The music of the Middle Ages all rested on the Gregorian mode as a basis. Instrumental accompaniments date back from the days of St. Ambrose, and some also accredit him with the introduction of antiphonal singing, while others give it to St. Hilary of Poitiers, who borrowed it from the practice of the Eastern Church. The instruments were "viols," and later "organs," but originally these were in unison only with the voices. Of course the tendency was more and more to richer and smoother melody, but an outcry was raised from time to time that the ancient methods were being departed from, and the simplicity of the music destroyed by too much elaboration, as well as by the introduction of "lewd" and secular melodies. The great reformer of Church music was Giovanni Palestrina [d. 1594], the Master of the Pope's Choir first at the Lateran Church, then at St. Maria Maggiore, then at the Vatican. He found not only the singers demoralised, but the sacred service, even the most solemn parts of it, set to music which only seemed to have for its object the display of the artifices of the composers, and the pleasing of the ear by utterly secular and frivolous melodies. The Masses and other compositions of Palestrina marked the beginning of a new epoch in sacred music. Pope Gregory XIII. commissioned him to revise and reform the whole system, and, although he died before this commission was fully completed, there was sufficient done to enable the reform to be carried on. He was a splendid melodist, but he never used his art for the purpose of display, subjugated it all to the sense of the words, and aimed at purity and beauty. His works, which are astonishing in quantity, are still admired as keenly as ever they were.

The rise of the English School of Music synchronises with the dawning of the Reformation. The first anthem in Boyce's Cathedral Music is by King Henry VIII., who was originally intended by his father for Holy Orders with a view to his appointment to the Primacy. Consequently, all the greatest English sacred compositions were written with a view to their performance in the service of the Anglican Church. The first great ecclesiastical writer of the first period was John Marbecke, organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor [d. 1585], whose Te Deum, adapted from the Ambrosian, is very popular in our own day. His Book of Common Prayer Noted, an adaptation of the old plainsong of the Church to the English Liturgy, is the basis of the English Choral Service, and was republished by Mr. Dyce in 1844, and there have been many editions since. Marbecke having written a theological treatise would have been burned as a heretic for Calvinism had he not hidden himself. He was followed by Redford, the author of the beautiful anthem "Rejoice in the Lord," Christopher Tye, Thomas Tallis [d. 1585], William Byrd [d. 1623], and Richard Farrant [1680]. The choral responses and liturgy of Tallis have never been superseded. His anthem "If ye love Me," and Byrd's sublime "Bow Thine ear," are among our first-class anthems. Farrant's "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake" is also deservedly popular, and his service in G Minor, though heavier than suited to modern taste, has some passages beautifully pathetic and sweet. The service in F, by Orlando Gibbons, is reckoned by many musicians the finest ever written for the English ritual, and his eight-part setting of the 47th Psalm as an anthem is almost unrivalled for its majestic swing. He died in 1625, and is buried in Canterbury Cathedral. The great Rebellion for a while put a complete stop to the progress of English Cathedral music. Organs were burned and music books torn up. At the Restoration, so great had been the destruction, that there was difficulty in reviving the choral services of the Church, and the taste of the King and his Court was towards more florid melodies than those of the old masters. But a new school slowly arose, not unworthy of its predecessors. Among its members were Child, Michael Wise, Blow, Lawes, and Henry Purcell, the last being the greatest composer which this country has produced. Under this school "Verse" anthems began, i.e. anthems with passages for solo voices, ending, and generally beginning, with a chorus, and with interludes for the organ only. One of the most curious of verse anthems is Purcell's "They that go down to the sea in ships," which opens with a bass solo beginning on upper D, and running down two octaves. It was written for a singer of exceptional voice compass. Such performances are hardly consistent with the solemn dignity which should characterise the service of the Church, and it is due to Purcell to say that such forgetfulness is not a mark of his writing in general.

Among the great composers who followed, we must name Jeremiah Clarke, Nares, Charles King, Drs. Greene and Boyce, Goldwin, Weldon. Quite worthy of being named with them are the amateurs Creighton and Aldrich, both cathedral dignitaries. The graceful service in G by the latter never fails to delight when well sung. The arrival of Handel in England in 1711 must not pass unmentioned, but the history of the oratorio hardly falls within our province. It created much opposition when it was first started in England. Cowper and Newton both wrote fiercely against it. But the opposition was not unreasonable, considering that the performances in church were, as far as it could be done, divested of all religious character; payment at the doors and fashionable lounging stood in the way of all idea of worship. The anthem music of later times in England is, some of it, very beautiful. Such names as Attwood, Walmisley, S. S. Wesley, Goss, Sterndale Bennett, Turle, to say nothing of living masters, are an honour to any national school of composers.

We have said nothing of the use of hymn singing in public worship. It had been the intention of Cranmer to translate some of the grand mediæval hymns for the use of the Church, but he only carried it out with respect to the Veni Creator, which is inserted in the Ordination Service. Consequently, the metrical singing of the Church was long confined to the translation of the Psalms by Sternhold and Hopkins, known as the Old Version. This was largely supplanted by the New Version of Tate and Brady in the days of Charles II. Nearly all the metres were either 8. 8. 8. ("Long Metre"); 8. 6. 8. 6. ("Common Metre"); or 6. 6. 8. 6. ("Short Metre").

But the Evangelical movement of the eighteenth century made large use of hymn singing, and this was greatly objected to by the old-fashioned church folk, e.g. Bishop Mant preached against it, and fifty years ago it was a distinguishing mark of "Low Church men" to find hymns sung in churches. Now, however, this is all changed. When there is a good choir in a parish church one anthem is generally sung in the day, but the hymns form one of the most popular portions of the service. There has been also a remarkable revival of the ancient Gregorian chanting, partly from a dislike of the florid styles into which chant music had fallen at the beginning of the century, partly from the revived love of mediævalism which has been the outgrowth of the Oxford movement. [See ANTHEM; CHANT; CHOIR.] The use of Choral Services again, which formerly was confined to cathedrals and college chapels, is now common in places where a choir can be gathered together. This is largely owing to the extended knowledge of music among the people. The objection which was formerly made to the chanting of the Psalms, that the unlettered could not follow it, is obviated now that everybody can read.

Myinchery.—A Saxon name for a nunnery.

Mystery [from mucin to stoma, "to shut the mouth"].—The word is used to denote something secret, which is not revealed to mankind, or only partly revealed. The word is applied both to doctrines and facts. Thus the Incarnation of Christ, and the Resurrection from the Dead, are often spoken of as mysteries.

In the ancient Church the Sacraments were so called, more especially the Holy Communion, and the Fathers frequently speak of the "sacred" and "tremendous mysteries" of this Sacrament. It is used in this sense in the Exhortation at the beginning of the Communion Office, where Christ is said to have "instituted and ordained holy mysteries as pledges of His love," etc.

Mystical Interpretation of Scripture.—The belief of universal Christendom that certain facts and persons of the Old Testament are types of Christ is sanctioned by many passages in the Bible itself. The Epistle to the Hebrews is in great measure founded upon this belief, and St. Paul, writing to the Galatians, calls the history of Abraham and his two sons an allegory. In ancient times this method of interpretation was so widely extended that almost every event was turned into a type, and invested with a secondary and spiritual meaning; thus the scarlet thread of Rahab was regarded as a symbol of the blood of Christ, and even the relation of Bathsheba to David was interpreted as the Church forsaking the Devil and joining herself to Christ. The critical study of the Bible, consequent upon the revival of learning in Europe, caused these fancies to recede into the background, and the historical narratives to be more closely studied. Milman and Stanley and Dr. Farrar, in our own country, have aimed at showing us the characters of the sacred Volume as men saw them in the flesh, and to bring before us their very times and the circumstances which surrounded them. There was an outcry made when Milman called Abraham a powerful Bedouin sheikh, as if he had said something irreverent, instead of striving to make the Bible characters living men and women who become more truly examples to us when we realise them as of like passions with ourselves. Yet the old mystical interpretation is by no means cast away. It does not follow that because we have learned to realise that Isaiah and Jeremiah were politicians with opponents and partisans, and threw themselves into the burning strifes of the day, that there is no place left for the doctrine of types and secondary senses. No doubt, as in the grotesque exegesis above referred to in the case of Bathsheba, there has been much which repels us, and so there is still. Some is fanciful, some to us repulsive. Thus in Bishop Wentworth's Commentary, which is very full of mystical meanings, the bulrushes of Moses's ark are likened to the manuscripts and books which have carried his writings down the stream of the World. Such a fancy, however far-fetched, is not so grotesque as that which sees in the outrage of Reuben on his father's concubine a type of the Pope debauching Christendom. [Wordsworth on Gen. xxxv. 22.] Bishop Horne was much given to spiritualising, so are Mr.

Spurgeon [e.g. in his Sermons on the Canticles], and Dr. Littledale in his Commentary on the Psalms. No doubt this method of exegesis was derived from the Jews. It was carried on by Origen and Clement of Alexandria, and, though more cautiously, by Augustine and Jerome: Nor is the mention of these great Fathers of the Church the only sanction which such a method of interpretation receives; the very fact that our Lord interpreted the Old Testament Scriptures concerning Himself, the brazen serpent and the deliverance of Jonah—all these things are sufficient to justify the principles of mystical interpretation. But the examples above quoted are a warning to us not to let fancy run riot with unreasonableness. Thus many fanciful views are founded, as has been thoroughly proved, upon false etymologies, and, therefore, as one able commentator of our time has well said, "the grammar and the lexicon must be supreme."

The father of mystical interpretation as a system in the Christian Church was Origen. He drew out four senses from the sacred narrative. There was, first, the literal; secondly, the allegorical; thirdly, the tropological, in which the allegory was transferred from the Church at large to each individual soul; and fourthly, the anagogical, in which the whole was transferred again from the earthly to the heavenly. Thus literally Jerusalem became allegorically the Church militant; tropologically, the Christian soul; anagogically, the heavenly city. Manna became first the Eucharist, then the continual inner life of the soul, and lastly, the marriage supper of the Lamb. This is surely reasonable enough; but one feels on doubtful ground when we are taught by Gregory the Great to see in Job an allegory of Christ, because Job means "grief," and Christ was a Man of sorrows, and he dwelt in the land of Us ("counsel"), and Christ rules in the heart by wise counsels; and then he goes on to interpret the seven sons and three daughters, and the 7,000 sheep and the 3,000 camels. One may safely assert that the sacred narrator had no idea of such meanings in his own mind. The growth of critical and reasonable interpretation will probably form a correction of mere extravagances, as the interpreters recognise the need, first of all, of mastering the text, and next of resting interpretations, not upon fanciful resemblances, but upon essential analogies, such as that of Isaac and Ishmael, the sons of freedom and bondage, with the liberty of Christianity and the bondage of the Law. Such principles commend themselves at once to the reason and the conscience, and such interpretations become, as so many have already become, part of the heritage of Christendom.

Mystics.—A class of theologians who profess to be able to see mysteries hidden from the uninitiated. They are to be found in every religion, and in every age. There are said to be three kinds : those who resign themselves to an imagined Divine manifestation, those who form a theory of God based on their own inspiration, and those who claim converse with spirits. The first Christian mystics seem to have arisen towards the close of the third century. They held that they must remain in a state of inaction while the Divine Spirit guided them, that if they turned their eyes from the world the soul would return to God, and they would enjoy not only communion with Him but would see truth undisguised and pure. Mysticism was thus a reaction against stiff formalism, a cry of the spirit for freedom. In the sixth century mysticism received a strong impetus from the publication of some writings alleged to be by Dionysius the Areopagite, as Mystical Theology, The Heavenly Hierarchy, The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy. They certainly are not his, but probably date from the time when they first appeared. The writer endeavoured to apply to Christianity the theosophy of the Neo-Platonist school, and to show that by means of an intermediate and mediatorial hierarchy man may hold communion with the higher powers, even rising higher till he can contemplate God Himself. These works were translated by John Scotus Erigena; afterwards a commentary was made on them by MAXIMUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE [q.v.], who, in addition to his works against the Monothelites, wrote a great number of mystical tracts on the Scriptures, the Trinity, and the ceremonies of the Church, all thoroughly saturated with the allegorising principles of the Alexandrian School.

The encouragement given to mysticism by Louis the Meek in the ninth century caused it to spread over Europe, especially in France. St. Bernard of Clairvaux was deeply impressed with it; and St. Hugo and Richard of St. Victoire in the twelfth century did much in opposing the materialism of the Schoolmen. The mysticism, however, of the West did not rush into heresy as that of the East seemed fated to do. Gnosticism, Montanism, Manichæism, all had their origin in the cry for spirit as against letter. In the West in course of time errors had their origin in the same root. Thus Bonaventura in the thirteenth, and Gerson in the fifteenth, laboured to reconcile the two elements. In the Netherlands and Germany, mystical Pantheism developed in the sect of the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT [q.v.]. In the fourteenth century, Henry Eckhart revived the Pantheism of Scotus, and united it with the severest asceticism. Ruysbroek caused a complete revolution in mysticism, which he based on Theism. He states that "man, having proceeded from God, is destined to return and become one with Him again. This oneness, however, is not to be understood as meaning that we become wholly identified with Him, and lose our own being as creatures, for that is an impossibility. What it is to be understood as meaning is, that we are conscious of being wholly in God, and at the same time also wholly in ourselves; that we are united with God, and yet at the same time remain different from Him." Mysticism was further developed by Gerhard in the Netherlands, and by John Tauler in Germany. Tauler, a Dominican, of Strassburg, and a great preacher, who was called Doctor Illuminatus, was very practical in his mysticism, and held the school of thought which was afterwards developed in the Reformation. His great friend, Henry Suso, of Ulm, a pupil of Eckhart, thus expressed his views :—"A meek man must be deformed from the creature, conformed to Christ, and transformed to Deity." Thomas à Kempis's works are pervaded by the longing for annihilation of self, and oneness with God, common to all the mediæval mystics. In the fourteenth century appeared a little book, named German Theology, to which no name is appended, but which is attributed to the Custos of the Herrn Haus, at Frankfort, one of the "FRIENDS OF GOD" [q.v.]. This book remained comparatively unnoticed till brought forward by Luther, who ranks it third among his favourite books, next to the Bible and St. Augustine. In 1621 it was prohibited in the Roman Church, but the edition published by Luther in 1518 met with great favour.

The Reformation, which had thus been aided by mysticism, almost caused its downfall when Luther proved the fallibility of oral tradition and individual intuition, and proclaimed the Scriptures the standard of Christian faith. But it soon broke out in more extravagant modes, especially among the ANABAPTISTS [q.v.], though under a different form. The first Reformers who professed mysticism were Paracelsus of Hohenheim [d. 1541] and Weigel of Meissen, in Saxony [d. 1688]; but the leader of the movement was Jacob Böhme, whose views show a mixture of Gnostic theosophy and naturalism. [BÖHME, JACOB.] Arndt [d. 1621], a Lutheran of Anhalt, who gave up his post when his province adopted Calvinism, was also a mystic, but his mysticism took the form of a spiritual religion. He wrote True Christianity and The Paradise of Christian Virtues, which are still read in Germany. Gerhard's Sacred Meditations and School of Piety are of the same tone as Arndt's works. Towards the close of the seventeenth century, Michael de Molinos, of Saragossa, published The Guide to a Spiritual Life, the substance of which is that, in pursuance of good, the mind must be withdrawn from all worldly objects, and be wholly merged in God; therefore his followers are called QUIETISTS [q.v.]. This book was condemned by Innocent XI., and Molinos was imprisoned. Among the most famed of the Quietists in the seventeenth century were Madame Guyon, Madame Bornignon, Peter Poiret, and Madame de Krüdener. In modern times the chief mystics have been EMANUEL SWEDENBORG and WILLIAM LAW [q.v.]. In the same category we must place the Hutchinsonians, the Jansenists, and those who substitute the subjective revelation of consciousness for the objective revelation of the written Word.

Mythology.—Mythology is the science of myths or legends relating to the worship of primitive nations. All races of men have confused and hazy traditions as to the origin of the world and of their own existence which have been handed down to them in the form of stories. At first these stories are taken literally; but with the progress of civilisation they are interpreted allegorically, and their absurdities and impossibilities are explained away as being the poetical way of stating familiar facts. Almost all national mythologies contain much that is "silly, savage, and senseless," and it has been the object of philosophers like Max Müller and Herbert Spencer to account for and explain the contradictions between the honour paid to mythological deities and heroes and the abhorrent deeds they are said to have committed. A certain resemblance runs through nearly all heathen mythologies, as they chiefly relate to the same matters—such as how all things came into being, the conflict between good and evil, the phenomena of summer and winter, day and night, storm and sunshine, etc. They may be briefly classified as follows:—The Mythology of Savage and Semi-Savage Tribes. In it the powers of nature are looked upon as beings very like themselves, allied to and interchangeable with animals, and endowed with magical powers. There is recognised a dual principle, one of good and another of evil. Thus amongst the Aborigines of Australia the creative power is symbolised by the eagle-hawk, and the destructive by the crow. Amongst the Bushmen of South Africa an insect takes the place of a bird; and with the Indians of the prairies the coyote, or prairie-dog, is the subject of their myths of the origin of matter. But most savage tribes start their mythology with taking for granted the existence of the earth or sea. They do not trouble themselves with questions as to the beginning of creation. With the Maoris of New Zealand the heaven and the earth were at one time indissolubly united in a close embrace, and of them were born the gods, who cut them asunder. But these gods were engaged in incessant conflict, as is the case in every system of mythology.

We know very little of the myths of the far East, nor is it easy in a short space to give much idea of the different beliefs of India as contained in the Vedas. The philosophical tendency of the Oriental mind does not find much expression in myth or legend, which have found their most perfect development in the poetry of Greece. But the leading ideas of a creative power opposed by a destroyer are to be found in the myths of the East as everywhere else, but here we meet with the idea of sexual relationships between the gods, which is developed to such an extreme in classical mythology.

In Egypt Osiris was worshipped as the king and giver of life. He was the son of Seb, answering to the Greek Chronus, or Time, and was represented in human form. His great enemy was Typhon, the spirit of evil, who succeeded in killing him, and scattering his remains over the country. One of the chief objects of adoration was the sun-god Ra, and each divinity was symbolised by certain animals, such as the bull, the calf, the cat; and plants, as the tamarisk.

When we come to Greece the field is so large as to preclude any attempt to summarise it. Suffice it to say that almost every natural phenomenon was associated with the name of a god, the legends concerning which were in many instances grossly obscene. It is very difficult to say what the original sources of the stories that have come down to us were. No doubt they have been greatly disguised and amplified by the imagination of their narrators.

In Scandinavian mythology we meet with Loki, the evil spirit; and Odin, the all-powerful husband of Frigga, and father of Baldur. "On the whole, the Scandinavian gods are a society, on an early human model, of beings indifferently human, animal, and divine, some of them derived from elemental forces personified, holding sway over the elements, and skilled in sorcery."

The question now arises, How are we to account for the origin of all these myths? Men in a savage state accept them as true and undoubted facts; nor to them does it appear at all strange that a man should become a kangaroo, a bear, a snake, or a prairie-dog. Such they imagine they were before they became men, and such they are likely to be after they are dead. There is no inconsistency or contradiction in the ridiculous stories they hear about the world around them, for, beyond the outward resemblance, they recognise no difference between themselves and the wild animals they fear or which fear them. But it is very different with races that have any pretence to civilisation. Their prophets and teachers have been obliged to account for the absurdity of much of their legendary mythology, which, indeed, had its natural effect in disgusting the more refined and reflective minds of Greece and Rome, and making them sceptical as to all religious teaching.

A very natural explanation was that of Eudemus the Messenian, B.C. 316, who maintained that the gods, equally with the heroes, were originally men, and all the tales about them only human facts, as they had been distorted and exaggerated by the imagination of their pious worshippers. In later times mythology has been spoken of as a disease of language. Professor Max Müller maintains that in the earliest stages of society men could only speak of what they saw under personal designations. Thus the sun would be to them the Shining One, the dawn of day the Burning One, and as the shining of the sun follows the dissipation of the cold and darkness of night they would describe the process as the Shining One following the Burning One, which gradually gave rise to the legend of Apollo, the God of Light, pursuing Daphne, who forthwith became a tree called Daphne, from its property of being easy to burn. In course of time the original meaning of the words used would fade away from the recollection of those using them, and remain only as proper names, so that what was originally understood as a plain statement of fact, such as the sunshine following the dawn of day, would become a romantic story of an amorous god pursuing a coy and fugitive maiden, who avoided his embrace when overtaken by being changed into a laurel-tree. With great research and detail Max Müller endeavours to establish his theory, pointing out the close relationship existing between the names which in every branch of the great Aryan family of languages denote the different subjects of mythological lore. But it is hardly necessary to seek such an origin for mythology. To the mind of childhood the idea of personality comes naturally. The child does not inquire closely into the cause and origin of what passes around it. The storm, the sunshine, the thunder, the rain are to its imaginative nature sufficiently explained as being the acts of a personal being, and savage tribes are but children of a larger growth. And what at first is to them a plain way of stating facts remains in later stages of mental growth a poetical representation of them. You say to a child, as it trembles at the sound of the thunder, "That is the voice of God," and the child believes it to be so in a plain and literal sense. But when it grows up it uses the same language, to which, however, it attaches a poetical or figurative meaning. Neither children nor uncivilised races can understand any phenomena unassociated with personal action. If anything happens, some one must have caused it. If the sun rides through the sky, Phaeton is driving his burning chariot: if the lightnings flash overhead, Jupiter is hurling his thunderbolts. Thus the earliest myths are those relating to physical events. After them come myths relating to ethics. They abound amongst all races, and are exemplified by such legends as Perseus and Andromeda, Jack the Giant Killer, and many others familiar to us as nursery tales. Then come historical myths, which have an inevitable tendency to gather fresh details as they pass from mouth to mouth. The stories of Hercules amongst the classics, and of Arthur in our own literature, are illustrations of these. Around a nucleus of actual fact gathers an accretion of fable.

But myth should not be confounded with allegory. They belong to different stages of social life, and are the results of different processes of mental working. Myth is only possible in the infancy of a race, allegory demands considerable mental development for its conception. Myth is the outcome of the unconscious action of the general mind of a whole people, allegory the result of a conscious and careful adaptation of means to an end on the part of an individual. It must have an object, myth has none. Allegory is meant to accomplish something yet to be done, myth to explain something already in being.

The chief subjects of myth, then, amongst all nations are: the origin of the world, the origin of man, sun and moon myths, death, and heroes; but all these have to be sought for amongst many books, for at present there exists no one trustworthy work on the very interesting subject of comparative mythology.

N

N or M.—The letters used to represent the child's answer to the first question in the Church Catechism, "What is your name?" Many explanations are given of the meaning of these letters; some say that they stand for typical Christian names, "Nicholas or Mary," others that they are a corruption of "N. or NN," from the Latin Nomen or Nomina. But against this is the fact that before the sixteenth century no one received two names at baptism, and therefore Nomina would be out of place. It has been suggested that "N. or M." is a misprint for Nom. In the marriage service N. is the only letter used to represent the names of both parties.

Nag's Head Consecration. [PARKER.]

Name.—It has been the custom from very early times to give the Christian name at baptism, probably in accordance with the practice of the Jews, who named their children at the ceremony of circumcision. It was usual also among the heathens to give their children names on the day when they were cleansed by lustration from natural pollution, and which was called "Dies Nominalis." There is no evidence in the works of early Christian writers to show that the Christians had adopted the practice, nor does the New Testament give any authority for it, but many instances are known of cases where new names were given at baptism, though many persons retained names which they had received before. It was usual in early times that Christian names should be taken from the Bible, or have reference to the Christian religion.

Names of Reproach. — From the earliest times the Christians have received nick-names, or names of reproach, from their enemies. The chief of these were [1] Nauarenes, a name given them by the Jews, which was adopted afterwards by a sect who kept up the Mosaic ceremonies with the Christian rites. [2] Falileans, a term always used by the Emperor Julian when speaking of the Christians. [3] Atheists, because they derided the worship of the heathen gods, and worshipped none that could be represented by art. [4] Greeks and Impostors. St. Jerome tells us that Christians in the streets were greeted by this epithet. Some say that they were called Greeks because of the proverbial falseness of that nation, and some because the Christian philosophers wore the Greek habit. [5] Magicians. The miracles of Christ and of his followers were frequently ascribed to sorcery, and Celsus and others said that He had studied magic in Egypt. Also the endurance shown by the martyrs was attributed to the same cause. [6] Sibyllists, so called by Celsus from the use by the Christians of the Sibylline books. [7] Biothanati, or self-murderers. [PARABOLANI and DESPERATI.] These names were given to them from their readiness to suffer martyrdom rather than deny their faith. [8] Samentarii and Semarii, from the faggots [samenta] with which they were burnt and stakes [semaria] to which they were tied. [9] Crucidae, or cross-worshippers, and ASTINARI, or ass worshippers, probably from the lowliness of the Medoemmer's earthly state. Scrawled on the walls of Pompeii was found a crucified figure with an ass's head, underneath which was written, "This is the Christian's God." [10] Plantinians. They were so called by Celsus as a ridicule upon the poverty and simplicity of most of the early Christians, in which they were supposed to resemble Plautus, who was said, in a time of famine, to work for a baker.

The orthodox Christians often also received names of ridicule from the heretics. Thus the Novatians called them Cornelianians, because they sided with Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, against Novatianus; and also Apostatice, Capitolins, and Synedrians, because they agreed to receive back penitent Apostates and those who had sacrificed in the Capitol into their communion. The Montanists called them Psychici, "carnal," as opposed to themselves, who were spiritual; the Millenarians, Allegorists, for looking upon the prophecy of a thousand years as allegorical; the Aetians, Chronites, because their religion was said to be temporary; the Manicheans, Simplices, or idiots; the Apollinarians, Anthropolatres, or man-worshippers; and the Origenists Philosarca, "lovers of the flesh."

Nantes, EDICT OF, issued by Henry IV. of France in 1598, secured to the Huguenots religious toleration so far as freedom of conscience went, but they were allowed their own worship only under certain conditions, and were obliged to observe the festivals and fasts of the Roman Catholic Church. Louis XIV., at the instigation of the Jesuits, revoked the Edict of Nantes in 1685, on the ground that there were no Protestants left in France; notwithstanding which, about a hundred thousand were driven from the country by the fierce persecutions which they underwent. Their ministers were expelled, their schools closed, and dragoons were quartered among them to get rid of them by any means short of murder. [HUGUENOTS.]

Narthex. — The antechapel of an ancient Church in which the catechumens and "the hearers," or the second order of penitents, were placed. In some churches an outside corridor or cloister was called the exterior narthex, and was occupied by the "mourners" or those penitents who were in the first stage of their penance.

Natalis, ALEXANDER. [NOEL, ALEXANDER.]

Natatoria or Natatorium. — The ancient name for a baptismal font or baptistery.

Nativity of the Blessed Virgin. — One of the black letter days of the Church Calendar, Sept. 8th. The first record of its observance is in 687, when Pope Sergius I. placed the Nativity among the festivals kept in memory of the Blessed Virgin. It was afterwards put into the martyrologies, and into Gregory the Great's Sacramentary. The Greeks and Eastern Christians did not begin to keep it until the twelfth century, but now do so with great solemnity.

Natural Laws, or laws of Nature, are simply statements of the orderly condition of things in nature. They state what is found in nature by a sufficient number of competent observers. Thus it has been found that specimens of air in different parts of the world have possessed about the same weight; hence it is inferred that the air everywhere has weight, and this is called a law of nature. Again, Newton observed that bodies fall to the ground at a certain rate, and from this and many like observations flowed the great law of gravitation, another law of nature; and from this again three others, the three laws of motion. Sometimes the term Law of Nature is applied to the condition which is observed when several simple laws of nature act together; thus Darwin noticed that those species of plants and animals which could live and thrive on the plainest food, which could get their food most easily, and which could withstand the accidents of weather, and of the attacks of their neighbours, with the least harm, would, in the long run, overpower and exterminate less hardy species, and this, the "survival of the fittest," is sometimes called a law of nature. As an illustration:—it has been found that the common English fly, because it is more thrifty and less dependent on surrounding circumstances, will, in time, exterminate the great blue-bottle of New Zealand. The laws of nature, collectively, are, briefly, then, the fewest and simplest assumptions, which being granted, the whole existing order of nature would result.

The further that scientific research is carried the more exactly is this "reign of law" found to prevail, so that we never look for any deviations from laws of nature: given certain conditions, we know that they will be followed by certain other conditions; the former we call cause, the latter, effect.

To these laws of nature there are, in Christian doctrine, apparently two great classes of exceptions—miracles and the results of prayer. Thus we are brought face to face with the questions—Can we believe in miracles, which seem to contradict these laws? Can we believe that prayer will produce any effect, when everything is regulated by law? The Deist, who believes that God created the universe and arranged it once for all, but does not now interfere in its concerns, would say that the Laws of Nature, as we call them, are the expression of God's mind and will, and that hence any interference with them, such as a miracle supposes, is impossible. The world, like a vast and perfect clock, has been wound up once for all, and not the slightest deviation in its working is to be looked for. But how stands the case with those who believe in the beneficent rule of a Personal God, whose tender mercies are over all His works? [The general question of the credibility of miracles will be found discussed in the articles MIRACLES and RESURRECTION.] In considering the relation of miracles to the laws of nature, it should be remembered that sin is always represented as having brought misery and disorder into the fair order of nature, whilst the effect of nearly all the miracles recorded in the Bible was to relieve misery or to restore some degree of order. Again, many miracles were but extensions or intensifications of natural occurrences, e.g. some of the "plagues" of Egypt—the flies, the frogs, the locusts—and even our Lord's miracles of healing. We cannot, then, regard them as contrary to nature. Perhaps the simplest way of looking at miracles in regard to natural laws, is to compare them with our own ordinary power of modifying the effects of those laws. We cannot violate these, but we can control, or alter the direction of the action of many of them at pleasure; thus, a ball thrown into the air would, by the law of gravitation, fall to the earth, but we can arrest the action of the law by catching the ball in our hands, and, against the same law, we can throw it up into the air again. No law has been "violated;" intelligent will has merely brought other forces into play, which have temporarily suspended the most conspicuous effect of the law of gravity. Much of our life, as animals, is consumed in struggling against and modifying laws of nature, which would, left to themselves, work our death. Thus, we clothe our bodies to prevent that continual radiation of heat which, in winter at least, would be fatal to life. Now, in our case the interference is exactly known; but if God should see fit to suspend or counteract laws of nature, though He might employ means or other laws in a similar way, the means being unknown to us, what we call miracles would be produced. Such considerations may prevent us from falling into the mistake of looking upon miracles as violent interruptions to the course of nature. But whether God actually has thus modified and controlled the laws of nature is, of course, a different inquiry, and in the present day the question of the reality of miracles practically centres in the greatest of them, the Resurrection of Christ. Accepting this, as the Church does, all the others naturally follow.

Similar remarks will apply in the case of Prayer, since answers to many prayers must be of a miraculous nature—special providences, as they are called. If we can so much control and modify the action of natural laws, why is it not possible to God? But the question is, Will God thus interfere at our request? Some reply, No. God has fore-ordained everything; and to suppose that He would make any change because we asked Him, would be to admit that His arrangements were faulty and needed amendment; prayer, therefore, can only be useful to the one who prays by making him dwell on the goodness of God, arousing his faith, etc. It may, however, be replied that although God foresees all things, He has yet given us free-will, and has made us responsible for the use of our wills, so that, in a manner never explained to us, we have the ordering of our lives and conduct largely in our own hands, and that hence there must be room for prayer in the providential arrangements of God. Besides this, the promises that prayer shall be heard and answered are so emphatic and so varied [Matt. vii. 7, 8; Jas. i. 5; 1 John v. 14, 15], that we cannot doubt that God desires us to pray in the full belief that, under the conditions He lays down, we shall obtain our requests. [PRAYER.] One condition of rightful prayer is that we should not put any hindrance in the way of its fulfilment; indeed, we ourselves are to further it as far as we can. It follows from this that we cannot expect an answer to our prayer if we are wilfully doing that which would make our desire impossible by a law of nature; for instance, natural laws tell us that a few grains of arsenic will destroy life: it would then be clearly useless to pray for deliverance from death if we deliberately took what we knew to be a fatal dose of the poison. Again, it would be improper, and probably useless, to pray for protection when amongst the sufferers in an epidemic of cholera, if, knowing and understanding the precautions to be used (i.e. the natural laws of the disease), we yet neglected them all when we might have observed them. God expects us to show our faith by using the reason He has given us, and conforming, as far as we know them, to the laws of nature, which are the general expression of His will, and therefore to be obeyed.

A very interesting question arises with regard to Natural Law: Have we any reason for supposing that laws of nature rule in the spiritual as well as in the natural world, or do they cease to have effect at the boundary line of Matter and Spirit? From time to time analogies have been traced between natural laws and spiritual laws, but Professor Drummond, in a remarkable book, Natural Law in the Spiritual World, takes up the position that spiritual laws are the same laws as natural laws; that the spiritual world is arranged on a like principle to the natural world, and that it is under a like governmental scheme. One example of Professor Drummond's method must suffice. Numerous and exact experiments have conclusively proved that life can only originate from pre-existing life; that under no conditions can particles of dead matter, whether organised or not, acquire life by themselves. This fact of life only from life is known as the Law of Biogenesis in the natural world. Professor Drummond maintains that the same law holds good in the spiritual world. Except a man be born again. . . . Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit [John iii. 3, 5, 6]. As in the natural, so in the spiritual world, there is life only from life. The general argument is very interesting, and the analogies suggested are in many points striking, and in some cases seem of real value; but as a whole the contention not only does not seem to be made out, but very weighty reasons have been advanced, both from science and theology, against Professor Drummond's cardinal conclusion.

Natural Theology.—The belief concerning the existence and the character of God which we derive from our observation of the phenomena of Nature. Thus Paley, in his work bearing this title, argues for the belief [1] in design, i.e. in an intelligent Creator; and [2] in the goodness of the Creator, judging from the arrangements observable in the Creation for promoting the happiness of the creatures. [God.]

Nave.—In modern churches, the central division of the body of the church, as distinguished from the aisles on either side. In ancient churches, the central portion as distinguished from the narthex or antechapel at the end, and the bema or chancel at the other. It was occupied by those worshippers who were in full communion with the Church, and also by the penitents of the third and fourth grades. In it stood the ambo, or reading desk.

Naylor, JAMES, was born in Yorkshire. After serving as quartermaster for some time in Colonel Lambert's regiment, he quitted the army and embraced the principles of the Quakers, but became "exalted with strange imaginations." Thus he rode into Bristol in 1656, a man and a woman holding his horse by the reins, and some others following after and singing the Tersanctus. The magistrates of Bristol seized and sent him to the Parliament, who tried and condemned him, as a blasphemer and seducer of the people, to have his tongue bored with a hot iron, to be marked in the forehead with the letter B to signify a blasphemer, then to be carried back to Bristol, where he should make his entry on horseback with his face to the tail, and then to be cast into prison for the remainder of his days. The Quakers disowned him, and condemned his extravagances; but afterwards, on his making a public recantation, he was received again into their society, and having gained his freedom, he publicly preached among them in London and other parts of England until his death in 1660. [FRIENDS.]

Neal, DANIEL, a Dissenting minister and author, was born in London, Dec. 14th, 1678. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and in 1700 went to Holland, where he studied at Utrecht and Leyden. On his return to England he became assistant to Dr. Singleton, pastor of an Independent congregation in Aldersgate Street, whom he succeeded in 1706. He died at Bath in 1743.

Neal's first work was a History of New England, which was very favourably received in America; but the book for which he is known is a History of the Puritans, published in 4 vols. 1732-8.

Neale, JOHN MASON, D.D., a learned ecclesiastical historian, and one of the best of English hymn writers [b. 1818, d. 1866.] He was educated at Cambridge, and ordained in 1841; a few years later he was appointed Warden of Sackville College, East Grinstead, and received no further preferment. He belonged to the Ritualist Party in the Church, and this brought him not only under popular dislike, but under the displeasure of the Bishop of Chichester, who for fourteen years would not allow him to officiate in the parish churches of his diocese. But he was a courageous and very earnest man, and laboured humbly and indefatigably at his desk, as well as in his hospital. The East Grinstead Sisterhood, which took the lead in furnishing nurses to the sick, was founded by him. His greatest work is his History of the Eastern Church, a book of wonderful learning and interest, though it is incomplete. The completed portion comprises a very elaborate account of the Liturgies and Ritual of the East, and the History of the Patriarchates of Alexandria and Antioch. Another specialty of Dr. Neale's authorship is his numerous books for children; Triumphs of the Cross, Tales of Christian Heroism, etc. etc., a collection for the most part of legends of early Christian martyrdoms, all marked by a wonderful charm of style, though the stories, it must be confessed, are to be regarded more as legends than as sound history. His hymns are known far and wide. Probably the best known are those translated from the rhythm of St. Bernard of Morlaix, "Jerusalem the Golden," "Brief life is here our portion," etc. Scarcely less popular are those from Eastern sources, "Art thou weary?" "The day is past and over." In conjunction with the Rev. T. Helmore, Dr. Neale published The Hymnal Noted, a systematic translation of the hymns in use in the Roman Church, to which Mr. Helmore supplied the music from ancient sources. The book has been to a great extent superseded by Hymns Ancient and Modern and other works which used the best of Dr. Neale's hymns. The writer of this paper has an autograph letter from him, in which he gives a general leave to use any copyright hymns of his on behalf of the Church. A glance at the Table of Hymns and Authors in any collection of the present day will show how greatly we are indebted to him. Other works of his are The Moral Concordance of St. Antony of Padua (a collection of texts arranged for sermons, mostly involving a large amount of mystical interpretation), a History of the Jansenist Church of Holland, several volumes of sermons, all more or less mystical, and a Commentary on the Psalms of the same character. Whatever judgment may be formed of his peculiar opinions, it will always be acknowledged by those who knew him that he was not only a man of remarkable learning, but also one of humility, of unselfishness, and of saintliness.

Neander, JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM, a great ecclesiastical historian, was born at Göttingen in 1789. He was the son of a Jewish pedlar, and bore the name of David Mendel. His mother was a relative of the celebrated philosopher Mendelssohn. David's early youth was spent at Hamburg, to which his mother, having been separated from her husband, had removed. He entered the college, where he soon attracted notice by his industry and talent, and the influence of friends that he made there inclined him towards Christianity. This inclination was greatly strengthened by the perusal of Schleiermacher's Discourses of Religion, first published in 1806, and in that year he was baptised by the name of Neander [Gr. "a new man"]. Just before his baptism he wrote an essay on religion, which, though rough and containing some errors, is characteristic of him, and declares his intention of consecrating himself to God. He removed to Halle, where he studied under Schleiermacher, to whom he afterwards acknowledged himself to be indebted, though they differed in some points, Neander being more positive and realistic in his views, and laying more stress upon the doctrine of sin as a free act and on the personality of God. After the French victory at Jena the University of Halle was shut up, and Neander arrived at Göttingen, where he studied under Planck and Heeren. It was here that he determined to become a Church historian. After a short stay in Hamburg he went to Heidelberg, where, in 1811, he took up his residence as a Privat Dozent, and wrote a Curriculum Vitæ and De Fidei Gnostice Idea secundum Clem. Alex. On account of his monograph, The Emperor Julian and his Times, he was called to the newly-established University of Berlin as Professor of Church History, and worked there in conjunction with Schleiermacher, De Wette, Marheineke, and other famous men. He continued at Berlin lecturing and writing, and produced here his most famous works. Between 1818 and 1826 appeared works of his on the Gnostics, A Life of St. Chrysostom, Memorials of Christian Life in the Early and Middle Ages, Tertullian and his Writings, etc. But these were only preparatory works to his great history, which appeared in five volumes between 1826 and 1846, Universal History of the Christian Religion and Church. His Life of Jesus in its Historical Relations was written to refute the celebrated work of Strauss.

As a theological teacher Neander was faithful and efficient, and he was complete master of his subject. His theology cannot be called entirely orthodox, especially on the subjects of inspiration, the sanctification of the Lord's Day, and the Holy Trinity; but he was deeply pious and reverent. His merit as a Church historian is that he struck out in an entirely different line to his predecessors. They had belonged to the pragmatic school, who looked on Christianity as a system of doctrine; while he, in his very first work, instead of merely discussing facts, brought out the hidden life of Christianity, realising throughout the presence of its Master and Leader. His idea of Church history is ably put forth in the introduction. "We look upon Christianity not as a system born in the hidden depths of man's nature, but as a power which has come down from heaven, in that heaven which has opened itself to a hostile world—a world which in its essence, as well as in its origin, is exalted high above all that man can create with his own powers, and which was designed to impart to him new life, and transform him in his innermost nature."

He was also very apt in bringing out the individualities of those of whom he was writing and allowing them to speak for themselves, without mentioning his own feelings or opinions. This, however, sometimes led him into the error of dwelling too much on individual Christians instead of the whole Christian Church, of regarding Christianity as a succession of famous men. Another fault is in his style, which was too diffuse and monotonous, and his ignorance on political and æsthetic matters lessens the value of his discussions on Church government and sacred art. In his anxiety not to be too severe on heretics, he sometimes does injustice to the zealous opponents of sects. But in spite of these defects his work may be fairly called what he said Church history ought to be—"A living witness for the Divine power of Christianity, a school of Christian experience, a voice of edification, instruction, and warning, sounding through all ages, for all who are disposed to hear."

Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man.—A book which was published under the sanction of the King and Convocation in 1543. To distinguish it from its predecessor, the Institution of a Christian Man, which was commonly called "The Bishop's Book," it received the name of "The King's Book." Henry VIII. took a considerable part in the work of The Necessary Doctrine, which is full of traces of Gardiner's influence over him at the time of writing. For instance, the preface, which is probably the King's work, forbade any under the rank of the nobility and gentry to read the English Bible under penalty of a month's imprisonment for each offence.

Necessitarians or Necessarians [also termed Fatalists].—Those who believe that all things happen of necessity, or according to fixed laws. This doctrine of necessity is connected with that most profound mystery, the origin of evil, and hence deep thinkers in all ages have occupied their minds with this question. Necessitarians may be divided into:—[1] Those, like the Materialists and Positivists, who believe that in nature things could not possibly be otherwise than they are, and therefore that even the will of God is not free to alter or control them. [2] Those who hold that man's will is not free to control his actions, but that he chooses according to fixed laws of his Creator. The leading writer among modern Necessitarians was Hobbes, who argued that every act of man's choice is the result of a series of causes, God being the First Cause; and that if we could see the connection of these causes, we should, as God does, see and know that man, in everything, acts of necessity. Another writer of this school was Leibnitz, who grounded his optimist doctrine of Necessity on his theory of the perfection of the universe. Anthony Collins argued in favour of Necessity, on the ground that all our actions are controlled by some force external to ourselves. Locke also held similar opinions. But the two most widely read writers on Necessity were Dr. Priestley [b. 1733, d. 1804] and Jonathan Edwards [b. 1703, d. 1758]. President of Princeton College, U.S. The former, who was a Materialist, adopted the views of Spinoza, and concluded from them that motives act upon the mind as weights in the scale, and that under certain conditions man will always act in the same way, his mind being as incapable of overcoming the motives or inducements brought to bear upon it, as the scale has of resisting the effects of the weights cast into it. President Edwards wrote two treatises on this subject, entitled An Enquiry into the Freedom of the Will, and on The Doctrine of Original Sin. He argues that a man may resist a certain amount of opposition to his will, but that his power of resistance is limited, and that under certain conditions the will is powerless to resist. This he calls moral necessity. He argued, too, that God's foreknowledge is inconsistent with an absence of necessity in man's choice. The Unitarians and Rationalists are credited with extensively holding strong views in favour of Necessity.

Necrology [Gr. nekros, "dead," and logos, "a discourse"].—A collection of accounts of the lives and deeds of deceased persons, published soon after their death. Also a list of the deceased members or benefactors of any religious community.

Necromancy [Gr. nekros, "dead," and manteia, "divination"].—The art of revealing future events by conversing with the dead. It originated in the East, and amongst the Greeks it was said to have been the invention of Orpheus. Thessaly was the chief place where it was practised, and it was connected there with many horrible rites. A distinct class of people called Psychagogoi, "evokers of spirits," made it their profession. Its practice is condemned in the Old Testament, where we have a singular instance of it in the story of the witch of Endor. With the establishment of Christianity by Constantine, necromancy was strictly forbidden. It is still practised by some of the negro tribes in Western Africa. Traces of it are to be found in old Scandinavian and Teutonic poems. In our own days, some persons in the United States, calling themselves spiritualists, pretend by table-turning and spirit-rapping to hold converse with the spirit-world.

Nectarius.—Successor of Gregory Nazianzen as Patriarch of Constantinople in 381, and predecessor of St. Chrysostom. He governed the Church with great piety and moderation. Since the Novatian heresies there had been a special penitential priest to receive the confessions of those who had sinned deeply after baptism, but several abuses had stepped in, and Nectarius abolished them.

Nectarius, Patriarch of Jerusalem from 1660-72, wrote a preface to Mogila's Confession in 1662, a declaration against Rome, and a Greek treatise against the theses on Papal Supremacy, published in Palestine to convert the Greeks to the Romish Church.

Neff, FELIX [b. 1798, d. 1829], was a native of Geneva, who was trained as a soldier till he was converted during the religious revival of his native city, and having been ordained in London, in 1823, went to the Hautes-Alpes, where he preached to the Waldenses, who had greatly degenerated in faith and morals. His life was a very noble and self-sacrificing one, and his labours were much blessed.

Nelson, ROBERT.—One of the large and goodly list of English laymen who have done noble service to the Church by their example and writings. He was born in London, 1656, graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1680 was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. He was intimate with Halley, with whom he travelled in France and Italy. He spent his life chiefly in writing. He refused to take the oaths of allegiance to King William, and remained a Nonjuror till 1709. He died at Kensington, Jan. 16th, 1715, leaving much money for the poor. His chief works are—Life of Bishop Bull; Practice of True Devotion; Companion for the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England, which is still the best book on the subject; The Life and Writings of William Kettlewell; Letters to Dr. Clarke on the Trinity; and The Whole Duty of a Christian.

Neology. [RATIONALISM.]

Neonomians [Gr. neos, "new," and nomos, "law"].—The name applied to the views of some teachers at the end of the seventeenth century, who asserted that the old Law was entirely abolished, and that Christianity was the new Law which had taken its place. It was one of the many controversies in which charges of Antinomianism were brought on one side and Legalism on the other. The Neonomians, while expressing their belief in Election, added that "the very elect are not personally justified until they receive Christ, but remain condemned; that there is a full offer of pardon and glory upon the terms of the Gospel to all who hear it, and that God thereby requires them to comply with the said terms." The principal teacher to whom the name Neonomian was applied was DANIEL WILLIAMS [q.v.].

Neophytes [Gr. "newly planted"] was a term used in the primitive Church for converts who had been recently baptised. Neophytes could not hold any offices in the Church; but when any enter the Roman Church they sometimes do so under special privileges from the Pope. The name was also given to those who had been newly received amongst the clergy or into any religious order.

Neo-Platonism.—A system of philosophy which became prominent in Alexandria about the end of the second century. Ammonius Saccas [i.e. the sack-bearer], so-called from his having been in former years a carrier, was at that time the chief teacher of this school. But long before this, Philo Judæus, a contemporary of Christ, had prepared the way, and, by some, is regarded as the first of the Neo-Platonists. The chief aim of this school was to popularise and revive the doctrines of Plato, by showing that all that was true in current systems of philosophy was in harmony with Platonism. At Alexandria every system of philosophy and every religious sect had its representatives; Ammonius Saccas taught that all these were derived from one original and perfect standard of philosophy, which had been delivered to the Egyptians by Hermes, and had been preserved in its purity by Plato. The amalgamation of the mysticism of Egypt with the speculations of Plato formed the basis of Neo-Platonism; and with it were blended many of the doctrines of Aristotle and of the existing philosophies. Ammonius, who had been brought up as a Christian, held that Christ was a great and wise teacher; but that His followers were misled, and had corrupted His teaching by spurious additions, such as the Divinity of Christ and other doctrines.

Christ, he said, would be favourable to Neo-Platonism, for He came to check error, but not to abolish the true standard of philosophy. Hence Neo-Platonism as taught by Ammonius was hostile to, and became the powerful rival of, Christianity. Other prominent teachers in this school were Numenius, a Jew, Longinus, and Plotinus, and a powerful patron was found in Julian the Apostate. Plotinus consolidated Neo-Platonism, and reduced it to a definite system. The Supreme Being, according to this school, was a mystical Trinity, consisting of unity, or Primitive Light, the source of all things; intelligence; and soul, from which emanated all the souls of men and animals. The souls of men were considered to be kept in their bodies as in a prison, and hence self-denial and asceticism were enjoined as a means towards the release of the soul, and its rise above earthly things. The most distinguished pupil of Plotinus was Porphyry; in his time Neo-Platonism became strongly hostile to Christianity. Their last great teacher was Proclus, a man of great learning, who lived about 450. In 519 the Emperor Justinian arbitrarily closed their school at Alexandria, and dispersed their followers, and by about the middle of the century they had disappeared altogether. But their system has greatly influenced Christianity in all ages. Origen was a pupil of Ammonius Saccas. Clement of Alexandria, and other divines, may be styled Christian Neo-Platonists, in that they, like Ammonius, sought to find out what was true in Platonism, and in every philosophy; and then to show that it was in harmony with the Christian faith. Truth, it was recognised, was not confined to any one sect or system. Thus Clement, in his Strom. i. 7, writes: "By philosophy, I mean not Stoic, Platonic, Epicurean, or Peripatetic theories, but all sound teaching of the collective schools, all precepts of virtue that have connection with religious knowledge." At the Reformation, Neo-Platonism flourished for a time, especially in Florence.

Neot, St., was an Anglo-Saxon saint of great holiness and learning, who resided first at Glastonbury, and afterwards in Cornwall, on the spot where the present St. Neot's was afterwards erected. It is said that he had a great influence over King Alfred, to whom he was a kinsman. He died on July 31st, about 822.

Nepotism [Lat. nepos, "a nephew"].—The practice among ecclesiastics of conferring honours, titles, or privileges upon members of their family.

Neri, St. PHILIP, founder of the Oratorians, descended from two of the noblest families in Tuscany, was born at Florence in 1515. When he was eighteen he went to his uncle, who was a merchant living at St. Germans, near Mount Cassino. It was intended that Philip should become his heir, but the youth feared being led away to a love of dissipation, and went to Rome, where he became tutor in the family of Galeotto Gaccia. Here he continued his studies, and his fame for learning and for purity of life became very great. He ate only once a day, and his food was generally bread and water. He was the disciple and intimate friend of St. Charles Borromeo [BORROMEO], and under him did many works of charity. In 1548, with the assistance of his confessor Persiano Rosa, he founded the famous Confraternity of the Blessed Trinity in the Church of Our Saviour del Campo for the relief of the poor. In 1551 he was ordained priest, and joined the community of St. Jerome, which had received the name of "The Charity." In 1564 he formed those who had joined him in the care of the hospitals, and who numbered about twenty, into the Congregation of the Oratorians, so called because they assembled for prayers in the oratory or chapel every morning and evening. The society obtained the approbation of Pope Gregory XIII., who gave to them the church of "Our Lady of Vallicella," of which they took possession in 1583. The Oratorians soon spread all over Italy, and were introduced into France in 1631. St. Philip died May 26th, 1595. He was canonised by Pope Gregory X. in 1622.

The Oratorians were established in France in 1611, to the great disgust of the Jesuits. The Order increased, however, until the Revolution, when it went down rapidly; but has been revived of late years. The first congregation in England was established at Birmingham in 1847 by Dr. J. H. (since Cardinal) Newman, and in 1849 F. W. Faber set up another at Brompton. The church which they have since built on that site is one of the most magnificent in London.

Nero, PERSECUTION OF, took place A.D. 64, in the tenth year of the Emperor's reign. In July of that year a fire broke out in Rome, on the south side of the Palatine Hill, and raged for some days, so that two-thirds of the city was burnt to ashes. Many believed that Nero himself was the cause of the fire, and, though there is no evidence to prove it, it is possible, from the fact of his cruelty of disposition and his desire for increased magnificence in the buildings of Rome. He endeavoured to allay suspicion by kindness to all who suffered from the fire, and laid the blame on the Christians, whom he caused to be persecuted with great violence. Some were torn asunder by wild beasts, others were crucified, and some were covered with pitch or other inflammable material and set up on poles to light the gardens of the Emperor's palace. [PERSECUTIONS.]

Nestorians.—Followers of Nestorius, who was Bishop of Constantinople from 428 to 431. Formerly a monk of Antioch, who had gained some reputation as a scholar and orator, he was nominated to the See of Constantinople by the Emperor Theodosius, and readily elected by the clergy and people, to put an end to the distractions caused by the claims of two rival Constantinopolitan candidates—Proclus and Philip of Side. He began his episcopal career by showing himself extremely zealous for the extirpation of heresy. After denouncing heretics in no moderate terms in a sermon preached on the day of his installation, he proceeded to active persecution of the Arians and other sects, and prevailed on the Emperor to publish a severe edict against them. But it was not long before Nestorius himself was accused of heretical views concerning the nature of our Lord. Many eminent divines, especially those of the school of Alexandria, in their zeal against Arianism, had been led to insist so strongly upon the Divine nature of the Saviour, as almost to exclude the idea of his human nature; and to assert of him as God that which could strictly only be said of him as man. For example, God was said to have been born, to have suffered, and died. This tendency was strongly condemned in a sermon preached at Constantinople by Anastasius, a presbyter whom Nestorius had brought with him from Antioch. Anastasius particularly attacked the use of the term Theotokos (Bearer, or Mother of God), which had been applied to the Virgin Mary by Athanasius and others, and was then in general use. Nestorius supported these views of Anastasius in numerous sermons, in which, amongst other things, he maintained that it was not allowable to affirm that God was born, or that man may be worshipped; and proposed to replace the word Theotokos (which, however, he admitted in a certain sense) by Christotokos, i.e. Mother of Christ, urging that since both natures were united in Christ, this term would express all the meaning that the older term was meant to convey. These sermons caused a great commotion in Constantinople. Proclus and others vehemently opposed Nestorius, some even going so far as to threaten to throw him into the sea; the Bishop, for his part, retaliated by deposing, banishing, or whipping such of his opponents as were under his authority. The controversy spread, and soon reached Egypt, where a number of monks adopted Nestorian views. Cyril of Alexandria, becoming aware of the dispute, entered the lists as the opponent of Nestorius, and the controversy between the two Bishops, inflamed by the standing rivalry of their Sees, assumed very much the complexion of a personal quarrel. Cyril enlisted the aid of Celestine, Bishop of Rome, and addressed several letters to Nestorius, the most important of which contained twelve anathemas, to which the Bishop of Constantinople was called upon to subscribe. Nestorius answered by sending back twelve counter-anathemas.

At length a General Council was called at Ephesus by the Emperor Theodosius to settle the vexed questions, A.D. 431. John of Antioch and other Eastern bishops were unable to reach Ephesus at the time appointed, owing to the bad state of the roads. Nevertheless, the Anti-Nestorians determined to open the Council, and a session was held under the presidency of Cyril. Nestorius was three times cited to appear, but, with his suffragans, he refused to obey in the absence of the Orientals. After the third citation the question was discussed in his absence, and Nestorius condemned and deposed "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ whom he hath blasphemed." The Emperor at first refused to ratify this sentence, but extensive bribery brought his Court over to the side of Cyril, and he was at last prevailed upon to confirm the deposition, and consent to the consecration of Maximian, a monk, to the bishopric of Constantinople. Nestorius was banished to his monastery at Antioch, where he remained till 454. Maximian dying in that year, the Nestorian party urged the restoration of their leader, and the disturbance thus caused was so serious, that he was sentenced to be banished for life to the Great Oasis. Here he was taken captive by a wild people called the Blemmyæ, who devastated the Oasis. On being released by these captors, he gave himself up to an officer of the Emperor in Egypt, under whose treatment he died [about A.D. 440].

The followers of Nestorius, being driven from the empire, wandered eastward, and settled in Persia, Ceylon, and on the Malabar and other parts of the coast of India. In the sixth century Nestorianism became the established religion of Persia, and all other forms of Christianity were forbidden. The absence of continuous written history prevents us from knowing accurately the course of the Nestorian Church. That they existed in China in the 8th century is proved by the fact that the Jesuits in the 17th century found there a monument set up by them in 781. In 1258 twenty-five Metropolitans acknowledged the authority of the Nestorian Patriarch of Bagdad. In the primacy of Archbishop Tait, repeated applications having been made by the Nestorian Christians for instruction and help, under isolation and oppression, Dr. Cutts was sent out to report on their condition. They have had, at least, the courage of their faith, however ignorant they may have been. Education has been more than once offered them by other Churches which had a purpose behind—namely, to proselytise them to their own views—a somewhat ungenerous method, and one which they greatly resent. The wisest suggestion which appears to have been made with respect to them is, that means should be afforded of procuring their union with the Eastern Church, as represented by the orthodox Patriarchs. If Eastern Christians could be brought to understand one another better, and to see that their separation is largely owing to misrepresentations and misunderstandings, a great benefit would accrue to Christianity. It would present an unbroken front to the reviving fanaticism of Islam, which threatens even yet to disturb very seriously the course of civilisation. And it would be a blessing to the English Church to be privileged thus to be the peacemaker. A mission to them, set on foot by Archbishop Benson, has sent back a most interesting report, which will be found in the Guardian newspaper for Sept. 14th and 28th, 1886. The object of this mission was to exhibit the doctrine and ritual of the Church of England, and its harmony with the Catholic antiquity which they claim, combined with learning in the Scriptures. The mission, as the report shows, was received with the most hearty welcome.

Newcastle. BISHOPRIC OF.—This diocese was founded in May, 1882, its first bishop being the Right Rev. Ernest Roland Wilberforce. It was taken out of the Sees of Durham and Carlisle, and comprises the entire county of Northumberland, the town and county of Berwick-on-Tweed, and part of Cumberland. It has 171 benefices. The officials of the diocese are two archdeacons, the vicar of St. Nicholas Church, Newcastle, and seventeen minor canons. The income of the See is £3,500 a year.

The church of St. Nicholas, which supplies the place of a cathedral, was consecrated by Osmund, Bishop of Salisbury, in 1091. It was burned down in 1216, and there are traces of its first rebuilding; the present structure of the nave, however, dates from 1359, and portions of it were not built till 1474. The style is Decorated and Early Perpendicular. It contains nine side-chapels or chantries. It was restored by Sir Gilbert Scott between 1873 and 1877.

Newcome, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Armagh, was born in 1729. He was educated at Abingdon Grammar School, and thence went to Oxford in 1753. In 1765 he became a D.D. and Chaplain to the Earl of Hertford, who was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. In the following year he was made Bishop of Dromore, whence he was successively preferred to Ossory in 1775, Waterford in 1779, and to Armagh in 1795. He died in 1800.

Archbishop Newcome was one of the eminent divines of the liberal school of the eighteenth century. He was an assiduous Biblical student, and wrote many valuable works, as Harmony of the Gospels, Observations on Our Lord's Conduct as a Divine Instructor and on the Excellence of His Moral Character, New Versions of the Twelve Minor Prophets and of Ezekiel, A Review of the Chief Difficulties in the Gospel History relating to Our Lord's Resurrection, and An Historical View of the English Biblical Translations from 1526-1776. The best of these is the Harmony of the Gospels, which contains much useful criticism and valuable information. It led to a controversy with Dr. Priestley on the duration of our Lord's ministry, Bishop Newcome arguing for three years, while Dr. Priestley limited the time to one year.

New Jerusalem Church.—A society that was founded by the followers of SWEDENBORG [q.v.], and so called because they hold that their Church is the "New Jerusalem" spoken of in the Apocalypse.

In December, 1783, five persons met together in London in answer to an advertisement for admirers of Swedenborg's writings, and these continued to meet at intervals, and by April, 1787, they had increased their number to thirty, and resolved to form a society. Amongst the first disciples were two clergymen of the Church of England, Thomas Hartley and John Clowes, also two Wesleyan preachers. The following is a copy of the Articles of Faith held by the New Church, not indeed written by Swedenborg, but drawn up at the Annual Conference of Ministers and Laymen.

The Articles of Faith of the New Church, signified by the New Jerusalem in the Revelation, are these :—

"1. That Jehovah God, the Creator and Preserver of heaven and earth, is Love Itself, and Wisdom Itself, or Good Itself and Truth Itself; that He is one, both in Essence and in Person, in whom, nevertheless, is the Divine Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which are the essential Divinity, the Divine Humanity, and the Divine Proceeding, answering to the soul, the body, and the operative energy in man. And that the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is that God.

"2. That Jehovah God himself descended from heaven as Divine Truth, which is the Word, and took upon Him Human nature for the purpose of removing from man the powers of hell, and restoring to order all things in the Spiritual world, and all things in the Church. That He removed from man the powers of hell, by combats against and victories over them, in which consisted the great work of Redemption. That by the same acts, which were His temptations, the last of which was the Passion of the Cross, He united, in His Humanity, Divine truth to Divine good, or Divine wisdom to Divine love, and so returned into His Divinity in which He was from eternity, together with and in His Glorified Humanity; whence He for ever keeps the infernal powers in subjection to Himself. And that all who believe in Him with the understanding, from the heart, and live accordingly, will be saved.

"3. That the Sacred Scripture, or Word of God, is Divine Truth Itself containing a Spiritual sense heretofore unknown, whence it is Divinely inspired and holy in every syllable, as well as a literal sense, which is the basis of its spiritual sense, and in which Divine Truth is in its fulness, its sanctity, and its power. Thus, that it is accommodated to the apprehension both of angels and men. That the spiritual and natural senses are united by correspondences, like soul and body, every natural expression and image answering to, and including, a spiritual and Divine idea. And thus, that the Word is the medium of communication with heaven, and of conjunction with the Lord.

"4. That the government of the Lord's Divine Love and Wisdom is the Divine Providence; which is universal, exercised according to certain fixed laws of order, and extending to the minutest particulars of the life of all men, both of the good and of the evil. That in all its operations it has respect to what is infinite and eternal, and makes no account of things transitory but as they are subservient to eternal ends; thus, that it mainly consists, with man, in the connection of things temporal with things eternal; for that the continual aim of the Lord, by His Divine Providence, is to join man to Himself, and Himself to man, that He may be able to give him the felicity of eternal life. And that the laws of permission are also the laws of the Divine Providence; since evil cannot be prevented without destroying the nature of man as an accountable agent; and because, also, it cannot be removed unless it be known, and cannot be known unless it appear. Thus, that no evil is permitted but to prevent a greater; and all is overruled by the Lord's Divine Providence for the greatest possible good.

"5. That man is not life, but only a recipient of life from the Lord, who, as He is Love Itself, and Wisdom Itself, is also Life Itself; which life is communicated by influx to all in the spiritual world, whether belonging to heaven or to hell, and to all in the natural world; but is received differently by every one, according to his quality and consequent state of reception.

"6. That man, during his abode in the world, is, as to his spirit, in the midst between heaven and hell, acted upon by influences from both, and thus is kept in a state of spiritual equilibrium between good and evil; in consequence of which he enjoys free will, or freedom of choice, in spiritual things as well as in natural, and possesses the capacity of either turning himself to the Lord and His kingdom, or turning himself away from the Lord, and connecting himself with the kingdom of darkness. And that, unless man had such freedom of choice, the Word would be of no use, the Church would be a mere name, man would possess nothing by virtue of which he could be conjoined to the Lord, and the cause of evil would be chargeable on God Himself.

"7. That man at this day is born into evil of all kinds, or with tendencies towards it. That, therefore, in order to his entering the kingdom of heaven, he must be regenerated or created anew; which great work is effected in a progressive manner, by the Lord alone, by charity and faith as mediums during man's co-operation. That as all men are redeemed, all men are capable of being regenerated, and consequently saved, every one according to his state. And that the regenerated man is in communion with the angels of heaven, and the unregenerate with the spirits of hell. But that no one is condemned for hereditary evil, any further than as he makes it his own by actual life; whence all who die in infancy are saved, special means being provided by the Lord in the other life for that purpose.

"8. That repentance is the first beginning of the Church in man; and that it consists in a man's examining himself, both in regard to his deeds and his intentions, in knowing and acknowledging his sins, confessing them before the Lord, supplicating Him for aid, and beginning a new life. That to this end, all evils, whether of affection, of thought, or of life, are to be abhorred and shunned as sins against God, and because they proceed from infernal spirits, who in the aggregate are called the Devil and Satan; and that good affections, good thoughts, and good actions are to be cherished and performed because they are of God and from God. That these things are to be done by man as of himself; nevertheless, under the acknowledgment and belief that it is from the Lord, operating in him and by him. That so far as man shuns evils as sins, so far they are removed, remitted, or forgiven; so far also he does good, not from himself, but from the Lord; and in the same degree he loves truth, has faith, and is a spiritual man. And that the Decalogue teaches what evils are sins.

"9. That Charity, Faith, and Good Works are unitedly necessary to man's salvation; since charity without faith is not spiritual but natural; and faith without charity is not living but dead; and both charity and faith, without good works, are merely mental and perishable things, because without use or fixedness. And that nothing of faith, of charity, or of good works is of man, but that all is of the Lord, and all the merit is His alone.

"10. That Baptism and the Holy Supper are sacraments of Divine institution, and are to be permanently observed; Baptism being an external medium of introduction into the Church, and a sign representative of man's purification and regeneration; and the Holy Supper being an external medium, to those who receive it worthily, of introduction, as to spirit, into heaven, and of conjunction with the Lord, of which also it is a sign and seal.

"11. That immediately after death, which is only a putting off of the material body, never to be resumed, man rises again in a spiritual or substantial body, in which he continues to live to eternity; in heaven, if his ruling affections, and thence his life, have been good; and in hell, if his ruling affections, and thence his life, have been evil.

"12. That now is the time of the Second Advent of the Lord, which is a coming, not in Person, but in the power and glory of His Holy Word. That it is attended, like His first coming, with the restoration to order of all things in the spiritual world, where the wonderful Divine operation, commonly expected under the name of the Last Judgement, has in consequence been performed; and with the preparing of the way for a New Church on the earth, the first Christian Church having spiritually come to its end of consummation, through evils of life and errors of doctrine, as foretold by the Lord in the Gospels. And that this New or Second Christian Church, which will be the Crown of all Churches, and will stand for ever, is what was representatively seen by John, when he beheld the holy city, New Jerusalem, descending from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband."

The general affairs of the New Church are administered by a conference of ministers and laymen. Its principal societies for spreading its doctrines are the "Swedenborg Printing Society," established in 1810, and the "Missionary and Tract Society," established in 1821. Its disciples are found now in all parts of Christendom; its first minister in America was ordained in 1798, since which time it has made great progress.

At the present time there are in England about seventy-five societies, twelve of which are in London or its neighbourhood; they are governed by a Conference, which meets annually, and is composed of ministers and representatives of the societies. In America, where there is a still greater number of societies, they have a general convention composed of eleven associations and six societies. They have also societies in Germany, Austria, France, Switzerland, Italy, Norway and Sweden, Australia, and Africa.

Newton, SIR ISAAC [b. at Woolthorpe, Lincolnshire, 1642; d. in London, 1727].—The greatest mathematician England has produced. In spite of feeble health he made great progress in mechanics and mathematics; he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1660, became a Fellow in 1667, and two years later was appointed Lucasian Professor of Mathematics. In 1699 he became Master of the Mint, and continued to hold the office till his death. The wonderful discoveries by which he has gained for himself lasting fame were chiefly made in the earlier part of his life; but it is not with these that we have to do. In religion he was deeply earnest, but displayed a tendency towards Arianism. He was devoted to Bible study, the results of which he published in his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended; Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of St. John: and a Historical Account of Two Notable Corruptions of Scripture.

Newton, JOHN, one of the leaders of the Evangelical party, well known as the friend of William Cowper, was born in 1725. His mother, who was a Dissenter, had a great wish that her son should be brought up to be a minister, but she died when he was seven years old. This made a great change in Newton's life, for, though his father and stepmother were kind to him, they had no great love for him. At ten years old he left school, and went on several voyages with his father. He afterwards was for some years at Alicante, and when he was about eighteen a prospect was opened for him in the West Indies, but before starting he went to Kent on business, where he met and fell in love with Mary Catlett, who afterwards became his wife. He stayed there too long, and the ship sailed without him.

Through the teaching of his mother he had been seriously inclined in his youth; but he came across Shaftesbury's Characteristics, and the tendency to infidelity which they created in him was increased by an evil companion, and for a few years he lived in vice and profanity. He went to Guinea, where he had intended to make his fortune in the slave trade, but he mismanaged his affairs and fell into great poverty. After two years of misery he wrote home, and a ship was sent out to fetch him. On the way home came the turning-point of his life. There was a storm, the ship was wrecked, and the crew momentarily expected it to sink. Newton was frightened as his past life rose up before him, and made resolutions which he kept, in spite of one relapse when he was again in Africa, but a fever which he had there again convinced him of his sin. During his convalescence he studied the Bible, Divinity, and Latin. On his return to England he was married, early in 1750, to Mary Catlett, whom he had now loved for seven years. He used to say that the thought of her had some influence over him, even at the time of his greatest wickedness, and his married life, which lasted forty years, was very happy.

He would have liked now to give up his seafaring life, but there was no other way of earning a living open to him. It was some years before he decided on entering the ministry. He would have preferred that of the Dissenters, but his wife persuaded him to become a minister of the Church of England, when the Bishop of Lincoln, in 1764, consented to ordain him to the curacy of Olney. He only received £60 a year, so found it very difficult to live; but Mr. Thornton gave him £200 a year to enable him to do more good among the poor. He remained at Olney fifteen years, during which time a new gallery had to be added to the church to provide for the increasing congregation, and the number of communicants became very large. It was here that his friendship with Cowper began.

In 1779 he was opposed by a hostile party in the town, and at the same time the livings of St. Mary Woolnoth and St. Mary Woolchurch were offered him by Mr. Thornton, and he accepted them. There he preached assiduously, generally between three and six sermons a week, and his church was always crowded. He had not a good delivery, but his illustrations were very apt, and his words struck home to his hearers.

He died Dec. 21st, 1807, continuing his work till the end. He wrote a good deal, the chief of his productions being the Apologia, or Defence of Conformity, the Memoirs of the Rev. J. Cowper, and of the Rev. Mr. Grimshaw, a collection of his letters entitled Cardiphonia, and the Olney Hymns, which he composed in conjunction with his friend Cowper.

Newton, THOMAS, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's and Bishop of Bristol [b. at Lichfield, 1704, d. 1782]. He was educated at Westminster School and then entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and was ordained priest in 1730. In 1761 he was appointed Bishop of Bristol, and in 1768 Dean of St. Paul's. His life and writings, forming six volumes, passed into two editions. The volumes are thus divided: 1, Life and Parliamentary Speeches; 2 and 3, Dissertations on the Old Testament and on Moral Subjects; 4, Sermons; 5 and 6, Dissertations on the New Testament, and five Charges on—[1] reading the Scriptures, [2] the increase of Popery, [3] the licentiousness of the times, [4] the late attempts against the Church, [5] a dissuasive from schism. He also published in 1749 an edition of Milton's Paradise Lost [2 vols.], with critical notes, and a Life of its author.

New Year, CELEBRATION OF.—It seems to have been the custom of most of the ancient nations to mark the first day of the year with rejoicings, and we find tokens of it among the Chinese, Romans, Jews, Egyptians, etc. In the early days of Christianity the Fathers made a protest against the feasting and revellings that took place among the heathens on that day, and preached severe penitence sermons. When Dec. 25th was recognised as the day of our Lord's Nativity, Jan. 1st, as the eighth day after, became also a festival, the day of Christ's Circumcision, and Dionysius Exiguus dates the years of his era "from the circumcision of the Lord." In many old documents the day goes by the name of "the octave of the Lord." Even when the day first began to be kept as a holy day it was some time before Christians thought of it as the first day of the year; but at last it became a custom for the priests to deliver a New Year's oration, which habit was continued until the Reformation. In some churches it is now the custom to begin a service at 11 p.m. on New Year's Eve, and continuing it till after midnight, while almost all "ring the old year out and the new year in."

New Zealand.—The islands which comprise New Zealand were first discovered by a Dutchman, Abel Janssen Tasman, in 1642, but the first European who landed there was Captain Cook in 1769. He found that the inhabitants were a savage tribe of Maoris. They were cannibals, and there was some hesitation about visiting their island; but in 1809 several of them came to Port Jackson, where they were welcomed by Dr. Marsden, then chaplain to the convicts [MARSDEN, SAMUEL], who, having learnt about the country and people, came to England, and soon returned with a small party, sent by the Church Missionary Society, who landed on the northern island on Dec. 20th, 1814. Marsden's success was slow but real; in 1822 the Rev. H. Williams, and in 1825 the Rev. W. Williams, joined the mission. A translation of the New Testament and Prayer Book was made in 1833, and three years after New Zealand was included in the new See of Australia. In 1840, at the request of the chiefs, the islands were put under British rule. An English settlement had already been founded at Wellington, followed by settlements at New Plymouth and Nelson. In 1841 was founded the Bishopric of New Zealand, the first bishop being the noble Bishop Selwyn, whose life is a splendid chapter in missionary history. St. John's College was founded at Auckland, and four archdeaconries were constituted. In 1846 two converts were sent to preach to a warlike tribe, and were martyred. The first native deacon was ordained in 1862, and others soon followed. An insurrection took place in 1862, headed by William Tamihana, a native who declared himself to be the angel Gabriel, and instituted a religion composed of Romanism, Wesleyanism, Mahometanism, and Church doctrines.

There are now seven bishoprics. The colony of Canterbury was founded in 1850, and became a bishopric in 1856. The diocese of Nelson, Wellington, and Waiapu were founded in 1858, those of Christ Church and Dunedin in 1866. It is said that in 1874 in New Zealand there were of the Church of England 172 churches, and an attendance of 19,916; the Presbyterians had 125 churches, with an attendance of 18,541; the Wesleyans 105 chapels, with 12,723 people; Roman Catholics 86 chapels, in attendance 10,967; Baptists, Free Methodists, and Congregationalists, an attendance of about 3,000 each.

The following is a percentage table of the religions of the country according to the church census of 1878:—

Episcopalians . . .	43·4	Baptists . . .	2·3
Presbyterians . . .	23·8	Congregationalists . . .	1·4
Roman Catholics . . .	14·7	Lutherans . . .	1·4
Methodists . . .	9·4	Other sects . . .	3·6

Niceæa, COUNCIL OF.—This was the first council in which East and West met together, and hence it is the first of the four General Councils of the Church. The peace of the Church had been greatly disturbed by the teaching of Arius and his followers concerning the Divinity of Christ, whereupon the Emperor Constantine, being anxious to see the Church united and at peace, summoned a General Council to meet at Niceæa in Bithynia, in June, 325, to settle the questions at issue. Niceæa was chosen as the place of assembly partly because of its healthy situation and partly on account of its nearness to the seat of government, Nicomedia, twenty miles distant.

The number of bishops who attended the Council has been generally received as 318; and each bishop had two presbyters and other attendants, so that the whole assembly numbered, according to some accounts, over 2,000. As Arianism was of Eastern growth, and unknown in the West, the great majority of the Council were Eastern bishops, only about ten coming from the West. The composition of the assembly was of a very mixed character. There were deputies from Egypt, headed by Alexander, the aged Bishop of Alexandria; in attendance upon him was a young deacon, twenty-five years of age, represented as small and insignificant, but who was none other than the great Athanasius, the champion of the orthodox; from Alexandria also came Arius, the leader of the opposite party. There were also bishops from Syria, including Eustathius of Antioch; Eusebius, the historian, of Cæsarea, who was suspected of being an Arian; one bishop came from Persia, another from Armenia others from Asia Minor, Greece, and Cyprus. Another conspicuous bishop was Eusebius, of Nicomedia, a strong Arian. It was from his hands that the Emperor Constantine, on his deathbed, received the rite of Baptism. Alexander, a presbyter, and Aecius the Novatian, represented Byzantium; and Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra, was a prominent speaker on the orthodox side; all these came from the East. The West was represented by deputies from France, Calabria, Sicily, and Milan. Rome sent two presbyters, Victor and Vincentius, her Bishop, Sylvester, being too aged to be present. From Carthage came Cæcilian, and from Spain Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, who is represented as holding the chief place in the Council at the Emperor's right hand. The sight of these Fathers of the Church was rendered deeply impressive by the fact that the majority of them bore traces of the severe persecutions through which they had passed. They were truly an army of confessors; and for this reason they were peculiarly qualified to testify what was the true faith of the Church. Many heathen philosophers were attracted to Niceæa, and discussed with the bishops outside the Council.

On the arrival of Constantine, the Council was formally opened; first, an address to the Emperor was recited by Eusebius of Cæsarea, and a thanksgiving to God for the Emperor's victory over Licinius. Constantine from his throne in the midst of the Council, then addressed the assembled bishops, exhorting them to unity and concord; and then, in order to promote this desirable end, he openly in their presence burnt all the written complaints and accusations that various bishops had laid before him, adding these words: "It is the command of Christ that he who desires to be himself forgiven must first forgive his brother." Coming now to the main purpose for which the Council was assembled, viz. the determining of the faith which had been attacked by Arius, it seems certain that Arius was heard in defence of his opinions, and that he boldly adhered to them; whereupon the assembled bishops raised their hands and closed their ears in horror at such blasphemous words. Arius was expelled, and the Council set themselves to issue the result of their deliberations in the form of a creed, setting forth the true faith. First of all Eusebius of Cæsarea presented a creed which had been long in use in Cæsarea; the Arian bishops, about eighteen or twenty in number, were willing to sign it; but as this creed evaded the very points at issue, a very important phrase was inserted, viz. homoousion to patri—"of one substance with the Father," and other alterations. The creed of Cæsarea was then adopted as the faith or creed of the Council of Nicæa. The Emperor acquiesced in the decisions of the Council, banished Arius and his followers, and ordered all the heretic's writings to be burnt. He further decreed to banish any who refused to subscribe the Nicene Creed. Theonas and Secundus were the only two bishops who persevered in refusing to subscribe to the Creed, and they were banished.

The following anathema was added to the Creed:—

"But those that say 'there was when He was not,' and 'before He was begotten He was not,' and that 'He came into existence from what was not,' or who profess that the Son of God is of a different 'person' or 'substance,' or that He was created, or changeable, or variable, the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes them."

Another question was settled by this Council, viz. the date for keeping Easter. The Council decreed by common consent [i] to discard the custom of keeping the Christian Passover on the same day as the Jewish, viz. the 14th of Nisan, and [ii] to keep it on the Sunday that came next after the full moon of the vernal equinox.

The Council, before breaking up, passed twenty canons for the correction of abuses, and for regulating the discipline and government of the Church. Of these twenty Nicene canons, the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 17th refer to the morals and behaviour of the clergy; the 17th, forbidding usury; the other three restraining abuses now happily extinct. The 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 15th, 16th, and 18th refer to clerical discipline. The 4th is still observed throughout the greater part of Christendom, and orders three bishops at least to be present at the consecration of a bishop. The 5th limits the power of the bishop, by ordering a Synod to meet twice a year, in order to investigate the cases of those excommunicated. The 6th and 7th preserved to the Metropolitans of Alexandria, Antioch, and Cæsarea their ancient privileges. The 15th has been generally disregarded throughout the Church; it forbids the translation or promotion of ecclesiastics from one city to another. The 18th restrains the powers of deacons, who in that age practised a kind of tyranny, which has been imitated by the other orders of the ministry in later times. The 16th forbids bishops to ordain outside their own dioceses. Other canons refer to the cases of those who have "lapsed" in times of persecution, laying down on what conditions such are to be received back into the Church. The last canon, the 20th, directs prayers to be offered up, the people standing.

Another question, of local interest only, was settled, viz. the Melitian schism in the Church in Egypt.

The work of the Council was now completed. The Emperor, in a letter to the Churches throughout the empire, set forth the settlement of the Arian and Paschal controversies; and, having entertained the whole of the bishops present at the Council, dismissed them to their dioceses, exhorting them to prize concord above all things, and begging them to pray for him. The Council, which had commenced probably in June, closed with the banquet on July 25th.

Nicander, Sr., and Marcian, Sr.—Martyrs in the reign of Diocletian. They were soldiers in the Roman army until their conversion to Christianity. Being brought before the Governor Maximus, they were charged with disobedience to their prince and impiety to the gods of the empire. The imperial edict was read, which obliged all to sacrifice to the heathen deities, and they were accordingly required to comply with it immediately. Maximus, however, said he would make the matter as easy as he could, and not insist on any great and solemn sacrifice, but be satisfied with their throwing a little incense into the fire in honour of the gods. They persisted in their refusal to do this, and Daria, the wife of Nicander, urged her husband to remain steadfast in his faith, even begging that she might herself share his martyrdom, and she was consequently imprisoned, but afterwards released. Nicander and Marcian were beheaded, June 17th, about 303. The place of their martyrdom is supposed to be Moesia, a province of Illyricum: but some say that it was Venafrò, in the kingdom of Naples, and that it was in the reign of Domitian.

Nicene Creed. [CREED, NICENE.]

Nicephorus I., Emperor of Constantinople, was originally Treasurer and Chancellor. In 802 he took possession of the throne, banishing the Empress Irene to Lesbos, where she died shortly after. He is described as being of a licentious, rapacious, and cruel character. In his relations with the Church he heavily taxed Church property, favoured the Iconoclasts and sects, especially the Paulicians, and prohibited the Bishop of Constantinople from carrying on a correspondence with the Pope of Rome. He was killed A.D. 811, in a war with the Bulgarians.

Nicephorus II. [PHOCAS] became Emperor in 963. He published a decree, providing that no bishop should be installed without the consent of the Emperor, and appointed officers to the charge of vacant Sees, with orders to spend a limited amount for ecclesiastical purposes, and to pay the rest into the royal treasury. He was murdered in 969 by John Tzimisce, who succeeded him.

Nicephorus, St.—A martyr of Antioch during the persecution raised by the Emperors Valerian and Gallienus. He was a layman, and was a great friend of one Sapricus, a priest. But discord rose up between them, and for a time they never met. At last Nicephorus attempted a reconciliation, but in vain. The persecution breaking out, Sapricus was seized for his religion, tried, and, after going through great torture, was condemned to be beheaded. Nicephorus, as they were leading the priest to execution, came to him and intreated to be forgiven, but his request was refused by Sapricus. On mounting the scaffold the priest renounced the Christian religion, and thus saved his own life. Nicephorus did what he could to make him persevere, but to no purpose, so declared himself a Christian, and ready to suffer in the apostate's stead, and was martyred on Feb. 9th, 260.

Nicholas, St., Archbishop of Myra, was born in the middle of the third century at Patara, in Lycia, of Christian parents. He entered the Monastery of Sion, near Myra, became Abbot, and was noted for his charity and benevolence. One of the deeds ascribed to him is that of throwing three bags of gold into the house of a poor nobleman who was unable to furnish a dowry for his three daughters, and was tempted to sell them to a life of shame until Nicholas thus delivered them. This constituted him the patron saint of virgins. Soon after his return Nicholas was chosen Archbishop of Myra. He is supposed to have died on Dec. 6th, 342.

The three balls, the attribute of St. Nicholas, are either the three bags of gold before spoken of, or three loaves of bread, an emblem of his charity. The fact that the three balls are the sign of pawnbrokers has a curious origin.

The three gold balls were a conspicuous object on the spire of St. Nicholas Church, Lombard Street, and as in the Middle Ages the money-brokers had their head-quarters in this street, it became the fashion for persons who set up as money-lenders to use the three balls of St. Nicholas as their trade mark. Nicholas is also the patron of thieves, because he forced them to return some property they had stolen; of sailors, because he stilled a storm when journeying to the Holy Land; and of children, because he is said to have restored to life three boys who had been murdered, dismembered, and put into a tub of wine. St. Nicholas is one of the most popular of saints, the chief patron of Russia and of Venice, Freiburg, and many other towns, chiefly seaports. There are said to be 372 churches dedicated to him in England.

Nicolaitanes.—A heretical sect, holding the doctrines of Antinomianism, and condemned in the Book of Revelations as holding "the doctrine of Balaam . . . to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication." Probably it was these whom St. Paul described as "glorying in their shame, mind- ing earthly things." The Nicolaitanes are thought by some to derive their name from Nicolas the proselyte; others believe that the name is only the Greek form of Balaam, "destroyer of the people," of whom they were supposed to be symbolical. They are spoken of by Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria as being in existence in the second century; and Epiphanius says that the sect became merged in that of the Gnostics.

Nicole, PETER, was born at Chartres in 1626. He was a strong Jansenist, on which account he joined the Port Royalists, and became celebrated as a great preacher. He died in Paris, November, 1695.

Nicole assisted Arnaud in several works, as the Perpetuity of Faith and Logic of Port Royal. He translated Pascal's Provincial Letters into Latin, and wrote notes upon them. His chief original works are Essais de Morale, controversial tracts against Calvinism, a treatise of the unity of the Church, and a treatise concerning the Quietists.

Nicomedes, St.—This saint, during the Domitian persecution, attended the Christians while in prison, giving them all the assistance and comfort in his power. He also found means of giving their bodies a decent burial in spite of their persecutors, who would have interred them as public criminals. While burying the body of St. Felicula, he was apprehended and beaten to death. He is commemorated on Sept. 15th.

Nihilists.—A sect that maintained that it was impossible for God to become man, inasmuch as God is unchangeable, therefore that Christ was not different after His Incarnation to what He was before. The Incarnation was a Theophany, and God suffered Himself to appear man. This theory, though not so strongly put, was started by Abelard at the beginning of the twelfth century, but greatly developed and brought into notice by Peter Lombard some years later. The sect was strongly opposed by John of Cornwall and Walter St. Victor, and finally condemned by the Lateran Council which met in 1179. In the course of the fourteenth century the name was applied to a German sect of a very short-lived existence, who declared that God, the devil, man, heaven, hell, good, and evil did not exist, only appeared to do so, that everything was nothing, in fact.

Nimbus or Aureole.—A circular disc surrounding the head of Christ, and of saints and angels, symbolising the light which was supposed to proceed from those filled with the Holy Spirit. It was used in very ancient times by the Egyptians, and the Romans adopted the symbol for the heads of those invested with power. The Christians adopted it in the fifth century, and applied it first to Christ, then to the angels, and finally to the saints. The nimbus round Christ's head was sometimes triangular, symbolising the Trinity.

Ninian, St.—The apostle of the Southern Picts, who lived in the fourth century. He was the son of a Cumbrian prince, and resided some time at Rome, where he was instructed in religion and then returned to his native town. He built a stone church, which the Britons, having never before seen a building of stone, named Candida casa, or White House, which was afterwards called Withern. Here he fixed his See, dedicating the church to St. Martin. Ninian converted the Cumbrians and Southern Picts as far as the Grampians, and his followers did great good through the whole land. He died Sept. 16th, 432.

Nitzsch, KARL IMMANUEL, one of the most distinguished of modern German theologians, was born at Borna, in Saxony, in 1787. His father was Professor of Theology at Wittenberg, an ardent follower of Kant. The son was also educated at Wittenberg, where his principal theological teacher was Reinhard, one of the last Supernaturalists; but his teaching was soon counteracted by the influence of Schleiermacher and Daub. In 1810 he became Assistant Pastor, and subsequently Parish Minister, at Wittenberg. His opinions soon made themselves felt, and he was considered one of that new school, of which Neander is the head, who endeavoured to reconcile faith and science, not by forced methods, but by showing in their own lives that union of reason and reverence for which they argued in their writings. In 1822 Nitzsch was called to Bonn as Professor of Theology and University Preacher, and laboured there for over twenty years, writing and busying himself in all matters concerning the Prussian Church. He wrote several treatises in favour of the union between the Lutheran and Reformed branches of the Church, and was one of the leaders of the General Synod which met on the subject at Berlin in 1846. In the following year he succeeded Marheineke at Berlin, where he became Professor of Theology, University Preacher, and Upper Consistorial Councillor, and in 1854 Provost of St. Nicolai Church. He died Aug. 21st, 1868.

Nitzsch and Twisten have been considered the principal followers of Schleiermacher's theology, though they differed in some points, as in God's relation to the world, the Divine attributes, etc. He was also one of the founders of the German Evangelical Church Diet, which first met in 1848. His chief work is his System of Christian Doctrine, showing the moral bearing of all the articles of faith, and the doctrinal root of all the Christian virtues. He takes his material wholly from the Bible, and in a number of notes refers to later opinions and systems. Another noted work is his Practical Theology. In 1836 appeared A Protestant Answer to Möhler's "Symbolik," and he also wrote against Strauss's Dogmatics. His other works consist chiefly of sermons, and of various articles which appeared in the theological journals.

Noailles, LEWIS ANTHONY DE, Cardinal, was born in 1651. He became Doctor of Divinity at Paris in 1676, Bishop of Cahors in 1679 and of Châlons upon the Maine in 1680, and Archbishop of Paris in 1695. He was strongly opposed to the Quietists, writing a treatise entitled A Pastoral Instruction touching Christian Perfection and the Inward Life, against the Delusions of the Pretended Mystics in 1697. In 1700 he became Cardinal with the title of St. Mary Minerva. He died on May 4th, 1729.

Nocturns.—These were prayers held during the night. In the Roman Church the Psalter is divided into portions consisting each of nine psalms, each of which portions is called a nocturn. Nocturnal prayers are read on the vigils of feasts.

Nocturnal services seem to have been used in the earliest times of Christianity. During the persecutions, services were held in the night to avoid detection, and, when all fear of this was over, the custom was still continued. Nocturnal services became very frequent when cenobitical or monastic life grew and flourished.

Noel, ALEXANDER [b. 1639, d. 1724].—Ecclesiastical writer of the Gallican Church, and Provincial of the Dominican Order from 1706. He wrote Select Chapters of Ecclesiastical History, and an Old Testament history. His Gallicanism gave so much offence that his work was placed on the Index Expurgatorius by Pope Innocent XI., but Noel defended himself with such spirit that Benedict XIII. removed the censure.

Noel, BAPTIST WRIOTHESLEY [b. 1799, d. 1873], was educated at Cambridge and ordained in the Church of England, becoming Incumbent of St. John's, Bedford Row; but he left the Church and became a Baptist minister. He was the author of Essay on Christian Baptism, Letters on the Church of Rome, A Selection of Psalms and Hymns, etc.

Noetians.—Followers of Noetus, who founded a sect of Monarchianism. Noetus was a native either of Ephesus or Smyrna. He put forward his theory at Smyrna, and was excommunicated about 230 by a synod before which he was summoned; afterwards he gathered around him numerous followers, and founded a school in which to teach his doctrines. He died shortly afterwards, but his theory was taught by his disciples, chief among whom were Sabellius and Epigonus. The heresy spread and was adopted by many Christians in Rome and elsewhere. [See PATRIPASSIANS.]

Nominalists.—One of the parties into which the Schoolmen were divided in the eleventh century. That general notions exist, we all admit, and some sort of classification comes natural to us. Thus we distinguish between trees and horses, we form notions of them which exist no doubt in the mind alone, but we realise that there is a form or idea of them which must have been in the mind of the Creator. The general properties which certain things share alike, and which we abstract in our minds from the particular things that exhibit them, were known by the Schoolmen as Universals. Thus we realise ideas in the words "whiteness," "truth," "animal." Then the Schoolmen proceeded to enquire—Are these "universals" real existences? or are they mere modes of intellectual representation that have no real existence except in our thoughts? The Nominalists maintained that genera, species, etc., are all individual objects, and that there is nothing general except names. Thus the name "circle" is applied to everything that is round, and is a general name, but no independent fact or property exists corresponding to the name. Some Nominalists held that the names of the Holy Trinity are the names of Three Individual Substances, and that the Unity of the Trinity is a mere verbal expression. This school of thought is thus directly opposed to the REALISTS [q.v.].

There were, however, shades and degrees of Nominalism. Thus Roscelin, the Canon of Compiègne, who was compelled to retract his Anti-Trinitarian heresies at the Council of Soissons [ROSCELIN], was an Ultra-Nominalist, holding that the only realities are individual things which we group together by the aid of mere names. His pupil, Abelard, held the Sabellian doctrine concerning the Trinity. In the fourteenth century William of Occam, an English Franciscan friar and a pupil of Scotus, revived the Nominalist theory in modified form, which was maintained by many eminent men. The controversy subsided at the Reformation.

In more modern times the chief Nominalists have been Hobbes, Hume, and Dugald Stewart.

Nomination.—The act of appointing a person to any office; in the Church of England, the act of presenting a clergyman to any ecclesiastical preferment. Sometimes it may be distinguished from a presentation, as the lord of a manor may have the right of nominating a man to some benefice under his patronage, but can only refer him to the ordinary for presentation.

Nomocanon.—A Greek name for a collection of canons, with the addition of those civil laws to which they refer. The first collection of this kind was made by John of Antioch, Patriarch of Constantinople, about the year 554, and was divided into fifty titles. Photius of Constantinople made another nomocanon about the year 883, reducing the heads to fourteen. Balsamon wrote a commentary upon it, about 1180, showing what was, and what was not, in use in his time, etc. In 1255 Arsenius, monk of Mount Athos, wrote notes on it showing the conformity of the Imperial laws with the Patriarchal constitutions. The third collection was made by Matthæus Blastares, monk of the Order of St. Basilus, in 1335, and was named the Syntagma—that is, a collection of canons and laws relating to each other.

Non-Communicating Attendance.

—The custom of remaining in church during the Holy Communion without receiving, usual in many Anglican churches at the present day, is the subject of much controversy. In the Roman Catholic Church it is, we need not say, a usual thing, inasmuch as every man is bound to be present at Mass on "days of obligation," but is not bound to communicate, in fact, cannot do so without previous confession. But non-communicating presence in the Church of England, whatever may have been the custom in Reformation times, had quite died out in the beginning of this century, but has been, as we have said, revived in some churches. It is said in defence of it that the Holy Communion, the chief of all Christian acts of worship, had come to be altogether neglected, except by a few; that this service, a preaching of Christ in act, a "showing forth of the Lord's death," which ought to be made the one characteristic service of the Lord's Day, was turned into a service to be observed by those who professed a higher holiness than the general, not into a worship which all believers in Christ might rejoice in. To this it was replied that the Lord's Supper is a Communion, a Feast to be partaken of, not a Sacrifice to be adored. It is obvious, then, that the question turns upon the deeper question: Is the Eucharist a sacrifice? This has been discussed elsewhere. We have here to inquire what was the intention of the compilers of the Liturgy. In the Convocation of 1563, the Puritan party proposed a Canon: "That no person abide in the church during the time of the Communion unless he do communicate; that is, they shall depart immediately after the exhortation be ended, and before the confession of the communicants." This was opposed by the Catholic party, and rejected by the Convocation. [See Strype's Ann., vol. i. p. 340.] In accordance with this, the Convocation of 1604 passed the following Canon [xviii.]. After giving direction for proper reverence in church, it proceeds: "None, either man, woman, or child, of what calling soever, shall be otherwise, at such time, busied in the church, than in quiet attendance, to hear, read, mark, and understand that which is read, preached, or ministered; saying in their due place, audibly with the minister, the Confession, the Lord's Prayer, and the Creed; and making such other answer to the public prayers as are appointed in the Book of Common Prayer; neither shall they disturb the service or sermon by walking or talking, or any other way; nor depart out of the church during the time of service or sermon, without some reasonable or just cause."

There is added another Canon, directing the churchwardens to see that all stay to the end; first, they are to see that all parishioners resort to the parish church on Sundays and holidays, adding, "and there continue the whole time of Divine Service" [Canon xc.], "and if they do not obey, they are to be presented to the ordinary of the place."

It may be considered further that there is apparently no assumption that any person will withdraw during the service; there is no rubric directing a pause for the purpose, but the service goes straight on unbroken. Probably the rubric which directs that intending receivers shall give their names beforehand is intended that the minister may know for how many to prepare.

With regard to the practice of the early Church, Bingham (Ant. b. xviii. c. i. s. 6), shows that the Canons of the Council of Nicæa [xi. and xii.] did not only allow, but required attendance without oral communion in certain cases. He remarks, "In all which we may remark, that the word 'communicating' does not always signify partaking of the Eucharist, but communicating in prayers only without the oblation, which is but an imperfect sort of Communion." The Council of Nicæa calls this communicating with the people in prayers only. Of the order of penitents, the consistentes were the fourth. They were so called, says Bingham, "from their having liberty [after the other penitents, energumens, and catechumens were dismissed] to stand with the faithful at the altar, and join in the common prayer, and see the oblation offered; but yet they might neither make their own oblation, nor partake of the Eucharist with them."

Nonconformists.—This term, as now in use, includes all who absent themselves from the worship of the Established Church of England on the ground of conscience, and in this sense is synonymous with the word Dissenters [q.v.]. But in a stricter sense it is applied to those ministers who were ejected from their livings on their refusal to submit to the Act of Uniformity passed by Charles II. in 1662. The number of these was about 2,000, and their burdens were increased by the passing of the Conventicle Act in 1664, by which they were prohibited from meeting in any number greater than five, in any other manner than was allowed by the Liturgy or practice of the Church of England. This was followed in 1665 by the FIVE MILE ACT [q.v.], and in 1673 by the TENET ACT [q.v.]. This last Act was intended to deprive them of all political power and religious influence. Amongst the ejected clergy were some of the most pious and learned divines of the day, Baxter, Howe, Flavel, Philip Henry, etc. James II. showed a decided disposition at first to crush the Nonconformists, as evidenced in the trial of Baxter, but he afterwards relaxed the laws, hoping to gain toleration for the Roman Catholics, and published his Declaration of liberty of conscience. Soon after the accession of William III. the Toleration Act was passed, which granted to the Nonconformists a partial relief, and in George I.'s reign the laws against them were never enforced. The Bill of 1829 removed parliamentary disabilities, not only from the Nonconformists, but also from the Roman Catholics.

Nones. [CANONICAL HOURS.]

Nonjurors.—Those clergy of the Church of England, about 400 in number, who refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary at the Revolution of 1688, and were therefore deprived. Among them were the Primate (Archbishop Sancroft), and Bishops Ken, White, Frampton, Lloyd, and Turner. The deprived bishops of course held that their successors were schismatical intruders, and regarded themselves still as real holders of their Sees. Sancroft, feeling himself bound to offer all legal resistance, remained in his palace at Lambeth, in the hope, which many who had taken the required oath shared, that the schism might even yet be avoided, and the Government had some hope that the oath might yet be taken. Though it was prescribed to be taken before August 1st, 1689, the deprivation was not declared for more than a year, and Tillotson was not named as Sancroft's successor till April 23rd, 1691. A process of ejectment against Sancroft was then issued, and the Archbishop having first celebrated the Communion in Lambeth Chapel, removed first to the Temple, then to Freshingfield. Hicks, Dean of Worcester, affixed a protest against his ejectment to the cathedral door. Beveridge, though he had taken the oath, refused to succeed Ken, and Kidder was appointed. Sancroft from his retirement at Freshingfield always spoke of the Nonjurors as the true Church of England, and of the Establishment as apostate and rebellious, and steps were taken for preserving the succession. A list of the Non-juring Clergy was sent to King James in France, who nominated two as bishops, Hicks and Wagstaffe, who were consecrated "Suffragans of Thetford and Ipswich," by Lloyd, White, and Turner, the deprived bishops of Norwich, Peterborough, and Ely. Sancroft had previously died.

After the death of King William divisions began to appear among the Nonjurors. Some considered that as the oath might lawfully be taken to Queen Anne there was no bar to returning to the Establishment. It was with this object that Henry Dodwell in 1706 wrote his Case in view considered. The same view was taken by Robert Nelson. But there was a party headed by Hicks and Jeremy Collier who determined to carry on the separation. On May 29th, 1713, Collier, who had long taken an important place among the Nonjuring divines, was consecrated a bishop, and with him Samuel Hawes, formerly a parish clergyman in the diocese of Lincoln, and Nathaniel Spinckes, who had been a prebendary of Salisbury. The deprived bishops, who were now all dead, had consecrated none after Hicks and Wagstaffe. Wagstaffe also was dead; therefore George Hicks, the only surviving bishop, procured the assistance of two Scotch bishops, Archibald Campbell, who was of the Argyle family, and James Gadderar.* These two bishops were resident in London, and had very much associated themselves with the English Nonjurors. Hicks died Dec. 15th, 1715, and Collier then became the senior bishop and leading man among the Nonjurors. Very soon afterwards, Jan. 26th, 1716, he, Hawes, and Spinckes, consecrated Henry Gandy and Thomas Brett as bishops; but fresh divisions broke out in the little body: some leaned towards the Greek, some to the Roman Church, and others again were rigid in their Anglicanism. In 1717 began the division on "Usages." The principal of these were those connected with the Eucharist, i.e. the mixed cup and the other uses of King Edward VI.'s First Book; the others, not so connected, as Trine Immersion at Baptism, were also all found in the book of 1549. These Collier and Brett, with Campbell and Gadderar, the Scotch bishops, wished to see restored. Howes, Spinckes, and Gandy, were for retaining the Anglican book of 1662. Much was written on both sides, and Collier published in 1718 Offices of Holy Communion, Baptism, Confirmation, and Visitation, which differed little from those of King Edward. This division also led to a further division, in that the "Non-Usagers" refused to join any longer in negotiations for a union with the Greek Church, which had already been begun, but fell through on the death, Feb. 8th, 1725, of Peter the Great of Russia. The divisions, however, on the Usages outlasted Collier's life. He died, April 26th, 1726, and was buried in St. Pancras Churchyard.

Before his death, fresh bishops had been consecrated by both parties (the Non-Usagers again obtaining the help of Scotch bishops); but afterwards, about 1730, the disputes subsided, and all the bishops joined in communion except one, John Blackburn, consecrated 1712, who still firmly adhered to the Anglican book. He, however, made no attempt to continue his own succession, and died 1741. In "the '45" none of the regular Nonjurors appear to have been involved; but some of the separatists, those who were in favour of the views of Collier and Brett, joined the rebels, and died as traitors. One of the separatists named Campbell desperately endeavoured to carry on the succession of his party. He was the last bishop left, and in defiance of canonical rule he alone consecrated a new bishop. Thus the line went on, the last being consecrated in 1795. One of these bishops, Cartwright, ended his life as a surgeon, practising at Shrewsbury, a legal subject of King George. The last of the bishops, Booth, died in 1805; but a Nonjuring clergyman was living in the West of England in 1816. They lingered there longer than in any part of England. Many of those who would not take the oaths were content to receive the Communion in the National Church as private individuals, and it is said that many purchased Church Prayer Books printed before the Revolution in order that they might ignore the reigning sovereign.

Many historians who differ from the Nonjurors altogether in their view, have yet acknowledged that they rendered important services to the religion and literature of the country. A Latitudinarian spirit came in with the Revolution, and many good men were strongly influenced by it. Against this the Nonjurors made a stand, and preserved the spirituality of the Church, which might otherwise have sunk into a mere State-establishment. Their example of conscientiousness, sacrificing station, influence, and worldly substance, was a lesson of self-sacrifice such as society is ever the richer for. Some of them wrote valuable books. Hicks, Williams, Law, Nelson, Charles Lealie, Jeremy Collier, are all honoured names in the great roll of English authors.

* Gadderar had been consecrated in London, Feb. 24th, 1712, by Hicks himself, with Campbell and another Scotch bishop, John Falconar; this last was also one of Campbell's consecrators on Aug. 24th, 1711, and through him and the other two, who were the deprived bishops of Edinburgh and Dumbane, this line traces itself to Archbishop Sharp's consecration by Bishop Sheldon, of London, Dec. 15th, 1681.

Non-Residence.—The absence of an incumbent from his parish or benefice for any length of time, while a substitute is entrusted with the discharge of his duties. At one time non-residence was very general in England, in consequence of the holding of pluralities; but it was forbidden by statutes passed in 1837–8. Under ordinary circumstances no incumbent may be absent from his benefice more than three months at a time, under penalty of losing part of his income. Exemption from this rule may be granted by the bishop of the diocese in cases of pluralities or peculiarities; and severe illness, for at most twenty years, has been held a valid excuse for non-residence.

Norbert, Sr., Archbishop of Magdeburg and founder of the Premonstratensian Order, was born at Xanten, in the Duchy of Cleves, 1080. His father, Heribert, Count of Gennep, was related to the Emperor Henry V., and his mother, Hedwig, was descended from the House of Lorraine. He spent some time at the Court of Frederick, Archbishop of Cologne, and then with the Emperor, Henry IV. He was a Prebendary of the Church of Xanten and Almoner to Henry IV., who offered him the Archbishopric of Cambray; but he refused, fearing that the higher orders would prove a restraint to him, for he gave way to all his passions and led a very dissolute life. This continued till he was thirty years old. One day he was riding, when he was suddenly overtaken by a thunderstorm, and a ball of fire fell at his horse's feet, which, in its terror, threw its rider. Norbert lay unconscious for some time, and on his recovery determined to give up his wicked life, and to work as a priest and missionary. He spent some time in preparation, and in 1118 sold his estate, which he gave to the poor, and resigned his preferments. He set out for Languedoc, where Pope Gelasius II. was at the time, from whom he gained permission to preach wherever he thought proper. He passed through all the northern provinces of France, preaching and imposing severe penances. His eloquence did much, but his example effected more. He fasted all through the year, eating only in the evening, except on Sundays. In 1119 Pope Calixtus II., who had succeeded Gelasius, held a Council at Rheims, at which Norbert was present and obtained a fresh grant. He here became acquainted with Bartholomew, Bishop of Laon, who prevailed upon the saint to accompany him to his diocese, and put him in possession of St. Martin's Church, where he was to reform the regular canons; but his rule was too strict for them, and he resigned his appointment. The Bishop then, knowing that Norbert wished for a solitary life, promised to give him any place he might choose, and it is said that the Virgin Mary appeared to Norbert in a dream, pointed out a lonely valley in the Forest of Courcy, which received the name of Prémontré, and also chose the dress which he was to adopt. Here he retired and formed from the followers who soon gathered round him the Order of the Premonstrants, under the rule of St. Augustine. The order soon spread all over Europe, and in 1117 Norbert was called to Antwerp. The pastor of St. Michael's, in that city, led a dissolute life, which Tanchelm, a heretic, turned to good account by asserting that this was a proof that the institution of the priesthood was an idle fiction, and that the Eucharist was of no service to salvation. He gained 3,000 followers who, even after his death, in 1116, infected the whole country with their tenets. The canons of Antwerp applied for aid to the Bishop of Cambray, who implored St. Norbert to come to their assistance. He brought some of his canons with him, and the clergy of Antwerp settled the church and revenues of St. Michael upon them, which gift was confirmed in 1124. After putting matters in good order he returned to his first settlement, where the Order had increased so much that in 1125 there were ten houses besides the original house at Prémontré. In 1127 as Norbert was travelling through Germany, the Archbishop of Magdeburg died, and the saint was chosen to succeed him and was consecrated, though against his own wishes. He brought about several reforms, restored the revenues of the Church, which had been usurped by the nobles, persuaded the clergy to practise celibacy, etc. It is said that one of the clergy in revenge hired an assassin to murder the Bishop in his confessional on Maundy Thursday, but that Norbert, knowing of the design, ordered the man to be searched, and the weapon was found upon him. After about three years his patience and courage overcame his enemies, and he was allowed to regulate his diocese in peace. He still gave up some time to his Order, and also interested himself in the affairs of the Church. He strongly opposed Peter Leon, the Anti-Pope, who was condemned at the Council of Rheims in 1131.

St. Norbert died June 6th, 1134, and was canonised by Pope Gregory XIII. in 1582. At his death there were 1,200 members of his community.

North Side.—The rubric prefaced to the Communion Service directs the minister to begin the Service at the north side of the Lord's Table. It is a matter of controversy whether by this is intended that he shall stand on the north side of the front, still looking eastwards, or at the north end, looking south. The last legal judgment left the matter to the minister's discretion. [EASTWARD POSITION.]

Norwich, SEE OF.—This ancient See of East Anglia has not taken so eminent a place, historically, as some of the others, owing to its retired situation, but it has many features of deep interest. It owes its foundation to Archbishop Honorius, who sent "Felix the Burgundian" to be its first bishop at Dunwich. [DUNWICH.] On the resignation of the fourth bishop of the See, Bisi, Archbishop Theodore established a second See at Elmham for the "North folk;" but the terrible Danish invasion swept the board for many years. In the middle of the tenth century the bishopric of Elmham was restored under Eadulf. In 1075 it was transferred, under Bishop Herfast, to the stately minster of Thetford, then the second town in East Anglia, and possessing ten churches. In 1091 Herbert of Losinga, Abbot of Ramsey, in Huntingdonshire, obtained the See from William Rufus by means which approached very near indeed to simony. Very miserable in conscience afterwards, he made his way to Rome to ask for absolution, in spite of a furious outburst of wrath from the King. The Pope absolved and reinstated him on condition of his founding certain churches. On his return he removed the See in 1094 from Thetford "to the rich and populous Norwich," and began the beautiful cathedral, intended to be a monastic institution on the model of Canterbury. It was dedicated in Sept. 1101, in the name of the Holy Trinity. He built several other churches in his diocese, among them that at Yarmouth, which has now developed into the largest parish church in England. He also established Cluniac monks in the ex-cathedral of Thetford, and preached in Ely Abbey three years before it became a cathedral at the translation of the relics of St. Etheldreda. The cathedral nave was extended to its present length by his successor, whose successor, again, deserves notice as the only bishop in England who had the courage to stand by Becket in his struggle with the King. Glancing down the list of bishops, we note John of Oxford, a time-serving partisan of Henry II.; John de Grey, an unscrupulous tool of King John, but during whose episcopate lived the good Sampson, Abbot of Bury, immortalised by Carlyle in his Past and Present; Pandulph, the Legate before whom England was abased by the wicked King John; Walter Calthorp, "the only Bishop of Norwich whose saintly life has been his chief characteristic," such a benefactor to the poor that he even sold his silver spoons to feed them, the builder of the hospital of St. Giles, and beautifier of the cathedral; Bateman, in whose episcopate the awful Black Death destroyed no less than 2,000 incumbents in that one diocese; Nix, under whom Bilney, the Lollard, was burned, and under whom also the suppression of the monasteries began; Thirlby, under whom Kett's rebellion took place; Hopton, under whom nine Protestants were burned at Norwich; Parkhurst and Scambler, two disgraces to their office for their greed of money; Hall, in whose days the Puritan outrages were wrought upon the glorious cathedral; Reynolds, the author of the General Thanksgiving, loved by his people for his unbounded charity during the Great Plague; Bathurst, who lived till the age of ninety, and neglected his diocese shamefully; Stanley, who revived religious feeling when it was almost dead. We ought to mention Dean Pridesaux, a good author and vigorous dean, who saw seven bishops of Norwich during his incumbency.

Notaries of Rome, since called Protanotaries.—The office of notaries was instituted by St. Clement during the persecutions of the primitive Church, and seven were appointed to keep an account in writing of the imprisonment and death of the martyrs, each having charge of two wards of the city. St. Fabian appointed seven sub-deacons, whom he entrusted with the duty of seeing that the notaries carried out their work of preserving the records which they made. By this means histories of the martyrdom of St. Andrew, St. Polycarp, and many others were preserved, and the earliest collections of the lives of the saints were derived from these sources.

Nourry, NICHOLAS LE, was born at Dieppe in 1647, and eighteen years after became a Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Maur, where he devoted himself to literary work. He came from Rouen to Paris, where he assisted James de Frisches in editing St. Ambrose's works, and he also worked with Bellaïse and Duchesne. His most noted work is the Apparatus ad Bibliothecam Maximam; criticism of the lives, writings, and opinions of the authors in the Bibliotheca Patrum at Lyons. In 1710 he published Lucius Cæcilius de Moribus Persecutorum, which he states is not, as was supposed, the work of Lactantius, and gives his reasons for that opinion. Nourry died at St. Germain-des-Prés in 1724.

Novalis.—The name assumed by Friedrich von Hardenberg, who was born at Wiedestedt, in Mansfeld, in 1772. His father and mother belonged to the Herrnhuters. He was educated at Jena, whence he passed to Leipzig and Wittenberg. He assisted his father for a time as auditor of the Saxon Saltworks, but was obliged to give up his post through ill-health, and devoted himself wholly to literature. He became acquainted with Schlegel and with Tieck, the Romantic writer, who wrote a biography of Novalis, and who seems to have had a great influence over him. He died in 1801.

Novalis's best works are his Spiritual Songs, which show a beautiful simplicity and pure spirit of devotion. His other works, Heinrich von Ofterdingen, The Pupils at Saïs, and Hymns of the Night, are remarkable for the imagination and enthusiasm which they display.

Novatian, the founder of the Novatianist sect in the third century, was a man of learning and eloquence, but of ascetic tendency. Educated as a philosopher, he was baptised on a sick-bed, but omitted after his recovery to present himself to the bishop for the laying-on of hands. Notwithstanding this, and in the face of some opposition, he was ordained priest by Bishop Fabian of Rome, who wished to enlist his talents for the Church, and he acquired great influence at Rome. After the Decian persecution, a dispute arose as to the treatment of the lapsed. Novatian headed a party which maintained that the Church had no power to re-admit apostates, and that, by receiving such into communion, it would forfeit its Christian character. The lapsed, they said, must be left to the mercy of God. At the election of Cornelius, a man of milder views, as Fabian's successor, A.D. 251, Novatian, with his party, seceded from the Church, and three obscure bishops, obtained on false pretences, consecrated him to the See of Rome. Intimation of this consecration was sent to the great Churches, but these refused to acknowledge him, and many of his followers, alarmed at the schism, returned to orthodoxy. Nevertheless, the numbers of the sect increased, and the members swore, at the reception of the Eucharist, that they would never desert him or return to Cornelius. They now assumed the name of Cathari (i.e. Puritans), and adopted still harsher views. Not only the lapsed, but also those who had been guilty of any of the greater sins after baptism, were excommunicated for life. They declared the Church to have become impure, and its ministrations to be of no effect, and second marriages were forbidden as adulterous. The Novatian sect continued for a considerable time. They were perfectly orthodox as to the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and suffered, with the Catholics, from the Arians. An attempt was made at the Council of Niceæ to bring them back to the Church, and they were generally unmolested by the Catholics until the time of Nestorius and Cyril of Alexandria.

Novatus, sometimes confounded with Novatian, was a priest of Carthage, who became noted for his malpractices and disobedience to authority. In A.D. 249 he was cited to appear before his Bishop, Cyprian, charged with ill-treating his wife, robbing widows and orphans, appropriating the funds of his church, allowing his father to die of starvation, and refusing even to bury him; but the outbreak of the Decian persecution saved him from punishment. After the persecution, Novatus allied himself with Felicissimus, a rich man for whom he had procured deacon's orders, and the two set themselves to oppose Cyprian in every possible way, especially encouraging very lenient views concerning the treatment of the lapsed. Visiting Rome, he joined the opposite party of Novatian, and became as severe towards the lapsed as he had formerly been lax, influenced, it has been hinted, chiefly by his love of opposition to regular authority. After staying at Rome for some time, he returned to Africa and is lost sight of.

Novices [Lat. novitius].—Those who are in a state of probation before entering a religious society, in order that it may be seen whether they have the necessary qualities and are likely to keep the vows. This period of probation is termed the novitiate. Until it is over no promises are made, and the novice may return to the world if desired.

Nowell, ALEXANDER, D.D., an eminent divine of the reign of Queen Elizabeth [b. at Read Hall in Lancashire, in 1507 or 1508, d. in London, Feb. 13th, 1602]. He was educated near Manchester till he was thirteen, when he entered Brazenose College, Oxford. He became the intimate friend of Foxe, the martyrologist, whose room he shared. In 1538 he was made Bachelor of Arts, in 1543 became Master of Westminster School, and in 1581 Canon of Westminster. Having adopted the Lutheran doctrines, he was obliged to leave England on Queen Mary's accession, and travelled in Germany till the accession of Queen Elizabeth, when he returned, and was appointed Archdeacon of Middlesex and Canon of Canterbury, and afterwards Dean of St. Paul's. Nowell was chosen by the Convocation of Canterbury in 1563 to preside at the drawing up of the Articles of Religion, and also to write a catechism, which he appears to have developed later into the Church Catechism which has been attributed to him with probability. Another catechism which he wrote in 1571 was directed by Archbishop Parker to be taught as a preventive against heresy; and in fact he was always regarded as holding very orthodox views, and as remarkable for his learning and piety. The catechisms already mentioned, and a few sermons, are his only extant works.

Nowell, LAURENCE, brother of the above, entered Brazenose College, 1536. He travelled with his brother in Germany during Queen Mary's reign, and was made Dean of Lichfield on his return. He died in October, 1576. He was an eminent antiquary and Anglo-Saxon scholar, and left an Anglo-Saxon dictionary in MS., which is now in the Bodleian Library. Nowell also made several collections from ancient historical manuscripts.

Nullatenenses.—Bishops in title only, holding no dioceses.

Nunc Dimittis.—The Latin for the first words of the Song of Simeon, "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace," which is found in Luke ii. 29-32, and is appointed in the Anglican Church to be read after the second lesson at evensong. It was used in this place even in the early Church, and is found in the Apostolical Constitutions. It occurs in the Latin office for Compline, from which and Vespers the Anglican Evening Service was compiled.

Nuncio.—A representative of the Pope who resides permanently at a foreign Court to carry out investigations upon ecclesiastical matters. A nuncio is thus distinguished from a legate a latere, whose duties are only temporary. The nuncios had formerly almost unlimited power, and held courts of appeal which were superior in authority to the national ecclesiastical courts. The nuncios were often at variance with the legati nati [LEGATES], and a sharp controversy took place in consequence of a nunciature being established at Munich in 1785, though it was swallowed up soon after in the troubles of the French Revolution.

Nuns [The word is derived by some from Coptic nomnos, "holy," but is probably from Low Latin numma, "mother" (compare Sanskrit nanna), a familiar word used by children like mamma].—Women who seclude themselves from the world in religious communities, take a vow of chastity, and spend their lives in prayer and good works. Nuns are met with very early in the history of the Church, under the name of virgines Deo sacratæ, but they did not at first live together in convents; they remained at home, but were distinguished from the rest of their family by a peculiar dress, and the asceticism of their life. Seclusion began to be practised towards the end of the fourth century, but for some time the nuns still attended their parish church on Sundays and festivals, and were under the guidance of the parish priest. They received their rules from the bishop of the diocese. In the sixth century it became customary to have a church attached to each nunnery, which also had its own priest; by this means was secured absolute seclusion from the world. A mother-superior or abbess was placed at the head of the community.

Nuns of recent order in the Roman Church are generally under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese, those of older foundation under that of regulars. A few are under a superior-general. They are allowed to take boarders to educate but under strict conditions. Their confessors are carefully selected, and in no case is a confessor allowed to hold office in the same establishment for more than three years. Nuns take their meals in one room, but each has her separate cell. There are a vast number of orders, but they are grouped under four principal classes—the followers of the rule of St. Basil (adopted by St. Teresa), of St. Austin (Ursulines and Dominicans), of St. Benedict (Fontevrault, etc.), and St. Francis ("Poor Clares").

Nuptial Benediction.—Used by Jews and Christians after the marriage ceremony. It was pronounced by the Jews when the bride was brought home, by the chief of the ten elders, who were obliged by custom to be present. The custom is justified by the passage in the Book of Ruth where ten elders are said to have been present at the wedding of Boaz. In the Christian Churches marriages are consecrated by the benediction of the priest or minister, according to an injunction given by Tertullian in the first century. In early times marriages not followed by this benediction were declared to be illegal.

O

Oaths.—The custom of appealing to God to affirm the truth of statements, with an imprecation of His vengeance or a renunciation of His favour if they prove false, has been common to all nations. The Romans and Greeks used many forms of swearing, with ceremonies. The Jews at first used to swear by God only, but in later times they swore by Jerusalem, the Temple, the Altar, etc., and that it was against this that our Lord warns Christians, and not against swearing at all, appears from the fact that St. Paul calls

God to witness the truth of his affirmations several times. This view was taken by the early Christians, and in several passages in the Fathers and Councils it appears that swearing upon solemn occasions was held lawful. It then became a custom to lay their hands on the Gospels when they swore, and to conclude with "So help me, God, and the contents of this Book," to which in the Roman Church "all the saints" was sometimes added. These oaths were called corporal oaths. Others swore by some particular saint, relic, cross, or altar. In the Middle Ages an oath was frequently called a canonical purgation, to distinguish it from the other modes of declaring innocence, as duels, ordeals, etc. By the Council of Meaux the clergy were forbidden to take corporal oaths, it being held that all ought to trust their word.

Obeah.—The negroes of the West Indies practise a species of witchcraft, and the name Obeah-man, or Obeah-woman, is given to the persons who exercise this power. The derivation of the word is unknown.

Obedience.—The performance of the commands of a superior. Ecclesiastically, the word is used in somewhat different senses, but all allied, as [1] the duty which all clergy owe to their immediate superiors in all things consistent with the law of God and the Church. [2] The submission which members of religious orders vow, on profession, to their own superiors and to the rules of the order. [3] A written command by which a superior of a religious order communicates some special order to a subject. [4] The term has also come to be used for a religious following or communion professing obedience to some head: e.g. the Roman obedience means the Church of Rome.

Obedience of Christ.—This is generally divided into active and passive. His active obedience implies what He did; His passive, what He suffered. Some divines distinguish between these, but the distinction is somewhat artificial. They refer our pardon to His passive, and our title to glory to His active obedience; but it cannot be clearly shown that there is such a thing as passive obedience; since it is clearly taught that our Lord's sufferings were an entirely voluntary obedience to the will of God. The Scriptures tell us much of the obedience of Christ, and show that it was voluntary [Ps. xl. 6], complete [1 Pet. ii. 22], wrought out in the stead of His people, and acceptable in the sight of God.

Oberammergau.—A village situated in the highlands of Bavaria, made famous by the Passion Play which is acted there every ten years. The following traditional account is given of its origin:—A plague broke out in the neighbourhood in 1633, which, in spite of all the efforts of the villagers, was introduced into Ammergau by a peasant, Caspar Schuchle, who had been working at Eschelohé, one of the plague-stricken villages, and wished to visit his family. In a day or two he died, and within a month eighty-four persons had perished. Then the villagers assembled, and vowed that if God would take away the pestilence they would perform the Passion Play every tenth year. From that time no one died of the plague. The play was first performed in 1634, and has been enacted every tenth year since 1680. This is the tradition, but the play is of much older date. They now speak of it as something already well known, and it is only the acting it every tenth year that is new. The oldest text-book of the play bears the date 1662, and refers to a still older book. Since the year 1634 the play has undergone many improvements. Thus Lucifer, Prince of Hell, who, with his retinue, used to play a prominent part, has been banished. Father Ottmar Weiss, of Jesewang, ex-conventual of the Benedictine Monastery at Ettal [d. 1843], revised the play, and the improvements were carried on by Anton A. Daisenberg, the former pastor of the village. Up to 1830 the play took place in the churchyard, but since then a theatre has been built for it. This is built entirely of boards, and is partly open to the sky. The auditorium is 118 feet wide and 168 deep. It comprises an area of 20,000 square feet, and is capable of conveniently seating 5,000 to 6,000 persons. Some say the stage resembles those of ancient classical Greek theatres, while others find more resemblance to the mystery theatre of the Middle Ages. There are five distinct places of action for the players:—The proscenium, for the chorus, processions, etc.; the central stage, for the tableaux vivants and the usual dramatic scenes; the palace of Pilate, the palace of Annas, and the streets of Jerusalem. The prices of the seats are from one to eight marks.

The great training school for the Passion Play has been the village church, with its ceremonies, processions, music, and song. Thus the dramatic scene of Christ's entry into Jerusalem is a repetition of the Church procession on Palm Sunday, even to the singing of the chorale, "All hail! all hail! O David's Son!" In the school the children are taught to learn by heart and sing passages from the great drama. The selection of the actors takes place there. The more talented are given parts for performance on the stage of the theatre, which remains up during the nine intervening years, though the rest is taken down. During these years minor plays, religious and secular, are acted, especially during the winter. Almost all the principal actors are wood-carvers. Josef Maier, who represented the "Christus" in 1870-71 and in 1880, and who has since died, also Schauer, who took the part in 1860, devoted themselves chiefly to crucifixes. Jacob Hett, the "Petrus" of 1880, and Lechner, the "Judas," are also skilful carvers.

At five o'clock on the mornings when the play is to take place a cannon is fired to summon the villagers and visitors to attend mass. The performance begins at eight and lasts till five, with an interval of an hour and a half. It consists of eighteen acts, beginning with the entry into Jerusalem and ending with the Ascension. Each act is preceded by one or more tableaux taken from the Old Testament, which delineate symbols or prophecies of the scenes from the life of Christ. These types are explained by the chorus of eighteen schutzgeister, or guardian angels, headed by a leader called the prologue or choragus. The schutzgeister greatly resemble the chorus of the ancient Greek plays. The play was, in 1880, given more than thirty times, from May 17th to Sept. 26th; it always takes place on Sundays and festivals. Though many look upon the play as irreverent, it is acted with so much earnestness and piety that it is evident to all spectators that it is regarded by the people as a religious duty. It would, however, certainly not be so in any other place, as the attempts to introduce it into New York in 1881-82 clearly show.

Oberlin, JEAN FREDERIC, Protestant pastor, noted for his holiness and benevolence, was born at Strassburg, Aug. 31st, 1740. He was inclined towards the military profession, but by his father's desire he pursued his studies at Strassburg University, and was ordained in 1760. He was Tutor in the family of M. Ziegenhagen till 1767, when he succeeded M. Stauber as Pastor of Ban-de-la-Roche, or Steinthal, in Alsace, where he laboured for fifty-nine years. This valley, which was almost entirely inhabited by Lutherans, had been laid waste in the Thirty Years' War and again by Louis XIV. The soil was very barren, and the people almost uncivilised and very averse to any improvements, so that when Oberlin first went there his life was frequently in danger. He set to work to improve their condition, both physically and morally, helped them to make a road to Strassburg, to improve their land, and introduced new manufactures, as straw-plaiting, knitting, weaving, etc. He also built new schoolhouses, and is said to have been the founder of infant schools. During the French Revolution his district was left untouched on account of his well-known character, and he was able to give shelter to several proscribed persons. It is said that the population rose under his ministrations from 500 to 5,000. He received the Legion of Honour from Louis XVIII., and a gold medal from the Royal and Central Agricultural Society of Paris. He was the first foreign member of the London Bible Society. He died June 1st, 1826.

Obituary.—A book used in the Roman Church in which to write down the names and date of burial of all those for whose souls masses are to be read.

Oblates.—A name given to several congregations, so-called because they "offer" themselves to God. The chief societies of Oblates are:—

Oblates of the Blessed Virgin and St. Ambrose.

—A congregation of secular priests founded by St. Carlo Borromeo at Milan in 1578. There is a house of this Congregation at Bayewater, with branches in several other parts of London.

Oblates of St. Frances at Rome.—A community of women established in 1433.

Oblates of Italy.—A society of secular priests founded at Turin in 1816.

Oblates of Mary Immaculate.—An association of priests founded at Marseilles by Charles de Mazenod, the Bishop, in 1815. Several of their priests are employed in foreign missions. There are eight houses in England.

The name "oblates" was also given during the Middle Ages to secular persons who offered themselves and their property to some monastery, to which they were admitted as a kind of lay brothers. They wore a religious habit, but different from that of the monks.

Oblations.—By special usage this word signifies the bread and wine offered upon the altar for consecration at the Holy Eucharist, these being distinguished from the alms of the poor and other devotions of the people in the phrase, "alms and oblations." It was an old custom for all communicants who could afford it to offer bread and wine, and sometimes other things, at the altar; out of which what was required was taken for the Eucharist, and the rest for a common meal. None were permitted to make these offerings but those who were also admissible as communicants; the offerings of the oppressors of the poor, of those living at variance, of idol makers and of abettors of heretics, even though they might be emperors, were sternly rejected. Oil for the lamps and incense—the first-fruits of grapes and corn—milk and honey for the newly baptised, were also offered at the altar, but always under conditions distinguishing them from the oblation of bread and wine.

From the oblation invariably accompanying the celebration of the Communion, the word was frequently used to denote the service of the Eucharist; as, e.g. in the phrases—"oblations for the dead," "oblations for martyrs," denoting the celebration of this sacrament at funerals or on the anniversaries of the day of death.

Occam or Ockham, WILLIAM OF.—One of the great Schoolmen, called Doctor singularis et invincibilis [b. at Ockham, Surrey, about 1270, d. at Munich, April 7th, 1347]. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, but, having joined the Order of the Franciscans, went to France to study under Duns Scotus. He afterwards opposed the Realism of his teacher, and formed a sect of Occamists among his followers, holding the doctrine of Nominalism, of which he became the most vigorous and logical advocate. [NOMINALISTS.] He constituted himself defendant of Philippe le Bel of France when the latter was excommunicated by Pope Boniface VIII.; and some years later he attacked Pope John XXII., who had condemned one Berenger Talon for saying that ecclesiastical possessions were unlawful and contrary to the example of Christ and His disciples. For this William of Occam was imprisoned at Avignon, but escaped with one of his companions to the Mediterranean, and thence to Munich, where he spent the remainder of his life. He ranked high among the Schoolmen as a logician, and was engaged throughout his life in continual ecclesiastical controversies. Among his works may be mentioned Disputatio inter Clericum et Militem, Expositio aurea (containing a summary of his Nominalist views), Decisiones Octo Questionum de Potestate summi Pontificis (based on the Sententie of Peter the Lombard), and many other controversial works.

Occasional Prayers and Thanksgivings.—Those which are appointed to be read on special occasions. There were special prayers placed at the end of the mediæval litanies, and also special masses for fine weather, rain, plague, etc.; but those in our Prayer Book are mostly original. The prayers for rain and fine weather were inserted in 1549 at the end of the Communion Service; but, with those for "In the Time of Dearth and Famine," "of War and Tumults," and "of any Common Plague," were placed at the end of the Litany in 1552. All the thanksgivings, with the exception of that for peace at home and the "General Thanksgiving," were written in 1604. These, with the prayers for Parliament and for all conditions of men, were added in 1662, and they were all then placed in their present position.

Ochino Bernardino.—An Italian Reformer who was born at Siena in 1487. He became a Franciscan, and afterwards a Capuchin, and was much famed for his preaching, which was very earnest and eloquent. He went to Naples, where he became acquainted with Juan Valdez and Peter Martyr. In 1538 he was elected General of his Order. In 1540 he was accused of heresy, for preaching upon justification without referring to indulgences, etc. He was afterwards summoned to Rome, but escaped to Geneva, where he preached to the Italian Protestants. He was at first strongly Calvinistic, but later adopted Socinian views. In 1647 his liberty was threatened, but he escaped to England, where he remained till the accession of Queen Mary obliged him to leave and go to Zurich. Here he wrote several of his books:—On the Lord's Supper; a catechism on the work of the Messiah and the Trinity, etc., which contained decidedly unorthodox views, and he was banished. He went to Cracow, but in 1564 had to leave on account of the decree banishing all foreigners who were not Catholics from Poland, and he died on the way to Germany. He has been regarded by some as the founder of Anti-Trinitarianism. He wrote a work on marriage which is considered to favour polygamy, against which Beza directed his Tractatus de Polygamia.

Among Ochino's other works are six volumes of Italian sermons written when he first went to Geneva; a book published in London on the usurped primacy of the Bishop of Rome; and Italian commentaries on Romans and Galatians.

Octaves.—The octave is the eighth day after any principal festival of the Church. The custom of keeping octaves was derived from the Jews, and in former times all the eight days were observed. The special prefaces for Christmas, Easter and Ascension Day are appointed to be read seven days after, and that for Whitsuntide six, as Trinity Sunday falls on the seventh day and has a preface of its own. The first two days of the octaves of Easter and Whitsunday have special services, and it seems from the Pietas Londinensis, published in 1714, that in the church of St. Dunstan in the West the Holy Communion was administered daily during the octaves of the three great festivals. All the days of octaves in the Roman Church (there are many more than in the Anglican) are kept most strictly, and, in some cases, no other feasts are allowed to be kept which fall within an octave. In the Anglican Church the octave of the dedication of a church is frequently kept. The octave of Easter Sunday is commonly called LOW SUNDAY [q.v.].

Odenheimer, WILLIAM HENRY [b. 1817, d. 1879], Bishop of New Jersey, U.S., a learned divine of the American Episcopal Church, and one of the most esteemed of its preachers. His sermons have been much read in England as well as in his own country, and he won much love from Churchmen on his visits to the Lambeth Conferences by his sunny and genial manner.

Odo, surnamed "the Severe," Archbishop of Canterbury, was born in East Anglia in the ninth century, of Danish parents, who were Pagans. They gave Odo a liberal education, and allowed him to mix with the Christians and be present at their instructions without any fear that he might embrace their religion. His father, on finding that the boy was impressed with the truths of Christianity, forbade him to hold any further intercourse with Christians; but Odo had the courage to rank himself among the catechumens, and, in consequence, was disinherited by his father.

Upon this, he entered the service of a Christian nobleman, named Aldhelm, belonging to the Court of Edward the Elder, who was so struck with Odo's natural gifts that he had him taught Latin and Greek, and when sufficiently instructed in the doctrines of Christianity, he was baptised, and soon after took holy orders, being made a Sub-deacon, an office he filled so well that he received Priest's orders before the age prescribed by the canons. Odo lived at Court and became Confessor to his patron Aldhelm, who took him with him on a journey to Rome, and on his death he remained still at Court, till, in 924, he was promoted by Athelstan, who had succeeded Edward, to the bishopric of Sherborne. It is said that Odo served in a campaign under Edward before taking holy orders, and after his consecration he took the field with Athelstan against the Danes headed by Anlaf, and did good service in gaining the victory. Dean Milman says of him, "In him the conquering Dane and the stern warrior mingled with the imperious Churchman." He was made Archbishop of Canterbury by Edmund, on the death of Wulfhelm, and he upheld the dignity of the primacy as none before him had done, and induced Edmund to make several laws for the security of religion and maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline in his kingdom. During the reign of Edred there was a great dispute between Odo and his clergy concerning the Real Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Eucharist—a doctrine which the Archbishop is said to have confirmed by means of a miracle. It was at the instigation of Odo that Dunstan committed the outrage on the royal authority at the coronation of King Edwy. It is certain that in 958 Odo made Edwy separate from Elgiva, but there is no proof that he was the author of the cruelties afterwards practised on her. Odo died the same year. He did much towards the enlargement and improvement of the old church of St. Augustine at Canterbury.

Ecclampadius, JOANNES [a translation of the German name Johann Hausschein].—A native of Germany who united with Zwingli in his work for the Reformation of Switzerland. He was born at Weinsberg, 1482, and died at the end of 1531, at Basel. He was intended for the profession of a lawyer, and studied law at Heidelberg and Bologna. Returning to Heidelberg he took up the study of theology, to perfect himself in which he resigned some advantageous posts which he had held as tutor to the sons of the Elector Palatine and preacher at Weinsberg. In 1515 he was induced by Capito, afterwards the Reformer of Strassburg, to become Preacher at Basel, and here he assisted Erasmus in the composition of his Annotations on the New Testament, of which Ecclampadius alone published the second edition. In 1516

he became Preacher of Augsburg, but after a short chaplaincy to Franz von Sickingen he returned to Basel in 1522, and his chief work was carried out between this year and that of his death. He supported Zwingli at the Marburg Conference in the dispute with Luther concerning the Eucharist, having previously published a treatise in 1525 setting forth his opinions in the matter. He was also employed to carry on disputes with Roman Catholics on theology. In preaching at Basel he had denounced the fallacies of many doctrines of the Roman Church, and had thereby made himself hated by Roman Catholics; he also held controversies with the Anabaptists. His chief works were commentaries on the Bible, and treatises De Ritu Paschali and Quod non sit onerosa Christianis Confessio. His views on the Eucharist were modified in later years. At one time he did not rise above the "memorial" view, but he afterwards emphatically declared the Sacrament a means of grace.

Ecconomi.—Stewards of church revenues, chosen by the clergy of each diocese out of their own number. Originally the distribution of the income of the Church, both among the clergy and among the poor, was entrusted to the bishop, who commonly associated his archdeacon with him in the work. But, as time went on, not only did the revenues of the Church increase, but also the number of converts, and with them came further demands upon the bishop's time, and more frequent calls for the discharge of the spiritual functions of his office. It was, consequently, deemed convenient to relieve him of the care of diocesan revenue by the appointment of the ecconomi.

Ecumenical Council [Gr. oikoumene, "the world"].—One gathered from all parts of the Church; as distinguished, therefore, from a diocesan or provincial synod. [COUNCILS.]

Oehler, GUSTAV FRIEDRICH.—An eminent German theologian of the orthodox school of Delitzsch [b. 1812, d. 1872]. A translation of his Theology of the Old Testament is published by Messrs. Clark, of Edinburgh, in 2 vols., and is valuable both for its depth of piety and also for its good Hebrew scholarship.

Oetinger, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPHER [b. 1702, d. 1782].—A German theological writer of the Mystical school. His position in German theology is analogous to that of the Hutchinsonians with respect to the English Deists. He endeavoured to meet the Rationalism and Materialism of his country by philological investigations, by means of which he constructed a system of philosophy which was to unite subject and object, matter and spirit, in the living Christ. Much of his doctrine was derived from Swedenborg. His writings were voluminous and not without effect.

The PIETISTS [q.v.] set a large value upon them on account of the careful spirit of investigation and industry which they display. For though his mind was inclined to everything fanciful and mysterious, yet he was learned, and, moreover, practical and full of good sense; above all, he was earnest and pious, and the people of Berlin recognised in him a genuine desire to give the mysteries of God a bearing on their daily life.

Offertorium.—A book containing the offertory sentences sung at Holy Communion.

Offertory.—[1] The sentences said by the priest during the Communion while the offerings of the people are being collected. They all speak of the necessity of supporting the Church and relieving the poor. The custom of making oblations at the Communion is Apostolic [1 Cor. xvi. 2], and is referred to by Justin Martyr and Tertullian, thereby proving that it was in use in the second century. The offertory sentences were sung in the choir before the Reformation. Chaucer's Pardoner was especially successful in singing an offertory ("Prologue"), and in Marbecke's Prayer Book with music the offertory sentences are set to varied music. But the rubric as it stands in the Prayer Book directs that the sentences are to be said by the priest. In some churches the attempt is made to combine this old custom with the rubric by the priest first saying the sentence, and being followed by the choir responding it musically. [2] The oblation of bread and wine placed upon the Lord's Table along with the offerings made by the congregation. The rubric of the Prayer Book directs "When there is a Communion the Priest shall then place upon the Table so much Bread and Wine as he shall think sufficient." The doctrine of the Roman Church is thus expressed by Bossuet: "The Church does really offer bread and wine, but not absolutely and in themselves; for in the New Covenant no oblation is made of lifeless things: indeed no oblation is made other than Jesus Christ; wherefore the bread and wine are offered that He may make them His Body and Blood" [Explication des Prières de la Messe]. All the ancient Liturgies contain an oblation of the bread and wine [see Hammond's Ancient Liturgies. Clarendon Press], but the five prayers in the Roman Missal are of recent date. [OBLATIONS.]

Office.—The term in its ecclesiastical sense is applied to a devotional form of service not in the Prayer Book. Such as, for example, that used at the consecration of a church.

Office, CONGREGATION OF THE HOLY.—That department of the Papal Government which is charged with the government of the INQUISITION [q.v.].

Officers Ecclesiastical.—The term sometimes applied to the three orders of ministers in the Anglican Church—bishops, priests, and deacons. And as officers must be under authority, so we are taught that they derive their authority direct from Christ Himself. It is sometimes applied in an inferior sense to those who handle the temporal affairs of the Church—such as churchwardens.

Oil.—It is certain that blessing of oil for holy uses is very ancient. St. Cyprian [Epistle 70, edit. Pamel] says that the oil used in the solemn administration of baptism was blessed on the same altar on which the Eucharist was consecrated. St. Basil the Great, in his Treatise of the Holy Spirit, c. 27, speaks of the blessing of oil and the baptismal water as a practice established in the Apostolical times; and St. Optatus of Milevis [67 "Of Schism"] observed that the oil consecrated in the church in the name of Christ was for that reason called chrism. In the four first centuries, indeed, it appears that this solemnity was not fixed to any particular day; and the Council of Toledo, in the canon already quoted, expressly says the bishops might perform it when they pleased; adding that each particular church in the diocese was to send a deacon or sub-deacon to the bishop for what chrism they were to use at the approaching festival, i.e. at the solemn administration of baptism on Easter Eve. But the present practice of the Roman Church is to bless the holy oils once a year, and that on Maundy Thursday. The oils are immediately distributed to the pastors and used till the return of the same day.

The consecration of the holy oils consisted in three solemn consecrations or formal benedictions: the first was that of the Oil for the Sick, employed in the sacrament of Extreme Unction: the second, of the chrism, used after baptism, in confirmation, at the consecration of altars, churches, and kings; the third, of the Oil of the Catechumens, so called because employed on the candidates for baptism before they are brought to the sacred font, which is also used at the coronation of sovereign princes and on other occasions. This has been always looked on as an episcopal function, and the Council of Toledo, in 400, Can. xx., expressly forbids priests to perform this ceremony, as being peculiar to the bishops. [ANointing.]

Olaf, Sr., or Olaf Haraldsen, one of the most noted of the early Norwegian kings, was born in 996. He was descended from the ancient royal line, but was educated in exile as a Christian. He was one of the Vikings, and made his name feared throughout the coasts of Norway and Sweden fighting fiercely against Canute. In 1015 he returned home, and, making good his claim, wrested the crown from the hands of Eric and Sverdr Jarl. He at once turned his attention to evangelising his country, and gathering together a band of followers, put an end to the rule of the Swedes and Danes in Norway, and became overking. When he had secured the throne, he sent to England for some missionaries, at whose head was Bishop Grimkil. The measures he took for the conversion of his people were very severe; he made frequent journeys through his kingdom accompanied by the bishop, who on account of the shape of his mitre was called "the horned man," and, summoning the Things, as the Swedish Councils were called, he read to them the laws enforcing Christianity, and all who refused to comply were threatened with death, loss of property, or maiming of the body. Hearing that the heathen sacrifices were secretly offered in the Drontheim district, he took a fleet of five vessels and three hundred men and, surprising the offenders in the middle of the night, slew their leader and divided their property among his followers, and then forced them to allow several churches to be built and several clergy to settle among them. Olaf then, accompanied by another bishop, Sigurd, went against a powerful chief named Gudbrand, who hearing of his arrival called together from far and wide the peasantry to resist these encroachments on the national faith. They repaired to Bredden, where Olaf and Sigurd were busy establishing teachers, and a battle was fought in which Gudbrand's son was taken prisoner by Olaf. It was then decided to summon a Thing to decide whether there was any truth in the new teaching, and having by chosen signs proved that Thor was powerless to defend his believers, Gudbrand was forced to acknowledge the Christian God, and forthwith he and all present were baptised; Olaf sent them some clergy, and Gudbrand himself built a church. These scenes were constantly enacted in different parts, and Olaf even extended his care to Greenland, the Orkney Islands, and Iceland. He set a good example to his subjects by his own observance of the ordinances of religion, going every morning to hear matins, and then to the Thing to decide all matters of religion, together with Bishop Grimkil and other learned clergy. But when he met with opposition the means used were sometimes so cruel that many fled to Canute for help. In 1028 the Danish King entered with a large army, most of Olaf's people forsook him, and he fled to Russia, where he was furnished with an army of 4,000 men, with which he returned; but was slain at Stiklestad on July 29th, 1030. Soon, however, a reaction set in, partly because the people disliked their ruler, Canute's son, and also because it was said that miracles were wrought at the place where Olaf had been buried; so the people assembled in 1031 and the body was buried with great state in the Trondhjem Cathedral. The fame of the miracles reached far and wide, pilgrims came from all parts of Scandinavia, and a book, written in the twelfth century, on his death and miracles, served to increase his fame. He was considered a saint, and though he was not canonised in the usual way, Rome never denied his saintship, and he became the patron saint of Norway. In 1847 the order of Olaf was created by King Oscar I. of Sweden and Norway.

Old Catholics.—The Old Catholic movement arose out of the dissatisfaction caused by the decrees of the Vatican Council of 1870. Symptoms of dissatisfaction and a desire for reforms had appeared from time to time within the Church of Rome, but had been sternly repressed by the ruling powers. This dissatisfaction, however, developed into open rebellion when it was sought to enforce submission to the dogma of Papal Infallibility. The opposition to this dogma was specially strong throughout Germany, where over forty University professors, headed by Dr. Döllinger, the learned Professor of Theology at Munich, and Professor Friedrich, issued a joint declaration against it. In April, 1871, Professors Döllinger and Friedrich were excommunicated by the Archbishop of Munich for their refusal to submit. Dr. Döllinger's answer was "As a Christian, as a theologian, as an historian, as a citizen, I cannot accept this doctrine." In September, 1871, the first congress of the Old Catholics was held at Munich, when the decrees were again denounced, and arrangements were made to organise congregations throughout Germany and Switzerland. They took the name of Old Catholics, to signify that they held fast to the Catholic faith as it had been handed down from the earliest Christian times, before it had been corrupted by the new doctrines imposed by the Papal power. At starting, the movement met with enthusiastic support, and its prospects seemed most encouraging. It became necessary to provide an episcopate, and this was obtained from the Old Catholic, or Jansenist Church of Holland. On Aug. 11th, 1873, Dr. Joseph Hubert Reinkens was consecrated by the Bishop of Deventer as the first Old Catholic Bishop for Germany. Dr. Reinkens had been suspended from his Professorship at Nuremberg, and subsequently excommunicated for his opposition to Papal Infallibility. The movement was now organised as an independent branch of the Church. Difficulties of a serious character began to arise when the work of revising the service books was taken in hand. Many were very jealous of any material changes being made, others were anxious for a very thorough revision. The result was that many adherents reverted to the Church of Rome. The chief alterations adopted were—the translation of the Mass into the language of the country, the omission of the Invocation of Saints, and a great reduction in the number of saints' days. In order to strengthen the position of the Old Catholics in their opposition to Rome, Dr. Döllinger arranged Reunion Conferences to be held at Bonn in 1874 and 1876. Divines from Germany, Switzerland, France, Denmark, Russia, Greece, England, and America attended. Among those who came from England were Dr. Harold Browne, Bishop of Winchester; Canon Liddon, of St. Paul's; and Dean Howson, of Chester. From America came, among others, the Bishop of Pittsburgh, and Dr. Nevin, American Chaplain at Rome. The questions which divided these branches of the Church were discussed, and formulæ of agreement were adopted by the Conference. These formulæ, however, were not received with favour either by the Eastern Church or by the Church of England. Dr. Pusey, in particular, expressed his disapproval of them. The question, however, which caused the greatest trouble to the Old Catholic community was the celibacy of the clergy; great differences of opinion prevailed on the subject. Finally, at a Synod held in 1878 at Bonn, it was decreed that the Old Catholic clergy were free to marry. This was followed immediately by the withdrawal from active co-operation of the greater part of the leaders, including Dr. Dollinger himself. Bishop Reinkens, although he disapproved of the decree, still retained his post as bishop. A great reduction also took place in the number of adherents, several congregations resigning in a body. The Old Catholics in Bavaria cut themselves off from all communion with the Church under the rule of Bishop Reinkens. In the last few years some of the lost ground has been regained, but the numbers on the whole remain very nearly stationary. At the present time there are computed to be about 70,000 in Germany and 80,000 in Switzerland. In Baden greater progress has been made than in other parts of Germany; thus, in 1873 there were 2,286 heads of households who registered themselves as Old Catholics, and in 1884 there were 7,118. In addition to these there are doubtless many adherents who have not ventured to risk persecution from Ultramontanes by openly registering themselves as Old Catholics. The Government, too, is by no means friendly to the community.

In Switzerland the first meeting of Old Catholics was held at Solothurn in 1871; but it was not till 1876 that Dr. Herzog was consecrated as their first Bishop by Bishop Reinkens. At the outset rapid progress was made; but, among other causes, the question of clerical celibacy caused the loss of "thousands," as Bishop Herzog testifies. There was less difficulty, however, in revising the ritual and services of the Church here than in Germany. A yearly synod of clergy and laity has been established, and in the University at Berne an Old Catholic Faculty of Theology was instituted in 1874.

Old Catholicism has established itself in every Roman Catholic country except Belgium, but at present only to a small extent. Thus the movement, although not answering the expectations that were first formed of it, yet has surmounted its early difficulties, and steadily maintains itself.

Oldcastle, SIR JOHN, more generally known as Lord Cobham, which title he assumed on his marriage with the daughter and heiress of that nobleman, was born at the close of the reign of Edward III. He was at once an author, wit, warrior, and statesman; and, although little or nothing is known of his early life, is supposed to have been one of the bosom friends and wild companions of "Madcap Harry," afterwards Henry V. Many believe that he is the Falstaff of Shakespeare. Be that as it may, he was very intimate with the young Prince, and, whatever his youthful excesses may have been, like his royal comrade he repented of them in later life.

In 1407, in conjunction with the Duke of Burgundy, he raised the siege of Paris: having received the command as a reward for his services to Henry IV. About this time he met with the writings of Wickliffe, which took a firm hold upon his intellect. We do not know how soon he declared his religious opinions; but after the death of the Earl of Salisbury, the leader of the Lollards, who was killed during a revolt against the King, the vacant place was offered to him as the greatest warrior of the day. He accepted it, and generously threw open his castle of Cowling, in Kent, to this persecuted sect, who made it their base of operations. Henry IV., worn out by a turbulent reign, died without attempting to confront him; but his son, after trying to convert him to no purpose, was so exasperated by his obstinacy that he gave him up to the clergy. The unfortunate nobleman was besieged in his own castle, and dragged off as a prisoner to the Tower. Before long, however, he managed to escape to Wales. Soon news was brought to the King that he had collected together twenty thousand men in St. Giles's Fields, and had formed a plot to destroy the royal family and most of the "spiritual and temporal lords." The report was probably false, for the King merely surprised a handful of men at a prayer meeting. Many of these were destroyed by the royal troops, while the others were tortured until they confessed a plot, and pointed out Cobham as the ringleader. The King, believing it, set 1,000 marks upon his head, and offered remission of taxes to any borough which should betray him.

After escaping detection for four years, which were blackened by the execution of thirty-nine prominent Lollards, Oldcastle himself was at last captured in the year 1317. His old comrade had no mercy for him, and after a mock trial, in which he refused to recant, he was suspended from a gallows by chains, and there burnt by a slow fire kindled beneath him, while a mob of jeering priests surrounded him, to prevent any expressions of sympathy from the multitudo reaching the sufferer, and to embitter his last moments of agony. Such was the end of this great man. With him the hopes of the Lollards were buried, and in after years they were little more than an empty name.

As an author his talents were considerable, his chief work being Twelve Conclusions Addressed to the Parliament of England. He was the first author and martyr among the English nobility.

Olga, Sr.—A saint of the Russian Church held in high honour; she was of humble birth, but married to the Grand Duke of Kieff. She ruled the country well during the minority of her son Swiatoslav. In 955 she visited Constantinople, where she embraced Christianity, and was baptised by the Patriarch Theophilaktos, having for her sponsor the Emperor Porphyrogenitus; she received the name of Helena. On her return to Kieff she endeavoured to convert her son to her new religion, but without success; but her teaching bore fruit later on in the mind of her grandson VLADIMIR [q.v.].

Olshausen, Hermann, one of the most illustrious modern Biblical commentators, was born at Oldehohe in Holstein in 1796. He studied theology at Kiel and Berlin, became a Privat-Dozent at the latter University in 1820, Extraordinary Professor at Königsberg in 1821, and Ordinary Professor in 1827. In 1834 he accepted a call to the Theological Professorship at Erlangen, where he died of consumption in 1839.

Olshausen's Commentary on the New Testament, which he left uncompleted, marked a new era in ecclesiastical literature. It is chiefly noted for the way in which he enters into the very heart of his subject, paying careful attention to the grammatical exposition, but at the same time laying open to the reader the hidden meaning of the text, showing its spiritual allusions and far-reaching bearings. The work was completed by his disciple Ebrard, aided by Wiesinger, and was translated into English at Edinburgh for Clark's Foreign Theological Library. Olshausen also wrote a tract on the genuineness of the writings of the New Testament, and before publishing his great work, put out two books containing his views as to the right way of writing commentaries.

Omen is a word which, in its proper sense, signifies a sign or indication of some future event, especially of an alarming nature. A belief in omens was very general among the Greeks and Romans; the Scandinavians, Germans, Icelanders, and ancient Britons were all imbued with this superstition; indeed, most nations were so. Amongst the Romans in particular, the observation of omens was a religious rite, without which no expedition was undertaken, or contract made. These omens were called auspices, from avis, "a bird," and specio, "to look," because they were based on the observation of the flight or other actions of birds. Priests, called augurs, were regularly maintained for these predictions. [DIVINATION.] There are numerous instances in history of events looked on at the time as good or bad omens, not only amongst the Romans, but also in our own and other countries. Archbishop Laud was a believer in omens; in the library of Lambeth Palace is preserved a piece of glass on which Laud wrote with a diamond recording the destruction of a church by lightning, and speaking of it as a sad omen. The Rev. A. M. TOPLADY [q.v.], also a believer, thus writes:—"Though it be true that all omens are not worthy of observation, and though they should never be so regarded as to shock our fortitude, or diminish our confidence in God, still they are not to be constantly despised. Small incidents have sometimes been prelusive to great events, nor is there any superstition in noticing these apparent prognostications, though there may be much superstition in being either too indiscriminately or too deeply swayed by them."

Onderdonk, Henry Usti [b. 1789, d. 1858].—An American bishop. He was educated as a doctor, but afterwards went into the ministry, became Assistant Bishop of Pennsylvania, and in 1827 succeeded Bishop White in the See. He was the author of Episcopacy Examined and Re-Examined, and of some hymns which he contributed to the Hymn-book of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, of which he was one of the compilers.

Onkelos.—The author of the most celebrated of the Targums, or Chaldee translations of the Old Testament. According to the Babylonian Talmud, he was contemporary with Gamaliel, and from the purity of his Chaldee, which greatly resembles that of Ezra and Daniel, may have been a native of Babylon. It was the first work of its kind, and keeps very closely to the original, except in the case of anthropomorphisms or anthropopathies which might appear derogatory to God. This Targum has frequently been published, as in the Antwerp Polyglota, Buxtorf's Hebrew Bible, etc., but a critical edition has never been attempted.

Oosterzee, Jan Jakob van.—One of the greatest theologians of his day, of the Dutch Evangelical School. He was born at Rotterdam in 1817. He studied at Utrecht, and became, in 1840, Pastor of Kemmer-Binnendijk, and four years after of Rotterdam. In 1862 he was called to Utrecht University, where he lectured first on theology and homiletics, and afterwards on doctrinal history and the philosophy of religion. He died at Wiesbaden in 1882. Oosterzee's Life of Christ, Christology, Theology of the New Testament, Dogmatics, Year of Salvation, Moses, and Practical Theology, have all been translated into English. He also contributed St. Luke, the Pastoral Epistles, and St. James to Lange's Commentaries.

Ophites.—An obscure sect, first heard of in Egypt in the second century. Origen denies that they were Christians, and although they professed to have received their philosophy from James, the brother of our Lord, their views were to the highest degree heretical. Their name [from ophis, "a serpent"] was given them on account of the honour they gave to the serpent who tempted Eve, and was therefore the cause, they argued, of the world's gaining a knowledge of good and evil. They maintained that Jesus and Christ were two distinct persons—Jesus, who was born of the Virgin Mary; Christ, the serpent, whose spirit was afterwards caused to descend upon Jesus. Their deity they named Jaldabaoth, who, after he had created man, was jealous of his perfection, so gave him a strict command, and then sent the serpent to persuade man to break it. Accounts of them and their extraordinarily profane creed are given in the writings of several early Christian writers, and in the code formed by the Emperor Justinian there are some laws against them. Another name for the sect is Serpentinians.

Optatus, Sr., Bishop of Milevum, lived in the fourth century. He was an African, and was brought up as a heathen, but was converted to Christianity, and became a noted champion of the Church. He was made Bishop of Milevum, in Numidia, and was one of the opposers of the Donatists, writing, about 370, six books against Parmenian, the Donatist Bishop of Carthage, to which Pope Siricius added a seventh in 385. Little is known of the life of St. Optatus, but he is mentioned in terms of high praise by St. Augustine, St. Jerome, and Fulgentius. His book was edited by Du Pin in 1700 with the different readings from several editions, notes, and a life of the author. The saint is supposed to have died subsequently to 384, and is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology on June 4th.

Optimism.—This theory, although it exists to a great extent in most books on Christian philosophy, was first designated by the name "optimism" to describe the teaching of Leibnitz in the eighteenth century. Its chief point is that the world as it is, is as good as it possibly can be, seeing that God is a perfect Being, and that therefore His creations must be to a certain extent perfect too. But there are difficulties in the way of this theory. If God wished the world and mankind to be absolutely perfect, why does He not make them so? This is a question which has been eagerly asked age after age, and no answer is forthcoming which settles it. Pope's Essay on Man sums up the Optimist theory in that famous line in the first book, "Whatever is right;" but in the face of the sorrow and sin which we are compelled to witness, we feel that an epigram like Pope's does not settle the question. Epigrams take hold of the memory, but they do not convince. Physical suffering, indeed, can be shown in many cases to result in good, and to conduce to the general welfare of man, but the conscience pronounces sin essentially evil. The Scripture points to a true Optimism when it points to a world to come where there shall be "no more curse," and where God "shall wipe away all tears."

Option [from the Lat. optare, "to choose"] is the right enabling ecclesiastics to choose certain benefices. Thus, when any of the free prebends fall vacant, the prebendary next in age may, if he likes, take it by option instead of his own. Formerly an archbishop, after confirming a bishop, had the option of appointing an incumbent to the next benefice which fell vacant belonging to the See; which options were only binding on the bishops themselves who granted them, and not on their successors. The law was done away with by Sec. 42 of 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 113.

Opus operatum ["the work wrought"].—A term used to denote the nature of the power of the Sacraments as opposed to Opus operantis ["the work of the worker"]. The latter expresses the doctrine of some extreme Protestants, that the Sacraments are used as signs of faith in obedience to our Lord's injunctions, and that they assist the mind in its approach to God, though the power of the work rests with the individual who makes use of the Sacrament. The Roman Catholic Church and the Church of England, on the other hand, hold that the Sacraments are the instruments through which God bestows His grace and power on the recipient, and that through them such grace is always bestowed, so long as there is faith and oneness with God's will. The absence of faith is the only barrier, and only in so far as the recipient has this faith is there the question Opus operantis. The term was employed by the Council of Trent, and much used in the Middle Ages in controversy on this point.

Oracle, among the heathens, was the answer which the gods were supposed to give to those who consulted them upon any affair of importance. It is also used for the god who was thought to give the answer, and for the place where the answer was given. The origin of oracles is attributed to Egypt, where the principal oracles were those of the Theban Jupiter, Hercules, Minerva, Diana, Apollo, and Mars, and especially of Latona. In Greece, the oldest oracle was that of Zeus, at Dodona, but the most famous was that of Apollo at Delphi; there were many others, but of less repute. The responses of oracles were given in various ways: at Dodona they issued from the hollow of an oak; at Delphi the priestess gave the answers in hexameter verse; at Ammon, in the desert of Libya, the priests pronounced them. In other places, the answers were given in such ambiguous terms that they admitted of altogether contradictory interpretations; sometimes they came in the form of a letter; and sometimes dice with peculiar characters engraved on them were used to cast lots, and these characters were then deciphered from an explanatory table. Dreams, visions, etc., were also supposed to convey the will of the gods. The Romans, although they believed in oracles, had none very celebrated of their own, but usually consulted those of Greece.

Learned men have been much divided as to the source of these oracles; some suppose that they were the invention of priests, others conceive that there was a supernatural agency employed in the business. There are several circumstances leading to the former hypothesis, such as the gloomy solemnity with which many of them were delivered in subterranean caverns, the numerous and disagreeable ceremonies enjoined, as sleeping in the skins of beasts, and expensive sacrifices, the medium of priests, speaking images, vocal groves, etc., look very much like the contrivances of artful priests to disguise their villany. But, on the other hand, if we may credit the relation of ancient writers, both among heathens and Christians, this hypothesis will hardly account for many of the instances they mention, and since it cannot be proved either impossible or unscriptural, it seems at least possible that God might sometimes permit an intercourse with spirits, overruling, in the end this and every other circumstance to His own glory.

Respecting the cessation of these oracles, there have been a variety of opinions. It has been said that oracles ceased at the moment of the birth of Jesus Christ. History, however, makes mention of several laws published by the Christian Emperors, Theodosius, Gratian, and Valentinian, to punish persons who interrogated oracles, so that it would appear that they existed, and were occasionally consulted, as late as A.D. 358; but about that period they entirely ceased, and for several centuries before they had sunk very low in public esteem. Towards this there can be no doubt that the advancement of Christianity powerfully contributed.

Among the Jews there were several sorts of real oracles. God's spoken words face to face with Moses; prophetic dreams, such as that of Joseph; visions, sent to prophets in an ecstasy; and specially the oracle of the Urim and Thummim worn by the high priest, which by an extraordinary brightness made known the will of Jehovah. This manner of inquiring of the Lord was often made use of from Joshua's time to the erection of the Temple at Jerusalem. After that time they usually consulted the prophets, who were frequent in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel. After the death of Malachi they appear only to have expected immediate Divine direction through what was called the Bath Kol, or Daughter of the Voice, which was a supernatural manifestation of the will of God, either by a strong inspiration or internal voice, or else by a sensible and external voice, which was heard by a number of persons sufficient to bear testimony to it. Such was the voice heard at the baptism of Christ [Matt. iii. 17].

The Scripture gives us also examples of profane oracles. Balaam, at the instigation of his own spirit, and urged on by his avarice, suggests to Balak a diabolical expedient of making the Israelites fall into idolatry [Numb. xxiv. 14, xxxi. 16], by which he promises him a considerable advantage, if not victory, over the people of God. Micaiah, the son of Imlah [1 Kings xxii. 20, etc.], says that he saw the Almighty, sitting on His throne, with all the host of heaven round Him, and asking "Who shall tempt Ahab?" etc. Then Satan offers himself to be a lying spirit in the mouth of God's prophets, and God accepts his offer. The dialogue clearly proves two things: [1] That the devil could do nothing by his own power; [2] that with the permission of God, he could inspire the false prophets, sorcerers, and magicians, and make them deliver false oracles.

Orarium.—A stole worn in the Eastern Church by priests on both shoulders; by deacons, on the left only.

Orate, fratres, &c.—The opening words of the address said at the beginning of the Canon of the Mass after the "Lavabo." Originally the priest said merely "Orate" or "Orate pro me;" but the other words, "ut meum ac vestrum pariter sacrificium acceptum sit Domino," were added by Remi of Auxerre in 880.

Oratorio.—A sacred drama, sung by solo voices and choruses, and accompanied by an orchestra, but differing from the opera in not requiring scenery, stage-costumes, or action. This distinction was not always made in the case of the earliest oratorios, and most of those produced in Italy in the Middle Ages were performed in churches on stages erected for the purpose. The subjects of oratorios have been taken, almost without exception, from the Bible, and probably originated, like the old mystery plays, in an attempt to impress sacred events more strongly on the minds of the people. The first oratorios, in the present sense of the term, were held by Filippo de Neri [b. 1515, d. 1595], the founder of the Congregation of Oratorians, in the oratory of his church, and hence the name, "oratorio," was given. After his time the oratorio was developed in successive stages by Emilio del Cavaliere, Carissimi, Scarlatti, and Stradella; but the greatest step in its growth was in the works of Handel [b. 1685, d. 1759] and Bach [b. 1685, d. 1750], who changed its form from the Italian to the Anglo-Germanic. The chief difference between the treatment used by these two composers is that Bach's oratorios were still designed for use in churches, while those of Handel were somewhat secularised. With them the oratorio reached its highest standard, though in technical details it has been developed by Schütz and Sebastiani, and still more by Mendelssohn and Haydn.

Oratories.—Churches were so called as being houses of prayer, but the name is now applied only to private and domestic chapels in distinction to the parish church.

Oratory, PRIESTS OF THE.—There were formerly two religious Orders of this name—one in Italy, the other in France.

The Italian Order was founded by St. Philip Neri, under whose name will be found an account of the Order. [PHILIP NERI, St.] After Neri's death the congregation continued to increase in Italy, and has produced many eminent writers, as Baronius, Rainaldi, etc. It was introduced into England by Cardinal Newman in 1847. The first house was at Mary Vale, and was transferred to Alcester Street, Birmingham, in 1849. In 1850 a house was opened in London, which was released from obedience to Birmingham in October of that year, and was transferred to Brompton, where a large domed church has been erected. It is said to be the largest religious Order now in England.

The French Order was founded in 1613 upon the model of the preceding by Cardinal Bérard, a native of Champagne, who wished to deepen devotion and to revive the splendour of the ecclesiastical state. He assembled a community of ecclesiastics in the suburb of St. Jacques, and formed the Order, which consisted of two sorts of persons—incorporated and associates. The former governed the houses while the latter gave themselves to the life and manners of ecclesiastics. The fathers of this French Order did not, like those of the Italian Order, distinguish themselves by their researches in ecclesiastical history, but devoted themselves to all branches of training, both secular and sacred. They belonged to the secular clergy and did not keep the canonical hours. They received the name of Fathers of the Oratory because they had no churches in which the sacraments were administered, but only chapels or oratories in which they read prayers and preached. The Order was approved by Pope Paul V. in 1613 under the title of Congregation of the Oratory of our Lord Jesus Christ in France. The founder's favourite work was the institution of seminaries for the training of priests, of which, on his death in 1629, there were six. There were altogether fifty seminaries, colleges, and houses of retreat. At the beginning of the eighteenth century several members of the society were inclined to Jansenism; but in 1746, after a hard struggle, they accepted the Bull Unigenitus. The society was broken up at the Revolution by the Civil Constitution of the Clergy; but the Oratory of the Immaculate Conception, founded in Paris in 1852, adopted the ancient rule. Among famous Oratorians we may mention Lejeune, Malebranche, Thomassin, Massillon, Jean Morin, Le Brun, and Lami.

Ordeal.—The old English word [from Anglo-Saxon or, "out," and deal or dæl, a "judgment"] for the JUDICIUM DEI [q.v.].

Orders, HOLY.—The estates of bishops, priests, and deacons, conferred by the imposition of hands of lawfully ordained bishops, are termed "holy orders." These orders are designated "holy" in distinction to INFERIOR or MINOR ORDERS [q.v.], because of the special grace of God for the work of each several office given by the laying on of hands of the bishop, qualified thereto by virtue of Apostolical succession.

Orders, INFERIOR OR MINOR.—Offices in the Church, to fill which, men are set apart by solemn commission from the bishop, but which have not the same spiritual character as the offices of bishop, priest, or deacon. They originated in the need of lightening the duties which accumulated upon those higher officers of the Church, and were designed to relieve them of the more secular portion of their services. Their numbers varied according to the requirements of the Church. Among them were the orders of sub-deacons (reckoned by some among the superior orders), acolytes, exorcists, lectors or readers, porters (the above are recognised in the Roman Church now), singers, fossarii, who are charged with the care of the dead and the conduct of funerals, *parabolan*i, attendants on the sick. They were admitted to their offices without imposition of hands, and were allowed to follow secular occupations as a means of livelihood. In the Anglican Church the vicars choral and the choristers, the sacristan or sexton, and the vergers, answer to some of the above. The newly-revived order of lay-readers corresponds to that of the lectors. Judging from the tone of recent discussions, the speedy revival of the subdiaconate in the Church of England at no distant day may be regarded as at least probable.

Orders, RELIGIOUS. [MONASTICISM: MENDICANT FRIARS; FRANCISCANS; MILITARY ORDERS, etc.]

Ordinary is the name given to one who exercises ordinary or immediate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical affairs. An ordinary performs all his functions in his own right, while lower orders perform them in the right delegated to them from the bishops. The name is given properly only to a bishop who has original jurisdiction, but in a wider sense it is used for all commissaries of the bishop who have judicial power. Thus, in the 138th Canon of the English Church it is written, "That no bishop or archdeacon, or their vicars or officials, or other inferior ordinaries, shall depute or have more apparitors to serve."

Ordination.—The act of conferring holy orders. The power to ordain is, in Episcopal Churches, held to be vested in the bishops, as the successors of the Apostles, and the claim of others than bishops to ordain has always been repudiated by the Church. In the ordination of deacons, the bishop lays his hands on the person to be made deacon; in the case of admission to the priesthood, the imposition of hands is the act of the bishop, with the priests present; while the officiating bishop and bishops present are joined in the act of consecration in the case of a bishop. It is an ancient rule that three bishops at least should take part in the consecration of a bishop, but where this number was not obtained, the consecration, though irregular, was held to be valid. In the Anglican Church it is required that the person to be made deacon should be twenty-three years of age, unless there are exceptional reasons for his ordination before that time; that every man to be admitted priest shall be full four-and-twenty years old; and every man to be ordained or consecrated bishop shall be fully thirty years of age. The times for ordination are the four ember seasons, except there be urgent occasion, and then any Sunday or Holy Day. Conforming to the practice of the universal Church, the Church of England requires evidence of the soundness in the faith, of the proficiency in learning, and of the excellence of the moral character, of those who are desirous of receiving ordination.

In the Nonconformist bodies, some contend for the power of ordination as belonging to the people, the exercise of which right by them constitutes a minister, and confers validity on his public ministrations; others suppose it belongs to those who are already in office. The following is an outline of the arguments on both sides.

According to the former opinion, it is argued that the word ordain was originally equal to choose or appoint; so that if twenty Christians nominated a man to instruct them once, the man was appointed or ordained a preacher for the time. The essence of ordination lies in the voluntary choice and call of the people, and in the voluntary acceptance of that call by the person chosen and called; for mutual assent and agreement are necessary to join together the pastor and people. And this is to be done among themselves: public ordination, so called, is no other than a declaration of that. Election and ordination are spoken of as the same; the latter is expressed and explained by the former. It is said of Christ that He ordained twelve [Mark iii. 14], that is, He chose them to the office of apostleship, as He Himself explains it [John vi. 70]. Paul and Barnabas are said to ordain elders in every Church [Acts xiv. 23], or to choose them; that is, they gave orders and directions to every Church as to the choice of elders over them. The word used in Acts xiv. 23 is translated chosen in 2 Cor. viii. 19, where the Apostle speaks of a brother, who was chosen of the Churches to travel with us, and is so rendered when ascribed to God [Acts x. 41]. This choice and ordination, in primitive times, was made in two ways—by casting lots and giving votes, signified by stretching out of hands. Matthias was chosen and ordained to be an Apostle in the room of Judas by casting lots; that, being an extraordinary office, required an immediate interposition of God, a lot being neither more nor less than an appeal to His decision of an affair. But ordinary officers, such as elders and pastors of Churches, were chosen and ordained by the votes of the people, expressed by stretching out their hands, as in Acts. xiv. 23.

Some, however, on this side of the question, do not go so far as to say that the essence of ordination lies in the choice of the people, but in the solemn and public separation to office by prayer; still, they think that ordination, either by bishops, presbyters, or any superior character, cannot be necessary to make a minister or ordain a pastor in any particular Church; for they argue that Christ would never leave the subsistence of His Churches, or the efficacy of His Word and Sacraments, to depend on the uninterrupted succession of any office or officer, for then it would be impossible after the lapse of centuries for any Church to know whether it had an authentic minister. A whole nation might be corrupted, and every bishop and elder have apostatised from the faith, as it was in England before the Reformation; and to say that the right of ordaining lies in men who are already in office, would drive us to hold the untenable position of uninterrupted succession.

On the other side it is said that, though Christians have the liberty of choosing their own pastors, they have no power or right to confer the office itself. Scripture represents ordination to be the setting apart of a person to the holy ministry by the authority of Jesus Himself, acting by the medium of men in office; and this solemn investing act is necessary to his being lawfully accounted a minister of Christ. The original word [Acts vi. 3] signifies to put one in rule, or to give him authority. How did this power lodge in the people? how happens it that in all the Epistles not a single word is to be found giving them any directions about constituting ministers? On the other hand, in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus, who were persons in office, we find particular instruction given them to lay hands suddenly on no man, to examine his qualifications before they ordain him, and to take care that they commit the office only to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also [Titus i. 5; 2 Tim. iv. 14]. Besides, it is said, the early Christians evidently viewed this matter in the same light. There is scarcely a single ecclesiastical writer who does not expressly mention ordination as the work of the elders, and as being regarded as a distinct thing from the choice of the people, and subsequent to it.

Another question involved here is whether a man can be ordained in any other way than as the pastor of a church. In the Roman and Anglican Churches, a man receiving the imposition of hands is regarded as thereby in possession of certain powers, which he may forthwith exercise, or which may lie latent. But others hold that not to entrust with a church is not to ordain. In favour of the former view it is urged that when our Lord gave his commission [Matt. xxviii. 19], He gave no specific church, and that missionaries and itinerants cannot be ordained to particular spheres, but are ordained for the Church Universal. And by analogy we may hold that Titus and other friends of St. Paul were similarly ordained, to find their work afterwards as God might point it out to them. It should be noted that no bishop could ordain a man without title, that is, without knowing distinctly that he was to be appointed to some specific sphere of duty, either as curate of souls, or engaged in education (as fellows of a college), or as missionary.

Organ [Gr. organon].—The word in the LXX. was used for any kind of instrument, but in the Vulgate it is translated as "pipe." In St. Augustine's time it seems to have nearly approached its present meaning, as he speaks of it as an instrument in which wind was supplied by bellows. The pipes were at first generally ten, which were sounded either from a wind-magazine compressed by the arm, or by bellows whose supply was regulated by water. These were used at entertainments, and not allowed in churches, because it was thought that the soft tones spoil the singing; but when Michael Rhangabe sent an organ to Charles the Great, it was put in Aix-la-Chapelle Cathedral, and at the end of the ninth century Pope John VIII. begged Bishop Anno of Freising to send him an organ and some one who could play it. The keys were added in the eleventh century, and pedals in the fifteenth. The organ has never been used among the Greeks. From the time of Charlemagne organs seem to have come more and more into use in the West, though pretexts were made against them, and the monks were very averse to their use. At the Reformation they were discarded, being considered

"the vilest remnants of Popery;" but they were reintroduced at the Council of Basel. They were so disliked by the Puritans in England that at the Restoration there was scarcely one to be found, and foreigners were brought over to play on those which remained.

Concerning the position of the organ in a church, it is noticeable that in ancient times it was placed on the north side of the choir, as it is generally at present. The plan of placing it over the choir screen, which is now far less prevalent than it was half a century ago, seems not to have become general till the Restoration. It is the custom in many churches and cathedrals in Europe for the organ to be silent throughout Passion Week, and during Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent.

Oriel School.—This phrase was applied to a religious party at Oxford, of which Archbishop Whately may be regarded as the leader. Other members of it were Davison and Copleston, the Provost of the College; in fact, Principal Tulloch, in an interesting essay on this subject, Movements of Religious Thought during the Nineteenth Century, calls Copleston "the original master-mind of the movement." He was succeeded as Provost of Oriel, in 1828, by Dr. Hawkins, who survived until 1883, and maintained the liberal traditions of his predecessor. Soon after its foundation the party was joined by Arnold and Hampden. The school was known as "the Noetic men," from being supposed to claim superior mental independence, and the older men of the University regarded them with deep alarm. The recoil from them was one of the main causes of the Tracts for the Times, started by Newman, another Fellow of Oriel, who led an opposing school. [WHATELY; HAMPDEN; TRACTS.]

Oriflamme [Lat. auri flamma, "flame of gold"].—A banner with three points or tails, which had this name given it because it was made of a silken stuff, of a gold and flame colour; the tassels of it were green, and it was carried on the point of a lance. This banner belonged originally to the Abbey of St. Denis, and the bearing of this standard in war was the right of the Earls of Pontoise, or Vexin, who were the protectors of this monastery. Louis le Gros was the first King of France who, in his right of Earl of Vexin, caused the oriflamme to be carried in his armies, in 1124. Its use as the standard of France was continued till the reign of Charles VII., who, after he had ousted the English from Paris, adopted the White Coronet as the chief banner of France. The original oriflamme was lost about 1382; it was kept at St. Denis in times of peace, and consecrated with much ceremony every time it was carried to battle.

Origen, surnamed ADAMANTIUS, for his unwearied assiduity in writing and teaching, was born at Alexandria, A.D. 185. He was early instructed in the Holy Scriptures by his father Leonides, whom he often puzzled with perplexing questions, showing that tendency to go beyond the literal meaning, and that taste for fanciful interpretations, which afterwards strongly characterised him. These studies were followed up under Clemens Alexandrinus, and he gained, besides, a wide knowledge of many other subjects, including the opinions of the various heretical sects and philosophical schools. He had some acquaintance with mathematics and physical science, and a knowledge of Hebrew, which was unusual in his time.

When he was seventeen years old his father was martyred, in the persecution under Severus, and Origen's ardour almost led him to share his fate; indeed, his mother could only prevent him from joining his father by hiding his clothes. The death of Leonides left the family in great want, as all his property was confiscated; but they were assisted by a wealthy matron of Alexandria, who received Origen into her house. Here he pursued his studies for a short time until he was able to support himself by teaching grammar. Soon, however, he abandoned this employment, being appointed Catechist by the Bishop of Alexandria, Demetrius. In this capacity he commenced a life of great austerity. He sold his books of profane literature, and lived on the proceeds, spending his days in teaching, and the greater part of his nights in the study of the Scriptures. His zeal sometimes led him to extremes; for example, in interpreting literally Luke ix. 3 and Matt. xix. 12. His fame soon spread widely, and the number of his pupils increased so rapidly that he was obliged to commit the instruction of the newer converts to his friend Heraclas, and devote himself to the teaching of those who were more advanced. Origen did not confine himself to Alexandria. He visited Rome, and at the request of the Governor he went to Arabia to expound Christianity there. During a visit which he made to Palestine, he was allowed by Theoctistus, Bishop of Cæsarea, to expound the Scriptures publicly in the church, though he was then only a layman. This irregular proceeding was objected to by Demetrius, but was defended by Theoctistus, and by Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem. In the end Origen was recalled to Alexandria. At one time he was sent for by Mammaea, the mother of Alexander Severus, who was then at Antioch with her nephew, the Emperor Heliogabalus, to instruct her in the truths of Christianity; and at another he travelled to Greece to confute certain heresies which had arisen there.

In 228, Origen was ordained priest at Cæsarea by the Bishop Theoctistus. This ordination led to a serious quarrel between Origen and Demetrius. The latter, offended at this interference within his province, and envious, perhaps, of his subordinate's fame, persuaded a Council of African bishops to degrade him from the priesthood, banish him from Alexandria, and excommunicate him, on the ground that some of his doctrines were unorthodox.

Henceforward, Origen resided at Cæsarea, where he carried on his work of teaching and writing. That the feeling against him was not universal is shown by the fact that he was summoned to attend a Council of Arabian bishops, A.D. 238, at which he confuted the heresy of Beryllus, one of these bishops, respecting the Incarnation, and induced its author to return to the Catholic faith.

In the Decian persecution [A.D. 250] Origen suffered severely. He was imprisoned and tortured, but the martyr's crown which he so eagerly desired was denied him. He died in the reign of Gallus, A.D. 254, aged sixty-nine.

Origen's industry was indefatigable. He is said to have written as many as six thousand volumes; but, if this be true, letters and short treatises, are probably reckoned as volumes. His great work, which occupied twenty-eight years, was his Hexapla, an arrangement in parallel columns of six different versions of the Old Testament. These were:—[1] the Greek version, made by Aquila, in the reign of Hadrian; [2] that of Theodotion, published in the reign of Commodus; [3] that of Symmachus, published in 202; [4] the Septuagint [LXX.] version; and [5 and 6] two anonymous Greek versions. To these he added the Hebrew text in Hebrew and Greek characters. The first four of these versions formed the Tetrapla. These are now, unfortunately, lost. Other writings are:—Commentaries on the greater part of the Bible; Stromata, in which the opinions of the ancient philosophers are compared with Christianity; a work against Celsus consisting of eight books; a treatise to Africanus on the History of Susannah, defending that book; and an Exhortation to Martyrdom, written to his friend Ambrose during the persecution of Maximin, in which the possession of property, wife, and children, is held up as an encouragement, rather than a deterrent, to the martyr, making the merit so much the greater. Origen's character has been the subject of much dispute. The praise which he has received from some is only equalled by the blame which he has received from others. It is only fair to say that his Treatise de Principiis, from which the charges against him are chiefly drawn, is only known to us through the translation of Rufinus, and the original work has been so much altered by the translator and others, as Rufinus himself confesses, that there is considerable difficulty in arriving at the author's real opinions.

Original Sin.—The Ninth Article of the Church of England declares against the Pelagians that original sin is not a mere following of Adam by a free agent, but is "the fault and corruption of the nature of every man that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil." This passage assumes that man was created good and without actual sin, and that this original righteousness was lost by the Fall. But the position taken by modern scientific rationalism comes into collision with this view, for it assumes that man has slowly emerged out of a low physical and moral condition into civilisation, and that the traditions of a golden age are "a poet's dream, a vaunt of empty song."

This much may at once be conceded, that except in the Garden of Eden the Bible gives us no reason to suppose that the earlier inhabitants of the world were more moral or more religious than their successors, and that scientific investigation gives no trace of any but savage peoples. Yet the judgments of God as declared in Scripture are declared on the face of Nature, the soul that sins dies. Races, like individuals, become deteriorated. And thus we are brought to the conclusion that the sins of the fathers really are visited upon the children. But, unlike Nature, the religion of Christ offers hope, because it reveals that the suffering caused by sin is a discipline, that the furnace of affliction separates the dross from the gold, and that the Saviour can put away sin, and will do so in the brighter land whither we are faring. The teaching, not of St. Paul only, but of Christ, distinctly spoke of a new birth in Christ, which shall take away the death which is the heritage of man in his natural state [John iii. 5-8, 36; Rom. vi.]. The latter chapter is throughout the assertion that eternal life is a special gift of God, conferred on those meet to receive it. And this eternal life is the converse of the evil nature which produces what St. Paul calls the works of the flesh. Now, such works—injustice, oppression, lust, sensuality, cruelty—are certainly to be traced back till we find them originating in the promptings of that nature which we have in common with the animal kingdom. To gratify the various desires of the body is the law of the animal, and with this law the spiritual life comes into antagonism. Now the history of Adam and Eve may be poetic in form, but it represents a truth which Nature recognises, namely, that there was a conflict between the lower and the higher nature, in which the higher was defeated. Adam put away from him the supernatural grace which might have saved him, and it is thus with all his posterity. It has been asserted indeed that any interpretation of the Fall as an allegory throws doubt on the descent of mankind from a single pair, and that this is a direct contradiction of 1 Cor. xv. 22. To this it has been replied that inasmuch as the relationship to Christ is a spiritual one, and we are not Christ's sons by natural descent, there is no proof that our relationship to Adam may not have been regarded by the Apostle as spiritual too.

The doctrine of Original Sin explains the Incarnation of the Lord Jesus. There was a gradual evolution of the spiritual nature from its first beginning, far back in the history of the world. It struggled for existence against foes fierce, mighty, and manifold, yet it was marvellously preserved. Evil seemed strongest; yet the good lived and grew. And at length, in the fulness of time, came the Perfect Man, the Example, by following Whom, and in union with Whom, good is attained and evil cast out.

Origin of Evil. [Sin.]

Ormuzd.—The highest of the Persian gods. His worshippers held that he contained the principles both of good and evil, but this doctrine was afterwards degraded. He was looked upon as the representative of evil, while Ahriman, the "black god," was chosen as the evil god. [PAGANISM.]

Ornaments Rubric.—The name given to the second rubric preceding the order for Morning and Evening Prayer, which runs thus:—"And here is to be noted that such ornaments of the Church and of the ministers thereof at all times of their ministration shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth."

This rubric has lately given rise to a great deal of controversy with regard to both points, the ornaments of the Church and the vestments of the priest, but particularly the latter, which we will consider first.

[1] In 1549 the rubric referred to, which was placed at the beginning of the Communion Service, stated that the priest shall wear "a white albe plain, with a vestment or cope," and the assisting priests or deacons "albes with tunicles." At the end of the preface "of ceremonies" it was ordered that "in saying or singing of Mattins and Evensong, Baptising and Burying, the minister in parish churches, and chapels annexed to the same, shall use a surplice," and that graduates shall, in cathedral churches and colleges, use their hoods. "And whosoever the minister shall celebrate the Holy Communion, or execute any other public administration, he shall have upon him, besides his rochette, a surplice or albe, and a cope or vestment." In 1552 it was ordered "that the minister at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his administration, shall use neither albe, vestment, nor cope; but being archbishop or bishop he shall have and wear a rochette; and being a priest or deacon he shall have and wear a surplice only." On Queen Elizabeth's accession to the throne the rubric ordered that the ornaments should be "the same as in the second year of King Edward VI., until other order should be taken by the Queen with the advice of her Commissioners." Whether this "other order" was ever issued under these conditions is a much disputed point. There were still many different opinions held by the clergy as to vestments, as may be seen by Archbishop Parker's correspondence with Sir William Cecil, and in 1564 appeared the "advertisements" specifying the public and private apparel of all persons ecclesiastical; but it is a subject of much controversy whether these were issued by the Queen and her Commissioners, or on the responsibility of Parker and other bishops who had drawn them up. The advertisements ordered that in cathedrals and collegiate churches in ministration of the Holy Communion the principal minister shall use a cope, with gospeller and epistoller agreeably; at all other services or prayer, surplices or hoods; and for parish priests "saying public prayer, ministering the Sacraments or other rites of the Church, shall use a comely surplice with sleeves." This was ratified by the Canons of 1604. In 1662 the rubric was cast in its present form; but as vestments, except the surplice and hood, and in some places the cope, had fallen into desuetude since 1564, the word "retain" has led to much dispute. Subsequently the cope fell into disuse, and for many generations the surplice and hood, and the black gown in preaching, were the only vestments. Lately, however, the use of the other vestments has been revived. There have been many suits on the subject, as those of Liddell v. Westerton, and Hebbert v. Purchas. [For the present law concerning vestments see FOLKESTONE RITUAL CASE.]

[2] Concerning the ornaments of the Church there has been little discussion, except concerning lights on the altar, which some say were forbidden in 1549, and therefore are illegal now. The Canons of 1604, confirming the advertisements of Queen Elizabeth, ordered that the Ten Commandments were to be set up at the east end of the chancel; that the Communion table be decently made and covered with a carpet of silk or other decent stuff; that there was to be a pulpit, and an alms chest, a great Bible and Prayer Book, and that the wine be brought to the Communion table in "a clean and sweet-standing pot or stoop of pewter, if not of purer metal." Dr. Pinnock has given the following list of ornaments of the Church; those in italics being necessary, are to be provided at the cost of the parish, while the others are only optional and of modern introduction:—

1. Alms Basin.
2. Alms Chest.
3. Bells (and bellringers).
4. Bier.
5. Books.
6. Clocks, Chimes.
7. Communion Plate, &c.

8. Communion Table.
9. Coverings, Cloths, &c.
10. Credence Table.
11. Croce.
12. Evergreens, Flowers.
13. Foni.
14. *Images and Pic-

15. Lectern.
16. Lights.
17. Litany Stool.
18. Monuments.
19. Organ and Organist.
20. Parish Clerk.
21. Pulpit.
22. Reading Desk.
23. Royal Arms.

24. Scripture Sentences.
25. Sedilia.
26. Surplice.
27. Table of Degrees.
28. Ten Commandments.
29. Vestry Furniture, and other goods.

Orthodoxy [Gr. orthos, "right," and doxa, "opinion."]—Inasmuch as no one can arrogate to himself the claim of holding correct opinions on all subjects, it might seem difficult to determine what constitutes orthodoxy. It may be said that those who hold the doctrines of Scripture are orthodox; but as disputes exist as to the interpretation of Scripture this test is hardly sufficient. The Roman Catholic Church holds it heterodox to deny Transubstantiation. Protestants generally would agree to apply it to those who hold the doctrine of the Trinity and the three Creeds.

O Sapientia.—The opening words of the first of the seven antiphons formerly sung during the last week in Advent, except on St. Thomas's Day and Christmas Eve. They were appointed in the English Liturgy to be sung before the Magnificat, but were discontinued at the Reformation. The following is a translation:—

"Dec. 16. O Sapientia. O Wisdom, which comest out of the mouth of the Most High, reaching from one end to the other, mightily and sweetly ordering all things; come and teach us the way of understanding.

"Dec. 17. O Adonai. O Lord and Ruler of the house of Israel, who appearedst to Moses in a flame of fire in the bush, and gavest him the law in Sinai; come and deliver us with an outstretched arm.

"Dec. 18. O Radix Jesse. O Root of Jesse, which standest for an ensign of the people, at whom kings shall shut their mouths, to whom the Gentiles shall seek; come and deliver us now, tarry not.

"Dec. 19. O Clavis David. O Key of David, and Sceptre of the house of Israel, Thou that openest, and no man shutteth; and shuttest, and no man openeth; come and bring the prisoner out of the prison-house, and him that sitteth in darkness and in the shadow of death.

"Dec. 20. O Oriens. O Day-spring, brightness of the Everlasting Light, and Sun of Righteousness; come and enlighten them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

"Dec. 22. O Rex Gentium. O King and Desire of all Nations, Thou Cornerstone who hast made both one; come and save man whom Thou formedst from the clay.

"Dec. 23. O Emmanuel. O Emmanuel, our King and Lawgiver, Hope of the Gentiles, and their Saviour; come and save us, O Lord our God."

Osculatory or Osculatorium.—A carving or painting on wood or metal, with a representation of our Saviour, the Virgin, or one of the saints, used in the ancient Church at the celebration of Mass. It was kissed first by the priest and then by the people, to whom he handed it for the purpose. It was probably a remnant of the old custom among Christians in the early Church of interchanging the kiss of peace at the agape.

Osiander, ANDREAS.—A German theologian [b. 1498, d. 1552] who embraced the Reformation doctrines, and became a theological teacher at Königsberg. But his doctrine was largely mixed with mysticism; he asserted the doctrine of Justification by Faith, but explained it to mean the infusion into the soul of the Divine nature of Christ. Christ, he said, could not in His human nature only obtain justification for sinners; nor can man be justified by embracing and applying to himself, through faith, the righteousness and obedience of the Man Christ. It is through the essential and eternal righteousness of Christ, the Son of God, which is united to the human nature through the Incarnation, that mankind obtains complete justification. If man had never fallen, the Incarnation would still have taken place to complete the Divine image in human nature. His passionate inculcation of his opinions led to a very sharp controversy, in which Melancthon took part against Osiander; but the death of the latter ended it. His son Lukas was Court Preacher at Stuttgart, and author of a paraphrase on the Bible and other theological works.

Osmund, Sr., Bishop of Salisbury from 1078–1099. He completed the cathedral of Old Sarum. He was of Norman origin, and is said to have been related to the Conqueror, in whose train he came to England and was made Earl of Dorset. He compiled the Consuetudinarium, or Liber Ordinalis, "for the use of Sarum," which is still preserved in Salisbury Cathedral, and remained in use till the Reformation. Many miracles were said to be wrought at his tomb, and at length, in 1456, he was canonised by Calixtus III.

Osterwald, JEAN FRÉDÉRIC [b. 1663, d. 1747], was a pastor in Neuchâtel who wrote many treatises with the object of giving religious life a more practical character; as—A Treatise concerning the Causes of the Present Corruption of Christians, Grounds and Principles of the Christian Religion, Lectures on the Exercise of the Sacred Ministry, etc., all of which have been translated into English and other languages.

Ostiarii.—One of the minor orders of clergy, their duties resembling those of the vergers of modern times. Their duty was to stand at the door and watch that no heathen came in to disturb the service, and to maintain order in the church. The office is mentioned by Cornelius in his letter to Fabius in the third century. There is still an ostiary in the Roman Church.

Oswald, Sr., Bishop of Worcester and Archbishop of York. He was descended from an illustrious Danish family, who confided his education to his uncle Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury. By him he was made, first, Canon, and then Dean of Winchester; but, finding it impossible to carry out the reforms which were needed amongst his clergy, he gave up his preferment and went to France, where he remained some time in the Benedictine monastery of Fleury, on the Loire. In 961 he returned to England, and on the recommendation of St. Dunstan, who had succeeded Odo, Edgar made him Bishop of Worcester in the room of Dunstan. Oswald is memorable for his reformation of the clergy, and for aiding Dunstan to expel the secular canons, and replace them with monks in several dioceses. He built a monastery at Westbury, to which he used himself to retire when able. A monastery was founded by Ælwin, a relation of King Edgar, at Ramsey, in the fens of Huntingdonshire, and in 972, when it was fit for the reception of monks, twelve were removed thither from Westbury. In 972, on the death of Osketil, Archbishop of York, Oswald was appointed his successor, and at the same time he retained the See of Worcester. He got rid of the secular canons by building a new church in honour of the Virgin, which he placed in the hands of monks, and attended mass himself there, till gradually the other church was deserted, and the last of the ancient clergy took the Benedictine habit and became prior. He is said to have introduced monks into six other churches of his diocese, against the will of the people; but, however this may have been, it is certain that reform in the churches was greatly needed. St. Oswald died at Worcester in 992, and was buried in his cathedral.

Oswald, Sr., King of Northumberland, was the second son of Ethelfrith, and on his father being killed by Rædwald, King of the East Angles in 617, he was obliged to fly for safety with his brothers into Ireland. Here he was converted to Christianity and baptised. His uncle Edwin had usurped the throne, but in 633 he was slain in a battle with Penda, King of the Mercians, and then Eanfrith, Oswald's elder brother, succeeded him; but was slain the next year by the treachery of Cædwalla, King of the ancient Britons. Oswald then marched against Cædwalla and defeated him, and became King of Northumberland. He at once sent to Ireland for missionaries, and procured some monks from the island of St. Columba; Aidan, one of that number, was made Bishop of York in the room of Paulinus, who had retired on King Edwin's death, and the See was removed from York to Lindisfarne. Oswald built a number of churches and founded several monasteries, and also made his own palace the resort of the poor and afflicted. The Venerable Bede relates much about his charity. Penda meantime strove to bring back idolatry, and appeared at the head of a formidable army in the plain of Maserfield, in Shropshire, where Oswald was killed, on August 5th, 642. The town near the battle-field was called Oswestry in memory of him. Many miracles were said to be wrought at the place of his death, and his memory as a saint was kept on August 5th.

Otho, Sr., Bishop of Bamberg, in Franconia, called the Apostle of Pomerania, was born in Suabia in 1069. He laboured for some time as a teacher in Poland, until Henry IV. made him Chaplain to his sister Judith, whom he had married to Boleslaus, Duke of Poland. After the death of the Princess, Otho returned to Germany, where the Emperor made him Chancellor and Minister of State, and in 1102 appointed him to the See of Bamberg. In 1124 Boleslaus persuaded him to go to Pomerania as a missionary, and having obtained Pope Calixtus II.'s permission, he set out and converted many of the people. Having founded many churches, he made his chaplain Adelbert, Bishop of Julin, and returned to Bamberg. In 1127, hearing that Stettin and Julin had renounced their Christianity, he went back to Pomerania, till he was recalled by the Emperor Lothaire to assist at the Council of Mentz in 1131. He died on June 30th, 1139, and was canonised by Clement III. in 1189.

Owen, Sr., founded the Abbey of Rebai, and became, in 640, Archbishop of Rouen. He wrote a work entitled Vita Eligii. [AUDONUS.]

Overall, JOHN, English divine, was born in 1559, and studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became Fellow. He was made Master of Catharine Hall, and Regius Professor of Divinity. In 1602 he became Dean of St. Paul's, was appointed Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry in 1614, and was transferred to Norwich in 1618, where he died the next year.

Bishop Overall is noted for his Convocation book, composed when, as Dean of St. Paul's, he sat as Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation. It is not known how much is his own work. It contests Papal Supremacy, and strongly asserts the Royal Supremacy over the Church and prerogative in the State. This book received the unanimous assent of the Lower House, but was never passed, on account of the jealousy of King James.

Overberg, BERNARD, a great German educationalist, was born at Höckel in Osnabrück in 1734, educated at Rhein-on-the-Ems, and then settled at Münster, where he was ordained priest and became Teacher and, in 1809, Director of the Episcopal Seminary. He exercised his duties with the most remarkable success and benefit to his flock, especially excelling in his good influence as a trainer of teachers. Among his books are Christkatholisches Handbuch, Katechismus der Christkatholischen Lehre, Hausegen, etc.

Owen, DR. JOHN [b. 1616, d. 1683], Puritan divine, honoured both for his personal piety and his high literary attainments. His father was unable to supply him with the means for his maintenance at the University, but a rich uncle did so, and at the early age of twelve John Owen was admitted to Queen's College, Oxford, and at nineteen was Master of Arts. Two years later he was forced to leave his college for resisting the discipline of Archbishop Laud. He was at this time exercised much in his mind by doubts about his spiritual life, and this perplexity continued for nearly five years, causing a deep melancholy. Through hearing accidentally a very simple yet powerful sermon, preached by a stranger (whose name he never found out) on the text, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" he found such peace that he had from that time a serenity which never forsook him throughout his life. He became, first, chaplain to a private gentleman; then was offered the living of Fordham, in Essex, which he occupied on the principles of Independency; but after two years the people of Coggeshall, five miles from Fordham, besought him to go to them, which he did. His fame soon spread, and he was ordered to preach before the Parliament on April 29th, 1646. His sermon was a powerful appeal for liberty of conscience. Out of gratitude to the Earl of Warwick, who had given him the living of Coggeshall, he dedicated his book, Death of Death, in the Death of Christ, to him in 1643; and it was about this time that he attracted the notice of Cromwell, who heard him preach, and desired his friendship. General Fairfax was besieging Colchester, and he, too, was struck by his eloquent preaching. Cromwell, later on, insisted upon his accompanying him to Ireland, and afterwards to Scotland, where he also remained about six months, then returning to Coggeshall; but in a very short time he was appointed by the House of Commons to the deanery of Christ Church, Oxford, and the following year [1652] he was chosen Vice-Chancellor of that University, which office he held for five years. When in this high position he still retained that moderation and gentle firmness which had so endeared him to his congregation and friends. He showed no favouritism, but was tolerant, hospitable, and generous. He preached every Sunday at St. Mary's, and often at Stadham and other neighbouring places. Probably Oxford never stood higher for learning and religion than under his rule. The book he wrote about this time, Communion with God, corresponded with his daily life. At the Restoration he was deprived of the deanery, and from that time lived privately in London, publishing many books, amongst which was an Exposition of the 130th Psalm, and An Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which last was most valuable in refuting the errors of the Socinians. In 1678 he published a very powerful work upon The Holy Spirit, which shows his earnest endeavour to answer and refute all erroneous doctrines. His piety and learning won the respect of all, and even the King sent for him and assured him of his favour and respect. He died peacefully at his house at Ealing, having survived all his children.

Owen, ROBERT, Socialist writer [b. at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, Wales, 1771; d. there, 1858], was the son of poor parents, and by perseverance obtained a post in a cotton manufactory at Manchester, and afterwards at Lanark, where he met with much success. Through his benevolent schemes he largely improved the social condition of the working classes at Lanark, and published his views in 1813 in A New View of Society; or Essays on the Formation of Human Character, in which he advocated a modified Communism. With the same idea he started in 1823 for America, to found a colony at New Harmony, Indiana; but his plans failed, and he came back to England. Here he encountered fresh disappointments in the failure of two co-operative societies which he had set on foot; and another attempt in Mexico met with the like result in 1828. His Communistic ideas, which he continued to advocate, had some part in stirring up the Chartists to rebellion. Owen was a freethinker, and while in America he held a discussion with Dr. Alexander Campbell on the evidences of Christianity. In later years he devoted himself to the study of Spiritualism, under the influence of his son, Robert Dale Owen. He wrote some works on Socialism, and The Revolution in the Mind and Practice of the Human Race.

Owen, ROBERT DALE. [SPIRITUALISM.]

Oxford, BISHOPRIC OF.—Founded by Henry VIII. in 1546, who endowed it out of the lands belonging to the dissolved monasteries of Abingdon and Osney. It was dismembered from the diocese of Lincoln, and had at first the abbey church of Osney, about half a mile from Oxford, for its cathedral, until Christ church was converted into one. This was the original church of St. Frideswide's Priory. Her history is involved in legend, but her story is told by Philip, the third Prior, by William of Malmesbury, and John of Tynemouth, and is found in Leland's Collectanea. About 727 an alderman, named Didan, is said to have ruled over the Mercian city of Oxford; his wife's name was Saffrida, and they had a daughter, Frideswide, who embraced the monastic life, with twelve other maidens; her father, on her mother's death, built a conventual church in honour of St. Mary and All Saints, and made his daughter prioress thereof. St. Frideswide's death took place 735-40, or later. Her priory became a house of secular canons, and her remains were laid beneath the already existing tower until their first translation, under Prior Philip [Feb. 12th, 1180], by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the north choir aisle. Many casualties passed over the site of St. Frideswide's ancient church before her last translation. It was wholly or partly burnt in 1002, when the Danes took refuge in it from the massacre of St. Brice's Day, and then rebuilt and made a dependency of the Monastery of Abingdon. A Norman church must then have taken the place of the Saxon one, and probably the door of the chapter-house may have belonged to this. About 1111 the priory was granted to one Guimond, who re-established the foundation as a convent of regular canons of his own Augustinian Order, in which state it continued till Wolsey's reconstruction. Guimond died in 1141, and his successor, Robert of Cricklade, began the present structure of the church about the middle of the twelfth century, and in 1180 the buildings were far enough advanced for the translation of St. Frideswide from her sepulchre to her shrine.

Wolsey chose this place as the site of the new college he designed to found, and had already done much of the building, when all the works were stopped by his fall in 1529. In 1532 Henry refounded the college, to which he gave his own name; but in 1546 he suppressed it once more, and reconstituted the whole foundation. He then removed the new See of Oxford (erected at Osney in 1542) to St. Frideswide's, and this last foundation was styled the Cathedral Church of Christ in Oxford, and comprises a dean and canons, with other capitular officers, as well as a large body of students proper to a college. The See was endowed with the revenues of the lands purchased by Wolsey for his college. The bounds of the diocese extend over the whole county of Oxford, Buckinghamshire, and Berkshire, with parts of adjacent counties, and it contains 648 parishes. The value of the Bishopric is £5,000 a year.

Oxford, UNIVERSITY OF.—Though this University cannot claim the honor of having been founded by King Alfred, yet it is certain that from very early times it was the common resort of students, who lived in citizens' houses, having only meeting houses where they heard lectures from learned men; and as late as 1512 regulations were made for the governance of such students. As their number increased, the number of halls multiplied, and at one time there were more than a hundred. Now only six of them exist, which differ from the colleges only in that they are unincorporated, and have little or no endowments. The collegiate system took its rise at Oxford in the middle of the twelfth century, about the same time that it originated in Cambridge. In 1229 there was a great immigration from Paris into Oxford, and the latter was remodeled on the model of the former, soon to rank above it in intellectual importance. It was at this period, when Oxford was beginning to lose its importance as a national town only second to London—a gathering place of councils and resort of kings—that it began to be the centre of thought for the whole of England, and also the centre of teaching. The earliest charter recognising the University as a single organisation dates from Henry III., but the actual statutes date from 1623. Residence in private lodgings fell into disuse, and by the time of Queen Elizabeth it was compulsory that every student should reside in some college, or hall, at least during the first twelve months. Since 1868 students have been allowed to become members of the University without being members of any college or hall.

Oxford University has many times been the centre of religious changes in England. It was in Oxford that the Wycliffite movement arose. Here the martyrs under Mary were burnt. Methodism arose in Oxford, and in the present century the Tractarian movement centred from this town. There are at present twenty-one colleges in the University and six halls.

THE COLLEGES.

University College.—Founded by William of Durham in the early part of the thirteenth century.

Merton College.—Founded by Walter de Merton, Lord Chancellor and Bishop of Rochester in 1264.

Balliol College.—Founded by Sir John Balliol, father of Balliol, King of Scotland, probably in 1268.

Exeter College.—Founded in 1314 by Walter de Stapleton, Bishop of Exeter and Lord High Treasurer.

Oriel College was founded by Adam de Brome and Edward II. in 1326.

Queen's College.—Founded in 1341 by Robert de Eglesfield, Chaplain to Queen Philippa.

New College.—Founded, and for the most part built, by William of Wykeham, the first stone having been laid in 1380.

Lincoln College.—Founded in 1427 by Richard Flemmyng, Bishop of Lincoln.

All Souls' College.—Founded in 1437 by Archbishop Chichele, having been a chantry.

Magdalen College.—Founded by William of Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester.

Brasenose College.—Founded by Bishop Smith, of Lincoln, and Sir Richard Sutton, of Prestbury, in 1512.

Corpus Christi College.—Founded in 1516 by Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester.

Christ's Church.—Founded by Cardinal Wolsey in 1525, and intended to be called Cardinal's College. The foundation was suspended by King Henry VIII., re-established in 1532, and received its present name in 1546.

Trinity College.—Originally founded by the Priors of Durham at the end of the thirteenth century. Sir Thomas Pope founded a new college on the ruins of the old one in 1554.

St. John's College.—Grafted in 1555 on the previous foundation of Archbishop Chichele by Sir Thomas White, Lord Mayor of London.

Jesus College.—Founded in 1571 by Dr. Thomas Price, Treasurer of St. David's.

Wadham College.—Founded in 1613 by Nicholas Wadham on the site of a monastery of Augustinian Friars. The work was completed by his widow, Dorothy.

Pembroke College.—Founded in 1624 by Thomas Tesdale.

Worcester College.—Founded in 1714 by Sir Thomas Cooke, on the site of Gloucester Hall, a Benedictine establishment dating from 1283.

Hertford College.—First founded at Hart Hall at the end of the thirteenth century, and was transformed into Hertford College in 1746 by Dr. Newton of Christ Church.

Keble College was erected in 1868–70 in memory of the Rev. John Keble.

THE HALLS.

New Inn Hall was built under the name of Trilbek's Inns by William of Wykeham at the end of the fourteenth century, and gained the name of New Inn in 1460. The present building was restored by Dr. Cramer.

St. Edmund Hall passed into the possession of Queen's College in 1557, in which it will finally be merged.

St. Mary Hall, formerly the parsonage, house of St. Mary's Church, was given, in 1325, by Edward II. to Oriel College, and was established as a separate place of education in 1333. It is now to be completely united to Oriel College.

Charsley's Hall and Turrell's Hall.—Private halls founded according to the statute of 1882.

Oxlee, JOHN [b. 1779, d. 1854], Rector of Scrawton, in Yorkshire, and of Molesworth, wrote several books, of which the chief was The Christian Doctrine of the Trinity and Incarnation. He is said to have learnt 120 languages without a teacher. He was an original and bold speculator, and ran counter to the ordinary beliefs of the Church in many ways. Thus he published some letters to the Archbishop of Canterbury, ridiculing the doctrine of the personality of the devil. The Jewish Messenger pronounced him, next to Buxtorf, the most learned Gentile in Rabbinical lore. He wrote against the conversion of the Jews, on the ground that many assertions of Christian divines were demonstrably groundless, and that nothing could be done with any success until Christians better understood the Jewish principles. On the other hand, he maintained that the Jewish declamations against Christianity were the result of prejudice, which would disappear with mutual understanding. The late Thomas Scott, of Ramsgate, who published a vast number of tracts in favour of freethinking, included among them a long extract from Oxlee's letters to the Archbishop, and appended a biography of him.

Ozanam, ANTOINE FRÉDÉRIC [b. 1813, d. 1853].—A Frenchman who endeavoured to write a work which should equal Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. It was to be a history of Christian civilisation, written so as to vindicate Roman Catholicism. He, however, only partially succeeded, writing Dante and the Catholic Philosophy of the Fifteenth Century, History of the Civilisation of the Fifth Century, etc.

Pachomius, Sr., a famous monk, and the first who prescribed a fixed rule in writing for monks, was born about 292 in Upper Thebais. He was brought up as an idolater, but in his twentieth year left the army into which he had been pressed, and became a catechumen at Thebes. After he had received baptism he joined Palemon, one of the strictest followers of St. Anthony. After they had lived together several years Pachomius had occasion to go to an uninhabited place called Tabenna, on the banks of the Nile. There he is said to have been told by an angel that he should build a monastery, and others add that the angel gave him in writing the rule which he afterwards used. Thus about the year 325 the two hermits established themselves in a small cell which afterwards became the first coenobium. Palemon died soon after, but his place was filled by Pachomius's eldest brother John, and after his death many others joined, so that in a short time they amounted to about a hundred. The rule by which the monks were to live was proportioned to each man's strength. Their habit was of white linen without sleeves and a hood of the same stuff. Novices were tried with great severity before they were admitted, but when they had once entered they were not allowed to leave the community. None of the monks were allowed to take holy orders, the monastery being served by neighbouring priests. Pachomius himself practised the greatest austerities. He is said not to have lain down for fifteen years, and after his conversion never partook of a proper meal. Besides the care of the whole monastery, he did as much manual labour as any of the other monks. He built six other monasteries in Thebais, and Palladius, who wrote an account of the Egyptian and Palestinian monks in 420, states that the monastery of Tabenna contained no less than fourteen hundred monks. Pachomius's sister having resolved to spend the rest of her days in retirement, a monastery was built for her and her followers on the other side of the Nile, to which he gave a rule. Many miracles are related of him, as speaking the Greek and Latin, which he had never learnt, healing the sick, etc. He died in 348, and is commemorated in the Greek Church on the fifteenth, in the Latin on the fourteenth, of May. His Order is said to have remained in the East till the eleventh century.

Pacian, Sr.—A Spaniard, who, after his conversion to Christianity, was Bishop of Barcelona. He lived in the fourth century, and died about 390. He was contemporary with St. Jerome, who says he was famous for his exemplary life, his elocution, and learning. There are extant of his an Exhortation to Repentance, letters against the Novatians, and a treatise on Baptism.

Pacification, EDICTS OF.—The name given to those decrees granted at different times by the French kings during the sixteenth century for the protection of the Protestants. They were none of them of long duration, and the kings' need of the support of both parties caused them to grant concessions to the Protestants, and repeal them immediately afterwards to satisfy the Roman Catholics. The first Edict of Pacification was that granted by Charles IX. in 1562—added to by the same King in the following year at Amboise. Another was granted at Lonjumeau in 1568, but it only lasted a few months in consequence of an insurrection of the Huguenots. In 1570, however, he made peace with them again, and this time, with other privileges, granted them the towns of Rochelle, Cognac, La Charité, and Montauban as places of refuge from persecution. In 1576 Henry III. gave the Protestants full liberty to build churches and hold public services, but the Guises opposed this edict so fiercely that the King was obliged to revoke the edict at Blois towards the end of the same year. In 1577 he renewed the attempt to grant the Protestants some toleration, but was again overruled by the Guises and the league they had formed to maintain the Roman Catholic religion in France. In April, 1598, Henry IV. signed the famous Edict of Nantes, granting the Protestants full toleration, and this edict remained in force till 1685, when it was revoked by Louis XIV.

Pædobaptists [from the Greek pais, "child," and baptismos, "baptism"]. A name given to all those who hold the efficacy of the administration of baptism to infants, and which is used irrespectively of differences on other points.

Paganism.—The name applied to the idol-worship of the ancient world. The name is derived from Lat. pagus, "a village," and the etymology reminds us that the name was applied to the religion of the villages or country districts, as contrasted with that of the towns and large centres of population. In other words, when the world in its intelligent centres accepted Christianity, the outlying districts remained long attached to the ancient polytheism; hence "villager," a "rustic," became synonymous with "idol-worshipper."* By exactly similar process the word heathen, in Anglo-Saxon, "one who dwelt on the heath or open country," also became identified with a believer in the ancient gods.

At the period when Christianity began to extend itself beyond Palestine, the Roman Empire had gathered into itself all the civilised world except India and China, and as we have no historical evidence of the extension of Apostolic labours to China, and little as to the primitive Christianity of India, we may for our present purpose assume the Roman Empire to have been the real battle-field of idolatry and Christianity. Let us, therefore, sketch out in a few words what was the quasi-religious condition of the civilised world, or of that portion of it of which we know anything, at the period when the strife began.

A necessary part of the Roman policy was that of tolerating every form of religion which was found established among the conquered nations under their sway, provided that religion was not inconsistent with those relations between the conquerors and the conquered which were necessary for the maintenance of their power by the former. Hence we find the Jews exercising their religion in the time of our Lord without any restraint, so long as it was not made the pretext for rebellion to Roman authority. And so also in other portions of the Empire, the local idolatries were rarely interfered with; the Druidism of unconquered Britain, for example, continuing to prevail when the land was subdued by the Roman legions, and other local forms of polytheism in other countries being persecuted only when socially or politically troublesome. But with the more intellectual and educated subjects of the Empire, and wherever the influence of Rome itself was much felt, external idolatry had become little more than the recognised public religion of the State, conformity to which was kept up merely on the ground of order and social propriety; the more real and ruling principles of life being found in certain systems of philosophy which had grown up among the Greeks, and had extended their influence over all the higher classes among the Romans. Thus the religion of the civilised world at the time when it stood opposed to Christianity was, partly a system of mere idolatry, the worship of things that were not God; and partly this combined with philosophical principles which were more attractive than mere idolatry could be to educated minds. These philosophical principles were developed out of three systems, which had their origin among the Greeks, who were highly civilised and acute thinkers, at a period when the Romans themselves were in their infancy.

The three systems were the Stoic, the Epicurean, and the Platonist. They will be found under their separate heads. We have here only to inquire how idolatry affected the morals of mankind. A man must be violently prejudiced, if not wilfully blind, who should refuse to see in the teachings of Plato and Socrates a desire after truth and also after virtue which was almost Divine. The whole ethical doctrine of Greek polytheism was beautiful inconception. It inculcated the recognition of mutual rights, and the rendering to each man his due, "honour to whom honour, custom to whom custom, tribute to whom tribute." Diké, "justice," was to the Greek a real god. Liberty defending itself against tyranny was courage, courage was the essence of manliness [andreia]. Individual right involved social right, the authority of law reposed on the consent of the community, and thus there was interdependence and mutual help. Law was not, as in the great Oriental tyrannies, the power exerted by the strong over the weak, but the free and spontaneous consent of a race of freemen. And to preserve this mutual welfare, consideration, kindness and forgiveness became duties. "When thy neighbour acknowledges his fault," says Hesiod, "restore him to thy friendship."

Yet this system had a deadly worm at its very core. It contemplated man in his relation to his fellow men, but ignored his duty towards himself and towards God. "Know ye not that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost?" was a question which Christianity taught as a new revelation. A Greek was ruled in his dealings with the commonwealth, but was free to do what he liked as an individual. What was the result? The result was exactly what St. Paul described it in the first chapter of the Romans: licentiousness knew no bounds, for religion had not attempted to check it. Greek indecency, wantonness, dishonesty, lying, became proverbial. "If there is one fact of history more certain than another," says a powerful writer of our own day, "it is this fact, that human nature was reduced to such a state of fetid decay by the rejection of God, that a few more years would have seen the world one gigantic dunghill of corruption and death. Then the great sacrifice took place: God, manifest in the flesh, died upon the cross, an eternal sacrifice to take away sin. A fresh invigorating breeze swept through the putrifying mass of human life. Men faced for the first time the realities of existence with an unflinching faith—by pureness, by knowledge—in a Divine life." [Mr. J. H. Shorthouse.]

When Christianity became the recognised religion of the civilised world, idolatry became a popular belief in contravention of State authority. It had at first tolerated Christianity as it did any other religion. The persecutions that we have in the New Testament are mostly raised by Jews. The rest are excited by men who found that it interfered with their personal gains [Acts xvi. 19; xix. 27]. It was only when Christianity revealed itself as an aggressive system, bound to extirpate the "gods many and lords many" from the world, and hand it over to the one lordship of Christ, that Idolatry took alarm and began to persecute fiercely. It was beaten in the struggle and Christianity triumphed. For a while an analogous state of things was repeated. Paganism was tolerated by Constantine, as Christianity had been by most of the Emperors. The heathen priests were maintained in the enjoyment of their ancient privileges, and he and his immediate successors retained the heathen title which their predecessors had held of Pontifex Maximus ["chief sacrificer."] But popular opinion was against the heathen rites, and the temples were in some cases pulled down and in others allowed to crumble into ruins. Gibbon tells with glee, though at the expense of his hero Julian, how that Emperor, in his zeal to restore Paganism, proclaimed a sacrifice to the gods in populous Antioch. Instead of hecatombs of fat oxen, such as former days had witnessed, one pale and solitary priest appeared bringing a single goose.

At an epoch when toleration was a virtue so little understood, it is no wonder that legislation was often confused, and to our minds indefensible. Governments were called upon to inculcate the faith, and to secure liberty, though to some extent obliged, as a matter of fact, to respect the prejudices of the minority. When Arianism divided the Christian Church into fiercely contending bodies, Paganism lifted its head once more, but in vain, since it had lost its hold upon the intelligent. Theodosius the Great enacted that those who relapsed into Paganism should forfeit all civil rights. For years even this was evaded in the West. It was Justinian who completed the work. In his days the last temple was turned into the celebrated monastery of St. Benedict.

But meanwhile Paganism had left its mark on Christianity. The Church had felt obliged to make concessions to the pagans, to mitigate their opposition and facilitate their conversion. Hence minor observances of paganism were adopted as part of Christian ritual. The commemoration of saints is admitted by Jerome and Augustine to be derived from Pagan custom, and they justify the practice as one which the universal conscience of mankind approves. Neander traces the worship of the Virgin to that of Ceres. The casting of earth upon the dead which we retain in our Burial Service is derived from Paganism. The hanging of votive offerings in Roman Catholic churches is like what was practised in the days of Horace. New Year's gifts and rejoicings, the use of bride-cake, the popular observances of Valentine's Day, are all of Pagan origin. And every day of our lives we have the names of the gods of our fathers on our lips, for after them we call the days of the week.

Paget, FRANCIS EDWARD, d. at Elford, near Lichfield, August 4th, 1882, of which parish he had been incumbent for forty-seven years. He graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, 1828. He was one of the most prominent controversialists of his time on the side of the Oxford Tracts, though his writings were not dry or formal treatises on theology. They were mostly tales, written with great humour, and the satire which they contained had great effect upon the average public opinion. Thus in his story St. Antholin's, or Old Churches and New [1842], he poured merciless ridicule upon "the cheap and nasty" style in church building, and upon "Brummagem" Gothic which was a good deal coming into use. "Mr. Compo," the professor of this style in the story, became a nickname for cheap architects, and the style became obsolete under Paget's fun. So in Milford Malvoisin he launched his arrows against pews in churches, and did very much to further the "free and open" system. In the Warden of Berkingholt he became the champion of the poor against oppression of hard landlords, attacked some cruelties in the workhouse system, and satirised the Bible Society. Luke Sharpe, or Knowledge without Religion, was a story against non-religious education, and Lucretius was a satire against sensation novels. One of the cleverest is The Owllet of Owlstone Edge, a series of gentle satires upon the weaknesses of clergymen's wives. There were several more of these tales, and also some serious works, including some volumes of sermons. His volume Homeward Bound, written when he was seventy, is a beautiful forward-looking for himself and those dear to him in the world to come. Mr. Paget suffered not only from long sickness at the end of his life, but from blindness; but to his intimate friends he was still full of epigram and humorous comments on the doings of the world, in which he took a keen interest to the last.

Pagoda [supposed to be derived from the Sanscrit bhagavat, "sacred," or to be a corruption of put-gada, from the Persian put, "idol," and gade, "house"] is the name for certain Hindoo temples very highly decorated, and also for Chinese buildings of a tower-shape form, which consist of several stories, each story containing a single room. The finest of these is known as the Porcelain Tower of Nanjing.

Pain bēni [Fr. "blessed bread"].—Bread prepared for Sacramental consecration in the Roman and Greek Churches, but not used for that purpose. It is distributed after service on certain days to the non-communicants, as a symbol of their holding spiritual communion, though on this occasion they do not receive the Sacrament.

Paine, THOMAS, a Deistical writer, was born at Thetford, Norfolk, on Jan. 29th, 1737. His father was a Quaker who had been expelled from the Society for marrying a member of the Church of England. He was a stay-maker, and his son, when only thirteen, was taken from school and apprenticed to the trade, in which, however, he only remained a few years. In 1759 he went to Sandwich, where he became an exciseman, also carrying on the same employment at Lewes. In 1772 he was selected to draw up "the case of the Officers of Excise," in which he showed so much talent that he was introduced to Benjamin Franklin, who came to London in 1774 as a deputy from the colonies of North America to the British Government. On his advice Paine went to America, and settled at Philadelphia, where, in 1775, he became the editor of the Philadelphia Magazine. He was made member of the American Philosophical Society, and in 1779 Clerk to the Committee of Foreign Affairs; but was obliged to resign the latter appointment two years after, having divulged some political secret during a controversy with Silas Deane. In 1781 Paine was sent to France with Colonel Lawrence to negotiate a loan, in which he was more than successful, for the French granted a subsidy of six million livres, and became guarantors of ten millions advanced by Holland. On his return he received 3,000 dollars from the Congress, and from New York State the confiscated estate of Frederic Davoe, a royalist, near New Rochelle. In 1787 he came to Europe, first to France, then to England, and in 1791 and 1792 published in England his Rights of Man, in answer to Burke's Thoughts on the French Revolution. The second part was designated as "a false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious libel," and he was tried before the King's Bench and pronounced guilty, but escaped to France. He was chosen a member of the Convention, but offended the Jacobins by advising that the King should not be executed, but imprisoned during the war and then banished. He was therefore expelled from the Convention in 1793 as a foreigner, and from January till November, 1794, was imprisoned in the Luxembourg. It is said that his door was once marked as a sign that he was to be executed; but it opened outwards, so, when shut, the mark was hidden and he was passed over. He remained in France till August, 1802, when he returned to America, and died on his estate June 8th, 1809. His bones were brought to England by William Cobbett in 1819; but a monument was raised over his empty grave in America in 1839.

Paine's first notable work is Common Sense, which appeared in January, 1776. Burke speaks of it as "that celebrated pamphlet which prepared the minds of the people for independence." The Crisis, a series of pamphlets, which he published from 1776 to 1783, were also intended to rouse and keep alive the public spirit. His Age of Reason, published by his friend Barlow just after his imprisonment, is a violent and ignorant attack on Christianity, which alienated from him his friends both in America and England, exciting feelings of the deepest disgust and abhorrence. It was answered in several works, the most famous being Bishop Watson's Apology for the Bible in a Series of Letters to Thomas Paine, which appeared in 1796.

His other works are Reasons for Wishing to Preserve the Life of Louis Capet, The First Principles of Government, The Decline and Fall of the English System of Finance, etc.

Painting, CHRISTIAN.—In the early days of Christianity the primary object of painting was to represent Christ, either alone or as the centre of a picture, and these representations were not left to the imagination of the artist, but were copied from certain likenesses supposed to have been taken during His life upon earth. Tradition ascribed certain paintings of Christ and the Madonna to St. Luke, and the napkin of St. Veronica was preserved, on which was supposed to be depicted the Vera icon. These likenesses were copied and re-copied for centuries, and departure from the ancient tradition came to be looked upon as nothing less than heresy. Until the twelfth century there was no art in Christian painting; pictures were painted in order to keep alive the spirit of devotion in the minds of the uneducated, and this object was reached by the most conventional method, made holy to the worshippers by long usage. Figures were represented as stiff and shapeless, and the only change which came over early art was the continual increase in richness of colour. The first dawn of new life began gradually to make itself felt about the twelfth century, when artists first attempted to put animation, beauty, and grace into the forms of their creation; but the work was slow, and was more a trial of skill for their own pleasure than for the sake of art. Guido, of Sienna, and Giotto, of Pisa, are associated with the birth of true Christian art—the Romanesque school; it almost reached its completeness with Giovanni Cimabue, of Florence; and with Giotto di Bondone [b. 1276, d. 1336] the last fetters of conventionalism were cast off. From this time till the fifteenth century, art continued to flourish, fostered in two schools, the Florentine and the Siennese: the former somewhat severe, resembling the Byzantine school of the early Christians; the latter more graceful and more independent of conventional ideas. The fifteenth century saw a further development, which may be traced to the increase of religious feeling consequent on the rise of the mendicant Orders. It took the form of a nearer approach to nature in form and colour, light and shade—art became more naturalistic, while still keeping the spiritual expression of the old masters. The first of this school was a Dominican monk, Fra Angelico da Fiesole [b. 1387, d. 1455], who was followed by Masaccio, Fra Lippo Lippi, and Ghirlandajo; and it reached its highest perfection with the sixteenth century, in which Christian art was represented by many great masters, headed by Raffaele and Leonardo da Vinci and Michel Angelo. With these great masters beauty of form and feature were made equal, but not superior, to spiritual import, and the result was the painting of such pictures as later artists have never been able to equal. They have influenced all Italian painting of later times.

German art, as well as Dutch and French, was far behind the Italian; during the Middle Ages it followed the Gothic style, and it was only about the middle of the fifteenth century that Italian influence began to make itself felt. The Nuremberg and Saxon schools, headed respectively by Albrecht Dürer [b. 1471, d. 1528] and Lucas Cranach [b. 1472, d. 1533], each produced a number of good artists, but their individuality was lost in close and inferior imitation of the Italian painters. In opposition to the decline of art in Italy, and consequently in Germany, a school arose in Spain in the seventeenth century which lasted only a short time, but which produced five great painters, of whom Murillo is the greatest. The age which followed, characterised by the irreligion and immorality which preceded the French Revolution, gave a check to religious art from which it has never recovered; and although efforts have been made to revive the greatness of Catholic art, it still stands in a very small proportion to art in general, and is marked by no artist of great distinction.

Pajon, CLAUDE, the head of the Pajonists, was born at Remorantin, in Lower Blésois, in 1626. He was educated at Saumur, became minister of Machenoir in 1650, where he remained for sixteen years, and then returned to his university as Professor of Theology. It was here that he promulgated his peculiar views, which made him so famous that he went as minister to Orleans, lived there, and died in September, 1685. His doctrine was that there is no such thing as subjective grace, but that God governs the world through the objective connection of cause and effect. These tenets he preached and gained many followers, till the provincial synods forbade all Pajonists to minister in the church. He left two books, refutations of attacks on the Reformed Church.

Palamas, GREGORY.—One of the leaders of the HESYCHASTS [q.v.], who are, therefore, sometimes known as Palamites; he was born in Asia, and brought up in the Court of the Emperor John Cantacuzenus. He was the principal defender of this sect against the Barlaamites and others. In 1349 he was made Archbishop of Thessalonica; but the people refused to admit him, and he retired to the Isle of Lemnos, where he is supposed to have died. He wrote many works, most of which, however, are in manuscript. Amongst those which have been printed are Prosopopæia, and two Greek treatises against the Latin Church.

Palea.—The superscription affixed to certain canons in the Decretum of Gratian of which the meaning has never been clearly ascertained. By some it is declared to be a shortened form of Panopalea, a disciple of Gratian; others say that it is only appended to the less important canons, which are called palea, "chaff;" but this derivation does not hold good, as some of these canons are among the most important. The Palea in the oldest manuscripts are few in number, but the name was afterwards given to many more, and they are held to be of equal authority with the authentic canons of Gratian.

Paleario, AONIO [b. at Seroli in 1500], was educated at Rome, and then proceeded to Siena as teacher. In 1542 he was summoned before the Inquisition on account of the heresy said to be contained in his work Della Pienenza, Sufficienza, e Satisfactions della Passione di Christo, but he was acquitted. He became Professor at Lucca in 1546, and nine years afterwards moved on to Milan, where the charge of heresy was revived against him, and, after suffering two years' imprisonment, he was burnt at Rome in 1570. Besides the work we have mentioned, he wrote De Immortalitate Animarum, and Actio in Pontifices Romanos et eorum Asseclas.

PALESTINE, CHURCH OF.—The history of the Church of the Circumcision, i.e. of the Jewish Christians of Palestine, is connected towards the end of the New Testament period with the history of St. James the Less. The end of the Acts shows us St. Paul leaving Jerusalem for the last time; it is the last appearance of the ancient city in Holy Writ. At that time Festus was the Roman Governor. He had redressed some of the evils which his predecessors had caused, but his death was the sign for fresh ill-government. In the interval between his death and the appointment of his successor, the Sadducean High Priest, according to Josephus [and the passage is generally admitted to be genuine], caused St. James to be put to death. The Apostle, despite the prejudice of his countrymen against him as a Nazarene, had won the veneration of the Pharisees for his holiness. They appear to have regarded him as entitled to hold belief in our Saviour as a prophet, but to have asked him to undeceive the people by assuring them that he did not regard Him in the same light that St. Paul did—that he did not, in fact, look on Him as the only door into the sheep-fold of God. But St. James declaring that the Son of Man would come in the clouds of heaven to judge the world, they gave him up to his enemies, who threw him from a pinnacle of the Temple and dispatched him with clubs.

After the short government of Albinus came that of Gessius Florus, so intolerably cruel that the Jews regarded it as a punishment for the murder of St. James. They raised a revolt. King Agrippa made a speech to them deprecating it, but on their refusing to hear him he retired to Rome. Vespasian came after a while to conduct the war, was recalled by the confusion at Rome, where he was soon made emperor, and his son Titus carried on the warfare, and finally destroyed Jerusalem. The Christian Church there seems to have fallen into Ebionitism [EBIONITISM], but its annals become obscure. Simeon was chosen as St. James's successor, apparently because he had some relation to our Lord according to the flesh. Eusebius, who, living in Palestine, would have had access to any written memorials in existence, says there were none, that circumcised men ruled the Church until the time of Hadrian. In his days arose a false Christ, Barcochba, who stirred up the people to a fresh revolt, and after it was put down with terrible bloodshed, the Jews hated the Christians more than ever, as being double-dyed traitors. The Church became altogether separated from the Synagogue, and those who clung to Jewish customs were regarded as separatists. The ancient city was named Ælia Capitolina, the first name being taken from that of the Emperor Ælius Hadrianus; the records indicated that it was dedicated to the Jupiter of the Roman Capitol. The Christians acquiesced, apparently, with exultation in the witness which was borne to the prophecies of Christ. As a Church Jerusalem was then at an end. The ancient name of the city was restored two centuries later. [See JERUSALEM, BISHOPRIC OF.]

PALESTRINA, GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI DA, was born at Palestrina, near Rome, in 1524. He studied under CLAUDE Goudimel [q.v.], and in 1551 was appointed Master of the Chapel to Pope Julius III., to whom he dedicated his first work, consisting of four masses for four voices. At the Council of Trent the state of ecclesiastical music was discussed; the Cardinals demanded the abolition of all the secular tunes which had been introduced into the sacred music, while the singers defended them. At length it was agreed that Palestrina should write a mass according to the Cardinals' taste, and he produced three, the third being the famous Mass of Pope Marcellus, which is considered his best work. He died in Rome, Feb. 2nd, 1594. He left behind him numerous compositions, many of them unpublished. [MUSIC.]

PALEY, WILLIAM, a celebrated English divine, was born at Peterborough in 1743. During his infancy his father removed to Giggleswick, to become head-master of the Grammar School, and the boy was educated there. When he left for Christ's College, Cambridge, at the age of sixteen, his father said he had by far the cleverest head he had ever met with. In 1763 he graduated as Senior Wrangler, and then taught at Greenwich Academy for three years. In 1765 he gained the prize at Cambridge for a Latin dissertation on A Comparison between the Stoic and Epicurean Philosophy with respect to the Influence of each on the Morals of a People, and in the next year he was elected a Fellow and Tutor of his college. He remained there for ten more years, then married, and retired to the livings of Musgrove and Appleby, in Westmoreland, and Dalston, in Cumberland. In 1780 he became Prebendary of Carlisle, and subsequently Archdeacon and Chancellor of the Diocese. It was during this part of his life that he wrote most of his works. In 1794, as a reward for his Evidences, the Bishop of London made him a Prebend of St. Pancras, he was promoted to the sub-deanery of Lincoln, became a D.D. of Cambridge, and Rector of Bishop-Wearmouth. He died in 1805. The first of Dr. Paley's important works was The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy [1785], in which he shows himself to be a follower of Locke, and denies the theory of moral sense. In 1790 appeared the most original of his works, Horæ Paulinæ, in which, by comparing St. Paul's Epistles with the Acts of the Apostles, he shows the authenticity of both, and furnishes a testimony on behalf of revealed religion. A third important work was A View of the Evidences of Christianity, which appeared in 1794, in writing which he borrowed from the works of Lardner and Bishop Douglas. This book was very popular at the time, and ran through many editions. His last work was Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity, which Paley gained partly from Nieuwentyt's Religious Philosopher. The Natural Theology was, perhaps, the most popular of his works.

Paley stands pre-eminent in English popular theology as the Utilitarian divine. With him expediency was the one foundation of all philosophy. The laws of honour, the sense of right and wrong in the mind both of the individual and the nation, were set aside by him in favour of the doctrine that the laws both of God and man appeal to the fear of tangible punishment and the hope of tangible reward. Moral obligation means self-interest stretching through an endless future, and the proclamation of such motives is the revelation of the will of God. And this will must be made known by some authoritative method. What shall the method be? The moral sense being discarded, there remains the proof from miracles. Whoever cannot dispense with the laws of nature has no credentials of a Divine mission to offer. Consequently Paley directs his argument to proving that the evidence for the miracles of the New Testament is sufficient for the conviction of an honest conscience. Hume had declared that a miracle is so improbable in itself that no amount of external evidence is sufficient to make it credible. Paley replied that the evidence adduced in favour of the statements of the Evangelists was overwhelming. This much must be acknowledged, that Paley's style is perfect as regards clearness and directness. But the ignoring of the moral sense was a terrible weakness in his theology, and it may perhaps be regarded as the greatest merit of the philosophy of Coleridge, that he asserted against Paley the power of the conscience, of the internal evidence, and of the direct appeal of God to the soul.

Palimpsest [from Greek, palin, "again," and psao, "I scrape out"].—A manuscript written on vellum from which previous writing has been scratched off. The custom of thus using ancient MSS. was largely increased by the Mahometan conquest of Egypt, which hindered the supply of papyrus to heathen countries, and the result, no doubt, was that many ancient writings were thus destroyed. We have only to do here with those palimpsests which contain portions of the Holy Scriptures.

The most celebrated of these is known as the Codex Ephræmi. [CODÆ.] There is a palimpsest of the sixth century, containing part of St. Luke's Gospel, in the British Museum; another of the same date, of St. Matthew, in Trinity College, Dublin; another of the eighth century in the library of the British and Foreign Bible Society. See Cassell's Bible Cyclopædia, p. 816, for a fuller account of these and of others.

Palissy, BERNARD, a noted French Huguenot, was born near Agen in the Department of Lot-et-Garonne about 1510. He was early apprenticed to a potter, and so received little education. As soon as he was old enough he began journeying through France and Germany in order to improve his art. At last, about 1539, he settled at Saintes. His trade diminished greatly, as there was little demand for coloured glass, and the Reformation had much decreased the sale of images, which Palissy had painted. He had, however, seen an enamelled cup while on his travels, and gave himself up for some years to an attempt to discover the process of making the enamel. He worked for sixteen years, laughed at as a visionary by his neighbours, and reproached by his wife, as they were in the deepest poverty; but at last he was rewarded with success. Meanwhile, about 1546, Palissy had become a Huguenot, and through his exertions a Protestant Church was founded at Saintes. Towards the close of Henry II.'s reign, his merits were discovered by the Constable Anna, of Montmorency, who furnished him with the means of building ovens to burn his pottery, and on his being thrown into prison as a heretic in 1562, obtained his pardon through Catharine de Medici. Queen Catharine also protected him, more for her own benefit than for his, during the massacre of St. Bartholomew; he lived in the Tuilleries, and was employed in decorating the palace and gardens. However, in 1588 he was arrested and thrown into the Bastille, where he died two years after. It was at this time that his famous answer to the King is said to have been given. Henry had told him that if he would not recant he would be compelled to leave him to his fate. Palissy answered: "Sire, you have several times told me that you pitied me; but it is I that pity you, who have uttered the words 'I am compelled.' That was not spoken like a king. These girls, my companions, and I, who have a portion in the kingdom of heaven, will teach you this royal language, that neither the Guises nor all your people, nor you, will know how to compel a potter to bow the knee to images." Palissy remained in his cell till his death in 1590. He is now acknowledged to have been a sound thinker, and to have been "one of the greatest writers in the French language." A monument was raised to him in Saintes by a Roman Catholic committee in 1868.

Pall or Pallium.—An ecclesiastical vestment, granted by the Pope to archbishops as bestowing the metropolitan dignity. In its modern form, which may be seen in the arms of the Archbishop of Canterbury, it consists of a strip of white woollen cloth,* about "three fingers broad," thrown across the shoulders, to which are attached two bands of the same material, each embroidered with a red cross—one hanging over the breast and the other down the back. The whole is worn over the episcopal dress, to which it is fastened by three pins of gold. In its original form, however, the pall was not a sacerdotal ornament, but a splendid mantle, forming part of the Imperial robes of State, which it was treasonable for any but the emperor to wear, except by special permission. This permission was sometimes granted as a mark of peculiar distinction to philosophers and men of learning, and afterwards to distinguished ecclesiastics, particularly the bishops of the leading cities. In process of time the Bishops of Rome came to confer the pall upon other bishops of the West, the first who is known to have done this being Symmachus [498-514]. At first, the emperor's consent was necessary in all cases, but soon it was only asked in the case of bishops who were not his subjects, and at last it was dispensed with altogether. All this time the pall was looked upon as an honourable distinction, but not as a badge of authority, and was not yet restricted to metropolitans, much less considered necessary for the exercise of their powers. Gregory the Great, however, bestowed the pall as a sign of office on his "vicars," who were certain prelates invested by him with jurisdiction in cases of appeal; and this precedent was followed by succeeding Popes, who exacted from the recipients an oath of obedience to the Roman See. These "vicars" were generally the archbishops of their respective Churches, and by degrees the pall came to be considered as exclusively the badge of a metropolitan. Accordingly we find that Nicholas I. [858-867], writing to the Bulgarians, pronounces that an archbishop is not empowered to exercise his functions before receiving the pall from the Pope; and John VIII., in the Synod of Ravenna [A.D. 877], decreed that every metropolitan, within three months of his appointment, should send to Rome an application for the pall, accompanied with a summary of his faith. And in the Council of Lateran [A.D. 1215] Innocent III. enacted, by a canon transcribed into the Decretals, that the pall was to be considered as intimating the plenitude of Apostolic power, and that neither the function nor the title of archbishop could be assumed without it.

The granting of palls became a great source of revenue to Rome. Gregory the Great had expressly forbidden the handling of money in the transaction, but his prohibition was soon overlooked, and exorbitant sums were demanded for the palls. Canute of England, on his visit to Rome in 1027, remonstrated with John XVIII. on this point, and succeeded in obtaining from him a promise of an abatement in the case of future archbishops in England.

No archbishop might inherit the badge from his predecessor; when a prelate died, he must be buried in his pall, and his successor must apply to the Pope for another.

There is one instance of an archbishop receiving two palls. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, applied to Rome [1071] in person for the decoration, and, as a mark of extraordinary favour, was invested by Alexander II., his former pupil, with two palls.

Palladius, one of the early Christian Fathers, was born about 368, in Galatia. Little is known of his early life till in his twentieth year he went to Egypt, to learn something of the monks there, and resided among them for some time, and thence to Palestine, where he spent three years in Mount Olivet, and became acquainted with Rufinus, of whom he was a great admirer. In 400 he was made Bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia; but on account of his attachment to St. Chrysostom he became implicated with the Origenists, and was violently hostile to St. Jerome. He is supposed to have been banished, and on his recall to have been made Bishop of Aspona, in Galatia, where he died about 431.

Palladius was the author of a Greek work containing the lives of several Palestinian and Egyptian monks. It is entitled The Lausaic History, from Lausus, Governor of Cappadocia, to whom it is dedicated. Another work, A Dialogue of the Life of St. Chrysostom, written in 408, is attributed to him, but its authenticity is doubtful.

Pallavicini, SFORZA, Jesuit and Cardinal, son of the Marquis Alexander Pallavicini, was born at Rome in 1607. He was educated for the bar, and became a learned philosopher and lawyer, but entered the Order of the Jesuits in 1637. He became Professor of Philosophy in the Jesuit College in 1639, of Theology in 1643, was made Cardinal by Pope Alexander VII. in 1659, and died in 1667.

Pallavicini's chief fame is derived from his History of the Council of Trent. In 1619, Paolo Sarpi had written an account of the Council, the principles of his book being distinctly in favour of the Reformed opinions, and it was thought necessary to repel its attacks on Romanism. Torenzio Alciati was chosen for the task, but died in 1651, before he had gathered together all the material, and the work was carried out by Pallavicini. The book appeared in two volumes [1656, 1657], and was highly extolled by the Roman Catholics.

* The wool of which this vestment is made is obtained from two lambs which have been blessed by the Pope on St. Agnes' Day [Jan. 21st].

Palm Cross.—A stone cross or crucifix mounted on steps, sometimes seen near the entrance of a church [usually on the south]. The name has reference to the custom of decorating it with branches of palm for the procession on Palm Sunday. There are several ancient palm crosses in Cornwall; and Eyam Church, in Derbyshire, has one which is remarkable for the beauty of its sculpture.

Palm Sunday.—The day on which is commemorated our Lord's triumphant entry into Jerusalem, five days before His Passion. Throughout a great part of Christendom it is marked by a procession of palms. Some authors affirm that this ceremony is as old as the fourth century, and claim St. Cyril of Jerusalem as alluding to it. It is certain, however, that the ceremony was practised in the fifth century. The services of the Church of England for this day are marked by special second lessons, recording the great event of the day. St. Paul, in the epistle for the day, calls on us to honour the humiliations of Jesus Christ, which were the result of a profound obedience to His Father and an ardent affection for the souls of men; and, by insisting on the glory to which He was raised, the same Apostle exhorts us to practise those virtues.

Palmer [Lat. palmifer, "a palm-bearer"].—A name given to that class of pilgrims who had performed the pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre, and returned home carrying branches of Oriental palm, in token of their accomplished expedition. On arriving home they offered the palm to the priest to be placed on the altar, and these were frequently used in processions on Palm Sunday. Even after their return they continued their religious pilgrimages in their own country, and thus the word "palmer" was sometimes used for itinerant monks without a fixed residence, professing voluntary poverty, and visiting at times the most remarkable sanctuaries. The dress of the palmers was the same as that of the ordinary pilgrims, namely, a black or grey gabardine, girt with a cincture, from which a shell or scrip was suspended, a broad hat ornamented with scallop shells, and a long staff.

Palmer, EDWARD HENRY, an English Orientalist, was born at Cambridge in 1840. He studied at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1867, and for the next three years made expeditions in Sinai, and became perfectly acquainted with the language and manners of the Bedouins. In 1871 he was made Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic at Cambridge, and remained in England till the beginning of the Soudan war. He then went out to Egypt to try and dissuade the Bedouins from their attacks on the Suez Canal, but was captured, with two European companions, Captain Gill and Lieutenant Charrington, in the Wady Sadr, Desert of El Tih, and murdered, August 11th, 1882.

His books have proved very serviceable to Orientalists. They are The Negeb, or South Country of Scripture and the Desert of El Tih; The Desert of the Exodus; History of the Jewish Nation from the Earliest Times; The Quran, etc.

Palmer, HERBERT [b. at Wingham, Kent, March 29th, 1601; d. Aug. 13th, 1647] took his degree at Cambridge, became Fellow of Queen's College; ordained in 1624; Lecturer at St. Alphage, Canterbury, in 1626; University Preacher at Cambridge in 1632, and Vicar of Ashwell, to which he was presented by Archbishop Laud. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly in 1643; Assessor of the same, 1646; Incumbent of the new church at Westminster in 1647; and had in 1644 been appointed Master of Queen's College, Cambridge. Palmer was an eloquent and scholarly preacher, but is chiefly known by his method of catechising and the number of catechisms which he prepared. The best is An Endeavour to make the Principles of Christian Religion, namely, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Sacraments, Plain and Easy. He was also Chairman on the Committee of the Catechism, and his own catechism above-mentioned was taken as the basis of the Westminster Catechism. He wrote also Vindicie Sabbathi, in defence of Sabbath observance; and Memorials of Godliness and Christianity, containing the Christian paradoxes, sometimes ascribed to Lord Bacon.

Palmer, WILLIAM [b. 1811], a theological writer, brother of Lord Selborne, was the son of an Oxfordshire rector. When yet very young he was elected to a demyship at Magdalen College, where, in 1830, he took his Bachelor's degree as a First Class in Litteræ Humaniores. He had already gained the Chancellor's prize for Latin verse, and subsequently obtained that for a Latin essay on the subject of the Athenian comedy. He was appointed Tutor of his college, and acted as Examiner in the classical schools. He was one of those who followed Dr. Newman in seceding to Rome, being dissatisfied with the Protestant character of the English Church, and from that time resided chiefly in Italy, living the life of a student, but never taking priest's orders in the Roman Church. He died at Rome on April 5th, 1879.

He wrote many works, as The Harmony of Anglican Doctrine with that of the Church in the East; A Letter to a Protestant Catholic; An Introduction to Early Christian Symbolism; Egyptian Chronicles, The Patriarch and the Tear, etc. Origines Liturgicæ, the work of Sir William Palmer, of Worcester College, has often been attributed to his namesake of Magdalen.

Palmer, Rev. Sir William [b. at the beginning of the present century, d. 1885], a prominent supporter of the Oxford movement, graduated at Dublin in 1824, incorporated B.A. at Magdalen Hall in 1828, transferred to Worcester in 1831, Vicar of Monkton-Wyld from 1846-69, and Prebendary of Salisbury from 1849-58. He was also appointed, in 1846, Vicar of Whitechurch-Canonicorum with Chidcock, Marshwood, and Stanton St. Gabriel. He was the author of Origines Liturgicæ; The Apostolical Jurisdiction and Succession of the Episcopacy in the British Churches Vindicated against the Objections of Dr. Wiseman; A Treatise on the Church of Christ; A Compendious Ecclesiastical History, etc. Not long before his death he republished a very interesting narrative of the origin of the Tracts for the Times.

Pamphilus, Sr., was a native of Berytus, in Phœnicia, and descended from one of the most distinguished families in the province. He began his studies in his own country, and finished them in Alexandria, under Pierius, a man of such great learning that he was called a second Origen. From Alexandria, Pamphilus went to Cæsarea, in Palestine, where he was ordained priest, and where his learning and sanctity made him the greatest ornament of that Church. His favourite employment was the study of Holy Scripture; and to promote the improvement of ecclesiastical learning he collected a library at Cæsarea, which contained a great number of useful works. The author to whom St. Pamphilus most directed his attention was Origen, the whole of whose works he copied with his own hand, and St. Jerome, who had them afterwards, valued them very highly. It is said that Eusebius gained most of the material for his Ecclesiastical History from the Cæsarean library. St. Pamphilus also founded a school at Cæsarea, in imitation of that established at Alexandria. In 307, during the Maximinian persecution, Pamphilus was seized by Urbanus, Governor of Palestine, and, after being tortured, was thrown into prison, where he remained for two years, during which he wrote an Apology for Origen, in five books, to which Eusebius added a sixth, but the first alone is now extant. Pamphilus and his companions suffered martyrdom on Feb. 16th, 309, but he and some of the others are commemorated on June 1st. Eusebius afterwards took the surname of Pamphili, and wrote an account of the saint's life, which is now lost.

Panagia [Gr. panagia, "all holy"].—This word, used in the Eastern Church, has two meanings: [1] it is sometimes used to designate the Virgin Mary; and [2] it is a name given to the consecrated bread. The transition seems to have arisen from the Greek custom of placing a piece of the consecrated bread and a cup of wine before the image of the Virgin. Then prayers were offered, incense was burned, and the bread and wine distributed among the faithful.

Pan-Anglican Synod. [LAMBETH CONFERENCE.]

Pantænus, Sr., was born at Sicily in the second century. He applied himself successfully to the study of philosophy, and belonged to the Stoics till he was converted to Christianity. He was the first catechetical teacher at Alexandria, to which post he was presented during the reign of Marcus Aurelius. The Ethiopians having sent to the Bishop for a divine to instruct them, Pantænus was sent by Demetrius (cir. 190), and is said to have discovered a Gospel of St. Matthew in Hebrew which had been left there by the Apostle St. Bartholomew. Nothing is known of Pantænus after 203. St. Jerome says that he wrote several commentaries on the Scriptures, but that his lectures were more serviceable to the Church than his writings, which are now lost.

Pantheon, at Rome, once a heathen temple dedicated to Jupiter and all the gods. In 608 re-dedicated by Pope Boniface IV. to the Virgin Mary and all the saints. It is also called the Rotunda, from its fine dome, which is very celebrated, and suggested the idea of the domes of modern times.

Pantheism [from pan, "everything," and Theis, "God"].—The belief that God is everything, and everything God. In one form Pantheism may be regarded as a protest against Materialism. Those who regarded the visible world as the sum total of all things, became from the very nature of the case Atheists. Those who recognised that thoughts and feelings are things just as real as things that can be touched, were so far emancipated from the blank hopelessness of the Materialist creed. Pantheism may be regarded as an importation from the Eastern philosophies, the groundwork of which was the belief in an Infinite Eternal Being which clothes itself in a multiplicity of forms, and thus makes up the universe. But the great origin of modern Pantheism must be traced to Germany. The endeavour to construct a basis of belief which should supersede the old traditional supremacy over the conscience claimed by the Church of Rome led to the theories of Spinoza, of Schelling, of Hegel, and upon these theories much of the succeeding Pantheism of modern thought has been founded. The first postulate of the system is, not an objective faith which rules and regenerates the life of man, but religious ideas and thoughts which have to find their assimilation in the facts of the universe, and to make these fit in with arbitrary assumption. The sense of harmony, the æsthetic faculty, requires a religion, and therefore a religion which meets this want must be true. Of course, where free license is thus given to the imagination, it is no wonder that Pantheism takes a thousand forms. "Matter," says one,

"does not exist except as an idea of our minds." "Matter," says another, "is the body of God, and the unseen life, energy, intelligence of the universe are His soul. These two co-exist, and are inseparable." "There is no God beside Me," says the Creator by His prophet Isaiah; but the Pantheist applies this to the Universe, and represents it as saying, "I am God, and there is no other." It is true that the higher expression of Pantheism admits such ideas as God, Revelation, Creation, Providence, as something more than subjective, as expressing realities beyond the mind. But unfortunately when it is sought to fix and define these realities, they vanish like shadows. Thus a very able Unitarian minister, speaking of Gibbon's account of himself sitting in the Coliseum, and suddenly resolving there and then to write his famous book, regards that resolution as parallel to the inspiration of the Hebrew prophets who heard the Word of the Lord speaking to them and sending them a message. But such a comparison is not exalting to the modern writer, it simply drags down the ancient. To deny any real inspiration which comes direct from God, without any modification beyond that caused by the imperfection of the mind to comprehend it, is practically Pantheism. It denies personal intercourse between God and the soul. There may be a veiled Pantheism, too, in the view so often put forth of late, that conceptions of God have varied from age to age according to human circumstances. Thus the Jew conceived of God as a Deliverer when the Exodus from Egypt was new, and as a Legislator when order supervened upon anarchy, and as King when the nation was united, and as Father when Christ had compassion on the multitudes. There is truth, of course, in all this, as there is in the modern conception that He is an all-pervading beneficent Power; but it becomes error if it ignores the fact that God is, and ever has been, all these. The original grounds of faith in a Divine Creator, and Ruler, and King, and Saviour fail, when one aspect only is confessed. The supposed discovery becomes a mere childish game at hide and seek, where the finder and found are identical; fear and gratitude are predicated, but the source from which they spring becomes a shadow.

Unhappily Pantheistic opinion involves moral consequences of a sad character. The sinking of the personal distinction between man and God is followed by the loss of the affections and the conscience, which are the very life of religion. If God is already identified with His creatures, where is the room for obedience to Him, for His supreme law, for prayer which asks for what otherwise it would not receive? Above all, the holiness of God would disappear, as He becomes identified with the struggles and failures of the Creation. "The comparative and relative perfection of His Being," we are told, "is only to be reached by strife within and without, from which the spirit mounts stronger after every conflict." It is impossible to exaggerate the moral danger of assuming, as evil men did of old, that we are delivered to do all the abominations of sin [Jer. vii. 10], that evil in fact is a necessity for the production of virtue, not a moral consequence of liberty, and that the teaching of Holy Scripture is erroneous when it tells us that two possibilities are open to us, life and death, between which man has to choose. Freewill is the very centre of human personality, and without it we lose the distinction between human agency and the agency of God. Deeply instructive is it to watch the progress downward of the denial of this distinction. There is a strife going on, says the modern Pantheist, and its conditions make the world so bad that it is only just endurable, and the progress of civilisation makes things worse, for they increase the consciousness of misery. Such is the Pantheism of Pessimism, identified with the name of Schopenhauer. "I know no theory of the universe," says a celebrated living writer, "which leads me to think that it would not have been better for mankind if they had never been born."

Not only worship must disappear before such a creed, but morality also. Long before men reasoned about theories of life and the ultimate good, light and life were given to the world by the Ten Commandments, and the commentaries upon them in Psalms and Prophets. They were based on the principle that man is subject to a Will higher than his own and distinct from it, the Will of an eternally righteous and unchanging Lord. By this conviction men's lives have been governed and brought into a measure of order and peace. Pantheism sweeps away Lawgiver, King, and Judge. So long as he was believed in, the noblest spirits among men could face the terrible difficulties and problems of life, even with joy, because they believed Him faithful. They were like men with the warm sun over their heads casting light all around them. But the night cometh. Nature fails us all, and when God is denied, men do the deeds of darkness, and learn to praise the dead more than the living. The only refuge from such dreariness and despair is to believe in God even as Abraham did, even as St. Paul did, who knew in whom he believed, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

Papal Infallibility. [INFALLIBILITY.]

Papal Power, GROWTH OF.—The causes which led to this plain fact of history are just those which would tend to bring about the increase of a power which professed to be spiritual and Christian. But, besides this, the advocates of the Papacy base its claim to supremacy over the whole Christian Church on Scripture, citing Matt. xvi. 18, 19 in proof: "And I say also unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven;" and further Luke xxii. 31, 32: "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren;" and John xxi. 16, 17: "Feed My sheep;" and they point to the high position to which the Popes rose as but the natural fulfilment of these promises and injunctions of our Lord to St. Peter. It may be granted that our Lord's words to St. Peter, taken quite by themselves, would cover, in the person of that Apostle himself, a great deal of what is claimed for the occupant of the Roman See; but there is no evidence in the New Testament that St. Peter took rank above the other Apostles. It is true that he was one of the foremost of their number and did often lead them; but this was due to his energetic and ardent temperament rather than to any special gifts. The promises made to St. Peter are certainly remarkable, but we are compelled to regard them as given to him as representing the brotherhood of the Apostles, or them and their successors, in the government of the Church, or the whole body of the Christian ministry, although it may well be that they were personally addressed to St. Peter because our Lord knew that he would make a prompt and emphatic use of them, that by his instrumentality the Church would be built "on the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets," himself being one of the stones. But the contention of the Romanists is that the promises to St. Peter were not only personal in this sense, but that they were so peculiarly made to him alone that he could hand them on to a successor for perpetual transmission, and that as the Apostle was Bishop of the Roman Church, his powers would naturally descend to the succeeding Bishops of Rome. Here, again, it may be conceded, since there is nothing certainly to contradict the view, and early tradition is in its favour, that St. Peter may have resided for some time in Rome—although chronological difficulties will not allow us to believe that he was there for the traditional twenty-five years—that he may have exercised Apostolic supervision of the Church, perhaps in conjunction with St. Paul, and that both of them, or St. Peter alone, appointed Linus as the first Bishop. All this may be conceded, and yet the facts of history are altogether against the kind of supremacy which has been claimed for the Roman See. We know from certain evidence that the early Bishops of Rome neither made such claims nor enjoyed such prerogatives as the theory of the Papal Supremacy supposes. We know that there was no distinction between them and other bishops, but such as is to be naturally accounted for—naturally, and without any reference to prophecies, or to special endowments from above—by the secular greatness of the city of Rome; for the importance of the city, which was the bishop's seat, was the sole original ground of distinction between one bishop and another. "Wherever a bishop be," says St. Jerome [A.D. 390], "whether at Rome or Eugubium" [Gubbio, in Italy, an insignificant place then as now], "at Constantinople or at Rhegium, at Alexandria or at Thamis, he is of the same worth, and of the same priesthood . . . they are all successors of the Apostles." This is exemplified in the case of the three Churches founded by St. Peter, or believed to be so—Rome, Alexandria, Antioch. Now, although the Church of Antioch was founded by St. Peter, and is said to have been the seat of his episcopate before he went to Rome, still it ranked below Alexandria, which appears only to have been founded under his direction by his disciple, St. Mark; the reason being that Alexandria was the second city in the Empire, and the capital of Egypt, whilst Antioch was only the third. In a similar way the Church of Rome ranked first of all because Rome was the first city in the Empire. So too Byzantium, which had been only an ordinary bishopric, when it was made by Constantine the Great the second capital of the Empire with the new name of Constantinople, was raised by the second General Council [A.D. 381] to the rank of a patriarchal See, and placed next to Rome itself, above the Apostolic See of Antioch. This brings us face to face with the fact that the foundation of the Papal power rested on the circumstance that the Pope was Bishop of Rome. We are now in a position to trace the growth of this power. Before doing so it may be well to refer to the Title of Pope. In the East this term has been vaguely applied to almost any ecclesiastical person. In the West its use was confined at an early period to bishops. In the sixth century it began to be more often used of the Bishop of Rome than of other bishops; in the ninth century this was still further the case; and, finally, its use in addressing any one besides the Bishop of Rome was forbidden by Gregory VII. in the Council of Rome of the year 1073.

We have seen that the foundation-stone of the Papal Supremacy was Rome itself. Rome was what no other city has ever been—the capital of the whole civilised world; it was, moreover, the centre of the civil and military government of the Empire. St. Paul himself felt the greatness of Rome and the importance of witnessing for Christ there [Acts xix. 21, xxiii. 11, xxv. 11, xxviii. 15]. Again, the Roman Church was an Apostolical one, the only Western Church which could claim this title at all. St. Paul had lived there long, had written his greatest epistle to it, and had received the crown of martyrdom there. St. Peter, too, may have resided in Rome; very early tradition says that he had been its bishop, and he had probably been martyred there. To Apostolical Churches belonged a certain degree of reverence, and the Church of Rome could boast of the two great Apostles.

Besides this, in early days, the Roman Church was always orthodox. It was not a Church of great literary fame, but it held fast "the faith once delivered to the saints." When heretics came to Rome to further their views, their opinions were rejected by the stern orthodoxy of the Roman Church, and the news of this, spreading over the Christian world, tended to increase the influence of the Bishops of Rome. On such grounds, Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons [180], says that "with this Church the whole Church [i.e. the faithful everywhere] must agree—with this Church . . . in which the Apostolical tradition has always been preserved." And in like manner Tertullian, "What a happy Church is that on which the Apostles poured out all their doctrine with their blood. . . . Let us see what she hath learned, what taught." The references of the ancient Fathers to the Roman Church are full of respect and of a desire to set Rome as high as possible; but they speak of it as belonging to the same class with other Apostolical Churches, and rest its glory on its connection with both the Apostles, SS. Peter and Paul, on their having founded it, settled it, and taught it, and not on any promise of our Lord to St. Peter and his successors. Rather later, Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage [248], a man of great abilities and lofty character, was brought into close relations with the Church of Rome. We find that he writes to, and treats, its Bishops on terms of perfect equality. He addresses them as "brother and colleague;" and whilst he holds up the general dignity of the episcopate, he never owns, or even shows, that he was aware of any right in the Bishop of Rome to rule over the whole Church. Even those passages in his writings which speak in an exalted way of St. Peter, and of the Roman Church as founded by him, appear rather to be symbolical, representing St. Peter as the type of Apostleship and the Roman Church as the type of unity, than to imply that he admitted in any way the supremacy of the Roman See as it was afterwards understood.

In the reign of the Emperor Constantine [306] the Bishops of Rome became more important still. Christianity was made the acknowledged religion of the Empire, hence the number of Christians and of the clergy was largely increased; and, besides this, the bishops and clergy were allowed to receive legacies, and thus grew in wealth. It is also probably true that Constantine gave to Bishop Sylvester and his successors his own palace, the Lateran Palace, as the episcopal residence [see "Donation of Constantine" further on]. In his reign, too, was founded the New Rome, Constantinople, and from this time onwards the Old Rome knew comparatively little of her Emperors, whilst her bishops became more and more her most important public personages.

From early times the ecclesiastical had followed the lines of the civil divisions of the Empire, and thus the bishop of the capital city or metropolis of each province—with the title of metropolitan—had presided at synods of the bishops and clergy of the province, and had been looked upon, in Church affairs, as the representative of the province generally. Constantine made a new partition of the Empire into dioceses, each of which comprised several provinces. In the West the bishop of the chief city of a diocese received the title of primate, and was at the head of all the metropolitans within his limits, but without exercising their privileges. The most eminent of these primates were called patriarchs [of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem]. The patriarchate of Rome included the seven provinces of Middle and Lower Italy, with Corsica, Sardinia, and Sicily; but in none of these had metropolitans yet been introduced, so that the Bishop of Rome exercised metropolitical functions—the consecration of bishops, the convocation of synods, the ultimate decision of appeals, and many other sorts of authority—throughout the whole patriarchate. This in no small degree tended to exalt the importance of the Roman See. The State acknowledgment of Christianity also gave the bishops of Rome political influence, since their opinions and support were sought after not only by other bishops, but by Emperors who wished to have their support in the religious controversies of the time.

The next great step in the building up of the Papal power dates from the Council of Sardica [343], held at a town of that name in Illyria, and summoned as a General Council of the Church by the Emperors of the East and West. Its object was to heal the divisions in the Church caused by the Arian heresy [ARIUS]; but as the Westerns gave ATHANASIUS [q.v.] a seat and a voice at it, the Easterns separated themselves and met elsewhere, so that the Council of Sardica had no longer a title to the name "General." Some of the Canons enacted gave a deposed bishop the privilege of appealing to the Bishop of Rome as a referee, not to decide the case himself, but to say whether there ought to be a new trial, in this case allowing him to send Legates [LEGATES] to sit with the judges. On these canons has been founded the claim to a jurisdiction by the Bishop of Rome over the whole Church; and in the next century more than one Bishop of Rome referred to the Sardican Canons as Canons of the Council of Nicæa, which had been held nearly twenty years earlier, and was recognised as General by the Universal Church. By such means, in course of time, the appellate jurisdiction of the Pope came to be more and more allowed.

But beyond formal appeals, the practice arose of referring to Rome for advice in difficult matters in distant parts of the Church. Thus Siricius, who was Bishop of Rome in 398, answered an application from Himerius, Bishop of Tarragona, in Spain, and his letter is the first genuine piece in the series of what are called Decretal Letters, or Epistles. At first these epistles were written in the name of Roman synods [i.e. bishops and clergy met for consultation], but afterwards they ran in the name of the Pope alone, and their tone gradually rose from one of brotherly advice to one of command.

In order that these views might be furthered, an occupant of the Roman See was wanted of marked ability, and one who was determined to promote the aggrandisement of his office. Such an one was INNOCENT I. [A.D. 402]. He laid it down as a principle that all Churches ought to follow the usages of Rome, but apparently limiting the claim to those of the West—the Churches of Italy, the Gauls, the Spains, of Africa, Sicily, and the islands which lie between—on the plea that they had been founded by emissaries of St. Peter or his successors. This claim over daughter Churches was often cheerfully admitted to a large extent, as, later on, in the case of the Anglo-Saxon Church, which owed its organisation, though only partly its origin, to Roman missionaries, and which was a firm maintainer of the Papal Supremacy in legitimate matters. In like manner, in the Pelagian controversy [PELAGIUS], Innocent said that the Fathers considered that nothing, in remote provinces, should be finally settled unless it came to the knowledge of the Roman See, so that the Roman decision might serve as a rule for all the Churches. The next Bishop, Zosimus, went on to declare the authority of the Apostolic See to be such that no one might dare to question its decisions, and that the successors of St. Peter inherit from him an authority equal to that which our Lord bestowed on the Apostle himself.

The election of Boniface I. [A.D. 418] was opposed by a rival named Eulalius. In consequence of this, the former applied to the Emperor Honorius for aid, and was by him established in his See. This intervention of Honorius, at the request of the Pope himself, appears to have laid the foundation for the influence which Emperors afterwards exercised in the election of the Popes, and indirectly to have added to the power of the latter.

The latter half of the fifth century was a critical one for the power of the Roman See. The Eastern Empire was decaying, the Western Empire was tottering to its fall. Africa had already fallen a prey to the Vandals, and Sicily had suffered severely. Like the Empire, the Church was in evil case, from the many heresies rife within her [MANICHEANS, PRISCILLIANISTS, PELAGIANS], whilst outside she was assailed by the Arian powers of the barbarians. It was at this juncture that Leo I., or the Great, became Pope. He stands out as the Christian representative of the Imperial dignity and severity of old Rome, and is the true founder of the mediæval Papacy in its uncompromising strength, representing strongly that one side of the developing life of the Church which is especially identified with Rome—authority and unity. St. Leo—for he is a saint of the Church—was a man lofty and severe in life and aims, a theologian, and a man of personal piety. He is the reputed inventor of the Collect form of prayer, and its “Roman brevity and majestic conciseness” are consonant with his character and the style of his writings. Notwithstanding his ambition and love of domination, we may not doubt that, in his exertions for the elevation of the Roman See, he believed himself to be labouring, not for its benefit only, but for the benefit of the whole Church. The man and the times suited one another. Leo boldly declared the pretensions and practices of the Roman Church to be matters of unbroken Apostolical tradition, and thus tried to enforce the usages of Rome on the whole Church. He represented the Sardinian Canons as to appeals as Canons of the General Council of Nicæa, or perhaps adopted what was now the usual practice of Rome. The Vandals who conquered the province of Africa were Arians, and the hitherto independent African Church was now glad to submit to Leo’s interference as the price of his support. A chance dispute amongst the bishops in Gaul was taken advantage of, when one of the bishops appealed to Rome against his metropolitan—the great and good Hilary of Arles—to lay down the declaration that Rome had always been accustomed to receive appeals from Gaul, and the Emperor Valentinian III. passed a law enforcing this view.

During Leo’s pontificate arose the Eutychian controversy [EUTYCHES], which was settled at the General Council of Chalcedon A.D. 451. At this Council the Legates whom Leo sent to represent him sat as presidents of the clergy with Anatolius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and the practical adoption, though only after discussion, of Leo’s tome, or letter to Flavian [Bishop of Constantinople], treating of the doctrine of our Lord’s Incarnation, contributed greatly to raise the general opinion of the authority of the Bishop of Rome.

The claims of the Roman See were maintained during the next century and a half, but they made no great progress until the time of GREGORY I., or the Great [590], a man of great personal piety, as well as an able ruler both in temporal as well as spiritual things. As the Emperor lived at Constantinople, and governed Italy by an Exarch, or lieutenant, at Ravenna, the country was practically left with very little defence against the Lombards, and Gregory had often to provide for the safety of the people, and to negotiate peace with the enemy. This led to a large increase in the temporal power of the Popes. Again, the Popes had gradually become great landowners. The "Patrimony of St. Peter," as the estates of the Roman See came to be called, were situated, not only in Italy, but in many distant countries. Gregory managed this property by agents, often in minor orders, and through them he communicated with the Churches and the Sovereigns of these various countries, and thus the Roman See gained a footing and influence wherever it possessed estates. From the time of Gregory onwards the authority of the bishops was more and more depressed by the Popes. Persons often only in minor orders were empowered, by a commission from the Pope, to set aside the rule of the bishops, and to deprive them of their rights. Gregory, moreover, brought himself into a closer connection with the Churches and Sovereigns of other countries by appointing certain bishops as his deputies or vicars, and as a mark of this commission he sent them the pallium. [PALLIUM.]

English people will always hold Gregory in reverent esteem for sending Augustine as a missionary to Kent.

The next event of considerable importance was the opposition of Pope Gregory II. to Leo III. [717], the Isaurian. This Emperor took strong objection to the worship of images which had sprung up, and by edicts ordered their destruction in all the Churches of the Empire. [ICONOCLAST.] The Emperor was reluctantly obeyed in the East, but the Pope refused to yield, and boldly armed against the enemy; finally, the Imperial fleet was destroyed at the mouth of the Po, and a synod was summoned in which the Iconoclasts were condemned. The Pope pursued his victory no further, but by moderate counsels preserved Italy outwardly to the Empire, whilst at the same time he greatly increased his own power.

In the pontificate of Zacharias [741] we have the first instance wherein the civil duties of a nation, and the rights of a crown, were submitted to the decision of a Pope. Pepin, the Mayor of the Palace under Childeric, the last of the Merovingians, asked Pope Zacharias whether the nation of the Franks should be ruled by the real or nominal holder of power. Zacharias decided in Pepin's favour. The question was merely a point of casuistry, laid before the first religious judge of the Church; but later Popes pretended that Zacharias had exercised a right belonging to his office and had deposed Childeric.

In the year 800, Charlemagne, the son of Pepin, was crowned in St. Peter's at Rome by Pope Leo III., with the Imperial title. Rome was grateful to her deliverer from the Lombards, an Emperor was needed, the Pope was the spokesman of the popular will as well as a consecrating priest, and hence Charles the Great was crowned; but on this event was founded the right, claimed afterwards by the Popes, of raising and deposing monarchs at their will.

Later than this, two great forgeries were put forth which greatly helped the Papal claims. [1] The so-called "Donation of Constantine," which was believed to be true from 868 to the middle of the fifteenth century. It professed that Constantine had conferred on Pope Sylvester the right of wearing a golden crown, that he had endowed the Apostolic See with the Lateran Palace (this one thing was probably true), with the city of Rome, and with all the provinces of Italy. And that in consequence of this Constantine had relinquished the ancient capital, and had built a new city for himself—Constantinople. Its pretended date was about 330. The fable was invented to give an ancient right to many things which had become matters of history more or less. [2] "The False Decretals." In the sixth century Dionysius Exiguus collected the Canons from the General, and the most famous Provincial, Councils, and to them he added the "Decretal" letters of the Popes, so that these latter were set forth as having the same weight as the Canons. His collection was generally received as a book of canon law in the West, except in Spain, where Isidore, Bishop of Seville [601—636], made a separate collection. About 840 another Isidore started the False Decretals under cover of the name of the great Isidore. They are skilful forgeries, and profess to be letters and decrees of Bishops of Rome going back to Apostolic days. Their aim is to exalt the hierarchy as a whole, asserting the rights of the clergy as a body against the oppressions of the Emperors; but they carry the Pope's power higher than it had ever been carried before, and since they found their way into the collections of the canon laws, and finally into the code of the Papacy, their influence was very strong, and, indeed, still exists now, although the deception is admitted.

An example of the righteous use of the Papal power, and one which shows why the moral support of the civilised world was given to it, occurred in the Pontificate of Nicolas I. [858]. Lothair II., a vicious and contemptible prince, wished to obtain a divorce from his queen and marry another woman. Nicolas firmly opposed him, even deposing two French Metropolitans and annulling the decisions of a Frankish National Council, because they favoured the divorce. These measures were novel and aggressive, but the rightness of the cause prevented their being questioned. From the eighth century onwards the Popes had granted special privileges to monastic bodies [MONK], by which they were exempted from all jurisdiction but that of the Pope. Later on, especially in the twelfth century, these institutions increased in number, and it is easy to see how, by their means, the Pope's authority grew throughout every country, since they were independent of the bishops, and were often opposed to the parochial clergy. One of the greatest names amongst the Popes is that of HILDEBRAND, Gregory VII. [1048-85]. He was the moving spirit of a party in the Church which desired to emancipate it from all connection with the State, and from the feudal obligations by which it was bound in regard of its possessions. With unswerving steadiness, with thorough conviction, with far-sighted patience, and with a deep, subtle, and even unscrupulous policy, he laboured towards these ends during the reign of several Popes, who were guided by his forcible character, until at last he became Pope himself [1073]. The two objects he put before himself were:—[1] To fix in the College of Cardinals [CARDINAL] the freedom and independence of election of the Popes, and for ever to abolish the right (or, as he considered it, usurpation) of the Emperors and Roman people. [2] To bestow and resume the Western Empire as a fief of the Church, and to extend his temporal dominion over kings and kingdoms of the earth. As Hallam wittily says, he found it convenient to treat the Apostle St. Peter "as a great feudal suzerain" of the kingdoms of the earth. The first of these designs was accomplished, but the second only attained a partial success, although from this time onwards no Pope thought of awaiting the confirmation of the Emperor before he was installed in the throne of St. Peter. Pepin and Charlemagne had bestowed on the Popes grants of territory, with sovereign rights, and now the Countess Matilda, a firm friend of Gregory, made over to the Roman See her territories after her death. The "donation" was disputed, but the Popes realised enough of it to add greatly to their power and wealth.

The Crusades [CRUSADES] brought vast advantages to the Papacy in many ways. Urban II., in 1095, offered forgiveness of sins to all faithful Christians who took up arms in this cause. In this movement the Popes found themselves placed at the head of Western Christendom, since they had the control of enterprises in which the most powerful sovereigns were expected to enlist themselves. They likewise extended their sway by claiming the supreme lordship over the territories rescued from the Infidels (the Turks).

Innocent III. [1198], the most powerful of all the Popes, carried the ideas of his predecessors to their furthest limit. Many of his high-handed proceedings directly tended towards social order and the happiness of mankind. No control but that of religion appeared sufficient to restrain the abuses of society. Innocent announced himself as the general arbiter of differences and conservator of the peace throughout Christendom. Thus he compelled the observance of peace between the Kings of Castile and Portugal by the threat of excommunication and interdict. [EXCOMMUNICATION; INTERDICTION.] He enjoined the King of Arragon to restore his debased coin. By a general interdict enforced throughout France he compelled Philip Augustus—a powerful prince—to take back his wife whom he had repudiated; and England was not the only country which he converted into a spiritual fief. On the whole, Innocent was the greatest and most successful of the Popes. The times themselves were favourable to his ability and gifts, as well as to his pretensions. A strong, uncompromising power, exercised upon the whole on the side of God and of right, was needed, and Innocent exactly met the want.

The Popes were at the summit of their power during the thirteenth century. "Rome inspired during this age all the terror of her ancient name. She was once more the mistress of the world, and kings were her vassals." The Emperor Frederick II. had taken the sign of the Cross, by which he bound himself to serve in the Holy War of Palestine; but he considered himself at liberty to fulfil his vow at his own time, and on this account became embroiled with successive Popes. Innocent IV., at a Council at Lyons, 1245, declared him to be deposed, and this, and the proscription of Alexander IV., were the main causes of the ruin of his family. This is the most successful instance of the exercise of the power of deposing kings which history affords.

In 1294 Boniface VIII. became Pope, and endeavoured to carry out Hildebrand's idea of the Papacy, but the real power of the Roman See was beginning to wane. The first successes of the Crusades were being followed by failure and disasters; the Holy Land was being abandoned, and the preaching of a Holy War ceased to rouse men to enthusiasm. The high pretensions of the Canon Law were opposed by the revived study of the Roman civil law, which contained a lofty theory of imperial and secular power. Boniface quarrelled with Philip of France, who would not yield to him, and death only prevented the Pope from publishing a Bull of deposition against the King. Just after his death the Popes settled at Avignon, and came under the control of the sovereigns of France. [PAPAL SCHISM.] Next followed the Councils of Constance and Basel, and afterwards the movement of the Reformation, all tending to limit and cripple the Papal power.

No student of history can fail to see what an important part the Papacy played in the Middle Ages, nor can he fail to admit that, though deformed by many human imperfections, it was yet powerful for good, by opposing to the idea of mere brute force that of an unseen but mightier spiritual power, which, in a comparatively lawless age, did on the whole defend the innocent and weak and punish the guilty and strong.

But whilst freely admitting this, he can find no foundation either in Holy Scripture or in the page of history for the assertions of a celebrated Bull of Boniface VIII. ["Unam Sanctam"], one sentence from which appears to sum up the Papal claims: "Moreover we declare, affirm, define, and pronounce that it is altogether necessary for salvation that every human creature should be subject to the Roman Pontiff."

Papal Schism.—During the seventy years [see preceding article] in which the Popes resided in Avignon they became more or less the servants of the French sovereigns. Gregory XI. became Pope in 1370, and his pontificate was a series of disasters. Italy, deserted by the Popes, was in a deplorable condition: the ecclesiastical estates were oppressed by their governors; they revolted, and leagued themselves with the Florentines and Viscontis to throw off the Papal rule. Gregory therefore determined, urged thereto by the solicitations of St. CATHERINE OF SIENNA [q.v.], to return to Rome and reside there, and he was received joyfully on Jan. 17th, 1377; but he found it no easy matter to rule over his neglected subjects, and was meditating a return to Avignon when his death—March 27th, 1378—prevented it. On his death began what is known as the Great Western Schism. Italy was not satisfied with the fact of having got her Pope back to Rome; during the long residence at Avignon the Cardinals had come to be all Frenchmen, and thus were completely under the power of the King of France. So when, after the funeral of Gregory, the Conclave met in St. Peter's to elect his successor, they were assailed by a tumultuous populace, demanding with threats that they should have a Roman, or at any rate an Italian, Pontiff. After many fierce discussions between the Cardinals, they were forced to yield to the demands of the people, and they chose Bartolomeo de Prignano, Archbishop of Bari; he took the name of Urban VI., and was crowned in St. John Lateran on Easter Day, April 18th, 1378. All the Cardinals were present, and thus gave a tacit consent to the legality of his election. But it was not long before they repented of their work. Urban proved to be a man of imprudent zeal, imperious, and of a most ungovernable temper. The Cardinals retired to Anagni, whence they communicated with those left at Avignon, and declared that the election of Urban, being compulsory, was illegal, and therefore might be considered as null and void. They then proceeded to elect another Pope, and chose Robert, Cardinal of Geneva, who took the name of Clement VII., and went to reside at Avignon. He was acknowledged Pope by France, Sicily, and the kingdoms of Spain. Urban refused to resign, and was acknowledged Pope by the rest of Europe. Thus there were two Popes and two sets of Cardinals, and endless division and dissension in the Church followed, the Pope and the Anti-Pope excommunicating and anathematising each other. It was agreed to refer the matter to a general council, but then arose the difficulty as to under whose auspices it was to sit. Urban made successful war on Naples, and Clement, who was under its protection, was obliged to fly and seek safety at Avignon. He was not, however, so successful in his war with Charles of Durazzo, who besieged him at Nocera; and, suspecting treachery from some of his Cardinals, Urban summoned them to Nocera on the plea of business, had six of the most learned and of best repute arrested and cast into a fetid prison, and then put to torture. The Pope, with the help of Raimondello Orsini, escaped from Nocera to Genoa. He died in 1389. Clement VII., his rival, reigned at Avignon in comparative peace and dignity, and on Urban's death he indulged hopes that Christendom would agree in acknowledging him as their legal Pontiff; but these were quickly dissipated, for the Italian Cardinals proceeded to elect as their new Pope, Pietro Tomacelli, a Neapolitan, who took the name of Boniface IX. His pontificate is remarkable for the growth of simony; but he was heavily pressed with debt, and the opposition Papal Court at Avignon was possessed of the Church revenues of France and Spain, which had hitherto belonged to Rome, whilst the progress of Wycliffite doctrines curtailed his income from England. He therefore published a Bull by which he secured to himself the annates, or first fruits—equal to a year's revenue—on all vacant bishoprics and abbeys. Clement meantime surrounded himself with thirty-six cardinals, to whom he made grants of benefices before they were void, giving them possession as soon as they should be vacant; this greatly irritated the French clergy, and they appealed to the King to get matters settled between the two Popes. Clement died Sept. 16th, 1394, and the University of Paris adjured the King not to elect a new Pope; but the Cardinals, without awaiting the King's orders, proceeded to elect a Spaniard, Pedro, Cardinal of Luna, under the name of Benedict XIII. He had pledged himself before election to do all in his power to heal the schism; but having got the power he would not relinquish it, and the King of France, having vainly sought to get him to resign, together with Castile, renounced obedience to him, and he was held a prisoner at Avignon, 1398. Boniface was equally obstinate in the matter of any compromise, and remained at Rome, exercising his share of dominion. Matters were thus at the close of the fourteenth century. For five years Benedict XIII. remained a prisoner, when he escaped by the help of Louis, King of Sicily, and once more France acknowledged him as Pope. Boniface died at Rome, Sept. 29th, 1404, and was succeeded by Cosmato Migliorato, who assumed the title of Innocent VII. His reign was troubled by quarrels of the Guelphs and Ghibellines, and on the success of the latter, under Ladislaus, King of Naples, he retired to Viterbo, but afterwards returned to Rome, only to die in 1406. The Roman Cardinals, before proceeding to elect his successor, took an oath that whoever might be elected Pope should at once renounce the papacy if his rival at Avignon could be made to do likewise. They elected Angelo Corrario, a Venetian by birth, who became Pope under the name of Gregory XII. The rivals now wrote to each other, expressing willingness to meet at Savona and remit the election of one sovereign pontiff to the two bodies of Cardinals; but the conference was evaded, and it became evident that nothing would be gained by the resignation of either of the rivals. The Cardinals then determined to assemble a general council at Pisa, to depose the two reigning Popes, and elect one in their room. The Council met on Lady Day, 1409; the Popes were denounced as guilty of perjury and heresy, and, on the 5th of June, the Patriarch of Alexandria read in the Cathedral of Pisa the sentence of their deposition. A harder task than deposing the two rivals now awaited the Cardinals—that of choosing as Pope one who should command universal respect. They elected Peter Philargi, of Candia, of the order of Friar Minors, who took the name of Alexander V. There were now three Popes, for neither of the others thought of bowing to the decree of Pisa, and Benedict remained at Perpignan, with the allegiance of Spain, while Gregory went to Naples. Alexander irritated his clergy by a Bull in favour of the friars, by which he gave them power to hear confessions and grant absolution in any part of Christendom. After only ten months of pontificate Alexander V. died at Bologna, in 1410, and Balthasar Cosma was chosen Supreme Pontiff, with the name of John XXIII. He made war with Ladislaus, King of Sicily, in which he was worsted, and then made an alliance with the Emperor Sigismund, and agreed to convene a general council once more; the place of meeting chosen was Constance; it met in 1414, and was very largely attended. The Pope was received with every mark of loyalty; his retinue consisted of nine cardinals and about six hundred followers; the council was opened by him in person on November 5th, and adjourned to the 16th. The three principal objects for which this council had been summoned were:—[1] the union of the Church under one acknowledged Pope; [2] the reformation of the clergy in its head and in its members; and [3] the extirpation of erroneous and heretical doctrines. We have in the present article only to deal with the first of these. In spite of John's remonstrances, the Council decided to receive ambassadors from the two Anti-Popes; it was settled also that neither of the three Popes should preside in the council. The cession of John was loudly demanded, as the only means of securing peace to the Church, and his enemies proceeded to lay grievous accusations against him. At length, on March 1st, 1415, he publicly pronounced his abdication, on condition of the other two doing the same. But soon after, some difference arising between him and the Council, he fled to Schaffhausen, thence to Brissac, and so to Fribourg, where the Duke of Austria, who had declared himself his protector, treacherously made him a prisoner in his castle. Two deputies were sent from the Council to cite him to appear at Constance, and on his way there he was seized by the Emperor Sigismund and again imprisoned. Notwithstanding his remonstrances the Council solemnly deposed him, May 29th, 1415, and sentenced him to imprisonment; he was taken first to Heidelberg and afterwards to Mannheim. On July 4th, Gregory, by his proctor, Carlo Malatesta, made his renunciation in open council. Benedict still refused to submit, whereupon the Emperor Sigismund, accompanied by the Archbishop of Tours and thirteen deputies from the Council, went to Perpignan, but could not prevail on him to abdicate; so in 1417 he was deposed, and the Council proceeded to the election of a sole Pope. On Nov. 11th, 1417, they chose Otho Colonna, who took the name of Martin V. Gregory died soon after his cession, and John XXIII., on obtaining his liberty in 1419, acknowledged Martin to be head of the Church, and was in consequence made chief Cardinal, but he died six months after. There was now only the peninsula of Paniscola, in a corner of the kingdom of Arragon, which held out against the rest of Christendom, by the invincible obstinacy of Benedict, who chose to consider himself the only true Pope, till his death in 1424. Before his death he obliged his Cardinals to elect another Pope in his room, who called himself Clement VIII.; but in 1429 the King of Arragon became reconciled to Martin V., and in the same year the pretended Pope made his abdication, and thus brought to an end the Great Western Schism. The Council of Constance had also been occupied with the Hussite War [BOHEMIA; HUSS] and with WYCLIFFE [q.v.]; it was dissolved in 1418. Martin V. thus remained sole Pope; but he died very suddenly, just before the opening of the Council of Basle, in 1431. On his death the Cardinals erected themselves into a standing council, which was to be superior to the Pope, and they solemnly pledged themselves that whoever should be elected Pontiff should proceed to the reformation of the Roman Court. Their choice then fell on the Cardinal of Sienna, Gabriel Condolmieri, under the name of Eugenius IV. The Council of Basle held its first sitting July 23rd, 1431, and was presided over by the Cardinal Julian Cesarini, in place of the Pope, who did not choose to go beyond the Alps; but not liking that the council should be held without his immediate control, he sought to transfer it from Basle to Bologna. This was refused, and the Council set to work to make some salutary Church reforms. The question of the union of the Eastern and Western Churches was coming on, and the Pope, irritated by the defiance of the Council, insisted that it should be removed to some place in Italy. He was then summoned to appear before the Council of Basle; but this he refused, and, having declared their sitting to be illegal, he summoned another to assemble at Ferrara, which was afterwards removed to Florence, where he and his adherents discussed the question of unity with the deputies in opposition to the Council of Basle. [FERRARA, COUNCIL OF; FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF.] The Council of Basle now proceeded to denounce Eugenius as a disturber of the peace and unity of the Church, and on May 26th they declared him to be deposed from the pontificate, and absolved all Christians from their oaths of fealty to him, and they chose as their new Pope, Amadeus of Savoy, with the name of Felix V. He was crowned at Basle, June 24th, 1440. Eugenius was, of course, furious, and refused to accept the sentence of deposition, so once more Christendom was divided by a schism, not only between the Pope and the Anti-Pope, but between two rival Councils. It did not, however, last long. Eugenius died in 1447, and was succeeded by Thomas of Sarzana, Cardinal of Bologna, under the title of Nicholas V. He was a learned man, singularly active and conciliatory, and soon became very popular. In 1449 Felix resigned his dignity, with the consent of the Council of Basle, and Nicholas was acknowledged as sole Pontiff. The Council of Basle dispersed in the same year.

Paphnutius, Sr., was born about the year 270 in Egypt, spent the first years of his life under the direction of St. Anthony in the desert, and afterwards became Bishop in the upper Thebaid, but the name of the See is not known. During the Diocletian persecution he lost an eye, and was sent to work in the mines, but returned to his people at the accession of Constantine the Great. He was present at the Council of Nicea, and opposed the proposal that bishops, priests, deacons, and sub-deacons who had married before their ordination should be separated from their wives. He was also present at the Councils of Tyre and Sardis in 335 and 347. He is supposed to have died about 350.

Papias.—Bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia [b. about A.D. 70, d. probably before 160].

Nothing is known of his life or works beyond the accounts of his writings given by Irenæus and Eusebius. Irenæus says of him that he was a disciple of St. John and the companion of Polycarp; but Eusebius questions this. Papias wrote an Interpretation of the Sayings of the Lord about 130, all of which has been lost, except some fragments quoted by the Fathers already mentioned. Eusebius also tells of the strange stories of the Apostles and of Christ's life and sayings, told by Papias, and says of him that he was learned and well acquainted with the Scriptures, though in another passage he describes him as too apt to put faith in traditions. Papias seems to have believed that the future millennium was to be the return of Christ in fleshly form to earth, thinking that the words of prophecy were to be taken in a literal sense. He relates in his interpretation of Christ's sayings many things which he declares he had received from unwritten tradition, among which are the last instructions of our Lord to the Apostles.

Parabolani [lit. "those who expose themselves"].—One of the minor orders of the clergy, on whom was specially laid the duty of visiting the sick and attending to their wants. They derived their name from bravely exposing their lives to danger when ministering to the sick in cases of infectious illness.

Paracelsus, PHILIPPUS AUREOLUS THEOPHRASTUS BOMBASTUS, was born at Einsiedeln, near Zurich, in 1493. He received little learning in his youth, but early took to a wandering life, and travelled over all Europe, and several parts of Asia and Africa, everywhere picking up information, and especially studying chemistry. The most valuable acquisition he made was an acquaintance with metallic chemistry, by which he is said to have cured thirteen princes, whose cases had been declared hopeless, before he was 33. He soon became famed, and in 1526, at the recommendation of Æcolampadius, was Professor of Medicine and Natural Philosophy at Basle, whence, however, after two years, he was ejected on the charge of quackery. He again took to a wandering life, and died at Salzburg in 1541.

Paracelsus was a strong Cabalist, and held the doctrines of internal illumination as an emanation from the Deity, the universal harmony of all things, the influence of the stars of the sublunar world, and the vitality of the elements.

Paraclete. [HOLY GHOST.]

Paradise, from a Hebrew word signifying a park, and in the LXX. used for the garden of Eden, in which Adam and Eve were placed. In the later Jewish theology it was adopted as meaning that part of Hades in which the souls of the faithful were placed after death, and in this sense it has been adopted by the Church, following our Lord's words to the dying thief, "To-day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise." It is also used by St. Paul as meaning heaven, or a part of heaven.

Paradise or Farvis.—A court of a church or monastery surrounded with cloisters. Also the porch of the church.

Paranimphs.—Those who attended the bridegroom and bride on their wedding day. The Jews and Greeks had such persons, and in the Fourth Council of Carthage [398] it was agreed that the bride and bridegroom should be conveyed by their relations or bridesmen to receive the priest's blessing. The term "paranimph" was also used by the Faculty of Divinity in Paris at the ceremony of giving the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, for the orator whose duty it was to make a speech in commendation of those admitted to that degree.

Paraphrase.—An explanation of some text in clearer terms, to elucidate to the reader the author's meaning. Paraphrases of the Bible were made in very early times, the first being the TARGUM [q.v.], the Chaldaic Paraphrase of the Pentateuch, written by various authors at different times. Paraphrases were also written on the Prophets and the other books of the Old Testament, besides the Pentateuch, though it has been believed by some that the earliest paraphrases were fabulous.

Paratorium.—The prothesis, or credence table. It was so called because the elements were prepared for the Holy Eucharist out of the offerings there received.

Parclose.—A screen or railing, either of open work or close, for separating a chapel from the rest of a church, for surrounding a tomb, or for any similar purpose.

Pardon.—The act of forgiving an offender or removing the guilt of sin, that the punishment due to it may not be inflicted. Of the nature of pardon, it may be observed that Scripture represents it by various phrases: "a lifting up or taking away," "a blotting out of sin," "an act of grace," etc. The author or cause of pardon is not any creature, angel or man, but God. Ministers are said to remit declaratively but not authoritatively; that is, they preach and declare that there is remission of sins in Christ, but they cannot pretend to absolve men. There is nothing that man has, or can do, by which pardon can be procured: wealth cannot buy pardon; human works cannot merit it; nor can water-baptism wash away sin. It is the prerogative of God alone to forgive; the first cause of which is His own sovereign grace and mercy. The meritorious cause is the Blood of Christ. Pardon of sin and justification are considered by some as the same thing, and it must be confessed that there is a close connection; in many parts they agree, and it is without doubt that every sinner who shall be found pardoned at the Great Day will likewise be justified; yet they have been distinguished thus: [1] An innocent person, when falsely accused and acquitted, is justified but not pardoned; and a criminal may be pardoned, though he cannot be justified or declared innocent. Pardon is of men that are sinners, and who remain such, though pardoned sinners; but justification is a pronouncing persons righteous, as if they had never sinned. [2] Pardon frees from punishment, but does not entitle to everlasting life; but justification does. If we were only pardoned, we should, indeed, escape the pains of hell, but could have no claim to the joys of heaven; for these are more than the most perfect works of man could merit, therefore they must be what the Scripture declares "the gift of God." After all, however, though these two may be distinguished, yet they cannot be separated; and in reality one is not prior to the other; for he that is pardoned by the death of Christ, is at the same time justified by His life.

Pardons. [INDULGENCES.]

Paris, MATTHEW OF. [MATTHEW PARIS.]

Parish [Gr. paroikia, "a sojourning"].—The portion of land under the spiritual control of a priest. The name was originally applied to the sojourning of the Jews in Egypt, and was thence transferred to the communities of Christians dwelling among strangers at Rome or elsewhere. The credit of introducing the system into England is generally ascribed to Theodore of Tarsus, Archbishop of Canterbury from 668 to 690, though others think that the parish is simply the old "township" of the early Teutons [see Green's Hist., vol. i. p. 8]. However this may be, Theodore certainly laid the foundation of the ecclesiastical parish, by introducing the principle of patronage which had been laid down in the East by Justinian's laws of 541 and 543, according to the rights of patronage to the founders of churches and their heirs. The system of parishes was used after the organisation of the Church in England to denote the territory governed by a bishop, and consisting of several churches or chapels dependent upon the mother church of the diocese. At first the mother churches were distinguished from others by containing baptisteries, in which the Sacrament of baptism was administered at stated times with elaborate ceremonial; the baptismal churches were each in the care of an archpresbyter, who held a position somewhat resembling that now held by a rural dean. In course of time, as the number of baptismal churches increased, presbyters were appointed to the charge of each, and were entitled to receive tithes. We find that land was now divided into districts corresponding to "hundreds" in charge of the presbyters, and in larger divisions corresponding to our counties, in charge of the bishops. With the increase of population came the necessity for increasing the number of churches and chapels. In Queen Anne's reign an Act was passed for building fifty new churches, to which parishes were to be allotted, in London. And occasionally local Acts were passed for the division of large parishes. But it was not until 1818 that the first Church Building Act was made. That Act provided that a parish might be divided either into distinct parishes, or into districts, or into chapelries. The arrangement was under the control of the CHURCH BUILDING COMMISSIONERS [q.v.]. They were empowered, with the consent of the bishop, to apply to the patron for his consent to the division. The boundaries were to be marked out, and might be altered from time to time by Order in Council. Glebe, tithe, and other endowments might be apportioned with the consent of the bishop and patron. Other Acts were passed in 1831 and in 1846. The latter provided for the making new parishes through the agency of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who are empowered to provide for the stipends of the new incumbents by alienating fees and other endowments. In cases where the income of a new parish is below a certain sum, the advowson may be obtained by private trustees on their finding a sufficient sum to raise the permanent income. When a new parish is formed out of an old one, the inhabitants for all ecclesiastical purposes belong to the new parish, and have no right to seats in the old parish church. But they have a right to vote for churchwardens of the mother church.

Parish Books.—Documents belonging to a parish, kept by the churchwardens or clerk, in which all matters relating to parish affairs are recorded, as well as notices of services, registers, and church accounts.

Parish Clerk.—The lowest officer of the church, of whom there is one in every parish. The clerks were formerly really clergymen in minor orders, who assisted the officiating priests, but are now laymen. Their duties are to lead the responses, be present at all christenings, marriages, and funerals, etc. They are generally appointed by the minister, except in some places where it is a custom for the parishioners or churchwardens to appoint them. After being appointed they are licensed by the ordinary, and are sworn to obey the minister.

Parker, JOHN HENRY [b. 1806, d. 1884].—A learned writer on church architecture, as well as an active controversialist in ecclesiastical questions. He entered into a discussion with Lord Selborne as to the binding character of the ADVERTISEMENTS [q.v.]. His manuals of Gothic architecture are probably the best in the language.

Parker, MATTHEW, Archbishop of Canterbury [b. at Norwich, 1504; d. at Lambeth, 1575]. He studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, of which he was made Fellow in 1527, and afterwards devoted himself for some time to the study of Church history and theology. The result was his declaring himself in 1533, in a sermon preached before the University, to have accepted the Reformed doctrines. He became Chaplain to Anne Boleyn, Master of Corpus Christi College in 1544, and in the following year Vice-Chancellor; on the accession of Edward VI. he was also presented to the Deanery of Lincoln, but lost this and all his other appointments when Mary became Queen. Her death took place within a few hours of that of Reginald Pole, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the new Queen, Elizabeth, nominated Parker as Pole's successor, moved, no doubt, not only by the sense of his moderation between extreme parties, but also by the remembrance of the relation in which he had stood to her mother.

His consecration, which took place on Dec. 17th, 1559, became the subject of a strange fable, known as the NAG'S HEAD CONSECRATION, which was an invention of the Romanists, set forth for the purpose of discrediting his consecration, and thereby invalidating the orders of the Church of England. The story has long since been abundantly refuted, and has been given up by the best authorities among the Romanists; it was as follows:—The Queen issued her warrant, directed to the Bishop of Llandaff; to Dr. Scory, elect of Hereford; Dr. Barlow, elect of Chichester; Dr. Coverdale, elect of Exeter; and to Dr. Hodgkins, Suffragan of Bedford. All these persons met at the Nag's Head Tavern, in Cheapside, where it was usual for the Dean of the Arches, and the civilians, to refresh themselves after the confirmation of a bishop in Bow Church; and there Neale, who was Chaplain to Bonner, peeped through a hole in the door, and saw all the other Bishops importuning Llandaff, who had been dissuaded by Bonner from assisting in this consecration. As he obstinately refused their request, Dr. Scory bid the rest kneel down, and, laying the Bible on each of their shoulders and heads, he pronounced the words, "Take thou authority, etc.," and so they all stood up bishops. The Romanists asserted that the consecration was irregular, both as to the place where it was performed and as to the manner of doing it; they also objected that three out of the four bishops present were only bishops elect, and that the other was a suffragan. The story could not have been invented till after the Queen's reign, for, had it been true, doubtless some of the writers of the time would have noticed it. Bishop Burnet discovered the falsity of the story from an original manuscript attached to Parker's registers, showing that the consecration took place in Lambeth Palace Chapel, on Sunday, Dec. 17th, 1559, where Dr. Parker came at five o'clock in the morning, in a scarlet gown and hood, attended by the said four bishops, and lighted by four torches, and there, after prayers, Dr. Scory preached, and then the other bishops presented the Archbishop to him, and the mandate for his consecration being read by a doctor of the civil law, and he having taken the oaths of supremacy, according to the form of consecration then lately published, all the four bishops laid their hands on his head and said, "Receive the Holy Ghost," etc. Several other clergy were also present.

The arduous duty fell to him of reconciling the conflicting elements in the Church, a duty which the Queen's capricious nature rendered all the more difficult. Under him the Act of Uniformity was carried into execution, and he wrote the Advertisements [q.v.], regulating the subjects of the clergy's sermons, under Elizabeth's directions. Archbishop Parker did much to promote the study of antiquities by founding the Antiquarian Society, and rescuing from the ruins of the monasteries many valuable records, with which he enriched the libraries of Corpus Christi and other colleges at Oxford. He also published the Chronicles of Matthew Paris, Thomas Walsingham, and others. He was buried in Lambeth Chapel. The Puritans, who declared that by enforcing uniformity he promoted schism in the Church, dragged his bones from the grave, and threw them on a dung-hill. They were replaced in the Chapel after the Restoration, and a small stone covers them, on which is inscribed: Tandem hic requiescit corpus Mattei Parker, Archi.

Parker, SAMUEL, Bishop of Oxford, was born at Northampton in 1640, and educated at Wadham College, Oxford, whence he removed to Trinity. In 1665 he became a F.R.S., and published Tentamina, Physico-Theologica de Deo, which so pleased Archbishop Sheldon that he made him one of his Chaplains [1667], and preferred him to the Archdeaconry of Canterbury [1670], and to a prebendal stall in that Cathedral [1672]. In 1686 he was consecrated Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards made President of Magdalen College by James II. He died in March, 1687. It has been asserted that he was a Romanist.

Bishop Parker was a good scholar, and wrote on several subjects. Among his works are Censure of the Platonic Philosophy, The Nature and Extent of Divine Goodness, A Defence of Ecclesiastical Polity against Dr. Owen, A Vindication of Bishop Bramhall from the Fanatical Charge of Popery, The Case of the Church of England Stated, Religion and Loyalty, etc.

Parker, THEODORE, American Unitarian [b. 1810, d. 1860]. He was educated in the Unitarian faith by his parents, who were pious middle-class persons, and they intended him for the ministry of their communion. He worked intensely, graduated at the Divinity School at Harvard with high honours, and became minister of a church at Boston. His Unitarian brethren soon found that he was leaving the conservative line of such men as Channing, and was being moved along in the direction of freethought, and they drew apart from him. This grew to an open breach when, in 1841, he published a sermon in which he treated the Gospel miracles as either myths or exaggerations. The result of the controversy which arose was that he left the Unitarian body with a large following, who established themselves under him as an independent congregation [1845]. His congregations were large, and his influence, from his manifest zeal for philanthropy and social reforms, was very wide. His testimony against slavery had great power in its abolition. He was a prolific writer, and his sermons are devout, earnest, and thoughtful. His works, comprising, besides these and other discourses, reviews, criticisms, and speeches, were published in London in twelve volumes, 1863-1865. He also published a translation of De Wette's Introduction to the Old Testament. His health failing, he came to Europe for change, but died at Florence.

Parker's position with respect to the Bible miracles, as indicated in his works, can hardly be said to deny them. "Non-proven" would perhaps express his view: they are improbable, and the evidence insufficient, but cannot be called impossible. The truth of Christ's moral teaching, nay, even His Divinity, in a sense unapproached by any other human personality, were evidenced by the sanctity of His life. Legends gradually grew round the beauty of His figure in the history; these being dropped, a true biography remains. Parker's faith in a personal God who governs the soul and the daily life of man, to whom prayer can be made, and who will answer it, seems not to have wavered. His private papers contain many direct and most earnest petitions to God. The Bible, according to him, is inspired, not in the sense of a revelation, but as calling forth in man the latent inspiration which is in him, and leading him to discern the truth which is given to every man, but which, but for such quickening, lies hidden.

Parkhurst, JOHN, Biblical Lexicographer [b. 1728, d. 1797], born at Catesby Abbey, Northamptonshire, died at Epsom. He took orders in the Church of England, but soon retired on his means, and betook himself to Biblical study. He first published his Hebrew Lexicon without Points [1762], and followed it by his Greek Lexicon in 1769. He was a partisan of the Hutchinsonian school, and this largely affected the value of his work. The peculiar opinions of that school led him to attach great value to etymological researches, and his own in the Greek are in the highest degree fanciful. But in spite of their faults, the learning and industry of Parkhurst, no less than his piety, gave a real value to his books, and the edition revised by the late Hugh J. Rose, and first published in 1829, is a book of enduring worth, though other works have largely superseded it.

Parochial Boards have been put forward as one of the needs of Church Reform. One scheme, that of Mr. Albert Grey, as spokesman of the Church Reform Union, was to leave each parish to choose its board—all ratepayers having a vote—which should regulate the hours of service, the ritual, and the choice of hymn-books, all subject to the veto of the Bishop. Another recommendation was that the Board should consist of communicants only. The Committee of the Upper House of Convocation on the subject reported as follows :—

"While we give full weight to the desire that has been expressed for the admission of the faithful laity of the Church, of all classes, to a substantial share in the control of Church affairs, we still feel that we require to be more fully informed as to the extent to which it is deemed to be desirable that the laity should share in the administration of the affairs of the Church. We look for valuable information and assistance in this, as in other matters, from the newly-constituted House of Laymen.

"Meanwhile we recommend the formation of voluntary parochial boards or councils, which, we are all well aware, have been recommended in many dioceses, and have been in operation in many parishes. It is otherwise as regards parochial boards or councils with defined statutory powers. The formation of these we cannot, as at present advised, recommend, until the principles on which they are to be founded shall have been fully considered by the Synods of the Church, and shall have received their general approval.

"It must always be remembered that parochial boards, however constituted, can only properly be regarded as a portion of a still further development of conciliar Church government. But this development can only be brought about by degrees, and by the steady progress of organised growth."

Parochiale.—A book of occasional offices for parish priests.

Parsees.—Parseeism was the religion of Iran or Persia. Its origin is wrapped in obscurity; even the date of Zoroaster, or Zarathustra, is fixed variously between 500 or 600 B.C. and 1200 B.C. The fundamental doctrines probably were formed 2,000 years B.C., whilst Persians and Hindoos were still one nation, and before the Veda existed, which is generally fixed at 1,500 years B.C. The first historic record is found in the arrow-head inscriptions of about 516 B.C., in which Darius Hystaspes figures as a disciple of the prophet, and ascribes his victories to Ormuzd. At the present time there is but a small congregation of Parsees living in Yazd and Kirmān, the rest have emigrated. There are many points of similarity to be found in the Jews and Parsees: both are monotheists, both are exiles, and both are followers of an ancient sacred law.

The book which contains their creed is called Avesta, which comes from the same root as Veda—vid, "to know," and thus means "law and revelation." It is sometimes improperly called Zend-Avesta; zend means a "commentary" or "glossary," which accompanied each part of the book as a help to the understanding. The Avesta was not the work of only one man or time; some of it is said to date back to between the seventh and fourth centuries before Christ, and some as late as the fourth century after. It is divided into the Yaena, which includes five gāthas, or hymns, written in a dialect resembling Vedic Sanscrit and probably very ancient; the Vendidad, which means "given against the demons," and contains the laws; the Visparad, meaning "chiefs," a collection of prayers; and other sections with special prayers. The Avesta doctrine came to Persia through Media by the Magi—some of that race who were the first Gentiles to worship the infant Saviour. It became the ruling religion of Persia in A.D. 226 under Ardeshir, the first Sassanide monarch, and it remained so till 642, when the Persian kingdom came to an end. Then many Persians accepted the Koran; yet a small remnant remained, and were the progenitors of the modern community of Indian Parsees. Some went to India, in 716, and settled in the northern part.

Besides being monotheistic, Parseeism is dualistic. It teaches the existence of two principles, always at war with each other—light and darkness, good and evil—under the names of ORMUZD or AHURA-MAZDA, and AHRIMAN. These two were supposed to be living in different parts of the universe with immense space separating them, till, each becoming aware of the existence of the other, a fierce war was waged between them. Ormuzd commenced creating spirits suitable to his purposes against his enemy, and then Ahriman created evil spirits to counteract their influence. Ormuzd next made the stars and planets, and when the earth was finished he placed it between himself and Ahriman; but the latter bored a hole through the earth and placed some of his bad spirits on it. Henceforth the earth became the arena of the struggle between good and evil. Zoroaster was then created by Ormuzd to oppose Ahriman. The struggle is to last for 12,000 years. Each man is to live his allotted time on the earth, there to determine his ultimate happiness; for the Parsee believes in the resurrection of the dead, and in a state of final blessedness. Fifty-seven years before the end of the world—which is to be brought about by collision with a comet—Sôshyana, of the direct seed of Zoroaster, will appear, and prepare the dead for the new life to begin. Then sinners are to be purified to join the blessed by living three days in molten lead. Ahriman is to vanish for ever.

The Parsees are worshippers of fire; their sacred altar-fire is never allowed to go out, and is fed chiefly with sandal-wood; their domestic fire is also sacred. They never smoke, and are very particular about bodily defilement: contact with a dead body is the greatest source of defilement, and needs special forms of purification. Their corpses are exposed to be the food of vultures on a dakhma, or "tower of silence," and then the bones only fall into a pit below; to inter a corpse is punishable by death. The priesthood was formerly confined to one family, but is not now so limited. Their service is divided thus: first, hymns and offering of sacrifices, which consist of small cakes and homa, the juice of a plant said to be very effectual against evil spirits; secondly, hymns, and reading of parts of the Vendidad; and then of hymns and prayers. The young Parsee becomes a member of the congregation at the age of seven, when, with sundry ceremonies, he or she is invested with a woollen cord, called a kuati, or sacred girdle, which is always worn, and implies irrevocable consecration to the faith of Zoroaster. Marriage is looked on as a very sacred tie, and is contracted between persons of the nearest kindred. The Parsees never make converts. They have translated the Vendidad into the dialect Gujerati, which, since their settlement in India, has been their mother tongue.

From the seventeenth century the Parsees have been the middle-men in India between English, French, and other European nations and their native customers. In 1881, of 100,000 worshippers of Zoroaster, one half were found to be in Bombay, which largely owes its prosperity to them. They are great promoters of education, and have English taught in all their schools; they have done much towards female enfranchisement. They are extremely charitable, and very loyal to the British Crown.

In 1771 Anquetil Duperron published a French translation of the Avesta, and Professor Max Müller has edited the translation in The Sacred Books of the East.

Parson [from Lat. persona].—The incumbent of a parish church. So called because he represents the church and parish, and in the eye of the law is the chief person thereof. In any action touching the same he would be the person to sue or be sued.

Parsonage.—Strictly speaking a parish church, with the house and land belonging to it; but generally used to denote the house appointed for the residence of the incumbent, and belonging to the church. The residences of the clergy have gone through many changes, undoubtedly, before attaining their present substantially equal character. In the Middle Ages many churches were served from neighbouring monasteries; in such case the priest walked over each day, entered the chancel by the priest's door, took the vestments, books, vessels, etc., out of the aumbries, and having robed himself in the presence of the congregation, began the service. If the distance was greater, he passed the night in the church, so as to be ready for the morning service. The "parvis," or room over the porch, which is found so often in old churches, was fitted as a priest's chamber. Sometimes he had a lodging in the tower, and occasionally the room which was so used is found in old churches with its fireplace still remaining. In this Parson's Room were generally stored the records of the manorial courts—documents of no small importance, inasmuch as they included evidence of land transfers; the only evidence indeed forthcoming in a simple state of society, when elaborate conveyancing was unknown.

In consequence of the clergy being celibate, and their frequent residence within the walls of the religious houses, very few specimens indeed remain of mediæval parsonages. Those that still exist have been so altered that nothing can be known accurately about their original character. In all cases they were, no doubt, small and lowly. The wealth of the Church was stored in the monasteries. And yet the parson was styled "Sir." In the parish church of Margate are brasses of two priests of the fifteenth century who are styled "Sir Thomas Smyth" and "Sir Thomas Cardyff." That the country priests were poor and lowly appears from Chaucer's account of the Parson in his "Prologue," and in the town we have just named records show that the parson of the parish church held a much lower social position than the "Prior of Salmestone," a religious house within the parish. Some mediæval parsonages in the border counties were constructed with walls suitable for the enclosure of cattle, and intended for them to be driven into on the outbreak of one of the frequent border frays.

For some time after the Reformation the parsonages seem to have been still humble dwellings. The vicious habit of non-residence did not tend to improve them. The pluralist rectors who lived at their canopies or in their fattest parsonages, and left the rest to their poor curates, could not but contribute to the depression of the social condition of the clergy as a body. Lord Macaulay's famous description of the "Levites" of the days of Charles II. is, no doubt, an exaggeration if applied to the whole body. There was no lack of learning as well as of moral worth even in the darkest days, but as a rule it would seem that the resident clergy were of humble rank and manners. Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield is very popular with us all. And if it be objected to him on one hand that he is far behind his successors of these days in social condition, it may be said on the other that he is of simpler tastes. Just the same thing may be said of the country gentry or the country shopkeepers. We have all moved on since the days of Dr. Primrose. What may be regarded as still more remarkable is that all through the charming story there is not a hint anywhere of any sort of parochial ministration. The country parsonage has certainly become more of a parish rendezvous since then. Even down to the present century it was considered out of the question that a clergyman of good family should live among his people. The law of the present day requires residence; the incomes of the clergy are more equalised, and a far larger number have a competence. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have done much to provide residences by making grants from the funds at their disposal for the purpose.

Parsons, REV. [PERSONS.]

Partial Indulgence, in the Roman Church, is the remission of only a part of the punishment due to forgiven sins. An indulgence granted as plenary will, if there be an obstacle to its full effect, be only partially obtained. [INDULGENCES; PLENARY INDULGENCES.]

Partibus, BISHOPS IN.—A title given to bishops holding foreign titles, who have been employed on special duties in England. Sometimes they served monasteries which were exempt from diocesan jurisdiction, sometimes they were consecrated for the help of infirm diocesans. Cnut, and his successors, introduced Danish bishops for their own countrymen. Bishop Stubbs gives a list of not less than sixty-two Irish bishops who acted as suffragans of English dioceses. There are bishops named in the same learned and valuable work as assisting at English consecrations and exercising other functions, of Damascus, of Laodicea, of Corbavia (in Dalmatia), of Sardinia, of Scutari, of Nazareth, etc., etc. [Stubbs's Registrum, pp. 142-149.] During the great Papal Schism the rival parties had bishops, and some of these occur in the records of episcopal work in England. After the Reformation it became unlawful for any Roman Catholic bishop to hold any English territorial title, and consequently these prelates became "bishops in partibus." Thus Dr. Wiseman, who had charge of London, etc., was known as "Bishop of Melipotamus in partibus infidelium." The event known as the Papal Aggression in 1850 was the reconstitution of England by the Pope into new sees, when Dr. Wiseman was appointed Archbishop of Westminster. The Ecclesiastical Titles Bill was passed, making it penal to use this title, but it has since been repealed, and, therefore, the Roman bishops are no longer called bishops in partibus.

Particular Baptists. [BAPTISTS.]

Pasagians.—A sect which appeared in Lombardy towards the close of the twelfth century, and which grew out of a mixture of Judaism and Christianity. They continued to observe the whole of the Mosaic Law except the sacrifices, and denied the equality of the Trinity. They were also sometimes called Circumcisi. The name "pasagians" is derived either from passagieri, "birds of passage," from the wandering life they led; or from pasagium, "journey," a word which was often used to designate pilgrimages to the Holy Sepulchre, and more particularly the Crusades.

Pascal, BLAISE [b. 1623, d. 1662], born at Clermont, in Auvergne, the son of Stephen Pascal, of an old and distinguished family. His father had four children, of whom only Blaise and two sisters grew to maturity. One sister survived to write her brother's life, the other took the veil in the convent of Port Royal. Their mother dying in 1626, Stephen Pascal gave up his offices in Auvergne and went to live at Paris, where he spent his time in carefully educating his children. It was a time of much fermentation of thought, the time of transition from the old philosophy to the new. Bacon died the same year as young Pascal's mother. His Novum Organum, published six years before, was no less than an epoch in the history of science. Mathematics and natural philosophy were cultivated in Italy, England, and France. Stephen Pascal became a geometrician, and cultivated the society of the ablest men in Parisian society; they met in each other's houses, and opened correspondence with other philosophers, and kept abreast of all discoveries which were being made in physics. This was the origin of the Academy of Sciences in 1666.

Young Pascal used to attend these conferences, and to listen eagerly. When only eleven years old he wrote a treatise on sounds, in which he sought to explain why a plate struck with a knife gives forth a sound which a touch of the hand stops. His father feared that this taste might interfere with his study of languages, and decided that mathematics should not form the subject of conversation when his friends came. Blaise was in such grief that his father promised him that after he had learned Greek and Latin he would teach him geometry, telling him generally that it comprised the measurement of bodies, in length, breadth, and thickness, and taught him to make them in a just and precise manner. Meditating on these definitions the boy, by comparing the position of lines, and inventing a nomenclature of his own, for he knew not the names of the figures which he secretly drew on the floor, arrived at many truths enunciated by Euclid. One day his father surprised him just as he had, by his unaided study, arrived at the discovery that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles. In delight he resolved to throw no more obstacles in his way, and gave him a Euclid, which he very soon mastered, and was recognised as a worthy member of the council of savans. By the time he was sixteen he had written a treatise on conic sections, which excited the admiration of the great Des Cartes, and from that time onwards he continued to make astonishing progress.

But about the year 1647, while living at Rouen, whither his father had removed six years before, Pascal began to be deeply moved by religious anxieties. He felt that intellectual pursuits did not satisfy his soul's needs, that without communion with the Infinite the soul cannot find peace. A friend lent him the works of Arnauld [PORT ROYALISTS], and from that time Christianity, which had been little in his thoughts, became an intense reality to him, and he succeeded by his earnestness in converting his father and sisters to his own views and principles. In 1652 his father died; one sister was already married, and the other, Jacqueline, went to Port Royal, and Pascal returned to Paris. For a while he gave himself to his studies, but his health, always feeble, quite broke down, and his physicians forbade him to continue them. The result was that he gave himself to society and amusements, to the grief of his sister Jacqueline, who entreated him to withdraw from the world. So far from acquiescing he was meditating marriage, when a narrow escape from being hurled into the Seine from a runaway carriage was accepted by him as a warning to turn from the world. From that time he sought the close friendship of those who were connected with the Abbey of Port Royal, then at the height of its fame. The publication in 1656, by Arnauld, of two letters in favour of Jansen [JANSENISTS] increased the rage of the Jesuits against him, and they moved for his expulsion from the Sorbonne. While the case was pending Pascal wrote the first of his Provincial Letters in his friend's defence. It was so well received that he wrote the rest, eighteen in all. Their popularity was amazing; full of wit and irony, yet of reverence and eloquence, Voltaire said of them, "They are models of eloquence and pleasantry. The best comedies of Molière have not more fun, Bossuet is not more sublime."

This was Pascal's last complete work. He meditated an apologetic treatise on Christianity, but his physical sufferings were so agonising that he was only able to jot down from time to time on separate pieces of paper thoughts which he intended to elaborate. But excruciating headaches, borne with beautiful patience, prevented his going further. From the age of eighteen he had never been a day without suffering, yet he had attained the rank of a first-rate mathematician, and had written his brilliant Provincial Letters before he died at the early age of thirty-nine.

Seven years after his death his jotted notes were published under the title of Thoughts.

Paschal Controversies [Gr. pascha, "passover"].—These were controversies which arose in the middle of the second century on the question of the proper date for keeping Easter. The term "pascha" was in the first ages of the Church applied to the anniversary of our Saviour's death [cf. 1 Cor. v. 7]. After a time Easter became included in this term, but at length the "pascha," as an ecclesiastical term, was confined to Easter alone, Good Friday being excluded. The Churches in Asia Minor used to celebrate the Paschal Supper, or anniversary of the Crucifixion, on the 14th day of the month of Nisan, the date of the Jewish Passover; and three days later they kept Easter, regardless of what day of the week it fell upon. The practice of Rome, and of the majority of the Churches, was always to keep Easter on the Sunday, and the Paschal Supper on its eve. The former custom—called the "quartodeciman," from its being kept on the fourteenth day—was claimed as derived from St. John and St. Philip; the latter from St. Peter and St. Paul. About the year 158 Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, visited Anicetus, Bishop of Rome, and discussed this question with him in a friendly spirit; the result was that it was agreed that a difference of practice was allowable on this point. But about the year 196, Victor, Bishop of Rome, sought to enforce uniformity of practice, by threatening to cut off communion with the Asiatic Churches unless they submitted to the Western custom. His efforts, however, were doomed to failure. Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, writing on behalf of the Asiatics, refused to yield to Victor, and when the latter sought to cut off so large a body of people from Christian communion he was opposed by many Western bishops, among others by Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons. In 314 the Council of Arles decreed that Easter should in all places be kept "on one day, and at one time;" but the Council had no jurisdiction in the East, and therefore did not affect the Asiatics. But in the Council of Nicaea the bishops from Asia Minor consented to conform to the Western and more general custom of keeping Easter; and although individual congregations resisted this surrender, yet the controversy was then at an end, and by the sixth century all traces of the Quartodecimans had disappeared.

Paschal Festival, or Easter, observed in commemoration of the Resurrection of our Lord, is regarded as the chief among the great festivals of the Church. From primitive times it has been the occasion of great rejoicing. Some ancient writers give to Easter Sunday the name of Dominicæ gaudii, "the Lord's day of joy." Public games and shows were interdicted in order that the festival might be generally celebrated with rejoicings of a religious character. Easter was the most usual time for the administration of baptism; and while this was administered with peculiar solemnity, the other offices and rites of the Church were celebrated with special manifestations of joyfulness and praise. The general joy was further increased by the custom of releasing from prison all except the worst offenders, and also by the choice made of this season as a suitable one in which to give freedom to slaves, and to do special acts of kindness and liberality to the poor.

Paschal II. was the successor in the Papacy of Gregory VII. [1099], and carried on that Pontiff's warfare against the Emperor Henry IV., not with entire success. That Emperor died in 1106, and was succeeded by his son, Henry V., who, though he was pledged to support the Pope, became a fierce opponent. After much struggling Henry was so far victorious that he took Paschal prisoner, forced him to crown him, and to acknowledge the Imperial right of investiture. These concessions so angered the clergy that they demanded the annulling of the oath, but Paschal remained faithful to it. Thereupon several Synods pronounced sentence of excommunication against the Emperor. The latter marched upon Rome, fearing the Pope would give way. Paschal fled from the city, and soon afterwards died [1118].

Paschasius Radbertus.—A celebrated divine. His family name was Rathbert, but, following the custom of the time in which he lived, he added a Latin to a barbarian name. He was born at Soissons at the end of the eighth century, and was educated in the monastery of Notre Dame in the same town. He received the tonsure there, but for some reason, which is not very clear, he gave up the religious for the secular life. But this did not last long. Under the influence of Abelard, Abbot of Corbie, he took full vows, and from that time devoted himself to the work of the monastery. He was one of the chief instructors, and spent much time in studying the writings of the early Christian Fathers. In 822, under the direction of Paschasius, a new monastery was founded, of which, on the death of Abelard in 826, he became the Abbot. He now began to write. In 830 he published the Life of Abelard, his master and patron, and in the following year wrote a tract, teaching a doctrine which has since become one of the principal articles of faith in the Roman Church—that of Transubstantiation. He maintained [1] that the Eucharist is the true Body and Blood of Christ, [2] that no trace of the substances of bread and wine remain after the consecration, [3] that it is the same flesh that was born of the Virgin Mary. He quoted in this tract passages from the writings of Cyprian, Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostom, and several others which he considered supported his theory. As was natural, such a startling doctrine was the cause of much and fierce controversy. The most famous of Paschasius's opponents was Frudegard, who is supposed by some writers to have been one of the monks of Corbie. Another monk, Ratram, addressed a long letter to the King, Charles the Bald, on the subject, trying to prove that the two first arguments put forth by Paschasius were sound, but that he was unable to agree with the third. Paschasius's other works were commentaries on the Lamentations of Jeremiah, the 44th Psalm, and on St. Matthew's Gospel.

Passalorynchites [from the Greek passalos, "a gag," and rynchos, "a muzzle"].—A branch of the MONTANISTS [q.v.] who never spoke, and kept their fingers constantly upon their mouths. They grounded their practice on the words of the Psalmist, "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips" [Ps. cxli. 3]. They arose in the second century, and St. Jerome testifies that even in his time he found some of them in Galatia as he travelled to Ancyra.

Passau, Treaty of.—This was a famous treaty of pacification with the Protestants, gained for them in 1552 from Charles V., by Maurice, Elector of Saxony. It is considered by the German Protestants as the basis of their religious liberty. By the three first articles it was stipulated that Maurice and the confederates should lay down their arms and should lend their troops to Ferdinand of Hungary to defend him against the Turks, and that the Landgrave of Hesse, who had been treacherously imprisoned, should be set at liberty. In the fourth it was agreed that the Rule of Faith called INTERIM [q.v.] should be considered as null and void; that the contending parties should enjoy the free and undisturbed exercise of their religion, until a diet should be assembled to determine amicably the present disputes; and that this religious liberty should continue always, in case that it should be found impossible to come to an uniformity in doctrine and worship. Also that the Imperial Chamber at Spire should be open to the Protestants as well as to the Catholics, and that there should always be a certain number of the Lutheran persuasion at that high court.

Passing-bell.—The custom of tolling a bell on the death of a person is a very ancient one. The sound of the bell calls for the prayers of the faithful on behalf of the dying person. The usage is referred to by the Venerable Bede, and is thus directed by Canon 67:—"When any person is passing out of this life, a bell shall be tolled, and the minister shall not then slack to do his last duty."

Passionarius.—An Office-book containing the lessons on the sufferings and death of martyrs.

Passionists, THE, or "Congregation of the Discalced Clerks of the Most Holy Cross and Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ." This Order was founded by St. Paul of the Cross, who was born near Genoa in 1694; devoted himself to a religious life, and founded the Order in 1720, with the sanction of Monsignor Gastinara, Bishop of Alexandria. In the following year he went to Rome to obtain the Pope's sanction, and having been detained there some years, during which he was ordained priest, the first monastery of the new Order was established at Monte Argentaro in 1737. The rules of the society were confirmed by Benedict XIV. in 1741, and again by Clement XIV. in 1769. St. Paul died at SS. Giovanni e Paolo, on the Cœlian Hill, in 1775. The Order spread after the founder's death, and first obtained a footing in this country in 1842. There are now five Passionist houses in England, two in Ireland, and one in Scotland. The Order was introduced into the United States in 1862, and they now have six houses there.

The Passionists fast three days in every week, besides Advent and Lent. In addition to the three usual vows they take a fourth: that they will do their utmost to keep alive in the hearts of the faithful the memory of our Lord's Passion. Their dress is black, with the name of Christ printed on the left side, and a small heart suspended from the neck with a white cross upon it.

Passion Sunday.—The fifth Sunday in Lent; the second Sunday before Easter. It is so called because the commemoration of our Lord's Passion begins with the Gospel for the day. In the north of England it is frequently called Carling Sunday, and celebrated by the eating of parched peas or "carlings." An old rhyme thus refers to the Sundays in Lent and Easter Day:

"Tid, Mid, Misere Carling, Palm, and paste (i.e., pasch) egg day."

The last week in Lent is popularly known as Passion Week. [HOLY WEEK.] From the earliest times it has been observed with greater strictness than the rest of the fast. The whole story of the Passion is read in the lessons for this week. The term seems to have been anciently applied to the fortnight before Easter, so that the Passion week began with Passion Sunday instead of with Palm Sunday. The word is used in this larger sense by the Council of Laodicea.

Pastophoria.—In the Eastern Church, small buildings attached to churches near the east end, to receive objects connected with the altar; in fact, the same as the sacristy.

Pastor [Lat. "a shepherd"].—A term widely applied to members of all orders of the ministry, as "shepherds" of Christ's flock.

It was restricted by Archbishop Laud to the episcopal order, and is used in this narrower sense by the Prayer Book in the first Ember prayer, and in the first Collect in the form for the consecration of bishops.

Pastorale.—A book of occasional Offices relating to confession and other pastoral duties of clergy of the Church of Rome.

Pastoral Letter.—A letter written by a bishop to his diocese.

Pastoral Staff or Crosier.—A bishop's official emblem. It is a long staff with a hook at the end, like a shepherd's crook, and is the symbol of the bishop's pastoral authority over his flock. It is frequently beautifully decorated with gold and jewels, and sometimes has a small banner or sudarium attached to the upper part. It was formerly borne by bishops and abbots. A bishop carried it in his left hand, with the crook turned outwards, to indicate his authority over his diocese; an abbot in his right hand, with the crook turned inwards, to signify his jurisdiction over the members of his house. In the Prayer Book of 1549 the use of the pastoral staff is enjoined as follows:—"Whosoever the bishop shall celebrate the Holy Communion in the church, or execute any other public ministration, he shall have. . . his pastoral staff in his hand, or else borne or holden by his chaplain."

Pastoral Theology.—That branch of the science of theology which has reference to the intercourse of the minister with his people. In his study he is to become acquainted with the Scriptures and the doctrines of the Church; in his pastorate he has to apply what he has learned to the varying needs of his flock, in the ministry of the Word and the Sacraments. Such work involves, primarily, visitation of the sick, pastoral converse and guidance, teaching in schools, preparation of candidates for confirmation, communicants' classes, enlisting lay co-operation and guiding it, attention to clubs and other parochial institutions, as well as to parish festivals, and endeavouring to sanctify all by the name of the Lord Jesus.

The discharge of these duties involves questions concerning which difference of opinion is sure to exist. Thus the preface of the Prayer Book requires the minister "being at home, and not being otherwise reasonably hindered," to say the morning and evening prayers in church. Now certainly there can be little doubt that the daily service ought to be said where there is a prospect of its being regularly maintained and fairly attended. Probably few English towns now are without a daily service in one of the churches. But in parishes where the clergyman is single handed, it may fairly be pleaded for him that he is reasonably hindered. When he has once begun he will be unwilling to let it be interrupted on account of indisposition or absence from home, and thus it threatens to be a strain on his health and a restraint on his needful recreation. The religious teaching in schools claims much attention, but most of all the great increase of population makes pastoral work much heavier than it was three centuries ago. Moreover, in religious families of the upper classes (and the poor cannot find time to leave their daily labour) family prayers have taken the part of the Church service, and these have the advantage of bringing together the whole household.

The following books on Pastoral Theology may be recommended: Blunt's Duties of the Parish Priest, Evans's Bishopric of Souls, Sandford's Parochialia, How's Pastor in Parochia, and A Manual of Pastoral Visitation.

Paten, Patena, or Discus.—The plate or vessel on which the consecrated bread of the Eucharist is placed, from which it is distributed to the communicants.

Paterines.—The origin of the name is unknown, but some suppose it to come from "pateria," which signifies in the Milanese dialect a popular faction, and that the opponents of the clergy were so called because of their popularity. But the name was also given to a branch of the Manicheans who migrated from Bulgaria to Italy in 1046. They taught that matter was essentially evil, condemned marriages, and set at nought Church authority. They are supposed to be the same as the PERFECTI [q.v.] and are also identified with the Cathari or Puritans who infected Languedoc at the end of the twelfth century.

Pater Noster.—The Lord's Prayer. These are the first two words of the Lord's Prayer in Latin.

Patriarch.—This title, borrowed from the Jews, was originally given to all bishops. But, by the fifth century, the title had become restricted to the bishops of a few of the most eminent cities of the Empire, who exercised some jurisdiction over the other metropolitans of their district. The term is first used in this confined sense by the ecclesiastical historian Socrates, A.D. 440, and authoritatively by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. The Bishops of Rome, Alexandria and Antioch, as the heads of Churches of Apostolic foundation, claimed the title in a special sense; but with these were generally associated the Bishops of Constantinople and Jerusalem, the former from the political, and the latter from the religious, importance of his See. The powers of the patriarchs varied in different parts. They presided at the local councils, and claimed the right of consecrating, and sometimes also of nominating, the metropolitans and inferior bishops of their province, and, in fact, exercised the supervision of their district generally.

Patriarchate.—The district under the jurisdiction of a patriarch.

Patrick, Sr.—The Apostle of Ireland. According to St. Patrick himself, who mentions the fact in his Confession, he was born at Bonavem of Taberniae, a locality which is probably to be identified with Kilpatrick, in Scotland. Another passage in the Confession gives the date as close to the end of the fourth century; but there is some doubt about the genuineness of this, and several writers place the birth some years earlier. His father's name was Calpornius, and he was a man of good family. His mother's name was Conchessa, who, tradition says, was a niece of St. Martin of Tours. His parents were both Christians, and took great pains with the education of their boy, though at first their efforts seem to have been attended with little result. The country at that time was infested by brigands and robbers, a gang of whom carried off Patrick from his father's ground when only sixteen. He was taken to Ireland and sold as a slave, his master obliging him to spend his whole time, no matter what the weather might be, in tending the cattle on the mountains. After enduring terrible hardships for six months, he succeeded in making his escape. He went directly to the sea in the hopes of getting back to his native land. He found a ship, but was not allowed to go aboard in consequence of having no money. He turned away in despair; but, though heathens, the sailors took pity on him and gave him a free passage. Three days after they landed him in Scotland, but at the extreme north, so that he was obliged to wander about for some time, always in danger of being again taken prisoner. He at last reached home, and was left at peace for a time. Meanwhile he had a dream in which he was told that he had been chosen as God's messenger for the conversion of Ireland. His movements about this time are uncertain, because the different writers of his life do not agree in many particulars. Some say that he travelled a great deal on the Continent before beginning his missionary duties. His own account, however, if we could be sure that the passage is genuine, says that he was ordained in Scotland, and spent many years there in retirement as the best means of preparing himself for his great work. Probably this is quite correct. His parents and friends were greatly opposed to his taking orders, and tried by every means in their power to dissuade him. Some urged that he would thereby expose himself to unnecessary dangers from the heathen, others that, owing to faults committed in his youth, he was unworthy of such a holy office. But he remained true to the vision he had seen, believing that he had a mission to the Irish from God. He found the whole country given up to idolatry, and immediately set himself earnestly to work. He was of a fearless disposition, and used to venture into the most wild districts. At all the places where he stopped to preach, he left behind converts to carry on the work, returning again afterwards to ordain clergy and establish a Church. His labours were crowned with greater success than he could have expected. He was not, however, entirely free from opposition. His most notable opponent was a Prince of Wales named Corotick. As far as we can make out from the accounts which are extant, Corotick must have invaded Ireland and come upon Patrick engaged on one of his missionary journeys. While Patrick was holding a confirmation, Corotick attacked the congregation, and carried many of them away captive.

Patrick fixed his See in later years at Armagh, which still ranks as the metropolitan See of Ireland, and he established other bishoprics in different parts of the country. He also presided over several councils which met to settle the discipline of the Church. Some of the edicts issued by him still remain to us. He died at Down in Ulster, at what date is uncertain [492 is the generally received one], having baptised the Kings of Dublin and Munster, and converted the whole island, with the exception of a few insignificant parts, to Christianity.

His Confession, to which we have already made reference, appears to be unquestionably a genuine document, though there are variations in some of the manuscripts which throw doubt on particular passages. A copy kept at Armagh claims to be transcribed from the original. Much controversy surrounds his teaching. Thus, while the Roman Catholics assert that he was a devoted son of their Church, opposing theologians strenuously deny this. The late Bishop Wordsworth did so, maintaining that St. Patrick knew nothing of Papal authority, of Transubstantiation, or of Worship of the Virgin.

Patrick, Simon, author of many excellent works in practical divinity and expository theology, was born at Gainsborough in 1626. He was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow in 1648. He was ordained by Dr. Hall, the ejected Bishop of Norwich, in 1651, and became successively Vicar of Battersea [1658], Rector of Covent Garden [1662], Prebendary of Westminster Abbey [1672], Dean of Peterborough [1679], Bishop of Chichester [1689], and of Ely [1691]. He died in 1707. The writings which form the foundation of Bishop Patrick's fame are his commentaries, which appeared from 1678-1705. He also wrote Heart's Ease, Parable of the Pilgrim, Exposition of the Ten Commandments, The Friendly Debate, The Christian Sacrifice, The Devout Christian, The Sacraments, The Popish Controversy, etc. He is considered as one of the Cambridge Latitudinarians, and as inclined to Platonism.

Patripassians [from Pater passus, "the suffering Father"].—A name given to one class among the MONARCHIANS [q.v.] who, denying the existence of any duality in God, affirmed that the Father, the one primary Principle, must have suffered on the cross. The leader of the party was Praxeas, who came, in the second century, from Asia Minor, the birthplace of Monarchianism, as an antagonist of Montanism. He went to Rome, and induced the Roman Bishop (either Eleutherius or Victor) to excommunicate the Montanists of Asia Minor. He next went to Carthage, where he was opposed by Tertullian, who wrote a treatise against him. The doctrine of Praxeas was one of those infinite shades of distinction which spring from the contests in the early Church on that paramount doctrine of Christianity—the nature of Christ and His relation to the primal and paternal Godhead.

Patronage.—The right to present a clergyman to a living; i.e. to nominate him to the bishop for the purpose of institution. This right was originally confined to the bishop of the diocese; but in the Council of Orange [A.D. 441] it was enacted that one who built a church might be allowed the presentation to it, and by a law of Justinian [A.D. 541] it was laid down that the founders of churches and their heirs should enjoy the privilege of nominating the incumbents; provided always [1] that a sufficient maintenance were provided for the clerk, [2] that the bishop approved of the nominee. The system soon became general throughout the West. It was introduced into England by Archbishop Theodore [A.D. 668-90]. Abuses, as was natural, gradually crept in. Churches were sometimes built as a profitable speculation, the builder taking the offerings and allowing to the incumbent a fixed income, while he appropriated the surplus to his own use. Occasionally the right of presentation was divided among several heirs, which led to a division of the living into a like number of parts, each held by a separate clerk. Frequently the patron claimed the right of introducing or ejecting a priest without any reference to the bishop; whilst, on the other hand, the bishop sometimes unreasonably refused to institute the patron's nominee. Against such practices, frequent canons and laws were directed; bishops were prohibited from consecrating churches built for profit; the partition of livings was put a stop to; the bishop's consent was made a condition of induction; and bishops were forbidden to withhold that consent except for valid reasons.

Instead of being regarded merely as a trust, patronage came to be considered as a vested right, and therefore as saleable property, which might be sold either with the estate or as a separate property. In England, the perpetual right of presentation is called an "advowson;" if appended to an estate, it is an "advowson appendant;" if a property by itself, it is an "advowson in gross." Of late the abuses of patronage have been the subject of much discussion, and it is proposed to bring in a Church Patronage Bill, which may cause very great changes. [REFORMS OF THE CHURCH.]

Patteson, JOHN COLERIDGE, D.D. [b. in London, April 1st, 1827; murdered Sept. 20th, 1871], Bishop of Melanesia. He was the son of the judge, Sir John Patteson; was educated at Eton, and afterwards studied at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became Fellow in 1850. After holding a curacy in Devonshire for some time, he went, in 1855, to New Zealand, to work under Bishop Selwyn, and he was so successful in missionary work that in 1861 he was consecrated Bishop of Melanesia. He had great talent as a linguist, and succeeded in reducing various languages which as yet had only been spoken into an elementary form of writing. In work he was indefatigable, and in times of sickness would nurse the people himself, while his linguistic talent was of immense help to him in teaching and understanding them. While crossing from one of the islands of his diocese to another his ship was attacked by the natives and himself killed; probably the ship was mistaken for one of the kidnapping ships which had from time to time come to the islands to carry off slaves to Queensland and the Fiji Islands.

Paul.—The name of five Popes. PAUL I. [757] is noticeable as living at the time of the Lombard invasion, and as having to play a double part between Desiderius the Lombard King and Pepin of France.

PAUL II. [1464-71].—A worldly Pontiff, who, instead of withstanding the inroads of the Turks in the Mediterranean, devoted himself to pleasure and luxury, and excommunicated Podiebrad, King of Bohemia, the strongest opponent of the Turk, for keeping faith with the Utraquists.

PAUL III. [ALEXANDER FARNESE] was appointed Cardinal by the wicked Pope Alexander VI., who held unhallowed relations with his sister. He failed twice before he succeeded in his attempt on the tiara, succeeding Clement VII. in 1534. He was a man of shameful immorality. In his pontificate the Council of Trent began. Paul, who dreaded that the power of the Emperor Charles V. might be employed adversely to himself, secretly encouraged some acts of the Reformers, and was willing to grant the cup to the laity, marriage to the clergy, and to make some other concessions, but lacked the skill needful for such complicated intrigues, and was quite defeated.

PAUL IV. [JOHN CARAFFA], one of the most determined enemies of the Reformation, succeeded to the popedom in 1555. He had previously been instrumental in establishing the Inquisition in Rome, with a view of stopping the progress of the Reformation in Italy. He was a man of strict life and of determined will, and left his mark upon the whole future history of the Papacy.

PAUL V. [CAMILLO BORGHESSE].—His pontificate [1605-21] is marked by the Molinist controversy, in which he took the part of the Jesuits against the Dominicans. For imprisoning two priests, he laid Venice under an interdict, and endeavoured to excite Spain to make war upon the refractory State. But he entirely failed, and the Venetians defied him successfully, refusing to give up the prisoners. This was the last Papal interdict ever issued. His menaces against the English throne were not more successful, and a work by Mariana, written by his command, in favour of the murder of tyrannical kings, was burned in Paris by the hangman, by order of the French Parliament. To the city of Rome he was a kind and useful ruler.

Paul [b. about A.D. 230].—The first hermit. In order to avoid the persecutions which the Emperor Decius was carrying on against the Christians, Paul fled into the desert, and hid himself in a cave overshadowed by a palm-tree, and by the side of a spring of water. Here he is said to have lived for ninety years, and to have died at the age of 113. St. Antony visited him towards the close of his life; tradition says that his existence was manifested by a dream to St. Antony, who was miraculously guided to his cell, and was with him till Paul's death. He is supposed to have died on Jan. 10th, but his festival is celebrated on Jan. 15th.

Paul of Samosata was a heretic who succeeded Demetrius as Bishop of Antioch in 262. He not only taught heretical doctrines, but also assumed the manners of a Sophist, imitated the pomp of a secular judge, and led an impious and wicked life. A circular was sent round to the various Churches, and in 264 a Council assembled at Antioch, and Paul promised to renounce his erroneous doctrines; but he did not fulfil his promise, and six years after, another Council was held. Paul was deposed, and Domnus, son of his predecessor, Demetrius, was put in his place. Paul refused to obey the sentence, and was allowed to remain in his palace till 272, when the Emperor Aurelian forced him to leave. Paul denied with Sabellius the distinction of the Three Persons of the Trinity; and with Artemon taught that the Holy Ghost had descended into Christ, operated in Him, and then returned to the Father. He also held that there were two distinct Persons in our Saviour, the Word and Christ, who, he said, did not exist before Mary, but was called the Son of God as a reward for His holy works. Paul's followers were called Samosatians, or Paulinists. There were some at the Council of Nicea, and even as late as 428; but Theodoret tells us that in 450 they had entirely disappeared.

Paul the Deacon [b. about 720, d. about 800], son of Warnefried, who wrote the history of the Lombards. He was secretary to Desiderius, King of the Lombards, and educated his daughter Adelperga. Having taken orders, he went to the Court of Charlemagne, and remained with him for some years on very intimate terms. He returned in 787 to Monte Casino, in Italy, where he had formerly been secluded, and devoted the rest of his life to writing. He continued his father's History of the Lombards down to the death of Luidprand, in 744, and wrote for his pupil, Adelperga, a history of Rome, called Gesta Episcoporum Mettensium. He wrote also a Life of Gregory the Great and several poems, from one of which, on John the Baptist, the names of the notes in the musical scale were derived by Guido of Arezzo.

Paula, St.—A disciple of St. Jerome, a Roman lady who was descended from the families of the Scipios and Gracchi, and was therefore of the noblest and richest family in Rome. She married Toxotius, after whose death she left her children and property, and followed St. Jerome to the Holy Land. She retired to a cave at Bethlehem, founded there a monastery, nunnery, and hospital, and died in 404, after spending her life in voluntary poverty and devotion. She is commemorated by the Roman Catholic Church on Jan. 26th.

Paulicians.—A heretical sect which originated about the middle of the seventh century. It is uncertain from whom they derived their name, whether from one Paul of Samosata (the second of the name); from a Paul of Armenia, who was a prominent member of the sect at the beginning of the eighth century; or from the Apostle Paul himself, whose teaching they specially pretended to follow. There has been considerable controversy as to their doctrines, some maintaining that they were the exponents of reformed and Scriptural religion, and others denouncing them as Manichæans. Their opinions, however, as stated by Peter of Sicily and Photius, are decidedly heretical. They believed in two Gods—one, the Creator of this present world, and God of the Old Testament; the other, the Good One, the ruler of the world to come. They received the New Testament only, attaching particular authority to the Epistles of St. Paul and the Gospels of St. Luke and St. John. They rejected the Sacraments, and attacked the use of images and the growing veneration for the Virgin Mary. They considered it allowable to attend catholic churches, and to conceal their true views by equivocation and deceit.

The originator of the sect appears to have been a certain Constantine, a man of Manichæan family, who lived about the year 653 at Mananalis, a village near Samosata. It happened that a copy of the Gospels and Pauline Epistles came into his possession, which he diligently studied. His reading led him to renounce some of the errors of his hereditary belief, but did not prevent him from substituting others, and he produced a system which, though professedly in accordance with the New Testament, was really founded on a Manichæan basis. The new doctrines soon gained converts. Constantine settled at Kibossan, in Armenia, and assumed the name of Silvanus. Here he remained for twenty-seven years, until the year 684, when the Emperor, having heard of the progress of the sect, made an attack upon it. The Emperor's officer, Symeon, captured Constantine and a number of his followers, and ranging the latter in a line, ordered them to stone their leader. All but one refused, but by the hand of that one—his adopted son, Justus—the heresiarch fell. The officer, Symeon, however, struck with their constancy, began to inquire into the Paulician doctrines, with the result that he was converted, and succeeded Constantine as leader of the sect, under the name of Titus. About A.D. 690 the youth Justus became uneasy as to the truth of his religion, and, failing to obtain satisfaction from Symeon, applied to the Bishop of a neighbouring town. The Bishop informed the Emperor, Justinian II., of the tenets of the sect, and the latter exerted himself for its suppression. Justus, Symeon, and many others were burnt, and the remainder dispersed. But Paulicianism was not stamped out. A new leader arose in the person of the Armenian Paul, under whom it soon recovered its strength. But after his death, the sect grew corrupt, and sank lower and lower till about A.D. 801. It was then reformed by the exertions of Sergius, who had lately been converted to Paulicianism, and promoted to the headship under the name of Tycheus.

The disposition of the Emperors towards the sect had varied. Leo the Isaurian and Constantine Copronymus transported many of them to Thrace; Nicephorus granted them toleration; Michael Curopalates and Leo the Armenian fiercely persecuted them. The Empress Theodora [A.D. 844] undertook the suppression of the sect, and under her not less than a hundred thousand were killed in various ways. Amongst these was the father of Carbeas, a captain of the guard. Carbeas was so enraged at his father's death, that he deserted with 5,000 followers to the Saracens, by whom he was given the city of Tephrica and other places. Here he was joined by other Paulicians, and they soon became strong enough to menace the Empire. With the help of the Saracens, Carbeas defeated Michael; the son of the Empress, at Samosata, and this success was followed up by his son-in-law, Chrysocheres, who was able to force the Emperor Basil to beg for peace [A.D. 867]. But a few years after [A.D. 871] Chrysocheres was defeated and slain by one of Basil's generals, Tephrica was taken and destroyed, and the power of the sect overthrown. Paulicianism, however, was kept alive by those who had been settled in Thrace. From this centre it spread over Europe, and is heard of as late as the eleventh century.

Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, born at Bordeaux about 353, of noble parents, from whom he inherited great wealth. He spent his youth in careless enjoyment, was educated by Ausonius, and became Consul of Rome in 379. After his consulship he travelled, and made the acquaintance of St. Martin of Tours, St. Ambrose, and others, under whose influence he first turned his thoughts to religion, and was baptised by Delphinus, Bishop of Bordeaux, in 391. Having determined to devote himself to a religious life, he separated from his wife Therasia, sold his estate and divided his wealth among the poor, and was ordained presbyter at Barcelona in 393. He went to Nola in 394, and in 409, having made himself esteemed and venerated for his piety and asceticism, he was chosen bishop of that place. He died June 22nd, 431. Paulinus left a number of letters which are valuable for the descriptions of social life and the architecture of the time, and some of his poems have also been preserved.

Paulinus, Sr.—Paulinus, the first Archbishop of York, was sent to England by Gregory the Great, together with Mellitus and Justus, to help St. Augustine in converting the people of Kent to Christianity. He had laboured there for over twenty years, when Edwin, King of Northumbria, asked in marriage Ethelburga, daughter of Ethelbert. It was thought dangerous to send her away from home to a country where she would be surrounded by heathens on all sides without having some one by her side to protect her. It was, therefore, decided that Paulinus should accompany her, and he immediately devoted himself to the conversion of those among whom he lived. Before leaving the south he was consecrated Bishop by Justus, who was then Archbishop of Canterbury. He used all the arguments he could to persuade Edwin to become a Christian, but at first without any success. But at the beginning of the year 629 the King called together a meeting of the Witenagemote that all might freely discuss the strange doctrines preached by Paulinus. The result was that Edwin was baptised at York on Easter Day of the same year, and the heathen high priest was by far the most zealous of that assembly in pulling down the temples and images of the idols. From that time Paulinus was most successful in his efforts among the people of the north, and established the Church there on a very firm basis. About the year 630, Pope Honorius sent him a pallium, and constituted the Bishop of York the metropolitan of the north. Edwin was killed in battle in 633, and his widow retired into a nunnery on the sea-coast of Kent. Paulinus would not be separated from her, so resigned the See of York, and soon after, when Rochester fell vacant, was appointed Bishop of that diocese. He died in 644.

Paulists.—A name given to "The Congregation of the Missionary Priests of St. Paul the Apostle," founded at New York in 1858 by Isaac Thomas Hecker. The first members of the order had been REDEMPTORISTS [q.v.], but requested to be released from their fourfold vows in order to carry on mission-work in America. The head of the Order is Superior-General, but the rules are made by a general council of members, who are bound together by voluntary agreement.

Paulus, HEINRICH EBERHARD GOTTLÖB [b. 1761, d. 1851].—An eminent rationalistic theologian of Germany. He was born at Leonberg, near Stuttgart, studied at Tübingen, where he graduated in 1784. By the liberality of the Baron de Palm, he travelled in Franconia and Saxony to examine into the state of education, and then went to Göttingen to study Oriental languages, which he afterwards continued in London and Paris. In 1789 he was made Professor of Oriental Languages in the University of Jena. Here he occupied himself in explaining the Old and New Testament in a philological-historical manner, which he published as A Philological Key to the Psalms [1791], and Philological Key to Isaiah [1793], and his Critical and Historical Commentary on the New Testament [1800-4]. In 1793 he had been made Professor of Theology, but in 1803 his health obliged him to leave Jena, and he took the Chair of Theology at Würzburg; when that Chair was abolished, he led a roving life, going in 1808 to Bamberg, the following year to Nürnberg, and in 1811 to Aushach. That year he was called to the Chair of Exegesis and Ecclesiastical History at Heidelberg, and here he remained till his death. In 1819 he started a political and historical periodical called Sophronizon, in which he wrote essays on passing events of importance. He was a most voluminous writer, and few men have exercised a wider influence on religious opinion in Germany. His teaching was purely rationalistic; his criticisms on the Bible show a profound conviction that everything supernatural in it was either fabulous or to be accounted for by natural causes, and that the only true criticism was to try to prove this. He acknowledged the miraculous feature of Christ's moral character, but His miracles he said only appeared to be miraculous because all the circumstances attending them had not been handed down to us. His rationalistic views did not change with age, they remained as they were in 1790, and he lived to see them far outstripped by the mythical theory of Strauss. Amongst his many works we may mention his Reminiscences [1791-6], Collection of Wonderful Journeys in the East [1792-1803], Life of Jesus as a Basis for a History of Early Christianity [1828], Commentary on the Three First Gospels [1830-3], and Sketches of the History of my Life on Looking Back for Fifty Years [1839]. In 1844 he retired from his post with a pension.

Pax.—A metal plate, engraved with a crucifix, given to the people to kiss at the celebration of Mass. Owing to the confusion caused by the "kiss of peace," the Pax was introduced about the thirteenth century instead of the mutual salutation.

Pax vobis ["Peace be with you"].—The ancient salutation of the minister to the people, the latter answering, "And with thy spirit." The use of the mutual salutation dates from primitive times, and is referred to by St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine. It was used [1] by the bishop on entering the church; [2] by the reader on commencing the lessons; [3] by the preacher before and after his sermon; [4] by the celebrant before consecrating the elements; [5] by the deacon on dismissing the congregation. The third Council of Carthage forbade its use by the reader, and restricted it to the clergy proper. In the Anglican Church the salutation has taken the form of "The Lord be with you."

Pearce, ZACHARY [b. in London, 1690; d. at Little Ealing, 1774], was educated at Westminster School, and thence went to Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a classical scholar. He took orders in 1716, and became Chaplain to Lord Chief Justice Parker, through whose interest he was preferred successively to the livings of Stapleford Abbot's, in Essex; St. Bartholomew's, London, and St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. In 1739 Pearce became Dean of Winchester; in 1748, Bishop of Bangor, and in 1756, Bishop of Rochester and Dean of Westminster. He resigned the deanery later in order to devote more time to literary work. His publications were numerous, and included a commentary, with notes, on the four Evangelists and the Acts of the Apostles, together with a new translation of St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, first published in 1777; an edition of Cicero, De Oratore, and of Longinus; a review of the text of Paradise Lost, and The Miracles of Jesus Vindicated. He is buried in Bromley Church, Kent, and was a great benefactor to the college established there for the widows of the clergy. The inscription on his grave, written by himself, is characteristic of the calm self-complacency of his life. It states that "he resigned the Deanery of Westminster, and died in the comfortable hope of (what had been his chief object in life) being promoted to a happier sphere hereafter." Dean Stanley relates that he would have been persuaded into the removal of some of the most interesting tombs in Westminster Abbey, had it not been for the strong remonstrances of Horace Walpole.

Pearson, JOHN [b. at Snoring, in Norfolk, Feb. 12th, 1612; d. at Chester, July 16th, 1686].—One of the most important theologians of the English Church. After being educated at Eton he was admitted to King's College, Cambridge, of which he was made a Fellow, and became Prebendary of Sarum in 1639, and Chaplain to Lord-Keeper Finch in the following year. His reputation for learning and eloquence was so great that he received successively appointments as Incumbent of Torrington; Preacher at St. Clement's, Eastcheap; Rector of St. Christopher's, in London; Prebendary of Ely; Archdeacon of Surrey; Master of Jesus College, Cambridge; and, finally, Bishop of Chester, in 1672. Burnet declared that Pearson was the greatest divine of his age, and Dr. Bentley said of him, that his "very dross is gold." His chief work is his Exposition of the Creed, remarkable for the orthodoxy and moderation of its doctrines; the substance of it was first delivered as a series of lectures in St. Clement's, Eastcheap. It is still a standard work of English theology. He also wrote Vindiciæ Epistolarum S. Ignatii, which was long considered as the best work on the Ignatian epistles; Annales Paulini, and other minor theological works. He was present at the Savoy Conference, and assisted in the final revision of the Prayer Book.

Peckham, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Edward I. Educated at Oxford and Paris, he travelled to Rome, where he was appointed by the Pope to the post of Auditor of the Rota, which office he held till his promotion to the See of Canterbury, effected by the authority of the Pope. Here he set himself to reform abuses, and attempted to restore primitive discipline. Dr. Jessop gives some interesting proofs of his zeal in the account of his Visitation of the Diocese of Norwich. He died in 1291.

Peculiar People.—A sect, chiefly found in Kent, who have created much stir of late years by refusing to use medicine, or to adopt any natural means for recovery from sickness, placing their dependence entirely on prayer. Not long since, in consequence of a death which, according to medical evidence, might have been prevented by treatment, the persons responsible, who defended themselves on the ground here described, were convicted of manslaughter.

Peculiars.—Churches exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary of the diocese. They are:—[1] royal peculiars, e.g. the sovereign's free chapels, under the jurisdiction of the sovereign; [2] archbishop's, bishop's, dean's, chapter's peculiars, etc.; and, formerly, [3] peculiars of monasteries.

Pederecti ["feet erect"].—A name of the Eunomians, an Arian sect, followers of Eunomius, a disciple of Arius. Their baptismal rites were remarkable. They baptised by dipping the body as far as the breast, with the head downwards and feet erect. Hence their name.

Pelagianism.—Towards the close of the fourth century the heresy of Pelagianism took its rise in the Church of Britain. Pelagius [b. about 380, d. about 450]—the classic form of his British name of Morgan—was a priest of some learning, much of whose later life was spent at Rome, until that city was taken by Alaric and his Goths, when he went to Carthage for a time, and thence to Jerusalem. The substance of his heresy was the denial of original sin. He believed and taught that none but Adam himself received any damage from his sin; that we are born as holy as Adam was before his fall; and that we can live a holy life by the mere power of our own determination to do so, without the aid of supernatural grace from God. The great St. AUGUSTINE [not the English missionary, but the still greater Bishop of Hippo, a town in that part of Africa which is now called Algeria] was the chief opponent of this heresy, which seems only to have reached Britain—though invented by a native of the country—after it had been known for some years in Palestine and Africa. When it did arrive, the orthodox party in the British Church applied to the Church of France—not to the Church of Rome—for some persons of learning and discretion who might come across the Channel and assist in combating the heresy. Germanus and Lupus, Bishops of Auxerre and Troyes, were sent over for the purpose; and a conference was held between them and the Pelagians at St. Albans, in the presence of a great multitude. St. GERMAN, by his arguments in the conference, and by the fervid eloquence of his preaching, afterwards brought the greater part of his hearers back to the orthodox side.

Pelagius, POPES.—There have been two Popes of this name. The first [555-560] was seriously compromised by taking part in the Monophysite controversy, and supporting the Empress Theodora in her defence of it. He had been the main adviser of his predecessor Vigilius, but on being appointed his successor endeavoured to rid himself of the charge of heresy. But his success was very partial. [See Milman's Lat. Christ., i. 324.]

The second lived in the miserable days of the Lombard invasion. He endeavoured to reconcile the Monophysite strifes, but little heed was paid to him. He was succeeded by Gregory the Great.

Pelliccia, ALEXIUS, AURELIUS [b. 1744], was a native of Naples, and appears to have spent all his life there. For many years he was Public Teacher of Ethics and Archaeology in the university, and also Liturgical Professor in that congregation of presbyters which was called the "Conferenza." Finding in the discharge of his duties the need of a handy compendium of his subjects, he resolved on writing one for the young ecclesiastics who sat under him, and wrote his Polity of the Christian Church—one of the most complete, comprehensive, and candid works ever produced upon ecclesiastical archaeology. It is more comprehensive than Bingham's, because the latter only deals with ancient times, whereas Pelliccia devoted himself to the gigantic task of giving the ecclesiastical polity of the ancient, mediæval, and modern Church up to the date of publication, viz. 1777. His work is divided into six books, treating of the Government and Ministers of the Church, of Holy Places, of Oblations and Benedictions, of the Kalendar and Holy Days, of the Judicial Functions of the Church, and of the Offices for Marriages and Funerals. Not the least value of this writer is his conspicuous fairness. His sympathies are with the whole Catholic Church, with the Greek and Anglican as with the Roman; and as he seldom claims for any distinctly Roman usage a greater antiquity than history warrants, the book has long been regarded as an authority by German scholars of all opinions, and has recently been translated into English by the Rev. J. C. Bellett.

Penance.—In the primitive Church those who fell into sin after baptism were subjected to rigid discipline. Before they could receive absolution—contrition, confession and satisfaction were necessary. To this end penitents were divided into four classes. The first were the "mourners" [penitentes], whose station was in the church porch, where they prostrated themselves before the faithful as they went in, begging their prayers on their behalf. When admitted into the second class they were termed the "hearers" [audientes], and were permitted to enter the church and hear the lessons and the sermon, but not to join in the prayers of the church. The third stage was reached when the privilege of remaining to join in the prayers offered on their behalf, and to receive the bishop's blessing, was granted. They were then called the "kneelers" [genuflectentes], or "prostrators" [substrati], and their place in church was in the nave, near the ambon or reading-deek. Lastly, they became "co-standers" [consistentes], allowed to stand side by side with those who enjoyed the full privileges of Church membership, after the former orders of penitents and the catechumens had been dismissed, to join in the common prayers and to see the oblation offered. Not till they had been released from this fourth stage were they admitted to partake of the Holy Eucharist. The time for passing through the different classes of penitents varied in accordance with the gravity of the offence committed, sometimes lasting many years.

Several canons, regulating matters of detail, were passed during the fourth century, but no change of importance was introduced till Leo the Great [461-8] allowed penance to be performed in private, stating that confession to God and the priest was sufficient. After a time penitents were frequently sent on pilgrimages, loaded with chains, or metal rings which ate into the flesh; but at his visit to Rome in 856, Alfred the Great obtained from Benedict III. the privilege of exemption for Englishmen from such penances. Towards the end of the seventh century the custom of commutation of penance and vicarious performance sprang up. The rich were allowed to compound for their offences by giving alms towards the relief of the poor, the redemption of slaves, or the performance of masses; while the poor substituted for penance the recitation of Psalms, visiting the sick, or burying the dead. This was the introduction of the principle which afterwards led to the reprehensible sale of "indulgences," or exemptions from penance.

Clergy did not perform public penance, but were degraded; and no one who had undergone public penance could afterwards be admitted to holy orders.

Penance is retained in the Church of Rome, and ranks as a Sacrament. It is not now practised in the Anglican Church, though the preface to the Communion Service says that the restoration of this "godly discipline" "is much to be wished."

Penitential Books were drawn up to regulate penance and its commutation. The earliest known was the work of John, Bishop of Constantinople in the time of Gregory the Great. That of Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, introduced the system into the Western Church. These books were condemned by the Council of Châlons in 813, but afterwards approved, and even considered essential to the library of a parish priest.

Penitential Psalms.—The name given to those Psalms which mourn the guilt of sin and appeal to the pardoning mercy of God. These are seven in number:—vi., xxxii., xxxviii., li., cii., cxxx., and cxliii. These have for many ages been used in the Western Churches in token of special humiliation, and are appointed in our Church for Ash Wednesday. They are said in the Roman Church on Fridays in Lent, after lauds, according to an order given by Pius V. There is no order for them in the private recitation of the breviary, but those who do recite them gain an indulgence of fifty days. Cassiodorus gives a mystical reason for the number seven, viz. that sin is remitted by baptism, martyrdom, alms, forgiving or converting others, abundance of charity, and penance.

REL.—26*

Penitentiary.—A House of Mercy, or home and place of discipline, for females who have given way to sins of impurity.

History.—In 1272 Bernard, of Marseilles, induced several who were leading impure lives to give up their evil ways, and to live together under rule, calling themselves Penitents of St. Mary Magdalene.

1492.—Tifferen converted many prostitutes, and formed the order of Penitents of St. Mary Magdalene at Paris. [PENITENTS, ORDERS or.]

1641.—Eudes induced some ladies to give themselves to the work of reclaiming the fallen, and from these the Penitentiaries of the Good Shepherd were formed.

1758.—The Magdalen Hospital in London was founded.

1807.—The London Female Penitentiary,

1849.—Clewes House of Mercy.

1851.—The Church Penitentiary Association was formed by Bishop Armstrong. This has now houses in connection with it containing 1,100 penitents.

1864.—The London Diocesan Penitentiary, Highgate, was founded by Bishop Blomfield.

How Supported.—By voluntary contributions and by the work of the penitents, with the exception of the Magdalen Hospital, Streatham, which has an endowment of £3,600 per annum. Contributions are gladly received at any of the Penitentiaries.

How Managed.—By a council, warden or chaplain, and self-devoted women, i.e. women not receiving a stipend: the bishop of the diocese being Visitor. In the Magdalen Hospital the matrons are paid. As the great object is to bring the women to penitence, and to build them up in the Christian faith, a warden or chaplain is appointed to superintend the religious instruction, and to conduct the chapel services. A chapel is necessary in every Penitentiary.

Admission.—By application to the warden or lady-in-charge. The penitent before admission must be free from infectious or contagious disease, and likely to earn her living after her course of training.

Training.—The penitents are generally detained two years. In some cases a longer period is necessary. At first, owing to weak health and idle habits contracted, they can do very little work; but gradually, according to conduct and health, they are taught needle-work, laundry-work, and housework. One object being to form regular habits in the girls, everything is done according to a fixed time-table. On entering, the girl is supplied with clothes belonging to the Penitentiary, the colour of the dress worn varying according to the progress made in the house. When ready for service or other employment a suitable outfit is provided. The girls, after leaving, can always find a friend in the warden or in the ladies at the Penitentiary. It is found that on an average 74 per cent.

Penitentiary Priests were early established in some of the Churches of the East for the purpose of hearing the confessions of the lapsed and giving them instruction. The office was abolished by Nectorius of Constantinople in A.D. 391. Though not established in the Western Church in early times, it was introduced in the twelfth century, and a canon of the Lateran Council, A.D. 1215, enjoins the appointment of a penitentiary in every diocese.

Penitents. [PENANCE.]

Penitents, ORDERS OF.—A name applied to certain fraternities in Italy and elsewhere who profess to do public penance at certain times in the year, and are distinguished from other religious brotherhoods by the shape and colour of their dress. The White Penitents, the most ancient order of this class, were instituted about 1260 by a friar of Perugia, who proclaimed that the wrath of God was about to fall upon the city, and could only be appeased by a general repentance. His auditors clothed themselves in sackcloth and went round the city in procession, chastising themselves with whips to expiate their sins. The Order of Black Penitents was instituted in 1488 by some Florentines for the purpose of tending criminals during imprisonment and before their death, and giving them decent burial, and also of burying all who were found dead in the streets. There are other orders of penitents distinguished by different colours, though in rules they follow one or other of the orders already mentioned.

The name has also been given to orders established for penitent women, as:—

Penitents of St. Magdalen.—An order established in 1272 by Bernard, a citizen of Marseilles. [See PENITENTIARIES.]

Penitents of St. Magdalen, Congregation of, at Paris, owed its origin to the preaching of a Franciscan, about 1492. Charles VIII. gave a palace for the use of this order, but it was removed to St. George's Chapel in 1572. It was originally established for the purpose of rescuing the fallen, but afterwards became simply a nunnery.

Penitents of the Name of Jesus.—A congregation of women at Seville, founded in 1550. It is divided into three parts—one for nuns, another for novices, and a third for those who are under correction.

Penitents of Orvieto.—An order of nuns instituted by Antonio Simoncelli, and erected in 1662 into a monastery for the reception of those who had led a sinful life, and wished to devote themselves to the service of God.

Penn, WILLIAM [b. in London, Oct. 14th, 1644; d. at Ruscombe, Berkshire, July 30th, 1718], son of Sir William Penn, the Admiral; a celebrated Quaker. He went to Christ Church, Oxford, and was there converted to Quakerism by the preaching of Thomas Loe, which took such a hold upon his mind that he and some fellow-students were accustomed to hold prayer-meetings together, and attempted to prevent the wearing of surplices in the University by tearing them away from the students. For this they were expelled, and Penn was sent by his father, in 1662, to France, and studied at Paris and Saumur, whence he proceeded to Turin for a short time. He returned to England in 1664, and became a student at Lincoln's Inn; but was despatched to Ireland two years later to manage his father's estates in the county of Cork. His Quakerish tendencies were here strongly developed, and he quarrelled with his father because the latter desired him to take off his hat in the presence of royalty, which Penn persistently refused to do. In 1668 he published The Sandy Foundation Shaken, in which he attacked the doctrine of the Trinity as usually received, and of the mediation of Christ, and for which he was imprisoned in the Tower. He was released through the intervention of the Duke of York; but was again arrested in 1670 for breach of the Conventicle Act, and sent to Newgate for six months. His father had died leaving him a large annuity, with which he visited Holland and Germany in the cause of Quakerism, and afterwards obtained a grant from the Crown of land in America on which to found a Quaker settlement. He and his friends started in August, 1682, and the colony of Pennsylvania, on the Delaware, was founded, of which they immediately set to work to build the capital, Philadelphia. The form of government, which had been framed in England, was accepted by the freemen of the province, and a bond of friendship established with the natives, which was in no way broken for more than seventy years. The colony seemed in a fair way of prosperity, and during the two years after it was established about fifty ships arrived, bringing English, Dutch, and German emigrants. Penn returned to England in 1684, and after the death of Charles II., became very intimate with James II., inasmuch that he was suspected of Romish tendencies, and on several occasions arrested; after the Revolution he was accused of complicity in a plot to restore the late King, and forced to live in retirement. He made a second expedition to Pennsylvania with the intention of changing the proprietary governments to regal ones, but abandoned the design and returned to England, much encumbered with debt; he spent his last years at Ruscombe.

Pennafort, RAYMOND DE, Chaplain to Gregory IX., was born at Barcelona at the end of the twelfth century, being descended from the kings of Arragon. He studied at Barcelona and Bologna, and entered the Dominican Order, of which, in 1238, he was made General; but resigned the office afterwards in order to become a missionary to the Moors and Jews. He became Confessor to Pope Gregory in 1230, at whose orders he drew up the sixth collection of Decretals. He also wrote Summa Casuum Penitentia, which was printed at Rome in 1603. He died in 1275, and was canonised by Pope Clement VIII.

Pennefather, REV. W. [MILDMAY.]

Penry, JOHN [b. at Cefnbrith, in Brecknockshire, Wales, in 1559].—He was educated as a Roman Catholic, but during the years which he spent at Cambridge, and subsequently at Oxford, he adopted Puritan views, and took the degree of M.A. At Oxford he was ordained priest, but got himself into trouble with the bishops in consequence of the somewhat unorthodox nature of his opinions, and the dissatisfaction was increased by a plea which he published for the preaching of the Gospel in Wales. In 1588 he published various tracts, and in the same year appeared the first book written by "Martin Marprelate." [MARPRELATE CONTROVERSY.] The author was supposed to be Penry himself, but it is probable that he was only the publisher, and that the author was Henry Barlowe; but so much suspicion attached to him that, in 1589, he fled to Scotland, and did not return for three years. Meanwhile he had become a Separatist, and as this caused him to be regarded as dangerous to the Church, he was arrested and imprisoned in March, 1593. He was tried on a charge of treason, and though there was no evidence forthcoming to prove that he was the author of the "Martin Marprelate" book, passages in his diary were so distorted as to look like proofs, and he was hanged at St. Thomas-a-Watering, London, May 29th, 1593.

Pentecost.—Among ancient Christian writers the term signifies sometimes the whole time between the Easter and the Whitsun Festivals, and sometimes the latter festival alone. The whole period of fifty days, being kept in honour and memory of the Saviour's Resurrection, was a time of more than ordinary joy, and it was a custom of very general observance to worship standing, instead of kneeling, during the whole of this space, to mark its joyful character. At a later period the Fast of the Rogation Days was introduced, modifying the ancient custom in the Church of excluding fasting from this season. [WHITSUNTIDE.]

Pentecostals.—Oblations made to a cathedral, at Whitsuntide, by the inhabitants of the diocese.

Perambulation of Parishes, or Beating the Bounds, is a custom, still surviving in some parts of England, of making a formal progress round the boundary of the parish during Rogation week. [ROGATION.] The practice is derived from the annual processions at this season, originated by Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne [A.D. 460], for the purpose of imploring God's blessing on the freshly-sown seed. At the Reformation all religious processions were abolished except these, an injunction of Queen Elizabeth providing "that the parishioners shall, once in a year, at the time accustomed, with the curate and the substantial men of the parish, walke about the parishes, as they were accustomed, and at their return to the church make their common prayers." No service was, however, appointed, but it was enjoined that "the curate . . . at certain convenient places, shall admonish the people to give thanks to God, in the beholding of God's benefits, for the increase and abundance of his fruits upon the face of the earth, with the saying of Psalm civ., Benedic anima mea. At which time also the same minister shall inculcate this and such like sentences:—Cursed be he that translateth the bounds and doles of his neighbour, or such other order of prayer as shall be hereafter appointed."

Perfect.—A term applied in the early Church to those who had received full instruction in the Christian religion, and were admitted to a participation in the Holy Eucharist. Converts were called "imperfect"; catechumens of some standing became "more perfect"; and at the end of their probation were admitted into the number of the "perfect."

Perfecti or Boni Homines.—This was a name given to several monastic orders, both in England and on the Continent. Thus an order founded in the eleventh century, at Vincennes, transferred in 1584 to the Minims; several Portuguese houses who sent missionaries to India and Asia Minor, and an English order of the thirteenth century, all bore this name. In the thirteenth century the stricter Catharists assumed the name of Perfecti. They held the Manichæan doctrines, and resembled the PATERINES [q.v.]. A Council was held at Lombez, in southern France, in 1165, to condemn the Perfecti.

Perfectionists.—Those who believe that it is possible to attain to actual perfection in this life. There are four classes of Perfectionists:—[1] The Roman Catholics, who teach that a man may, by obedience, become free from all mortal sin, though still subject to fall into venial sin; and even this tendency may be done away through the special favour of God. [2] The Wesleyan Arminians, who teach Christian perfection, namely, the fulfilment of the Law by faith and love, through the grace of God, though the infirmity of the body prevents it from being absolute in the eyes of men. [3] Many Quakers, who say that in souls justified by God "the body of death and sin comes to be crucified and removed, and their hearts united and subjected unto the truth, so as not to obey any suggestion or temptation of the Evil One, but to be free from actual sinning and transgressing of the law of God, and in that respect perfect." Yet this theory does not preclude the possibility of attaining to a higher degree of perfection, nor of falling away from a state of grace. [4] The Oberlin school of theology, who say that perfection is to be reached by a life of implicit obedience, which effectually prevents the possibility of sin, since virtue and sin cannot exist in the same soul at the same time. The Calvinists and Lutherans absolutely reject the theory of Perfectionism.

The name "Perfectionist" has also been given to a modern sect established in North America by John Humphrey Noyes, in 1845. Noyes was an independent preacher in New Haven, who gave out that he discovered from St. Paul's Epistles that all Christian religions were wrong, so started a new Church. There are now three settlements of this sect, the largest at Oneida Creek, where he first preached, and two smaller ones at Brooklyn and Wallingford. The views of this sect are, that all men are wholly good or wholly evil, and that all actions are wholly righteous or wholly wicked. They hold that they themselves are sinless, and are reconciled to God, that man and woman are entirely equal, and that all goods are common. As they are "perfect," and can commit no sin, no positive religion is needful for them, and their church has been described as "a chapel, a theatre, a concert-room, a casino, a working-place, all in one, being supplied with benches, lounging chairs, work-tables, a reading desk, a stage, a gallery, and a pianoforte." The system of "free love," or "complex marriages," has been established, which has led to an abolition of monogamy and the marriage bond. The sect is also known as the "Bible Communists" and "Free Lovers," and is in many points similar to the PRINCETES [q.v.].

Pericops.—Portions of the New Testament appointed to be read in the ancient Christian Church on Sundays and festivals. Some say that the selection was made as early as Apostolic times, while others fix the time as the fourth century, and some even as late as the eighth century. The custom corresponds with the Jewish Parashas and Haphtaraks. The Parashas were fifty-four sections, into which the Law was divided, so that the whole of it should be read during the year. Fifty-four was the greatest number of Sabbaths possible in a year, and when there were a smaller number two portions were read together. The Haphtaraks were fifty-four sections chosen from the Prophets, and read in like manner. This is still continued amongst the modern Jews, but the portions of the Prophets now read generally omit the prophecies regarding the Messiah.

The method of selection of the lessons in the Church of England will be found under the head LECTONARY [q.v.].

In the Roman missal each mass has two Scripture lessons, which are mostly taken from the Vulgate Version.

The Greek Church has special Epistles and Gospels for every week-day as well as every Sunday and Saint's Day.

In the Armenian Church, Scripture reading takes a very important place; from Easter to Pentecost they have three services a day, and portions from the Old and New Testament specially selected for each service.

Peristerion.—A dove of gold or silver, suspended over the altar or in the baptistery, of some ancient churches. Later a custom arose of keeping the reserved sacrament in these doves.

Perjury.—The taking an oath in order to tell or confirm a falsehood. This was considered a very heinous crime, both by the heathens and Jews, and among Christians is to be looked upon with great abhorrence, as it is treating God with irreverence, denying, or, at least, ignoring His omniscience, profaning His name, and violating truth.

Perpetua, St.—One of five catechumens who were seized at Carthage in the third century during the persecution of Severus. She had three young men (Revocatus, Saturinus, and Secundulus) and one woman (Felicitas) as fellow-sufferers. She was off-red liberty if she would give up her faith, and to refuse was doubly hard in that she was the mother of an infant whom she would be obliged to leave to the mercy of her enemies. Her mother was a Christian, her father still a heathen, and he used to come to the prison day after day to urge her to recant. While they were in prison, the priest was, at first, allowed to come and see them, and took the opportunity of baptising them there. A few days after Perpetua was thrown into a dark dungeon, but was allowed to have her baby with her, which she declared turned the dungeon into a palace. When her father heard that the trial was coming on, he made one more attempt to persuade her to save her life, but to no purpose, and sentence of death was pronounced. Her child had been taken to her father's house, and the day before her death she sent a message that she wished to see it once more, but he would not grant her request. The authorities had decided that the five prisoners should be torn to pieces on an approaching festival. It was the custom in Carthage at that time to dress their victims, the men as priests of Saturn, the women as priestesses of Ceres, before they were thrown to the wild beasts. But these five protested so earnestly against such an insult that the officers yielded, and Perpetua, having been tossed by a bull several times, was led into the centre of the arena, and there despatched by the sword of a gladiator, she herself guiding his aim. A festival in her memory has been kept since the days of Gregory the Great on Mar. 7th. The "Acts of St. Perpetua," said to have been written for the most part by herself, are still extant.

Perpetual Curate.—The curates called perpetual are the ministers appointed to take charge of a parish where there is no spiritual rector or vicar, but where the tithes belong to a lay rector or appropriator, who is bound to provide a curate, canonically instituted and inducted. The curates by this means become so far vicars that they cannot be removed at the pleasure of the appropriator, nor without the revocation of their licence by the ordinary. An Act passed by the instrumentality of Bishop Wilberforce provided that perpetual curates should henceforward receive the title of "vicar," and hence the name has now almost disappeared.

Perrone, GIOVANNI, D.D. [b. at Chieri, Piedmont, 1794; d. at Rome, Aug. 29th, 1876]. He studied and took his degree at Turin, and went to Rome, where he entered the Society of Jesus, by which he was sent to Orvieto in 1816 as Professor of Theology. He was appointed in 1823 to the same post at the Roman College, which he held for fifty years, except when in charge of the College of Ferrara, from 1830 to 1833, and Rector of the College of Rome, from 1853 to 1856. In the controversy concerning the Immaculate Conception he took a leading part, before the Bull Ineffabilis Deus was issued in 1854; and he also took the side of the Ultramontanists at the Vatican Council of 1869. The great influence which his learning and powers of rhetoric had in the Roman Church was largely increased by his being a member of most of the Papal congregations on doctrine and discipline. From 1848 to 1850 Perrone visited England with some of his pupils. He published his system of dogmatic theology in two books—[1] Prælectiones Theologicae quas in Collegio Romano Societatis Jesu dabat, and [2] Prælectiones Theologicae in Compendium redactæ—from which the present system has been for the most part adopted. Another of his leading works is De Immaculato B. V. Mariæ conceptu: an dogmatico decreto definitum possit.

Perronet, EDWARD, son of an English clergyman, a preacher first under Wesley, then an Independent, author of some hymns, among which "All hail the power of Jesus's name" still holds a place in popular esteem. He died in 1792.

Persecutions.—The causes of persecution in religious history are manifold and complicated. The Lord Jesus Christ was persecuted by the Pharisees because He exposed their hypocrisy, and by the Jews in general because He ran counter to their prejudices. These causes produced a like treatment of His Apostles; and the ignorance of the heathens was another cause of persecution: the Christians were confounded by them with the rebellious Jews, and indiscriminately persecuted. Thus the historian Suetonius says that Christ excited the Jews to frequent tumults. Furthermore, Gentile superstition came to the increase of persecution: the heathens could not endure a sect which aimed at the destruction of the worship of their gods. The Jews frequently escaped rough treatment simply because, though they practised their own rites, they let those of the heathens alone. But this was exactly what the Christians would not do. They boldly called on men "to turn from their vanities and serve the true God alone." Thus it was that they were called "Atheists," as enemies of the gods. And so all calumnies among them were believed by the superstitious: they burned Rome, made nightly conspiracies, ate human flesh, worshipped an ass's head, committed adultery, incest, infanticide. The base heresies of the Nicolaitanes, Carpocratians, and others, sometimes gave colour to the slanders. But another cause, which influenced some of the best and wisest of the Emperors, was found in political ideas. The Gentile religion was interwoven with the State; and men like Trajan, who conscientiously believed it their duty to uphold existing institutions, regarded Christianity as a hostile, and therefore a dangerous, principle. Its professors were denounced as the enemies of kings, of laws, and of the human race.

The persecutions in the New Testament were [1] about Stephen, [2] by Herod Agrippa (Acts xii.), [3] those stirred up by the Jews against St. Paul, [4] those raised by heathens who saw that their gains were endangered (Acts xvi. and xx.).

In Ecclesiastical History there are commonly reckoned ten persecutions. They are the following; notices of each will be found under their several names:—

PERSECUTION OF:—	DATE.	CHIEF SUFFERERS.
1.—Nero . .	64-68	St. Peter and St. Paul (Consul Flavius Clemens (St. John sent to Patmos))
2.—Domitian	95-96	Symeon of Jerusalem; Ignatius of Antioch
3.—Trajan . .	105-117	Justin Martyr; Polycarp
4.—Marcus Aurelius	166-180	Perpetua and Felicitas
5.—Septimius	202-211
6.—Maximian	235-238
7.—Decius . .	250-253	Fabian of Rome; Alexander of Jerusalem
8.—Valerian .	257-260	Xystus of Rome; Cyprian of Carthage
9.—Aurelian .	275	Execution of Edict prevented by death of Emperor
10.—Diocletian	303-305	Anthimus of Nicomedia; St. Alban

The accession of Constantine the Great, the first Christian Emperor, put an end to the persecutions of Christianity by the Empire. Would that no more needed to be added to this article. But Christian history has to record that persecution has been used as a weapon age after age for enforcing obedience to that form of religion which is strongest. The Arian controversy, which began the reign of Constantine, was the signal for persecution, now by the Arians, now by their opponents. "Toleration," it has been well said, "was the last Christian virtue to be learned." It was argued that as error of opinion leads to disorganisation of society, to moral evils, and (in early opinion) to everlasting perdition, such error must be put down like any other offence against the well-being of the commonwealth. The barbarous nations who broke into the Roman Empire and destroyed it were frequently persecutors. Thus the Vandals, both in their heathen days, and also after they had embraced the Arian faith, desolated the Church, and persecuted those who remained faithful to the ancient creed to death. The English, on arriving as heathens in this country, persecuted the Christian Britons, destroyed their churches, and drove them into the mountains. The cruelties of the Mahometans when they began their career of conquest were terrible and remorseless. "The Koran or the sword" was their sole alternative to all who fell into their power. During the Middle Ages all movements in the direction of freethought were regarded by the dominant religion as warfare against the Kingdom of God. The persecutions of the Waldenses and Albigenses, and the establishment of the Inquisition, are described in their places, as are also the Hussite wars, the persecutions of the Lollards, and the fires of Smithfield in the reign of Queen Mary. On the accession of Elizabeth the tables were turned, and the spirit of persecution was directed against the Roman Catholics, who were proceeded against as traitors to the State, and fined and imprisoned for not attending the established worship. Cases also occurred occasionally of the infliction of death for heresy, a penalty inflicted by Elizabeth upon both Baptists and INDEPENDENTS [q.v.]. There were those who left England for America in order to secure "freedom to worship God;" but even these in turn became persecutors both of those who preferred Episcopacy to Independency, and also of the Quakers. The same spirit showed itself on both sides in England in the days of the Commonwealth and of the Stuarts; and the history of the Scottish Covenanters is a touching narrative of persecutions bravely endured. The Act of Toleration may be said to have put an end to persecution as a legalised instrument in England, but the spirit will hardly be eliminated from mankind, except as human nature itself is altered by the influence of the Gospel of Christ.

Perseverance.—Continuance in any design, state, opinion, or course of action. The perseverance of the saints is their continuance and progression in a state of grace. This doctrine caused a considerable dispute between the Arminians and Calvinists, and the arguments of the Calvinists in its favour were as follows:—That the perfections of God, His love, faithfulness, wisdom, and power, are such that He would not be likely to condemn His people to everlasting perdition. That since Christ has united His people to Himself and died for them, and lives to make intercession for them, their falling would make His work vain, and is accordingly derogatory to the Divine glory. That man is upheld, not by his own power, but by the power of the Holy Spirit, which enlightens and confirms him, and enables him to persevere. In answer to these arguments the Arminians brought forward the denunciations in Scripture against apostles, and the prophecy that some would eventually fall from grace, and said that the doctrine precludes the use of means, and gives encouragement to presumption and false security.

Persia. RELIGION OF.—The religion of Persia, until it fell into the hands of the Arabs in 651, has been described in the article PARSEES [q.v.]. Then the greater part of the population embraced Mohammedanism: Persia developed that special branch of Islamism which is mystical, and is seen under the form of DERVISHES [q.v.]. Their founder, Meolana, was born at the beginning of the fourteenth century; there are now thirty-six dervish sects spread in the surrounding countries. It is a most powerful sect, both in the Ottoman and Persian empires. The Sultan is never deemed as fully invested with the imperial power till he has received the sword from the successor of Meolana Jelalu-d-din, and at the present time the Caliphate seems to be within its grasp.

Persia has been the scene of many missions: Nestorian and Roman Catholic missions, which have left little trace behind them; in the middle of the last century a Moravian mission, which was unsuccessful; and in this century more successful efforts are being carried on by means of the Church Missionary Society.

Persons or Parsons. ROBERT, an English Jesuit, was born at Nether Stowey, near Bridgewater, in Somersetshire, in 1546. He studied at Oxford, but, having become a Roman Catholic, went to Rome in 1574, where in the next year he entered the Society of the Jesuits. In 1580 he came to England with Campian; but when the latter was arrested, in 1583, Persons returned to Rome, though he still continued to manage the English mission. In 1587 he was made the first Rector of the English College at Rome, and in the next year went to Spain to make preparations for the furtherance of the Jesuits in England in case the Armada should succeed. He founded several schools for the training of English priests, and aided the secular clergy. He died at Rome in 1610. He is said to have been indefatigable, wily, of a hot temper and rough behaviour. He wrote many books, of which we may mention—A Christian Directory Guiding Men to Eternal Salvation; A Conference about the next Succession to the Crown of England, which appeared in two parts—the first for the chastising of kings, etc., and the second to prove the right of the Infanta of Spain; and A Treatise of the Three Conversions of the English from Paganism to Christian Religion, published under the name of N. D., i.e. Nicholas Doleman.

Pestalozzi, JOHANN HEINRICH [b. at Zurich, Jan. 12th, 1745; d. at Brugg, Aargau, 1827].—A great educationalist. His father was a physician, but died soon after his son's birth, and after various experiments, Pestalozzi applied himself to farming, with the intention of improving the condition of his farm people by education. His schemes failed, and after fifteen years he became deeply involved in debt, having been unsuccessful in his business. To pay off the debt he wrote a novel, Leinhardt und Gertrud, which soon became popular, and for which he received a gold medal from the Agricultural Society of Bern. Other novels followed, and he started a periodical, the Swiss Journal for the People. He made other attempts for the education of the poor, and founded a school for orphan children, in what had formerly been an Ursuline convent in Unterwalden. He suffered from a want of books and efficient teachers, and in less than a year the convent was turned into a hospital for Austrian soldiers. A school at Burgdorf was more successful, but that also failed after a time. For this school he wrote How Gertrude Teaches her Children, a work which has become very celebrated. In 1804 he was invited by the inhabitants of Yverdon to open an educational institute there. This institution soon gained a world-wide reputation, and pupils came to it from Germany, Russia, and America, and carried back his method to their own countries.

Mr. R. H. Quick says, in his Essays on Educational Reformers [page 177]: "The life of the Pestalozzian institutions had been the love which the old man had infused into all the members, teachers as well as children; but this life was wanting at Yverdon. The establishment was much too large to be carried on successfully without more method and discipline than Pestalozzi, remarkable, as he himself says, for his 'unrivalled incapacity to govern,' was master of . . . Pestalozzi was mad with enthusiasm to improve elementary education, especially for the poor, throughout Europe. His zeal led him to announce his schemes and methods before he had given them a fair trial; hence, many foolish things came abroad as Pestalozzianism, and hindered the reception of principles and practices which better deserved the name. His highly active imagination led him to see and describe as actually existing whatever he hoped sooner or later to realise. The enemies of change made the most of his mistakes, and his institution came to a speedy and unhonoured close. When the old man died at the age of eighty, he had seen the apparent failure of all his toils. He had not, however, failed in reality. It has been said of him that his true function was to educate ideas, not children, and when, twenty years later, the centenary of his birth was celebrated by schoolmasters, not only in his native country, but throughout Germany, it was found that Pestalozzian ideas had been sown, and were bearing fruit, over the greater part of Europe."

Pestalozzi himself says, in his Letters on Early Education: "Why have I insisted so strongly on attention to early physical and intellectual education? Because I consider these as merely leading to a higher aim, to qualify the human being for the free and full use of all the faculties implanted by the Creator, and to direct all these faculties towards the perfection of the whole being of man, that he may be enabled to act in his peculiar station as an instrument of that All-wise and Almighty Power that has called him into life."

Pestalozzi adopted the system of teaching from objects, and proceeding from the concrete to the abstract; he introduced graduation in writing, and strove to educate rather than instruct children. He believed in the system of mutual instruction, and set the elder children to teach the younger. His system is much used in the present Kindergarten schools.

Petavius or Petau, DIONYSIUS.—A Roman Catholic theologian [b. at Orleans, 1583; d. at Paris, 1652]; he early became a member of the Order of Jesuits, and lectured on rhetoric at Rheims and La Flèche. In 1621 he was appointed Professor of Theology at Paris, and became well known as a scholar and critic; he published De Doctrina Temporum, in 1627, a valuable book on chronology. In consideration of this work, Philip IV. invited him to Madrid as Professor of History, and at the same time Pope Urban VIII. invited him to Rome. Petavius declined both offers, and spent the remaining years of his life at the Jesuits' College of Clermont, in Paris, where he wrote his Rationarium Temporum, De Photino Heretico, and De Theologicis Dogmatibus. This last was his most famous work, but he left it unfinished.

Peter, FESTIVALS OF.—There were formerly four festivals of St. Peter kept:—[1] June 29th, the day on which SS. Peter and Paul are supposed to have been martyred at Rome, the former by crucifixion with his head downwards, the latter by beheading. This is the oldest of the feasts of the Apostles, having been observed since the fourth century. [2] Feb. 22nd, the festival of St. Peter's Chair at Antioch. Though there is no account in the Bible of the foundation of the church at Antioch, it is generally believed to have been the work of St. Peter, who established his episcopal chair first in this place. [3] Jan. 18th, St. Peter's Chair at Rome. Celebrated in honour of St. Peter's fixing his episcopal work there after seven years at Antioch. [4] August 1st, St. Peter's Chains, or St. Peter ad Vincula, the day on which the Roman Catholics honour his chains, and commemorate his miraculous deliverance from the hands of Herod Agrippa. The 1st of August was probably the day on which the church on the Esquiline Hill was dedicated to St. Peter in Chains. It was built by Eudoxia, wife of Valentine III., about the middle of the fifth century.

Peter Lombard. [LOMBARD.]

Peter Martyr. [MARTYR.]

Peter of Lampsachus, St.—A Christian martyr who was seized by order of the Emperor Decius in 249, at Lampsachus, a city on the Hellespont. The Pro-Consul Optimus tried to persuade him to offer sacrifice to Venus, promising that by so doing he should save his life. Peter refused, and Optimus ordered that he should be broken to pieces on a wheel. It was done slowly, and although he was in the most horrible tortures, the martyr's courage was undaunted. A few days after, three of his companions were brought before Optimus, and the same alternative was offered them—apostasy or death—and they all chose the latter. But one of them, Nicomachus, whilst he was on the rack, cried out that he was ready to sacrifice to the gods. He was immediately released and given full liberty. A few moments after, however, he fell down dead. The other two, Andrew and Paul, were given another chance of saving their lives, but remained firm. The Governor thought that he would be able in time to persuade them to sacrifice as he wished, and was willing to put off sentence of death, but the mob was so fierce against them, and so eager for their blood, that Optimus was afraid to delay. He handed them over to the infuriated populace, by whom they were stoned to death.

Peter the Hermit was born at Amiens in the middle of the eleventh century. He went to Jerusalem in 1093, and, seeing the deplorable condition of the Christians, on his return to Europe preached the first crusade, persuading most of the princes of Europe to join him. He was made the head of the enterprise, and had about 40,000 foot, besides cavalry, under him; but the people were too enthusiastic to wait for a regular army. They landed in Constantinople in 1096, and went thence to Bithynia, where they were defeated, and but 3,000 returned to Constantinople. He was present at the siege of Jerusalem in 1099, and was left Vicar-General there for a time; but afterwards returned to France, and died in 1115 in the monastery of Neu Montier in Liège.

Peterborough, BISHOPRIC OF.—It was not till the reign of Henry VIII. that Peterborough had a bishop of its own; it had possessed a most important Benedictine Abbey, and at the dissolution, the last Abbot, John Chambers, became its first Bishop. It had hitherto formed part of the great See of Mercia. It is said that the abbey was spared when it was surrendered, on account of its being the burial place of Catharine of Arragon. The present cathedral is the third minster that has been erected on the same spot. The first was built in the seventh century (commenced about 655) by Peda, the son of Penda, who died before its completion; this was the first monastic establishment of central England. Its site was the little village of Medeshamstead, called afterwards, from the patron saint of the abbey, Burgh St. Peter. On the completion of the building, it was hallowed in the names of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Andrew by Deusdedit, Archbishop of Canterbury, and other prelates, in the presence of Wulfere, who had succeeded his brother Peda. Saxulf was its first abbot. This abbey was entirely destroyed in 870 by the Danes, under Hubba, in the time of the seventh abbot, Hedda, who was killed in the attack with all his monks, said to number upwards of eighty. About a century later King Edgar, with Athelwold, bishop of Winchester, as architect, commenced the building of the second church; this structure suffered much from another Danish attack in the eleventh century, and in 1116 was accidentally destroyed by fire. Two years later the present structure was commenced, which took in all nearly one hundred and twenty years to complete, and was then consecrated in 1237 by the Bishops of Lincoln and Exeter. The choir had been ready for service in 1143, and was built by Abbot Martin de Bec; the east transept was built by Abbot William de Waterville [1155–1177], the nave by Abbot Benedict [1177–1193], who also built part of the west transept. The original fabric remains, with additions, but no great alterations. At the time of the consecration much that we now see had not been erected, viz. the bell tower, the western spires, the new building at the east (often erroneously called the Lady Chapel), built in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries by Abbots Ashton and Kirton, and the lantern tower. With the exception of Norwich Cathedral, Peterborough is the grandest

Norman church left in England. The great feature of the building is the west front: the date of its erection is not on record, but as it is in the best style of Early English, it was probably completed not long before the consecration of 1237. There was a chapel dedicated to St. Thomas-à-Becket, rich in his relics, brought hither from Canterbury by Abbot Benedict, who was a monk of Christ Church at the time of the murder. On not a few occasions has the Sovereign been entertained at the abbey at a great cost; Stephen, Henry III., and Edward I., and their queens, Edward II., Edward III., and the Black Prince, were all among its royal visitors. Catharine of Arragon was buried in the north choir aisle, in 1536, and Mary, Queen of Scots, in the south choir isle, in 1587, but her remains were removed to Westminster in 1613. In what is called the "new building" is preserved a very curious coped stone monument, having on each side six carved figures in monastic dress: it is said to have been erected by Godric, Abbot of Crowland, as a memorial of Abbot Hedda and his monks. In 1882 the condition of the lantern tower was discovered to be highly dangerous, and it was found that no expedients for patching up and trying to preserve the tower in its existing state would be of any avail, so that it became necessary to reconstruct the whole of it. The work of taking down the tower commenced on April 5th, 1883, under the direction of Mr. J. L. Pearson; then it was found that the piers which support the lantern must also be rebuilt. In the excavations made, remnants of the Saxon foundations of the first minster were met with, and also stones which had formed part of the original Norman tower. The "chief corner-stone," as it was called, was laid on May 7th, 1884, with masonic honours, by Lord Carnarvon as Pro-Grand Master, in the name of the Prince of Wales as Grand Master, of the Freemasons. The work of rebuilding is still progressing.

The income of the See is £4,500. There is an assistant bishop, a dean, three archdeacons, four canons, three minor canons, and twenty-four honorary canons. The diocese comprises the entire counties of Leicester, Northampton, and Rutland, with portions of counties adjacent, and contains 571 benefices.

Peters, HUGH [b. 1599; hanged, 1660]. —An English Nonconformist, who, having preached in Holland and America, returned to England in 1641, joined the Puritan party, and was hanged at the Restoration as a regicide. He wrote in prison A Dying Father's Last Legacy to an Only Child.

Peter's Pence.—The tax paid annually to the See of Rome by England and other countries, and supposed to have been originated either by Offa, King of Mercia, or by Ina of Wessex, for the support of a college in Rome for the education of English clergy. The tax was at first fixed at a penny, to be paid by every family; but was afterwards demanded only from those possessed of a certain fixed income; it was collected upon the feast of St. Peter ad Vincula. Much dissatisfaction was caused by the exaction of payments by the bishops, who were deputed to collect the money, and laws were passed laying a heavy penalty not only on those who refused to pay, but on the bishops in case they should neglect to deliver up the money given into their charge. The custom of collecting Peter's Pence became general in Poland, and was introduced into Prussia and Scandinavia, though the Papal Legates could never succeed in getting it paid regularly; and Gregory VII. tried to exact it from France and Spain, but without success. In England it seems to have been paid more or less regularly till the reign of Henry VIII., but for some time before it had only been regarded as a charity, and was not enforced from the people.

Petrobrusians.—Followers of the heretic Peter of Bruys, who was burnt at St. Gilles about A.D. 1125. The only authorities from which any knowledge of the sect can be gained are a passage in Abelard, and a book by Peter the Venerable, Adversus Petrobrusianos Hereticos. Peter de Bruys appears to have been an ecclesiastic holding some benefice in the south of France, where he first began to publish his heresy, and gained many followers among the Cathari at Arles and elsewhere; afterwards he preached with great success at Narbonne and Toulouse, but was eventually seized and condemned to death. He professed the desire to restore Christianity to its original purity, and accepted the Gospels, to which he would only grant a literal interpretation; the Epistles he partly rejected, and only granted to them a derivative authority. He would not allow infant baptism; declared that the Church being invisible, no buildings are necessary as places of worship, for the Church exists only in the hearts of the people; denied not only the Real Presence in the Eucharist but also that any sacramental character is attached to it, and regarded it simply as a historical incident in Christ's life. He objected to elaborate ritual of any kind, to prayers for the dead, and to music as a part of Divine Worship ; and he abhorred the adoration of the cross, as being the instrument of our Lord's torture. After his death the sect continued to flourish for some time, but finally became merged in that of the Henricians.

Pew, READING. [DESK.]

Pews, or enclosed seats in church, were not known till after the Reformation, and until the seventeenth century were only used by the patron of the church. The earliest pew for the congregation remaining, whose age is determined by the appearance of a date, is in the north aisle of Geddington St. Mary, Northamptonshire, and bears the date 1602. From this time they became more universal, till the episcopate of Wren, Bishop of Hereford, when they fell into disfavour. In his Visitation he says: "Are all the seats and pews so ordered that they which are in them may kneel down in time of prayer, and have their faces up to the holy table? Are there any close pews in your church? Are any pews so loftily made that they do any way hinder the prospect of the church or chancel, so that they which be in them are hidden from the face of the congregation?" With regard to the last point, it has been stated that high pews were first built by the Puritans, so that they might be able unseen to disobey the rubrics, particularly those enforcing bowing at the name of Jesus, and standing at the Gloria Patri.

The following are the laws concerning the holding of pews:—

No person has a legal right to occupy, in the parish church, any pew or seat exclusively without the permission of the churchwardens, except by prescription or by FACULTY [q.v.].

By immemorial use and by reparation [when repairs have been needed] a prescriptive right to a pew may be established as appurtenant to a particular house within the parish; and if a house to which a pew is so legally appurtenant be let, the occupier is entitled to the use of the pew.

But if it can be shown that the pew was not always connected with that particular house, or that it has at any time been repaired by the churchwardens at the cost of the parish, the prescription cannot be established.

A legal claim to a seat or pew, as an inheritance derived from the original holder, or as appurtenant to land, exclusively of a house or residence, cannot be established.

The distribution of pews and seats, which are not held either by faculty or by prescription, rests with the ordinary; the churchwardens are his officers, and they are to allot them to the parishioners according to their reasonable discretion, taking care to afford suitable accommodation to as many as possible. When a parishioner has been placed in a seat or pew by the churchwardens, or has been suffered for some time to occupy it, he is said to have a possessory right in it, which he may maintain against a stranger, but he is liable, when occasion shall require, to be displaced by the churchwardens, who, if more church accommodation be required, may make a different distribution of the pews or seats, so as to supply the deficiency; but if they do so capriciously, and without just ground, the ordinary will interfere. In these arrangements, therefore, it may be useful that the advice of the minister should be taken; but he has no legal power to interfere.

The erection of a pew or seat by any individual at his own charge, even with the leave of the minister, the churchwardens, and all the parishioners, gives him no permanent interest therein; such interest can be obtained only by a faculty.

Churchwardens must not permit pews or seats to be altered in size, height, or form, etc., at the mere pleasure of individuals.

In a parish church a pew or seat cannot legally be let or sold by any person unless by Act of Parliament: and if a pew or seat be appurtenant to a house, it can only pass with the house to which it is appurtenant. As a general rule, a person not being an occupying landowner in the parish cannot retain to his own use, or acquire a right to, a seat in the body of the church, or in the public aisles or galleries.

Philadelphian Society [Gr. philadelphos, "brotherly love"].—A sect founded in 1695 by an aged Englishwoman named Jane Lead. She embraced, it is said, the same views as Madame Bourignon. [BOURIGNONISTS.] She was a widow of good family, from Norfolk, and had devoted a great deal of time to the study of the works of Jacob Behmen. [BEHMEN, JACOB.] She wrote many books of a mystical character; one of them is called The Wonders of God's Creation manifested in the Variety of Eight Worlds, as they were made known experimentally to the Author. She was of opinion that all dissensions among Christians would cease, and the Kingdom of the Redeemer become, even here below, a glorious scene of charity, concord, and happiness, if those who bear the name of Jesus, without regarding the forms of doctrine or discipline that distinguish particular communions, would all join in committing their souls to the care of the internal guide, to be instructed, governed, and formed by His divine impulse and suggestions. She declared that this desirable event would come to pass, and that she had a Divine commission to proclaim the approach of this glorious communion of saints, who were to be gathered in one visible, universal Church or Kingdom before the dissolution of the earth. Thus she asserted that her Philadelphian Society was the true Kingdom of Christ, in which alone the Divine Spirit resided and reigned. She died in 1704 at the age of 81. She was greatly assisted in forming her society by Dr. Pordage, one of the Nonjurors, who had afterwards taken to medicine, and who was a great spirit-seer. The Philadelphians helped to spread the doctrines of mystical piety shown in the writings of WILLIAM LAW [q.v.].

Philip, LANDGRAVE OF HESSE, called "The Magnanimous" [b. at Marburg, Nov. 1504; d. 1567]. His father, William, died in 1510, and he was declared of age in 1518. In 1521 he attended the Diet of Worms, and though he had not yet proclaimed himself of any particular religion, he advocated the expediency of giving Luther a safe-conduct, and treated him with kindness. In 1525 he declared himself on the side of the Reformers, and took part in the controversy against the Roman Catholics. He formed the project of bringing about an alliance between the Protestants of Germany and Switzerland, and with this view he convened the Marburg Conference in 1529, to effect, if possible, a reconciliation between Luther and Zwingli. His plans failed, and he was suspected by the Lutherans of sympathy with the Zwinglians. He left Augsburg in 1530, and succeeded in forming the Smalcaldian League. His work prospered, and it seemed as if he might be able to advance the Reformation greatly by his influence and unwearied energy; but this influence was almost forfeited by a marriage with Margarethe von der Saal while his wife was yet living, to which, however, his wife and the great Reformers gave their consent. The matter was kept a profound secret for some time, but when made public the Landgrave found that his authority was lost, and after the Smalcaldian war [1546-7] he was imprisoned by the Emperor Charles V. for five years, through the treachery of his son-in-law, Maurice of Saxony, his people not having sufficient sympathy with him to attempt his release. He was compelled to retract most of his opinions, and helped to reconcile Protestants and Roman Catholics at Naumburg and Worms.

Philip Neri, St. [NERI, PHILIP.]

Philip, St., AND St. JAMES'S DAY.—This festival is kept on May 1st. St. Philip was martyred at Hierapolis, in Phrygia, by crucifixion, or, according to another tradition, by being hanged to a pillar. St. James, "the Lord's brother," is also surnamed "the Less," to distinguish him from the brother of John, probably from being less in stature or younger in years than his namesake; and "the Just," according to Hegesippus, on account "of his exceeding righteousness." He was hurled from a pinnacle of the temple, and his brains beaten out with a fuller's club [A.D. 62]. No reason is known for coupling these two names, but they are associated in the Sacramentary of Gregory and in the Lectionary of St. Jerome, as in the English Prayer Book.

Philippists.—Followers of Philip Melancthon, and distinguished as endeavouring, but without success, to bring about a union between Protestant bodies, especially Lutherans and Calvinists.

Phillimore, SIR ROBERT JOSEPH, BART. [b. at Whitehall, Nov. 5th, 1810; d. at Henley-on-Thames, Feb. 4th, 1885]. Having taken his degree at Christ Church, Oxford, he became an advocate at Doctor's Commons in 1839, and was called to the Bar in 1841; became Chancellor of the dioceses of Oxford, Salisbury, and Chichester, and Commissary of the Chapters of St. Paul's and Westminster; Judge of the Cinque Ports and Admiralty Advocate, 1855; Queen's Advocate-General, 1862; Dean of Arches, and Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, 1867; Master of the Faculties, 1871; and Justice in the Probate and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, 1875. He early became noted for his success as an advocate in ecclesiastical cases, and took part in all the prominent cases of ecclesiastical litigation which have had so marked an influence on modern Church history, notably that of Archdeacon Denison [1857]; "Poole v. the Bishop of London" [1859]; and the case of Essays and Reviews [1862]. His chief works as a legal author are Ecclesiastical Law of the Church of England and Commentaries on International Law, both of which hold a foremost place among law-books. The second gained for him a membership in the Institute of France.

Phillpotts, HENRY, D.D., Bishop of Exeter [b. 1778, d. 1869], was born at Bridgewater, and was the son of a wholesale brickmaker. He received his education at the College School, Gloucester, and at Corpus Christi, Oxford. In 1795 he was elected a Fellow of Magdalen. On his marriage, in 1804, he gave up his Fellowship, and in 1806 became Chaplain to Dr. Shute Barrington, Bishop of Durham. He first distinguished himself in theological controversy by publishing a defence of an episcopal charge delivered by Dr. Barrington, whose remarks had been attacked by the Roman Catholic historian, Dr. Lingard. Three years afterwards he was made Prebendary of Durham, and held the cure of one of the largest parishes in that city for ten years, when he was preferred to the rich rectory of Stanhope. In 1821 he took his D.D., and in 1825 he entered into controversy with Mr. Charles Butler, the author of The Book of the Roman Catholic Church. Dr. Phillpotts published his answer in an octavo volume, entitled Letters to Charles Butler, Esq., on the Theological Parts of his Book of the Roman Catholic Church, with Remarks on Certain Works of Dr. Milner and Dr.

Lingard, and on some Parts of the Evidence of Dr. Doyle before the Committee of the Houses of Parliament. In the ensuing year Dr. Phillpotts followed up the controversy by the publication of A Supplemental Letter to Charles Butler, Esq., on some Parts of the Evidence given by the Irish Roman Catholic Bishops, particularly Dr. Doyle, before the Committee of the Two Houses of Parliament in the Session of 1825; and also on Certain Passages in Dr. Doyle's Essay on the Catholic Claims. In the year 1827, when the question of Roman Catholic Emancipation occupied so much public attention, Dr. Phillpotts published two Letters to Mr. Canning, in which he insisted, as he had done before in a Letter to Earl Grey, that the claims of the Catholics to political enfranchisement ought not to be conceded "without adequate securities for the Church of England." In 1828 he accepted the Deanery of Chester, and in 1830 became Bishop of Exeter. As the income of the See was only £2,700, he endeavoured to get permission to keep the rectory of Stanhope, worth £5,000 a year, in conjunction with the bishopric. This the Government refused, but suffered him to enjoy his Durham prebend, worth not much less, until his death. In Parliament, from 1830 to 1841, he was a bitter antagonist of the Whig Ministry. He was a most determined opponent of the Reform Bill, Irish Church Reform, National Education, the Ecclesiastical Commission, and the New Poor Law. He was a zealous maintainer of what he believed to be the rights, doctrines, and duties of the Church, and in his zeal involved himself in manifold litigations with both the clergy and laity of Devonshire. The most notable case was that of his refusal to institute the Rev. G. C. Gorham, on the ground of his imperfect belief in the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. [GORHAM CASE.] The case was decided against him, and he ever after that time refrained from any conspicuous action in the politics of the Church. He was a courageous defender of "sisterhoods" at a time when they were highly unpopular, and took the part of Miss Sellon at Devonport when a fierce outcry was raised against her. He died at Bishopstowe, near Torquay, in his 92nd year. A fortnight before his death he had tendered his resignation of the See, but he died before the legal arrangements were completed.

Philo.—A Jew of Alexandria [b. probably a few years B.C., d. during the reign of the Emperor Claudius]. Of his life nothing is known beyond what can be gathered from his writings. He was of noble family, of the sect of the Pharisees, and was well acquainted with the Old Testament Scriptures, as appears from his numerous writings. About 39 or 40 A.D. Philo was appointed to the head of an embassy sent by the Jews of Alexandria to the Emperor Caligula to petition him for redress from the injustice of the Imperial Governor Publius Avilius Flaccus. The manner in which the ambassadors were treated induced Philo to write his book Contra Flaccum. At different times he visited Jerusalem and other parts of Palestine; and it is said that he made another journey to Rome in the reign of Claudius, but the story is surrounded by legends and is probably not true. The works of Philo are divided into three parts: the first containing Cosmopoetica, the second Historica, and the third Juridica seu Legalia. The influence of Philo's writings upon both Jewish, and through that upon Christian, theology and thought, has been profound. He had practically mastered all the learning of his time, and his object was to show that the Divine revelation as given to the Jews was consistent with the highest philosophy known to the ancients, and especially with that of Plato. From the bold anthropomorphism of the Jewish Scriptures he argued the absolute necessity of a symbolic or allegorical meaning, which required study and systematic interpretation—a doctrine carried to still greater lengths in modern days by SWEDENBORG [q.v.]. This allegorical doctrine is carried much further in the first division of his works than in the last; but he does not deny also the literal sense, which is, as it were, the vehicle of the spiritual.

In Philo's system of Theistic philosophy God is the one ideally good and perfect Being, as with PLATO [q.v.]. As such He is incomprehensible and inscrutable, but as Creator He manifests Himself to man, and is then the "Beginning, the Name, the Word;" and this manifestation is as natural to Him as burning is to great heat. On the other hand exists a formless chaos, which God has determined to fashion into a universe; but to bring such different existences into relation, an intermediary is required. This is found in the Locos [q.v.] or Word, and in still lower intelligent existences. The Locos is at different times represented as a High Priest, the Image of God, His Shadow, the instrument of Creation, the first-born Son, the Archangel, and so on; and Philo also identifies him with the Lord, or Angel of the Covenant, who so often appeared to the Patriarchs.

In the Book of Wisdom we probably see a slightly earlier form of Philo's doctrine engrafted upon Judaism, Wisdom being, in this book, personified much in the same real sense as the Logos of Philo. By the heathen philosophers the system of thought out of which Philo's grew was corrupted into Gnosticism. On the other hand, its relation to, and influence upon, Christian theology can be clearly traced in St. John's phraseology concerning the Logos or Word, and the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which also gives striking examples of the allegorical method of interpretation Philo so largely adopted, and which so profoundly influenced ORIGEN [q.v.] and other Christian Fathers. But as Farrar well points out, while Philo's conception, splendid as it is, is vague, and only floats in the air, the difference between it and that of the Apostles "is as wide as that between the living and the dead." "The four words of St. John, 'The Word became flesh,' created an epoch," and tell us more, and give us a more definite conception, than all which Philo and Plato wrote, though it was given to them, not only to see through a glass darkly much of the truth, but also to prepare the way for the coming of its kingdom.

Phonascus [Gr. phōnaskeō, "to practise the voice"].—In the ancient church, a precentor, or leader of the choir.

Photinus, Bishop of Sirmium [b. at Ancyra], and a pupil of Marcellus. He held that our Lord began to be Christ only when the Holy Ghost descended upon Him at His baptism. This doctrine was condemned by the Synod of Antioch in 344, and by that of Milan in 345. In 351 a Synod, which was assembled at Sirmium to consider his writings, condemned them; Photinus offered to defend them in opposition to Basil of Ancyra, and finally, on his persisting in holding and publishing heretical doctrines, he was deposed from his See. It is not certain how long his party held together, but they are mentioned as being in existence in 381. None of his writings have survived.

Photius.—Patriarch of Constantinople [b. at the beginning of the ninth century, d. 891], the son of noble and rich parents, and of great reputation as a statesman. Although he was a layman, he was appointed to the Patriarchate in opposition to Ignatius, who had been nominated by the Empress Theodora during the minority of her son Michael III. The patron of Photius was Bardas, the uncle of Michael III., who persuaded Gregory of Syracuse to promote him, within six days, through the orders of monk, lector, sub-deacon, deacon, and presbyter, to the position of patriarch. Ignatius was banished to Terebintha, but secured the support of many influential clergy, and wrote to the Pope demanding to be reinstated as patriarch. The supporters of Photius gained the victory, and he himself took the opportunity to create a breach between the Eastern and Western Churches, and, after calling together a synod in 867, he excommunicated the Pope. Shortly afterwards Michael III. was assassinated, and his successor recalled Ignatius, and caused Photius to be deposed, treated with ignominy, and imprisoned. He was released after a few years, returned to Constantinople, where he became reconciled to Ignatius, and became Patriarch on the death of the latter in 878. The Pope refused to recognise his claims, and he was regarded with dislike by the people; finally he was suspected of robbery and intrigue, and banished in 886 by the Emperor Leo to Armenia, where he remained until his death. Of his numerous works, by far the most valuable is the Bibliotheca, containing the names and short accounts of 248 authors, many of whom are unknown except from this work.

Piarists.—The Fathers of the Pious Schools, an institution founded by Joseph Calasanz at the end of the sixteenth century, sanctioned as a congregation by Pope Paul V. in 1617 (and therefore sometimes called Paulinians), and formed into an order by Gregory XV. in 1621. The object was at first to give poor children a religious education, and instruct them in reading and writing only; but afterwards a good modern education, including Latin, Greek, and philosophy, was given. They experienced some trouble from the jealousy of the Jesuits, but in 1870 numbered 2,000 religious. They have never entered Great Britain or France, but are chiefly confined to Italy, Spain, and Austro-Hungary. In the latter country there are said to be 20,000 children under their care.

Picards.—The name of a sect who, according to Sylvius and Varillas, carried the principles of the ADAMITES [q.v.] to the extravagance of going without clothes. It sprang up in the beginning of the fifteenth century, and took its name from Picard, a Fleming, who set it on foot. He travelled from Flanders into Germany, where it is said he deceived a great many people by his impostures. The Jesuit Balbinus, however, in his account brings no such charges, which many believe to have been mere calumnies charged against him on account of his denunciation of the Church of Rome; and Schlehta, secretary to King Ladislas of Bohemia, in his letters to Erasmus, gives an account from which it would appear the Picards were merely a division of the Vaudois or Waldenses. Picard settled at Tabor, near the river Lüschnitz, in Bohemia; was attacked by Zisca, and he and all his followers were killed, with the exception of two, who were saved that they might give an account of their opinions.

Pie.—The Ordinale or Pie was a table of directions for finding the services for the day in the old Office books, a process of some complexity. It is referred to in the preface to the Prayer Book "Concerning the Service of the Church" as follows:—

"The number and hardness of the rules called the Pie, and the manifold changings of the service, was the cause, that to turn the book only was so hard and intricate a matter that many times there was more business to find out what should be read, than to read it when it was found out."

The name "Pie" or "Pica" was in general use about the fifteenth century. Two derivations are proposed: [1] From the initial letter [pi] of the Greek word pinax, "a table or index." [2] From the Latin pica, "a magpie," so called from its pied or particoloured appearance, alluding to the employment of different coloured letters. [Cf. the phrase "the Pied Piper of Hamelin."] The printer's technical term "pie," applied to type in a state of confusion, is supposed to have been borrowed from the name of this index.

Pietists.—A party in the Lutheran Church formed first about the middle of the seventeenth century at Leipzig by Spener. He considered that the Bible was neglected in the studies ordered for young men at the University, and organised lectures and meetings for its more careful study. His preaching at Strassburg, Frankfort, and Dresden had great effect, and he insisted on a holy life in both teachers and taught. For this purpose, he formed schools called Collegia Pietatis, where men and women met together for prayer and instruction, and thence carried their influence throughout the land. The scheme was treated with some contempt, and those who took it up were nicknamed Pietists, on account of their alleged excessive piety as regards outward behaviour. The movement certainly did a great deal of good to society, instilling a purity of devotion in home life whose effects were lasting; and to it were due the foundation of German and Danish missions to the heathen. Amongst Spener's disciples were FRÄNCKE [q.v.], Thomasius, the Professor of Leipzig and Halle, and Bengel, the great commentator. Their teaching gained ground at Leipzig, but some of the more extreme Pietists so irritated the old school of theologians by their denunciation of the mere doctrinalism of many ministers in the Church, that at last the Docents were obliged to leave Leipzig. Frederick William I. of Brandenburg established the University of Halle in 1694, and through Spener's influence his friends found a refuge there, and it became the home of Pietistic professors, who first prelected on Scripture and founded the great exegetical literature of Germany. Afterwards they came into collision with the University of Wittenberg. Little more is heard of the party in the history of the Church till the beginning of the present century, when it was at the height of its power. It was entirely the result of the new wave of Evangelical teaching which passed all through Europe about the same time—waking men's consciences, making them dissatisfied with the rationalistic creed which had been considered sufficient the century before, and counterbalancing the refined indifference to religion which we find in the works of Goethe and some of his contemporaries. The work was to a great extent carried on by a publication called the Evangelical Church Journal. The views held by the members of this party were decidedly narrow.

As a groundwork they took the teaching of either Luther or Calvin, but further proceeded to say, that those only who also held these views could hope to be saved; and it was in consequence of this that several famous and learned divines, Neander amongst others, refused to join their ranks. It was not to be expected that the various members in all parts of Germany [for it was in that country that Pietism was principally developed] would think exactly alike. One province wanted the work carried on in one way and another in another; and the consequence was that various communities were formed. The most famous of these was that which established itself at Kornthal, near Würtemberg. It was not in the least schismatic, taking the Augsburg Confession as its basis, but it made several minor alterations in the Lutheran Liturgy, and claimed absolute right to settle its own affairs independently of the ordinary ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Würtemberg. The community is still in a flourishing condition, the church well attended, and the agricultural department a pattern to the surrounding country. Some of the schools, too, are so famous that many boys from America and England are sent there for their education. The population at the present time is about 1,000.

Pilgrimage.—A religious discipline, which consists in making a journey to some place in order to adore the relics of a saint, or to visit the scene of some event in sacred history. Pilgrimages were first made about the fourth century, and speedily came into use as an effectual means of penance, the most celebrated places of devotion being Jerusalem, Rome, Tours and Compostella. The custom of going on pilgrimages reached its height about the eleventh and twelfth centuries, when it was followed by all classes of society, from kings to peasants. The Church granted indulgences and special privileges to those who visited certain places of devotion, and some made it their calling in life to travel from one shrine to another. At some places, as at Loretto, and in our own days at Lourdes, it was said that the Virgin Mary had appeared and ordained that they should be consecrated to her service; while at others relics of saints were said to exist which had wonderful powers for the healing or sanctification of those who visited them. In almost every country pilgrimages have been common. In England, the shrine of Thomas à Becket was the chief resort of the pious; in Scotland, St. Andrew's; in Ireland, various places. The practice has been discontinued among the Protestants, but is still in favour in Roman Catholic countries, and innumerable shrines are held sacred, and visited for the expiation of sins or the healing of infirmities. Pilgrimages are not confined to Roman Catholics; they are common among Mahometans, Hindus, and Jews, and are connected with all kinds of superstitions.

Pilgrimage of Grace. [GRACE, PILGRIMAGE OF.]

Pilgrim Fathers.—The name usually given to those Nonconformist Puritans who first emigrated to New England. They had first fled from persecution in England to Holland, where small communities of Protestant Dissenters began to form about 1586; but a further impulse was given to the movement in 1608, when JOHN ROBINSON and a small company of Independents, in spite of attempts to prevent their even leaving the country, also emigrated to Holland. There, however, their situation was forlorn in the extreme: the language and manners around them were strange, and they had to find subsistence under such disadvantages that—in the words of one of them—"poverty came upon them like an armed man from whom they could not fly." Removing to Leydén, and congregating together, they did better; but they hungered for their own language, and English laws and nationality. All the lands of North America had been granted to two great companies, known as the London and the Western; and about 1617 negotiations were opened with the London Company for power to form a distinct plantation of their own distant from any other. Both the King and the Bishops made great difficulties about religion, to meet which the Puritans agreed to seven Articles assenting to the Confession of the Church of England and to the Royal supremacy; and in 1617 their patent was granted. They chartered the Speedwell of 60 tons from Delft Haven, and the Mayflower of 180 tons from the Thames; and on July 22nd, 1620, as many as the small vessel could accommodate—only a small minority—left Delft Haven under the care of William Brewster, JOHN ROBINSON [q.v.] remaining behind to take charge of the remainder, till they could follow. They left, after a solemn leaving-taking and religious service, for Southampton, where the Mayflower joined them, and they set sail; but twice had to put back for repairs to the small vessel—it was subsequently proved owing to misrepresentations of the captain. Finally the Mayflower alone left England, on Sept. 6th, 1620, and reached Cape Cod on Nov. 9th. There they bound themselves into a body politic, and sent a boat on an exploring expedition; and, finally, on Dec. 17th, 1620, they landed on Plymouth Rock, to found the colony of New England, again solemnly committing themselves to God in prayer.

Their chief leaders at that time were William Brewster, Elder of the Church; John Bradford, so often Governor of the colony; Edward Winslow, and Miles Standish, the military commander. The heaven was cloudy, the cold severe, the rain and snow pitiless; and for several months their privations were extreme. For years they were threatened alternately by starvation and extermination by the savages; but how they triumphed over these obstacles constitutes largely the early history of the United States, and need not be recounted here.

On June 24th, 1629, another colony in union with Plymouth was founded, under John Endicott, at Salem, Massachusetts. This colony included Francis Higginson, a Puritan who had been driven from the Anglican ministry for his opinions, and many like-minded, who desired to retain what they considered true in their historic Church. Higginson had said on deck to his people, as the English cliffs receded from view: "We do not go to New England as separatists from the Church of England, though we cannot but separate from the corruptions in it." But it soon appeared that the more rigid Puritans had no real conception of the toleration they claimed, and ere long all the prominent Anglican Puritans were violently seized and sent back to England. How this spirit grew is also, unfortunately, matter of history, and the rigidity of the persecution was rather increased than otherwise by the attempt to make the Church synonymous with the State, so that no man could have even rights of citizenship unless he were a communicant. The Book of Common Prayer became a "sinful violation of the worship of God," and the keeping even of Christmas Day was visited by a fine, as also was attendance at an Episcopal Church. Quakers were persecuted even to the death. Roger Williams was banished for no other crime than preaching full liberty of conscience, and the doors of Baptist meetings were nailed up. The simple fact is that none of the religious bodies—only a few rare spirits here and there—understood as yet religious toleration; and the history and deeds of the Pilgrim Fathers form a striking and somewhat grim proof of this. Much of their civil and religious system also failed. Their civil laws were copied closely from those of Moses; and the rebellion of human spirits against overstrictness produced at length a state of morals beneath the surface, which Cotton Mather vividly delineates. They also professed hyper-Calvinism almost without exception, a system which the human heart is never long able to bear without protest [see ELECTION], and thus, as at Geneva, so in America, many of the direct descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers are now Unitarians. But we may also study with profit, and even reverence, their better side—their simplicity, their love to the truth as they saw it, their earnestness, their manly independence; and, remembering these, need not wonder at the part they played in the history of the world.

Pineda, JOHN.—A Jesuit of noble birth, born at Seville about the middle of the sixteenth century. He was a good linguist, and wrote commentaries on various parts of the Bible, and some theological works. Died Jan. 27th, 1637.

Pinelli, DOMINIC [b. at Genoa, 1541; d. 1611], Cardinal, son of Paris Pinelli and Benedicta Spinola. He was educated as a lawyer, and his remarkable talents and learning brought him under the notice of Pope Pius V., who employed him in business at the Court. Pope Gregory XIII., successor to Pius V., had also a great regard for Pinelli, and promoted him to be Auditor of the Rota, Clerk of his Chapel, Chamberlain of the Church, and Cardinal. He also sent him as Legate to Roumania, which was in a state of disturbance, and which Pinelli succeeded in quieting. The Pope afterwards put him in command of the fleet, and intrusted him with the completion of the seventh book of Decretals. Pinelli wrote a tract concerning the Pope's authority, and an account of the lives of St. Francis and other saints.

Pinson, FRANCIS, a lawyer [b. at Bourges, 1612, d. at Paris, 1691]. Most of his works deal with ecclesiastical law, the prerogative of the sovereign in disposing of ecclesiastical benefices, etc.

Pisa, COUNCILS OF.—The first Council of Pisa was summoned in 1409 to endeavour to restore the unity of the Church; it was unsuccessful, for instead of getting rid of the two contending Popes, Gregory XII. and Benedict III., it added a third to their number in the person of Alexander V. [PAPAL SCHISM.]

The second Council of Pisa was of little importance. It was summoned in 1511, in the time of Pope Julius II., ostensibly for the reformation of the Church. It arose out of a quarrel between the Pope and Louis XII. of France because the former refused to renew the League of Cambrai. The Council was composed chiefly of French clergy, and after a few sessions they removed to Milan, where they cited the Pope to appear, and on his refusal gave sentence of his suspension. Julius meantime held a Council of Italians in the Lateran, who excommunicated the members of the Council of Pisa. Louis soon after losing all his Italian conquests, had to submit, and the Council was at an end.

Piscina.—A small drain, or sink, near the altar in a church, generally placed in a niche in the wall, to receive and carry off the water in which the priest washed his hands, and also that used for rinsing the chalice.

Pistoia, SYNOD OF.—A Council was held at Pistoia, in the north-east of Tuscany, in 1782, to consider some articles prepared by Leopold, the Grand Duke, who wished to introduce certain Jansenist changes in the discipline of the Tuscan Church. There were present 234 priests. Ricci, Bishop of Pistoia, was a great ally of Leopold, and the Jansenist doctrines of grace were approved of, principles of a spiritual democracy were asserted, and decrees were passed condemning devotion to the Sacred Heart, missions, use of Latin in the Mass, etc., and ordering the destruction of altars and images. This led to a revolt of the people, Ricci had to resign his See in 1787, and seven years later Pope Pius VII. published a Bull, Auctorem fidei, condemning the Pistoian decrees, and Ricci had to recant.

Pits, JOHN, was born at Alton, Hants, towards the close of the sixteenth century, and educated at Winchester, whence he was admitted to New College, Oxford. He became a Roman Catholic, and went to study at Douay, and afterwards at Rheims, where he was ordained priest. He retired into Lorraine, and was for some time confessor to the Duchess of Cleve, daughter of the Duke of Lorraine. Pits died in 1616. He was the author of treatises De Beatitudine, De Peregrinatione, De Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus.

Pius.—There have been nine Popes bearing this name. [POPE.] Of these, the most important were the following:—

Pius II. [Æneas Silvius Piccolomini] held the dignity from 1458 to 1464. He took his title of Pius in order to conjoin it with his former name Æneas. The Renaissance was in full swing, and Pius, following the foolish fashion, claimed for himself descent from Virgil's hero. It was much more serious that this fashion had extended itself in Italy to a revival of sheer heathenism, and Pius was not the only Pontiff whose religion was one of negations and infidelity. He was a man of shameful life, lecherous in youth, avaricious and grasping in old age.

Pius IV., whose name before was Giovanni Angelo Medici, was born on Easter Day, 1499, in Milan. He studied law, and in 1527 became Protonotary to the Curia under Clement VII. At the same time he gained the favour of the Cardinal Farnese, who, having been raised to the Papedom under the name of Paul III., made use of him in several embassies, conferred on him many benefices, and created him Cardinal on April 8th, 1549. Julius III. made him Legate of the army against the Duke of Parma. Paul IV. was, however, hostile to him; so he withdrew from Rome to his native town of Milan. On Paul's death he was recalled, and raised to the Papal Chair, being crowned on Jan. 6th, 1560. He is chiefly noted as having reopened the Council of Trent, Jan. 18th, 1562, and in spite of great difficulties it closed on Dec. 3rd, 1563. [TRENT, COUNCIL OF.] The well-known creed called the Creed of Pius IV., or the Tridentine Creed, was issued as an embodiment of all the doctrines defined in that Council. He died on Dec. 9th, 1565, having occupied the Chair nearly six years.

PIUS V., whose name had been Michael Christeri, was born at Bosco, in the Duchy of Milan, on Jan. 17th, 1504. He entered the Dominican Order, of which he became Professor, Preacher, and Superior, and afterwards was made Bishop of Satri and Cardinal by Paul IV. He was made Inquisitor-General of Lombardy, and was very zealous in repressing the Reformation. He became Bishop of Mondovi, and was chosen successor to Pius IV., Jan. 8th, 1566. He immediately set himself to regulate his house, to reform the clergy, and to enforce the decrees of the Council of Trent. Under his government the Inquisition exercised great severity. He aided Charles IX. of France in his war against the Protestants with an army of 4,400 foot and 700 horse. He excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, absolving her subjects from their allegiance. He also joined arms with the King of Spain, and took part in the Battle of Lepanto, Oct. 7th, 1571. He died May 1st, 1572, having been Pope for six years.

PIUS VI. became Pope in 1775. The early days of his pontificate were embittered by the struggles between the Jesuits and the States of Europe. The Emperor Joseph II. made several enactments striking at their power: thus, in 1781, he dissolved all connection between the religious orders and their generals outside his dominions; in 1784 he levied a tax on pilgrimages; in 1785 ordered the removal of side altars in churches, and in 1786 that the Mass should be said in the vernacular. But the Belgian revolution compelled him to see to the stability of his throne, and his ecclesiastical legislation came to nought. He died in 1790, but the Pope's troubles were renewed with the outbreak of the French Revolution. The Pope fought in vain against the oath demanded of the priests by the Revolutionary Government, and he had to submit to terms from Bonaparte. Nor was this all: riots broke out in Rome, the Pope's army was subjugated, and he was sent as a prisoner to Dijon, where he died in 1799.

PIUS VII. succeeded him, and was able to establish a Concordat with France, and went, though unwillingly, to Paris to crown Napoleon. But their relations became more and more strained, and at length Napoleon made him a prisoner at the Vatican and carried him to Fontainebleau. He was forced to sign a Concordat renouncing his temporal power; but afterwards repudiated it, and Napoleon had to acquiesce. He returned to Rome in 1814, and the strength which he had gained was proved by his being able to re-establish the Jesuits. [JESUITS.]

PIUS IX. [b. 1792, d. 1878] was born at Sinigaglia, May 13th, 1792. His name was Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti, and his family of Lombard extraction. He received his education at the Ecclesiastical College of Volterra, which he quitted in 1810. Five years later he entered the Guardia Nobile of the Vatican; but he soon chose the ecclesiastical profession, was ordained, and for several years was chaplain to some hospitals in Rome, and enjoyed the good-will of Pius VII., though filling no post at his Court. In 1823 he went out in the suite of Monsignor Muzzi, Apostolic Vicar in Chili, and travelled over a considerable part of South America. On his return Leo XII. made him Prelate in his household, gave him a canonry in Santa Maria di Via Lata, and named him President of St. Michael's Hospital in Via Grande. In 1827 he was created Archbishop of Spoleto, and in 1832 transferred to the See of Imola. In the interval Leo XII. had died [1829], and had been followed by Pius VIII., after whose death, in 1831, Gregory XVI. came to the throne. Those were years of great political commotion throughout Europe, and specially in Italy and the Roman States, where the successors of Pius VII. had departed from the mild and wise rule introduced at his restoration by Cardinal Consalvi, and had aggravated their temporal misrule by the reckless exercise of spiritual tyranny. The accession of Gregory was the signal for an insurrectionary outbreak in Central Italy, and Mastai-Ferretti, in his diocese of Spoleto, had to stand the brunt of the movement, and had no little trouble in assuaging the violent passions which raged around him; but his reputation as a man of liberal and benevolent opinions greatly aided him. His removal from the archbishopric of Spoleto to the bishopric of Imola was probably owing to the displeasure of Gregory at Mastai-Ferretti's humane and enlightened views of a Pontifical Government. At Imola he remained true to his liberal views, and shone as a reformer of abuses, encouraging a more extensive knowledge in his diocesan seminary; he founded an Accademia Biblica, somewhat on the plan of the Protestant Bible Societies, aiming at the diffusion of Hebrew history and the discussion of Scriptural subjects. He enjoyed a great popularity in his diocese, where he was called "the good Bishop." He was sent on a mission to Naples, and while there the cholera broke out, and he disposed of his plate and furniture in order to bestow their proceeds on the sufferers. He was made a Cardinal in 1840, assuming the title of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus, and continued to reside in his diocese till 1846, when Gregory XVI. died. The Conclave to elect his successor met on June 14th, and the two parties of the Sacred College had each their favourite candidate; those who wished for moderation choosing the Bishop of Imola, while those who clung to the old system put forward the Secretary of State, Cardinal Lambruschini. Mastai-Ferretti was elected by thirty-six out of the fifty voters present, and was crowned on June 21st, 1846, with the title of Pius IX. The first act of his pontificate was to release from their prison all the political offenders placed there by his predecessors, it is said to the number of 2,000; he recalled all exiles and restored them to their civil rights on the sole condition of their signing a declaration of allegiance. This act was received with acclamation, and created a perfect frenzy in the Catholic world throughout Europe. Austria and France, however, were greatly displeased at the Pope's measures of reform. In the great struggle of 1848 he refused to fight against Austria in defence of his Italian subjects, and on a rising of the populace in Rome he saw no way of safety except in flight, in which he was assisted by the Bavarian minister, Count Spaur, who conveyed him safely over the frontier, Nov. 24th, 1848. He took refuge at Gaëta, under the protection of Naples, and went thence to Portici, and it was not till April, 1850, that he returned to Rome. Pius IX. was now an altered man; he seemed to repent of his short whim of patriotism and liberalism, and he gave up all personal rule and allowed himself to be guided entirely by the unscrupulous Cardinal Antonelli, who had shared his exile, and whom he made his Secretary of State. The Pope felt that his political career on the throne had been a failure; but he still clung to the fond conceit that his pontificate was destined to eclipse the glory of his most renowned predecessors. So now he turned to the Church that attention which before his flight he had almost exclusively bestowed on the State. He summoned Jesuit theologians to his side, reconstituted their scattered order, and canonised saints, lavished indulgences, countenanced miracles, attempted and enforced conversions, marked out new dioceses in Protestant communities, and at last ventured on subtle polemic discussions and daring definitions of new dogmas. Thus, he proclaimed the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, Dec. 8th, 1854, and the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, July, 1870. By degrees his dominions were wrested from him, and on Sept. 20th, 1870, Rome itself, and with it ended the temporal power of Pius IX. The Vatican alone was left him, and to that palace and its garden he confined himself year after year. From thence he filled the world with his grievances by means of endless encyclical letters, freely printed in Italian and other newspapers. He lived to the age of eighty-six, dying Feb. 7th, 1878. His pontificate lasted thirty-six years, the longest on record.

Placet [placetum regium, regium ezequatur, littera parealis].—A confirmation of Church law, Papal bulls, or briefs, formerly required to be given by the State before such law could be put into execution. This was made compulsory in England by the Statute of Præmunire, 1393, which "vindicated the right of the Church of England to prohibit the admission or the execution of all Papal bulls or briefs within the realm." In the Roman Catholic Church it is no longer in force as regards matters of doctrine, ritual, or the Sacraments; in other matters it is simply limited to an appeal to the Pope, made by the bishops if any constitution appears to them to be unfitted for enforcement in their diocese. The Pope denies the right of the State to interfere in ecclesiastical matters, and all who attempt to prevent the carrying out of a Papal decree are under a penalty of excommunication; but, nevertheless, concessions are occasionally made in order to prevent disturbance.

Platina, BARTHOLOMEUS [b. in Cremona, 1421; d. at Rome, 1481]. He was the son of poor parents of the name of Sacchi, and the name of Platina refers to the place Platina, or Piadena, where he was born. He went to Rome, where his talents brought him under the notice of Pope Pius II., who appointed him Apostolical Abbreviator; and Sixtus IV. afterwards made him Assistant Librarian at the Vatican. He wrote Opus in Vitis Summorum Pontificum, published at Venice in 1479, which gives an account of the lives of the Popes from Eugenius IV. to the death of Paul II. He died of the plague at Rome. He wrote a history of the city of Mantua and other works.

Plato, the greatest writer of heathen philosophy, was born at Athens B.C. 429. Of the details of his early life little is known. He was well educated, and devoted the early years of his life to writing poetry; but at the age of twenty became acquainted with SOCRATES [q.v.], and in consequence gave up poetry, and devoted the rest of his long life to the study of philosophy. It is related by the biographer of the Greek philosophers, that once upon a time Socrates dreamed that he found an unfledged cygnet on his knee. In a few moments it became winged, and flew away, uttering sweet sounds. Next day Plato came, and Socrates felt his dream fulfilled. From that time Plato becomes so identified with his master that his individuality is almost lost. Some of the writings attributed to him are certainly spurious, though some fragments of them may be genuine, giving us some information respecting his travels in Sicily. The form which Plato chose to express his philosophy, that of the dialogue, was not an invention intended to present his truth in attractive form. It was because he was desirous from his heart to elucidate truth, and to give all sides full consideration. Many doubts and objections expressed are frivolous, but they are such as suggest themselves to many minds, and, therefore, have to be met. "The dialogues of Plato," says an English philosopher, "are literally an education explaining to us how we are to deal with our own minds, how far we are to humour them, how far we are to resist them; how they are to entertain the glimpses of light which sometimes fall upon them; how they are to make their way through the complications and darkness in which they so often feel themselves lost. Nowhere but in the sacred oracles do we find an author so cognisant of our own perplexities, so little anxious to hide them from us; nay, so anxious to awaken us to the consciousness of them, in order that we may be delivered from them. Herein lies the art of Plato. Most consummate art it is we admit; superior in the depth of insight which must have led to it, and in the influence which it exerts, to that which is displayed in almost any human composition. Still, it is not art, in the sense commonly given to that word; it has no independent purpose of pleasing. It does not work underground, leaving the ordinary man to feel its effects simply, and the thoughtful man to judge of its character by its effects. On the contrary, it anxiously draws your attention to its own methods and contrivances: that you should enter into them, and understand all the springs and valves that are at work, is as much the writer's ambition as that you should accept any one of the final results. Indeed, he does not acknowledge the result as yours, till in the region of your own inner being you have gone through the processes which lead to them." [Maurice's Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy. "Ancient," p. 129.]

The fundamental principle of Plato's doctrine is probably that which was known to the Schoolmen as that of UNIVERSALS [q.v.], i.e. the assertion that there is a constant character which repeats itself in every sample of any natural kind, an invariable attribute, which makes that object what it is, whilst individual members of that class have variable accidents. The essential attribute he called the idea—that was the ultimate reality. No object that comes before us in the physical world completely fulfils our idea. I have an idea of a man, but no one man fulfils the whole idea when I hear the word "man." But so far as the thing coalesces with the thought, the abiding essence is present. And these ideals rise in rank, the lower rise into the higher, even until they reach One Supreme, in whom all ideas and all thoughts are centred. Dr. Martineau in his masterly and exhaustive examination of the Platonic philosophy thus discriminates its main principles:—" [1] The proper end of man is not pleasure or the contentment of the sensitive nature, but a good which may run counter to this, and the chief elements of which are truth, beauty, right. These are to be sought on their own account as having intrinsic and ultimate worth. [2] This good, though including the just regulation of the active principles of conduct, does not terminate here, but takes in also the right direction of the rational powers. [3] The good which supplies the proper human aim is not merely subjective and dependent on the constitution of the human faculties; it has an objective reality, which would remain though we were not. Ere anything perishable arose, it was. It existed separately, and justifies, therefore, its assumption of the name God. [4] This highest good exists in us and out of us. Its various types, embodied in the visible universe, are also indigenous treasures of the human mind, which has pre-existed as well as they, and been familiar with them in an earlier state. Whatever is good is evolved from us by appeal to memory; virtue is learning, and learning is remembrance. [5] It follows from this that our relation to God as the Divine ground and source of the universe is a relation of likeness, arising from identity of essence—of the little to the great, the mixed and disguised to the pure and clear, the partial copy to the perfect original." [Types of Ethical Theory, vol. i. pp. 84–86.] The learned author shows in a very grand passage which follows where the Platonic idea fell short of the Christian.

Platonism has been made by Providence one of the most powerful handmaids of Christianity. It underlies the grand philosophy of the apocryphal books of "Ecclesiasticus" and the "Wisdom of Solomon," writings of Alexandrian Jews who had drunk deep of the Platonic writings. PHILO's teaching concerning the Logos was derived from the same source, and St. John was inspired to show how far he was right, and how the ideals had been fulfilled in the Incarnate Word. The Alexandrian divinity was Platonic [NEO-PLATONISTS; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA], and some of the greatest of English philosophers have drawn their doctrines from the same fountains. [COLERIDGE. See next article.]

Platonists, CAMBRIDGE.—In the seventeenth century a number of graduates, fellows, tutors, and masters of colleges in the Cambridge University, most of them from Emmanuel College, revived the study of Plato and his philosophy, and therefore were called the Cambridge Platonists. They were chiefly of Puritan origin and sympathies, but their great aim was to sink all minor differences and endeavour to find a basis of broad Catholic Christian views, in which charity should be the living principle. They were true and devoted Churchmen and believed all the Christian doctrines, yet looked on them from a Platonic point of view, endeavouring to assimilate the doctrines of Plato, and to apply to them the distinctive Christian doctrines. The four chief Platonists were Benjamin Whichcote, John Smith, Henry More, and Ralph Cudworth, accounts of whom will be found under their several names.

Among the minor members were Simon Patrick, John Worthington, while some members of Oxford University, as Joseph Glanvil and John Wilkins, were also so closely connected with the Cambridge Platonists that they are counted as belonging to the same school of thought.

Plenary Indulgence is the remission of all the temporal punishment due to sin. [INDULGENCES.] Plenary indulgences are granted in England at the eight great festivals of the Roman Church, and are sometimes granted by the Pope to the whole Church on solemn occasions, such as a jubilee. They may also be gained by the recitation of certain prayers, or by the performance of good works prescribed by the Church, provided that the person desirous of gaining them be in a state of grace, and penitent for the sins committed. It is also believed that plenary indulgences can be granted to the dead for the remission of the pains of purgatory. Plenary indulgences have been granted largely to confraternities, to the use of certain crucifixes and rosaries, and to pilgrimages to the chief churches at Rome or elsewhere.

Pliny the Younger—so called to distinguish him from his uncle, the celebrated naturalist, whose adopted son he was, and who perished in the great eruption of Vesuvius—was a disciple of Quintilian, and appears to have been, though a heathen, an amiable and just, as well as an able and learned man. He was the friend and favourite of the Emperor Trajan, and while Consul, he delivered in the Senate a panegyric on his patron, which is still extant. In A.D. 103 he was sent as Governor to Bithynia, and there found a state of things which alarmed him. The progress of Christianity had been such that the heathen temples were almost deserted, and the sellers of victims for sacrifice could find no purchasers for their wares; people of both sexes, of all ages and ranks, had adopted the "foreign superstition." And this was not confined to the cities—it had spread to villages and rural districts.

There was then, probably, no definite enactment directed against the Christians; but, nevertheless, they were generally treated as offenders. Their refusal to worship the image of the Emperor, or to sacrifice to idols for his safety, and, more than all, their nocturnal meetings, caused them to be suspected of disaffection towards the Government. Besides this, it was popularly reported and believed that they practised abominable and revolting rites at their secret meetings: for instance, that they were in the habit of killing new-born infants, tearing them in pieces, and drinking their blood. These fictions, though they may not have been believed by Pliny, could not but heighten the feelings of suspicion and dislike with which the Christians were regarded. Accordingly, Pliny never doubted that it was his duty to punish Christians, but he was uncertain as to the amount of punishment and the mode of trial. To satisfy his mind he addressed to the Emperor a letter [Ep. 96, book x.], which is famous as containing a testimony to the piety and good general character of the Christians, a testimony which is peculiarly valuable as coming from an enemy, and one who had thoroughly investigated the subject.

In this Epistle he makes particular inquiries on three main points: [1] whether young and old should receive the same punishment; [2] whether those who recanted should be pardoned; and [3] whether the very fact of being a Christian was in itself an offence, although no other crime could be brought home to the person charged. He then goes on to describe what had hitherto been his own method of procedure: First, he asked the accused if they acknowledged themselves Christians. Next, if they did not deny the accusation, he repeated the question, with a threat of death for refusing to renounce their opinions. Then, if they still adhered to their profession, he ordered them to be led away to execution. "never doubting that stubbornness and inflexible obstinacy ought to be punished." He states that he had examined several against whom anonymous charges had been preferred, but these all abjured Christianity, invoked the gods, offered supplications with wine and frankincense to the image of the Emperor, and reviled the name of Christ, "with none of which things," he says, "can they who are really Christians be induced to comply." Some of these persons, however, confessed that they had once been Christians, but had long recanted, some as long as twenty years before. From them he gathered the following particulars concerning the superstition:—Its adherents were in the habit of meeting together on a fixed day before it was light, singing hymns to Christ as a God, and binding themselves with an oath to abstain from thefts and adulteries. Then they separated, and met again to eat bread, which last practice, however, was given up when he published the Emperor's edict forbidding secret assemblies.

This account was confirmed in every particular by two maid-servants, whom he had examined by torture.

Trajan, in answer, assured Pliny that he approved of the measures he had taken. He instructed him that search was not to be made for Christians; but those who were brought before him were to be executed unless they recanted. If they recanted they were to be forgiven. He added that anonymous accusations were to be disregarded.

These letters are included amongst Pliny's Epistles, a collection of his correspondence in ten books. Their genuineness has been questioned, but there is no foundation for the doubt.

Pluralities Act.—By the statutes 1 and 2 Vict., cap. 106, and 13 and 14 Vict., cap. 98, it is now illegal for a clergyman to hold more than one benefice and one cathedral preferment at the same time. In 1885 was passed the PLURALITIES AMENDMENT ACT.

The chief provisions of this Act are as follows:—

[1] The definition of “ecclesiastical duties,” which are stated to include not only the regular and due performance of Divine Service on Sundays and Holy Days, but also all such duties as any clergyman holding a benefice is bound to perform, the performance of which is solemnly promised by every clergyman of the Church of England at the time of his ordination, and shall have been required of him by the bishop.

[2] A commission to consider any complaints for inadequate performance of the “ecclesiastical duties” of any benefice is for the future to consist of four members—one the archdeacon or rural dean; one a canon residentiary, prebendary, or honorary canon elected by the dean and chapter for three years; one a beneficed clergyman of the archdeaconry wherein the benefice is situated, elected by the beneficed clergy of such archdeaconry to serve for three years; one a layman in the commission of the peace for the county nominated by chairman of quarter sessions or lord lieutenant.

To such commission the incumbent complained of may add another commissioner, being either an incumbent of the diocese or a magistrate.

Another point in the Act is that the bishop may assign to any curate or curates, under certain circumstances, a sum not exceeding seventy pounds beyond that allowed now to curates in the care of non-resident incumbents, provided that such stipend or stipends shall not exceed the whole net annual income of the benefice.

Another provision enables the bishop to assign a stipend of not exceeding £200 to a curate during vacancy of a benefice.

Another gives power under special circumstances to the bishop to require an incumbent, even though resident, to nominate a curate to serve with him in the duties of the cure.

But it is provided that any clergyman may take and hold together, under due legal sanction, any two benefices, the churches of which are within four miles of one another by the nearest road, and the annual value of one of which does not exceed two hundred pounds.

Plymouth Brethren.—The name generally given, but not acknowledged by them (who call themselves simply “Brethren”), to a sect now divided into several, which sprang into existence without any precise date between the years 1826 and 1830; which has spread considerably in England, America, and the Continent, and which presents in its history, and not least in its errors and mistakes, points of considerable interest. Strange as it may appear in a body now become almost a byword for sectarian bitterness, the movement took its rise in a sincere desire after more Christian union amongst different denominations, informal meetings being held at private houses for united study of the Scriptures, and mutual edification on grounds common to all. This took place at first chiefly in Ireland, especially in Dublin, where the Anglican Church itself, as natural from local circumstances, possessed at that time a marked ultra-Protestant character. A little later it appeared, to some taking part in these meetings [nearly all of whom practically held Zwinglian views concerning the Lord’s Supper], that there was “nothing in Scripture” to hinder those thus meeting together from celebrating the Lord’s Supper amongst themselves; and this began to be done, one of the most prominent in these proceedings being Mr. Anthony Norris Groves, a gentleman who afterwards gave up a dentist’s practice worth £3,000 a year to go out as a missionary to Bagdad. About the year 1830 the movement was joined by the Rev. J. N. Darby, born in 1800, and a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, who up to 1827 had been a curate in the Church of England and Ireland, but who had left that body from conscientious motives. Darby’s strong character and considerable gifts in the exposition of Scripture gave him almost at once a commanding influence, and from the date of his accession the movement spread rapidly, especially at Plymouth, where he was joined by the Rev. Benjamin Wills Newton, another Anglican clergyman of great popularity, and the Rev. James L. Harris. Another early accession was the well-known Dr. Samuel Prideaux Tregelles.

Meeting at first on a footing of perfect equality as above stated, the body adopted, almost as a matter of course, the views of FRIENDS [q.v.] in regard to ministry, except that they have never allowed women to exercise ministerial gifts. They also adopted the practice, almost from the first, of a weekly observance of the Lord’s Supper. At this observance one of the elder brethren recites St. Paul’s account of the institution, in the manner usual among Dissenting bodies, and offers prayer and thanks before partaking of each of the elements. These are passed round from hand to hand, the bread being unseparated and a piece broken off by each in turn, as in their opinion a fitter symbol of the “One Bread” of which all partake. Their public ministry consists largely of exposition of the Scriptures, and there is usually considerable singing [without instrumental aid] and prayer in their meetings. Their theology is almost universally of a strong Calvinistic type, with in many places a considerable leaning to Antinomianism, and the majority of the communities hold Baptist views, and administer that Sacrament by immersion, though Mr. Darby himself and some of his followers advocated and practised infant baptism. As a rule Brethren are strong believers in what is known as the "literal and verbal" inspiration of the Scriptures, and accordingly study its letter with assiduity, and possess a large amount of Scripture knowledge of a certain kind, but with a strong tendency to mystical interpretation. The majority of them have generally held millenarian views respecting the second Advent of Christ.

As Methodists have their "class meetings" and Moravians their "love-feasts," so Brethren still maintain very commonly what they call "reading-meetings." Some of these are held in a public room; but ordinarily a more limited circle meet for tea at the house of one of their number, after which prayer is offered, and a portion of Scripture being read verse by verse, a general conversation takes place upon each verse, under the practical but informal presidency of one or more of the most experienced members present.

For eight or ten years Brethrenism spread rapidly: but from a very early period Darby's peculiar temperament led him to insist upon the duty of "coming out from among the sects," a view of Christian conduct which was foreign to the original intention, but was later formulated in a pamphlet entitled, Separation from Evil God's Principle of Unity. It was not perceived that, since the very "sects" themselves never professedly drew off from one another, but on many occasions sought to show and to profess their essential unity, to act thus was not only to establish a new sect, but to make it the most sectarian of any.* Brethren themselves, however, remained apparently united till about 1845, when Darby returned to England after some years' absence on the Continent, and at once accused Newton at Plymouth of taking too prominent a part in the meetings, and thus reviving "clericalism." On this ground Darby set up a rival meeting to that under Newton's influence, and two years later formally excommunicated Newton and his adherents on the ground of heretical doctrine. This was not without some foundation; for Newton, led away by the literal application to Christ (according to methods of interpretation common amongst Brethren) of every passage in the Messianic Psalms, had undoubtedly taught that our Lord (though taking the position with and on behalf of man, and entirely in grace) commenced his human life under the dissatisfaction of His Father, from which He had to work His way up, by His perfect obedience, to a position of acceptance. There can, however, be no doubt that Darby's own proceedings were embittered by the personal rivalry which had sprung up two years before; and this was shown more clearly the following year, when Darby demanded that a large meeting, held at "Bethesda" chapel in Bristol, should agree in excommunicating, ipso facto, all coming from Newton's meeting at Plymouth, failing which he excommunicated them also. The Bristol Brethren were then presided over by Mr. George Müller, educated as a missionary to the Jews, and the Rev. Henry Craik, born and educated in Scotland as a Baptist minister, both of whom possessed great influence, and who held that it was sufficient to examine into any alleged heresies as actually held by each individual, whenever he sought fellowship with them. There were now a Newtonian party, a Darbyite party (called "exclusives"), and a neutral party. There was another secession many years later under a former clergyman named Cluff, who adopted Perfectionist views; and, only in 1881, the year before his death, Darby was forsaken by Mr. William Kelly, one of his most earnest fellow-workers and partisans up to then through the whole of his stormy history. Before this, however, there had been numerous secessions and sub-divisions of smaller magnitude, so that in a city like Bath there were at one time no less than five, if not six, distinct sects of "Brethren." Most of these divisions have taken place concerning mysterious points as to the nature or work of Christ, and in their results have been unparalleled for the bitter feelings evoked. A case came to the knowledge of the present writer in which husband and wife, taking different sides on such questions, had refused to speak or hold any intercourse for years, even refusing to sit down to eat in company; and such results amongst old and dear friends have been counted by scores. It is remarkable that Darby himself, towards the close of his life, taught, in print, doctrine which is absolutely undistinguishable from that for which he had excommunicated Newton many years before, being led to it in exactly the same way, and being left by some of his old adherents on that account; but to the last he spoke and wrote of his own exclusive communion as "the Church of God on earth," and as the sole true representative of that mystical body. The majority of other Brethren, however, have not carried their pretensions, extreme as they are, to such a length as this.

The feeling of resentment cherished towards Plymouth Brethren by most other denominations may be partly accounted for by the facts above stated, but not entirely. A more active cause for it consists in the fact that the body has in the main always directed its propagandist efforts far less towards the large residuum which unhappily lies outside of all Churches, than to those professing Christianity in Churches already existing.

* Brethren receive at the Lord's Table in their own meetings members of other denominations regarded as orthodox, but refuse to partake of the Lord's Supper in any other churches.

Some of them have gone so far as to openly avow that their mission is "to the awakened in the Churches," and such efforts as they do make in mission work or city evangelisation are as a rule singularly unsuccessful. It is this which has brought upon them the common reproach of being "sheep-stealers rather than shepherds." Their want (in general) of evangelistic success, may possibly be due to the fact that public opinion amongst Brethren requires in every "gospel address" a complete statement of what is considered the whole plan and conditions of salvation, embodied in certain customary phrases, which naturally, by frequent repetition, lose their power over the hearts of men.

The movement, and the history of the body, are of peculiar interest in several respects. It was remarkable, to begin with, for the number of clergymen who took part in it, and who still adhere to it from time to time; and by some strange law of sympathy which it is difficult to understand, it seems also to have peculiar attractions for officers of the army and members of the aristocracy. It is also remarkable for reviving, in the nineteenth century, those passionate and bitter dissensions respecting mysterious points in the nature, work, or consciousness of the Saviour, which were so conspicuous a feature in the post-Apostolic age, showing a feverish intellectual activity in the same direction: nearly all their bitter divisions can be traced to this, and the remainder are due to those personal rivalries which also stand out so plainly in the earlier centuries of Christianity. It is remarkable that a movement begun in effort after more Christian communion, should have ended in such a different manner; and it is peculiarly suggestive to compare its history with that of the FRIENDS [q.v.] The latter, who adopted many of the same peculiar views, and who began amid the antagonism of all around them, provoked by their violent aggressiveness, have now settled down into one of the most popular and unobtrusive of denominations: whilst the Brethren, commencing their career in apparently the most sociable and kindly manner, have developed in the manner above shown. How far Mr. Darby's strong personality, exerting its influence for over fifty years, during the whole life of the movement up to 1882, brought about such results, it is yet too early to consider: but one lesson which does stand out most prominently is the utter insufficiency of the strongest "literal" views as to the inspiration of the Scriptures to prevent the most hopeless divergence. It will also have been noticed, that while the fullest "liberty of ministry" is claimed and practised, very many of those really prominent in the movement were either actual members of, or had received special training for, the regular ministry in other Churches.

It will be supposed from the above that practice as well as doctrine differs amongst Plymouth Brethren to a considerable extent, and also that there must be another side to such a dark picture. The diligent study of Scripture, though not always on wise methods, and the earnest Christian lives of the majority, are worthy of emulation by other denominations. They support (their own) foreign missions largely in proportion to their numbers, and very generally maintain their own poor. Some meetings recognise no paid ministry at all, while others do recognise some as having given themselves entirely to the service of the Church, and such are supported by the congregations; but always by voluntary contributions, usually dropped anonymously into boxes at the doors. Expenses of their meeting-houses are met in the same way. Some large congregations, such as those in connection with "Bethesda" at Bristol (now grown into three or four large meetings), might in practice be almost described as ordinary Baptist Churches "with an open ministry and weekly communion," and have very friendly relations with the other Churches around them; but this is the exception.

It is impossible to give the numbers of Brethren, because many of them object to make any returns; indeed, a distinct majority of individual members even object to give a vote, or take any part in civic affairs, though this is no part of the system. Their numbers are, however, unquestionably extending, and in all large cities several large meetings are generally to be found. In London, estimates vary between 15,000 and 25,000 in Church-fellowship, and in Bristol there are about 1,500, not including non-members or children in the same families. On the Continent they are strongest in French Switzerland, but have meetings and missions in all the European countries.

The literature of Brethrenism is very voluminous. Mr. Darby's own works have been published in 32 vols., and their doctrinal tracts and controversial or expository pamphlets can only be numbered by hundreds, the greater part of which, however, have passed into oblivion.

Pocock, EDWARD, D.D., a famous Orientalist [b. 1804, d. 1891], was born, educated, and died at Oxford. In 1830 he went to Aleppo, where he made a collection of Oriental manuscripts and coins at the request of Archbishop Laud; he continued his researches for two years in Constantinople. In 1836 he became Professor of Arabic at Oxford, and in 1843 Rector of Childrey, in Berkshire; in 1848

Canon of Christ Church. He was famed for his knowledge of Oriental languages, and for his valuable collection of antiquities, and wrote numerous works, antiquarian as well as theological. Among the latter are various commentaries on books of the Old Testament, and he translated the English Liturgy into Arabic.

Pœnitentiale.—A manual for priests, relating to the subjects of confession and penance.

Poggio Bracciolini [b. 1380, d. 1459] was secretary to no less than eight Popes, holding his office for nearly half a century. He was appointed by Boniface IX., and held office during the great schism, attending Pope John XXIII. to the Council of Constance. He is honourably known to posterity as the visitor to monasteries and the discoverer of several important MSS., some of them works up to that time supposed to be lost. He witnessed the martyrdom of Jerome of Prague, and wrote a vivid account to his life-long friend Bruni, in which he expressed his pity and admiration of the martyr so strongly that Bruni wrote back to warn him to suppress his feelings, lest he should share a like fate. After the Council was dissolved he went to England, whether in disgust at the corruption of the Papal Court (as some assert) is unknown, but he was the guest of Cardinal Beaufort. In some of his letters he gives amusing accounts of English life and character, not flattering to us. He soon returned to Italy, and resumed his duties, but sat somewhat loose to them, spending much time at Florence, and continuing his quest for MSS. He wrote some essays and disquisitions against the vices of the clergy, and especially of the monks, but his own writings are much disfigured by licentiousness. After fifty years' service he finally retired from the Court, and wrote the history of Florence. There he died, and was buried with great honours in the church of Santa Croce. His varied life, his high position, the services which he rendered to literature, and his own works, made him one of the most remarkable literary men of the fifteenth century.

Points, HEBREW.—The Hebrew points which stand for vowels have led to great controversies. It was generally believed that they were added by Ezra to the Chaldee alphabet, till Elias Levita, a German Jew, contradicted this opinion about the sixteenth century. He was upheld by Louis Cappel, a French Protestant and Hebrew Professor at Saumur [d. 1658], who in Arcanum Punctiones Revelatum, and Diatriba de Veris et Antiquis Hebræorum Literis maintained the comparatively recent introduction of the Hebrew points. He was opposed by the Buxtorfs, father and son, the former of whom [d. 1629] wrote Concordantia Bibliorum Hebræica et Chaldaica, and the latter [d. 1664], De Litterarum Hebræicarum genuina Antiquitate, and De Punctionum Origine, etc. In later times Dr. Humphrey Prideaux [d. 1724] wrote on this subject, and endorsed Cappel's opinion that the vowel points were invented by the Masorites shortly after Ezra's time, but were not received in the public schools till after the composing of the Talmud.

Pole, RICHARD, Cardinal and Archbishop of Canterbury [b. in Sussex, March, 1500; d. at Lambeth, Nov. 18th, 1558, within a few hours of the death of Queen Mary]. He was nearly related to royalty through his mother, Margaret, Countess of Salisbury, the niece of Edward IV., and was educated at the King's expense at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and afterwards in Italy, where he remained from 1520 to 1523. Though not ordained until many years later, Pole held several ecclesiastical appointments, whence he derived a large income; but in 1535 he lost them through the publication of a book called De Unitate Ecclesie, in which he expressed his disapproval of the project for the King's divorce from Catharine of Arragon. Soon afterwards he started for Rome, whence Pope Paul III., having made him a Cardinal, sent him to assist in the scheme which was being formed in the Netherlands to dethrone King Henry. The plot failed, and Pole received other commissions in Spain and elsewhere; but he was generally looked upon with suspicion as a traitor, and his mother and brothers were put to death by Henry VIII., in 1541, on the charge of being concerned in his treason. He returned to England in 1554, on the accession of Queen Mary, was made Archbishop of Canterbury, received back England to Papal allegiance in a solemn ceremonial held in Old Palace Yard, and devoted himself to the task of restoring the Pope's authority in England. How far he is to be held responsible for the persecutions which blackened Mary's unhappy reign is a disputed question. Mr. Froude is convinced that he was the mainspring of the cruelties. Archbishop Parker called him Carnifex Angellum Ecclesie Anglicane, "the hangman and scourge of the English Church." He was, nevertheless, believed by many to be secretly attached to Lutheranism, especially to the doctrine of Justification by Faith, and the book De Beneficio di Geni Christi Confessio has been attributed to him. He had actually received the majority of votes for the Popedom on the death of Pope Paul III. in 1549, but was debarred from the honour on the charge of holding heretical opinions. He was summoned in 1557 to answer to the charge before the Inquisition, but he died before the appointed date of the trial, and was proclaimed by the tribunal after his death a heretic. His personal character was irreproachable, but Froude says that he was enormously vain, and that the system in which he had been brought up had destroyed in him the human instincts—the genial emotions by which theological theories stand especially in need to be corrected. [Hist., vi. p. 100.] Pole is buried in the east end of Canterbury Cathedral, in the plainest tomb there. He is the last Archbishop buried in the Cathedral.

Polity [Gr. politeia, "citizenship"], in an ecclesiastical sense, means the theory of a government as a visible body. The great work which may be said to have shaped the course of the Church of England was Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity.

Pollok, ROBERT.—A Scottish minister and poet [b. at Muirhouse, Renfrewshire, 1799; d. at Southampton, Sept. 15th, 1827]. He studied at Glasgow, and received his licence to preach in the United Secession Church in 1827, but preached only once. His poem, the Course of Time, published in 1827, had great popularity, and he wrote numerous stories, of which the best known is Tales of the Covenanters. All his works were published anonymously.

Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, was a pupil of St. John, and by some is thought to be the angel of Smyrna on whose account St. John received a message in the Book of Revelation. Soon after his accession, Marcus Aurelius ordered a persecution throughout his empire. The Christians bore their sufferings so bravely that they are described by a writer of that time in the following words:—"At the time of their torment they seemed absent, as it were, from the body, or rather that the Lord, being present with them, conversed familiarly with them; thus they were supported by the grace of Christ." The mob were so angry at this fortitude that they determined to have Polycarp as one of their victims. He was warned of the arrival of the officers, so had time to take refuge in a neighbour's house, and from thence retired to a small village on the outskirts of Smyrna. He might have stayed there safely for some time, but the officers bribed one of his slaves to reveal the bishop's hiding-place. When they came to take him he behaved towards them with great kindness, setting refreshments before them with his own hand. He asked leave to have a quiet hour for prayer, and then expressed himself ready to go with them. On the way back to Smyrna the soldiers tried to tempt him to recant, urging that there could be no harm in saying the words "Lord Cæsar," or in offering sacrifice, and yet by such trivial matters he might save his life. He did not answer them at first, and when absolutely compelled to speak he only said, "I will not follow your advice." He was given another chance by the Proconsul while the soldiers were preparing the stake at which he was to be burnt alive. The Proconsul said, "Swear by the fortunes of Cæsar: curse Christ, and I will set thee free." But Polycarp quietly answered, "Eighty and six years have I served Christ; how, then, can I curse Him, my King and my Saviour?" The herald was ordered to proclaim that Polycarp had admitted that he was a Christian, and then the fire was kindled. Soon after his death one of his followers, Irenæus, wrote an account of his life and death, and some of his congregation met together to settle how they should commemorate the memory of one to whom they all owed so much. They agreed that they would solemnly keep the day of his martyrdom every year, which they called his "birthday." This is probably the origin of keeping Saints' Days.

Polygamy.—Though the law of Moses did not forbid polygamy, the spirit of the Jewish religion was clearly and unmistakably against the practice, and before the time of Christ monogamy had come to be regarded as God's appointment to man. When Christianity was first preached in the world, however, polygamy was in practice among heathens, and, as we shall presently see, there is good reason for assuming that it was not made a bar to admission to Christianity any more than was the holding of slaves, and that it was the spirit of Christianity, and not enactments, which finally drove it out of the Church.

In the last century a London clergyman (no other than the author of the popular hymn, "Lo, He comes in clouds descending"), observing with sad eyes the prevalence of immorality and the wide extent of female dishonour, wrote a work entitled Thelyphthora, in which he maintained that cases of seduction should necessitate marriage, and thus, that polygamy should be legalised in the interest of morality. This singular book is now only remembered as having called forth an indignant satire of Cowper against it. Few nowadays would believe that such a doctrine could obtain in a Christian country. But another question has arisen of a very serious character. Polygamy is in use among the Mohammedans and in heathen countries; and it is a difficult and much debated question what attitude ought to be taken by the Christian Church with respect to converts from heathenism who have a plurality of wives. Bishop Colenso, before publishing his works on the sacred narrative which made his name so prominent in theological controversy, had boldly expressed his conviction that a Caffre or Zulu who embraced the Gospel ought not to be compelled to put away his wives before being admitted to baptism. And ever since then, the question has been a moot point among those who are engaged in missionary work. At the Wakefield Church Congress held in October, 1886, the subject was somewhat fully discussed, and by giving an abstract of the arguments used there, we shall be enabled to see what is the prevailing opinion in the Anglican Church at the present time. The Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Bickersteth, read the first paper. He first, by a careful induction of passages from the Old Testament, proved what we have already stated, that it became more and more apparent to the Jewish mind that polygamy was opposed to the original institution of marriage and to the Divine Will. He quoted among other passages Ps. cxxviii. 3; Prov. v. 15-18; Eccl. ix. 9; Mal. ii. 14, 15; Mark x. 5-9; 1 Cor. vii. 3; Eph. v. 25-32.

"Bearing these Scriptures in mind," he went on, "we may confidently say that Christianity, as it prevails, will assuredly in time abolish polygamy, as it abolishes all other social evils. But the question which now presses for a definite answer in so many of our mission fields is not whether a Christian convert from among the heathens or Moslems may after his baptism take to himself more wives than one, because the practice is legal among his heathen or Mohammedan fellow-countrymen. This we should all refuse him, as contrary to the law of Christ and his baptismal vow. But the question is, ought a man who has married more wives than one in the days of his heathen or Mohammedan darkness to be refused Christian baptism if he will not put away all wives but one? And ought the second, or third, or fourth wife of such a man to be refused baptism if she will not leave her husband?" The Bishop then quoted General Gordon, as saying that he could convert all Africa with ease if a continuance of polygamy to such an extent might be allowed. Then, having said that missionaries in general appear to refuse baptism to those converts who decline to put away all wives but one, he proceeds to ask, "If, then, the man determines to be baptised at any cost, the terrible question must arise, which wife must he retain, and what is to become of those he rejects? Suppose a not improbable case. A man has three wives, the first old and childless, the second the mother of all his children, the third the last married and the best beloved. And yet this is the sore necessity to which some would reduce the catechumen who desires baptism." Henry Venn has answered, that as the first marriage only is legal the first wife must be kept, and the others repudiated as unlawful connections. "But," says the Bishop, "does this hold good? In the case supposed, the convert would have no choice. But surely the second marriage is as much a marriage, according to the laws of the country in which the matrimonial contract was made, as the first marriage and the first wife. When Jacob had married Leah and Rachel, would he have been right to put away the mother of Joseph on the plea that the first marriage was the only true marriage? I trow not. In saying this, I do not justify polygamy, but there are contracts, legal according to the laws of the country where those contracts are made, though mingled with human infirmity, and in themselves harmful to the contractor, which, when once ratified, honesty and honour, fidelity to God and man, forbid him to violate. Such contracts the legal marriage of a polygamist before his conversion appear to be. And he that 'swaereth to his neighbour, and disappointeth him not, though it be to his own hindrance,' is among those who the inspired Psalmist assures us shall never fall."

The Bishop then refers to 1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6, where it is ruled that the bishop must be "the husband of one wife"—a passage which the earliest commentators were unanimous in interpreting as forbidding a simultaneous polygamist to hold the pastoral office, and as implying thereby that converts who had married more wives than one were not compelled to put them away; yea, that such divorces would have been doing wrong, producing bad consequences in domestic life, and increasing the opposition of the civil powers to Christianity. And the Bishop comes to the resolution, "I would admit a polygamist to baptism, but if a baptised convert took to himself more wives than one I think he ought to be excommunicated. This discipline faithfully observed in the case of a conversion of a tribe or nation to Christianity, would stamp out polygamy in a single generation." We have only given the main points of an elaborate and exhaustive paper. The Bishop of Zululand thought, on the other hand, that polygamists should not be baptised. If Christianity was in the end to abolish polygamy by its own inherent force, that force must not be allowed to become less by any means of ours. The heathen marriage contract was not a contract he could at present recognise. The Rev. J. Johnson, a native missionary of West Africa, took the same view. "The question was whether they would be laying too great a burden upon a convert in requiring him to give up all his wives but one before he was baptised. But if polygamy was degrading to manhood, and injurious to man's moral character, and if baptism was a matter of inward grace and consecration to God, then, in his opinion, they had no right to admit a polygamist into the Christian Church. The Rev. J. A. Faithfull, who concluded the meeting, said he hoped that nobody would entertain the idea that the Bishop of Exeter, or any other churchman, wished to restore polygamy. The question was simply a practical one. Some persons were not quite clear that Holy Scripture explicitly forbade a polygamist to be baptised, and they question whether they would have a right to withhold baptism from a polygamist convert without calling upon him to put away all his wives but one. They felt that under certain circumstances such a putting away might be itself an immoral act."

It is clear that so burning a question needs solution, and it is believed that at the next meeting of the Pan-Anglican Synod, this will be one of the questions in which some authoritative sentence will be put forth.

Polyglot [Gr. polys, "many," and glotta, "a tongue"].—The name given to two or more versions of the Bible arranged side by side. The polyglots seem to have existed from very early ages. The ancient editions of the New Testament which appeared in the first ten centuries, and which contain the Greek and vernacular languages, are sometimes wrongly termed polyglot. The name is also sometimes used for the Hexapla of Origen, which contains the Hebrew text and six Greek versions. The Polyglots, properly so called, are the four greater and the many lesser polyglots. The four greater are the Complutensian, the Antwerp, the Parisian, and the London.

The Complutensian Polyglot [so called because it was printed at Alcalá de Henares, the Latin name of which is Complutum] was prepared at the cost of Cardinal Ximenes by famous Spanish scholars between the years 1502 and 1517, but was not published till 1520. It is in six volumes, of which the first four contain the Old Testament, the fifth the New, and the sixth Hebrew and Chaldee grammars and lexicons. It gives six different texts: the Hebrew, the Chaldee, Onkelos's Targum, the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the Greek New Testament. There are also literal Latin translations of the Chaldee and Septuagint Greek versions.

The Antwerp Polyglot was published there between 1569 and 1572 by the famous printer Christophe Plantin, at the cost of King Philip II. of Spain, under the direction of Benedict Arias Montanus. It is in eight volumes, and contains, besides what is in the Complutensian Version, the Chaldee Paraphrase upon the other books of the Old Testament, with the Latin interpretation of the Syriac. The eighth volume, which has the Hebrew and Greek texts with the Latin version of Pagninus, altered in a few instances by Arias, has been often reprinted. This polyglot is not of very much value, as it depends very much on the Complutensian, and the alterations are made from some editions published in Paris by Robert Stephens [d. 1559].

The Paris Polyglot, the largest of the polyglots, was published in Paris in 1645 at the expense and under the superintendence of Guy Michel le Jay. It is in ten large folio volumes, and contains, besides the versions in the Antwerp Polyglot, Syriac and Arabic versions, arranged by some Maronites from Rome, the Samaritan Pentateuch, and another Samaritan version, each with a literal Latin translation. It contains many defects, and has little critical value.

The London Polyglot was published in 1654-7 in London in six volumes. It was edited by Brian Walton, afterwards Bishop of Chester. There are two sets of copies—the Republican [1657], those dedicated to Oliver Cromwell, and the Loyal [1660], which were dedicated to Charles II. on his accession. The work engaged all the most learned men in England for many years. It contains Hebrew, Samaritan, Greek, Arabic, Chaldee, Ethiopic, Syriac, Persian, and Latin versions, all but the Vulgate being accompanied with literal Latin translations. The sixth volume contains various readings and critical remarks. The Prolegomena by Walton discusses Bible texts and versions. This work was followed in 1689 by the Lexicon Heptaglotton of Edmund Castell, containing lexicons of all the languages of the polyglot except the Latin and Greek.

The chief of the lesser polyglots are [1] the Heidelberg, in 3 vols. [1586], containing Hebrew, Greek, and Latin texts; [2] the Hamburg, compiled by David Wolder, in 6 vols. [1596], in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German; [3] the Nuremberg, edited by Elias Hutter [1599], in Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, German, and French; [4] the Leipzig, edited by Reineccius, the New Testament in Syriac, Greek, Latin, German, and Roman [1713], and the Old Testament in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German [1750-1]; [5] Bagster's, the most valuable of the modern collections of versions [1831], which contains Latin, Greek, Samaritan, the Septuagint, Hebrew, German, Italian, Spanish, French, and English, to which Syriac is added in the New Testament; [6] Bielefeld's Hand Polyglot [1845-54], containing in the Old Testament Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Luther's German version, and in the New, Greek, Latin, and Luther's German, and in the fourth column, sometimes the chief differences between this and other German versions, sometimes the English authorised version; [7] the Hexaglot Bible, edited in London by R. de Levante [1871-5], containing the Greek and Hebrew texts, with Septuagint, Syriac, Latin, English, French, and German versions.

Polytheism, as the word implies, is the belief in and worship of many gods—whether one god is considered supreme or not—as distinguished from the worship of the one true God only. Although there is reason to believe that heathen religions were anciently monotheistic, they certainly became polytheistic, and are so now. We infer from the history in Genesis and Joshua xxiv. 2 that, although the family of Abraham in Ur worshipped the one true God, they likewise believed in and worshipped other false gods as lesser deities. "Every form of Polytheism has sprung from Nature-worship. Man looked round on the powers of Nature and gave names to them—the sun, the moon, the stars, the wind. In time he assigned sex to them, and then various attributes, until they were completely personified. Thus, in Persia the blazing sun was adored as Ormuzd; in the bleak north the Norsemen called on Odin, the stormy; in Gaul and Britain pillars were raised to the sun, altars to the moon.” “At first, man was conscious only of physical inferiority, and thus his gods were his superiors in brute force alone; when his intellect grew, he felt how unequal it was to grasp the laws of Nature, and then the gods were treated as his superiors in wisdom and understanding. At last his moral consciousness awakened, and with it a consciousness of sin; then he raised his gods to an altitude of moral holiness and purity which he himself despaired to reach” [S. Baring-Gould]. Polytheism can lead its followers no further; here it leaves them without help, and its utter failure, even as a moral restraint, was felt by the best minds of the civilised world when Christ appeared.

Pomps [lit. “processions”].—The phrase “pomps of the devil” included anciently all heathen spectacles, public games, etc. A definition is thus given by Chrysostom: “The pomps of Satan are the theatre and games of the circus, together with the observation of days, and presages and omens.”

Pontifex or Pontiff.—An order of heathen priests at Rome. Four pontiffes, chosen from the patricians, were created by Numa; in A.U.C. 454 four more, chosen from the plebeians, were added. Sylla further increased the number to fifteen, and it afterwards became indefinite. The Pontifex Maximus was the head of the College of Pontiffs, and was a person of considerable power. The office of Pontifex Maximus was assumed by the Emperor Augustus, and was held by his successors, including the Christian emperors, till Gratian [A.D. 367-383]. The term “pontiff,” as applied to Christian bishops, is borrowed from this source.

Pontificale.—A book of rites which can only be performed by a bishop [pontiff]; e.g. the coronation of kings, the ordination of priests and deacons, and confirmation.

Poole, MATTHEW, a Nonconformist writer, was born at York in 1624, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He became Presbyterian minister of St. Michael-le-Quernes, London, in 1648; but lost his living in 1662 for his Nonconformity. He devoted himself to Biblical studies and writing, and died at Amsterdam in 1679.

His chief works are Synopsis Bibliorum Criticorum, published in 1669, which has gone through many editions; The Blasphemer slain by the Sword of the Spirit, directed against John Biddle, the Socinian [1654]; A Model for the Maintaining of Students of Choice Abilities in the University, and two works against Romanism, The Nullity of the Roman Faith and Dialogues between a Popish Priest and an English Protestant. He left uncompleted English Annotations on the Holy Bible, which were finished by his friends, published in 1686, and passed through many editions.

Poor Clares.—An Order of St. Francis, called the Povere Donne or Clarisses, which was founded by St. Clare of Assisi, who entered the Portiuncula in 1212. She was joined by her sister, St. Agnes, and they were given the church of St. Damian. They followed the rule of St. Benedict till 1224, when St. Francis drew up a written order, which was approved by Pope Innocent IV. in 1246. St. Clare died in 1253. In 1264 Cardinal Cajetan, with the approval of Urban IV., drew up a fresh rule; some of the nuns preferred that of St. Francis, which caused a division into the “Urbanists” and the “Clarisses.” The first monastery of Franciscan nuns of Minoresses was founded in 1293, outside Aldgate, and has given its name to the “Minories.” There were formerly a great number in France, but many disappeared at the Revolution, and but five or six remain. The greatest number are in Austria. There are five convents in England and six in Ireland.

Poor, THE.—Although Christianity greatly developed the care of the richer classes for the poor, yet a provision for their maintenance existed among the primitive nations, and was adopted as a matter of State policy. Among the Athenians, those who were maimed in battle, and the orphans of those who were slain, were maintained by the State. There were also in Greece institutions called eranos, somewhat on the plan of our friendly societies. In the early days of Rome the Agrarian and Licinian laws provided against the unfair distribution of property amongst her citizens. Later, when Christianity began to bear upon the barbarous custom of parents exposing the children whom they had no means to support, the Church took them under her wing, and provided for them by the erection of orphanages. Constantine, in 315-21, made laws concerning the support of these abandoned little ones, and the Council of Nice in 325 ordered the foundation of founding hospitals. Justinian [529-534], again, made laws regarding them, and founded houses of mercy for their reception, and thus Christian charity strove to alleviate the great evil which the law was powerless to eradicate. There is mention of an orphan asylum in Trèves as early as the fifth century, and another at Milan in 787, besides several others in the eighth century in different parts of Europe, some founded by individuals and others by royal authority. Several are spoken of in Italy in the fourteenth century. The first hospital in Rome was founded at the end of the fourth century. Legacies to religious houses were permitted in 321.

The feudal system of the Middle Ages provided for the labouring classes, who looked to their feudal lords for maintenance, and the villeins of Saxon England received a portion of land from their lord for the support of themselves and their families. The Church of Rome, through her abbeys and monasteries, became the great almoner of the world, and to the present day the charities of the city of Rome are administered through the Church.

In England from early times there were severe laws for the suppression of vagrancy, and the householder was compelled to provide for his labourers. In the reign of Richard II. the first law was made for the provision of the impotent poor; Henry VIII. ordered each parish to collect alms in a general fund for this purpose. His suppression of the monasteries had been a cruel wrong to the poor, for the aged and infirm unquestionably had been relieved largely by the religious houses. It was in Queen Elizabeth's reign, in the year 1601, that the enactments concerning provision for the poor took somewhat of the shape of our present poor-law. It was decreed that every inhabitant of every parish should be taxed for the relief of the poor, and that three or four householders from every parish, together with the churchwardens, should be made overseers of the poor, to give relief to the aged, work to the able-bodied, and to apprentice the orphan children. In the reign of George I. the workhouse system was introduced, and indoor relief was given to the poor in their own houses; guardians were appointed to watch over the pauper children and guard them from neglect. In 1782 an Act, called Gilbert's Act, introduced workhouse unions, and at the close of the eighteenth century there was a great relaxation in the treatment of the poor. The system of out-door relief in country districts became in time a great source of evil, as owing to the allowance made on marriage and on the birth of each child, there were parishes in which every labourer was a pauper. Commissioners were appointed to inquire into the matter, and they recommended [1] the cessation of out-door relief; [2] a central authority to control the administration; [3] unions for the better management of workhouses, and the classification of their inmates; [4] a complete and clear system of accounts. A Bill for carrying out these suggestions was passed in 1834. Paid relieving-officers were appointed to dispense relief under the direction of an unpaid Board of Guardians. In three years the operation of this Bill reduced the expenditure by one-third. In 1848 the Commissioners were exchanged for a public board, with a President who holds office as one of the ministers of the Crown. It has been impossible to withdraw out-door relief in the case of the sick and aged, but it is no longer given to the able-bodied as a supplement to low wages. Fifty-four public auditors examine the expenditure, and one or more district medical officers are attached to each union to attend on the sick poor.

Scotland and Ireland have similar, though separate, legislations as regards the poor. In Scotland out-door relief is the rule. In Ireland, where there was no poor-law till 1838, relief is administered almost entirely in the workhouse.

Christianity has been greatly instrumental in the reduction of pauperism. Mr. C. L. Brace thus writes in Gesta Christi, p. 403:—"It is almost a common-place to say that all the varied and blessed institutions of charity throughout Christendom, all the asylums, hospitals, and reformatories, the provisions for the lame, blind, and deaf, for the idiot and insane, for the sick of every possible disease, for the widow and orphan and homeless, for the aged and infirm, are only blossoms and fruit of the life and teachings and death of the great Benefactor." And again [p. 417]:—"The Christian, other things being equal, is less likely to be very poor, and a pauper he cannot easily be—that is, he cannot have that spirit of dependence, idleness, and dishonesty, which are the essentials of pauperism. . . . It is not claimed that religion alone in future ages can remove pauperism from the world, but the Christian belief will tend to a more just distribution of property; it will promote temperance and good morals; it will stimulate co-operation between labourers, and between labour and capital; it will encourage many forms of insurance, and above all elevate and train the character, so that the human being, though unfortunate, cannot be degraded, and thus, under the influence of Christ on the world, the labouring classes will be less likely to fall into extreme poverty, and, if they do, will be more readily assisted, or will not sink morally."

Popes.—This word is derived from the Latin papa, a childish or endearing word for father. In the days of the early Church it was undoubtedly applied to all the clergy, as it is in the Greek Church to this day. In the Western Church it was soon restricted to bishops, and then to those only who held important sees, such as Alexandria, Carthage, and Rome. It was Gregory VII. who first ordained that the Bishop of Rome, and he only, could bear the title. We have already fully entered into the history of the growth of the Papal power. [PAPAL POWER.] The following is a list of the Popes, taken from Milner's End of Controversy, a standard Roman Catholic work. Notices of the principal Popes will be found under their respective names. The references in brackets opposite some names are reminders of events which occurred during their pontificates. Porphyry [233-304] was a native of Syria. His original name was Melech [Heb. for "king"], and his preceptor, Longinus, afterwards named him Porphyrius [i.e. "empurpled"], because purple was the royal colour. He was for a while a pupil of Origen, then of Longinus, then of Plotinus. He wrote fifteen books against Christianity, which were unhappily destroyed a century later by order of Theodosius the Emperor. We say unhappily, because it is impossible but that, if we had them, they would furnish much information on doubtful points respecting the early Church. His life of Pythagorus is extant, and some other books, one of which was discovered by Cardinal Mai at Milan, and published by him.

Porteus, BILBY, D.D. [b. at York, 1731, d. 1809].—An English prelate. He was educated at a small school in his native city, went as a sizar to Queen's College, Cambridge, where in due course he became a Fellow. In 1757 he was ordained. He first became known as a writer by obtaining the prize for the Seatonian poem. Archbishop Secker made him his chaplain, and gave him first a small living near Sevenoaks, then Hinxton in the same county. In 1767 he became Rector of Lambeth, and soon after was made Chaplain to George III. and Master of the hospital of St. Cross at Winchester. In 1776 he was appointed to succeed Bishop Markham at Chester, and on the death of Bishop Lowth in 1788 he was translated to London, whither he occupied till his death. He published some lectures on St. Matthew, delivered on the Fridays in Lent at St. James's, Piccadilly, and these in their day were highly popular. He was also the editor of Archbishop Secker's works, to which he prefixed a biography. But he is best remembered now by his philanthropic deeds, by which he ameliorated the condition of the poor clergy of his dioceses. The Porteus library in the Bishop of London's palace at Fulham is another memorial of his munificence.

Portiforium.—A name applied in England to the breviary. Also a name for the Præ [q.v.].

Port Royalists.—Port Royal was the name of a Cistercian nunnery near Versailles, afterwards removed to Paris, and which became very famous in the seventeenth century. It was founded in 1204 by Mathilde de Garlande, as a work of piety to propitiate Divine favour, and insure the return of her husband, Matthieu de Marli, from the Crusades. It was built by the same architect as Amiens Cathedral, and was erected to receive twelve ladies. Not long afterwards it was licensed by the Pope to receive those persons who, without becoming nuns, wished to retire from the world. Pope Honorius III. granted to it special privileges, allowing the celebration of Mass within its walls, even though the country around were under an interdict. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the discipline of the convent was greatly relaxed, and the appointment of being its Abbess was much coveted. In 1602 M. Marion, the Advocate-General of Henry IV., procured this position from the King for his granddaughter, Jaqueline Marie Angélique Arnauld, then only eleven years old, while her younger sister, Agnes, aged only five, was made Abbess of St. Cyr. Jaqueline took the name of Mère Angélique. Many members of the Arnauld family joined the nunnery, and, until the final dispersion of the sisterhood, the posterity of the Arnaulds ceased not to rule the house. In 1608 Mère Angélique determined on a complete reformation in her community, and established a most austere system of discipline. She was roused to this by the preaching of a Capuchin friar. After a time the General of the Order sent Angélique to carry out some reforms in the Monastery of Maubisson; but she again returned to the valley of Chevreuse, her own nunnery, taking with her many of the nuns from Maubisson. In 1633 the community removed to the Faubourg St. Jacques, Paris, and one of the most important consequences of this change was the connection of Du Vergier de Hauranne, Abbot of St. Cyran, with the society. He was an adherent of Cornelius Jansen, and he occupies a place in ecclesiastical history as the founder of Jansenism in France. [JANSENISM.] The old establishment of Port Royal des Champs was used for a lay community of men, and numbered amongst its members some of the most brilliant scholars of the time, who established a school, and prepared educational books for the instruction of their pupils. Pascal, Nicole, Arnauld, Le Maître, De Séricourt, De Sacy, etc., looked up to St. Cyran as to a father for guidance in their studies as well as their lives. He was the author of the Port Royal Grammars of Greek, Latin, and Italian. The prosperity of the establishment drew down the jealousy of Richelieu, and he caused St. Cyran to be imprisoned in Vincennes, in 1638, on account of some of his writings, and here he remained a captive till after the death of the Cardinal. In 1643 Antony Arnauld published his book, De la Fréquente Communion, which was a decided attack on the Jesuits, and thus commenced the seventy years' religious war which ended in the destruction of Port Royal. Arnauld was cited by the Pope and Cardinal Mazarin to appear at Rome, but he refused, and went into voluntary retirement for twenty-five years at Port Royal des Champs. The Sisters, who now lived in Paris, having planned an ineffectual scheme of devoting themselves to the perpetual adoration of the Holy Eucharist, St. Cyran, who from his prison was still their guide, directed their energies to the more useful project of teaching children of their own sex. Angélique and most of her associates then returned to the quiet of their country establishment, and the recluses moved to a farm near, called Les Granges, where some of them were employed in making a translation of the Fathers. St. Cyran appointed Antoine Singlin as general confessor to both nuns and recluses. Their tranquillity did not, however, last long. The wars of the Fronde came to disturb them; most of the nuns returned to Paris; and the recluses, who numbered three hundred, defended themselves at Les Granges. Mère Angélique remained and took care of the ruined peasants.

But Port Royal had become an abomination to the antagonists of Arnauld. His doctrines were a reproof to the Jesuits, and Father Coruet framed the "Five Propositions" concerning the mystery of Divine grace which were said to be contained in Jansen's book Augustinus. Arnauld denied that such teaching was to be found in the book, but the Parisian doctors appointed to examine the matter declared that they were, and they were condemned as heretical by Innocent X. in a Papal Bull. [JANSENISTS.] The Queen-Mother, Anne of Austria, urged by Mazarin, decreed the fall of Port Royal and Les Granges; but it was hindered for a time by the so-called miracle performed on Mademoiselle Perrier, the niece of Pascal, by means of a thorn said to be preserved from the Saviour's crown: this relic was exposed at Port Royal in Lent, 1656, and the young lady, who was suffering with a fearful malady in the eye, on touching the sore with the thorn was instantaneously cured. This miracle seemed a special mark of Divine favour to the monastery, and Anne of Austria feared to carry out her plan, and so once more the school was spared. The story of the Holy Thorn is upheld by Arnauld, Le Maître, and Pascal; the last embodied it in his Provincial Letters, and it will be found in English in Memoirs of Port Royal, by Madame von Schimmelpenninck. But the brief respite came to an end with the death of Mazarin and the assumption of power by Louis XIV. in person, in 1660. Louis was a friend of the Jesuits and a hater of Port Royal and Jansenism. He at once consigned Singlin to the Bastille, and decreed that all at Port Royal and Les Granges alike should sign the formulary condemning the Five Propositions. This they refused to do, so their schools were dispersed, and the recluses were banished from their valley. Mère Angélique, now quite old, quitted Port Royal des Champs and went to Paris, where she found her monastery guarded by soldiers as a prison, and here she and many of her nuns died. Sœur Flavie, one of the remaining ones, proved a traitor to her society: she abjured her Jansenist heresies, as she called them, in the hope of being made Abbess, and she procured from the Archbishop of Paris the imprisonment of many of her Order, and a renewed command to subscribe to the Five Propositions. This was again refused. Instead of Sœur Flavie, another sister became Abbess, who procured a separation of the Paris community from that at Versailles. Those sisters who had been imprisoned were sent back to Port Royal des Champs, and deprived of the Sacraments of the Church. Yet once more the dissolution of the nunnery was delayed by the intervention of Anne of Bourbon, Duchesse de Longueville, and sister of the great Condé. She, after a life of dissipation, entered the ranks of the ladies of Port Royal in Paris, and addressed herself to Pope Clement IX. on behalf of the persecuted Order. He made terms of peace with them, and once more allowed Arnauld and his associates to recruit their monastery, open their schools, and receive back the scattered recluses. But the doom of the stronghold of Jansenism was fixed. Cardinal de Noailles, one of its bitterest enemies, had become Archbishop of Paris, and he persuaded Clement XI., in 1707, to issue the Bull, Vineam Domini, requiring the nuns of Port Royal to subscribe it; this they declined to do, except with certain restrictions, and their fate was sealed. De Noailles obtained an order for the suppression of the convent, and the nuns were finally dispersed in 1709 by armed police, and left to die without priestly absolution or Christian burial. Not content with this, a royal order, in 1710, caused the demolition of the monastery and the church; and nothing now remains of this once celebrated place but the ruins of a Gothic arch.

Positivism.—Positivism consists essentially of a Philosophy and a Polity, and to these may be added a Religion. It was originated by Auguste Comte [b. 1797, d. 1857], who set forth his ideas in some fifteen volumes. The books are rather verbose, and the difficulties connected with his system are met with the easy assurance, or "thereforeism," so often found in French philosophical and theological writers.

The name "Positivism" was chosen by Comte as implying reality and usefulness as well as certainly and precision, since he teaches that we have nothing whatever to do with anything which cannot be positively demonstrated. The existence of God, and the belief in a future state, are thus practically excluded from his system.

Positivism as a Philosophy.—"Each branch of our knowledge," says Comte, "passes successively through three different theoretical conditions—the theological or fictitious (or supernatural), the metaphysical or abstract, and the scientific or positive." These conditions are radically opposed to one another, and hence entire freedom from theological belief is necessary before the positive state can be perfectly attained. "In the theological state, the human mind, seeking the essential nature of beings, the first and final causes (the origin and purpose) of all effects—in short, absolute knowledge—supposes all phenomena to be produced by the immediate action of supernatural beings The theological system arrived at the highest perfection of which it is capable when it substituted the providential action of a single Being for the varied operations of the numerous divinities which had been before imagined." In other words, it began with Polytheism and advanced to Monotheism.

"In the metaphysical state, which is only a modification of the first, the mind supposes, instead of supernatural beings, abstract forces, veritable entities (that is, personified abstractions) inherent in all beings, and capable of producing all phenomena. What is called the explanation of phenomena is, in this stage, a mere reference of each to its proper entity In the last stage of the metaphysical system, men substitute one great entity (Nature) as the cause of all phenomena instead of the multitude of entities at first supposed."

"In the final, the positive, state the mind has given over the vain search after absolute notions, the origin and destination of the universe and the causes of phenomena, and applies itself to their laws; that is, their invariable relations of succession and resemblance. Reasoning and observation, duly combined, are the means of this knowledge. What is now understood, when we speak of an explanation of facts, is simply the establishment of a connection between single phenomena and some general facts, the number of which continually diminish with the progress of science. . . . The ultimate perfection of the positive system would be (if such perfection could be hoped for) to represent all phenomena as particular aspects of a single general fact, such as gravitation, for instance. . . . The point of departure of the individual and of the race being the same, the phases of the mind of a man correspond to the epochs of the mind of the race. . . . Each of us is aware . . . that he was a theologian in his childhood, a metaphysician in his youth, and a natural philosopher in his manhood." [Comte's Positive Philosophy, translated by H. Martineau.]

"The principle of theology is to explain everything by supernatural wills. That principle can never be set aside until we acknowledge the search for causes to be beyond our reach, and limit ourselves to the knowledge of laws." "The true positive spirit consists . . . in a word, in studying the how, instead of the why," of phenomena. [General View of Positivism, translated by H. Bridges.]

The ultimate aim and end of all knowledge is, according to Comte, the progressive well-being of Humanity; hence he places Sociology at the head of all the sciences,—that to which they lead up. The pursuit of a science into regions where it has no practical bearings, direct or indirect, he condemns as useless, and a departure from positive principles, whilst he brands the speculations themselves as "metaphysical," as a mere return to an exploded philosophical system.

Comte arranges the sciences in six primary divisions, according to the increasing complexity of their phenomena. Mathematics, being the most simple, comes first; and then follow astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, and sociology. Each passes through the three stages, theological, metaphysical, positive, before the one succeeding it. Sociology has not yet become positive, as theological and metaphysical modes of thought still retard its progress. Comte has also constructed a philosophy of history as set forth in his connected view of universal history. He argues that human activity passes successively through the stages of offensive warfare, defensive warfare, and industry. The respective connection of these states with the preponderance of the theological, the metaphysical, or the positive spirit leads at once to a complete explanation of history. It reproduces in a systematic form the division of history into ancient, mediæval, and modern.

The subjective principle of Positivism is the subordination of the intellect to the heart, the objective basis is the external order of the world as revealed by science. The function of the intellect is to discover the laws, or order of the external world—"the immutable necessity of the external world"—and thus to serve the feelings by controlling them, with the ultimate purpose of regulating action. Hence thoughts must be systematised before feelings, feelings before actions, though it is quite certain that feeling and activity have much more to do with any practical step that we take than reason. In other words, reason, though subordinate to affection, which in the positive system is the preponderating element, is needed to direct and control it. Reason thus deals with the external order of the world—the laws of the various sciences, including the laws of sociology—but only as the hand-maid of the affections.

When, next, Positivism is regarded as a polity, its weakness becomes apparent. The Positivist motto is "love, order, progress," but the means for carrying out such noble ideas are Utopian, and no sufficient basis for any one of the three is laid down. In regenerating society Comte looks for help to three sources—to philosophers as supplying the intellectual element, to the working-classes as supplying the active element, and to women as bringing the element of feeling. With this third element we may be confident that our intellectual and practical faculties will be kept in due subordination to universal love. Politics are to be subordinated to morals. To the Positivist, the object of morals is to make our sympathetic instincts preponderate as far as possible over the selfish instincts; social feelings over personal feelings. Between personal feelings, or self-love, and social feelings come the home, or domestic affections, and hence these are to be cultivated as a step towards the development of social feelings, since the latter constitute the first principle of morality. To live for others is the highest happiness. Self-love, in the Positive system, is regarded as the great infirmity of our nature. The object of education, which is to be strictly regulated, is to develop the social feelings to the highest degree. But even then the spiritual power (composed of philosophers, etc.), which is to be rigidly separated from the temporal or political power, must prolong the influence it has already exercised in education so as to recall individuals, or even nations, to the principles which they have forgotten, and this power will act through public opinion. If the spiritual power awards its praise and blame justly, public opinion will lend it the most irresistible support. As a help in the work of moral education is the Positive system of commemoration; for example, the yearly celebration on suitable days of those whom Comte regards as the three greatest of our predecessors—Cæsar, St. Paul, and Charlemagne. Positivism banishes the idea of rights and allows only of duties; there is no right of property, but only the duty attending its possession. Supposing that the proprietor takes a becoming, that is, a Positivist, view of his duty, he will be allowed to administer his property for the public benefit, otherwise he will be glad to give up possession. Spiritual rewards and punishments will preponderate over temporal ones; but moral influence would not be sufficient alone to secure order. To carry out the vast work of social regeneration, Comte proposes that a "Positive Occidental Committee" should be formed from the philosophers, working men, and women of the five Western European nations. This committee would bring forward measures for the formation of an Occidental navy, an international coinage, school, flag, etc.

A Positivist may be able to trace, in all this, the foundations of a regenerated society, but to the "theologian" in his darkness there seems no adequate motive for a love which is to surpass the Gospel standard, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," no guarantee for order, no hope of the promised progress.

Positivism as a Religion.—Positive Religion, or the Religion of Humanity, as Comte calls it, is a curious invention. Having dismissed, as mere fables, the belief in God and the instinctive longing for immortality, some central point was wanted towards which Feeling, Reason, and Activity could alike converge, and this was found in the great conception of Humanity—the abstract idea of mankind in the past, the present, and the future. It is the peculiar characteristic of Humanity, or the Great Being, who is here set forth, to be compounded of separable elements; mutual love knits together its various parts; and "towards Humanity, who is for us the only true Great Being, in the conscious elements of whom she is composed, we shall henceforth direct every aspect of our life, individual or collective. Our thoughts will be devoted to the knowledge of Humanity, our affections to her love, our actions to her service." [General View.] "By Humanity, the conception of God will be entirely superseded." This differs from Pantheism, since the Great Being of Positivism submits to the laws of the external world instead of originating them. [PAN-

THEISM.] This idea is to be illustrated by the organisation of festivals at regular intervals setting forth the various aspects of Humanity: the Nation, the Town, the Domestic Relations, Polytheism, Monotheism, etc., will have their festival days; in fact, there is to be a "Positivist Calendar." On the last day of the year there is to be a commemoration of the dead and of their services.

Throughout his system, Comte assigns to Woman a peculiar and exalted position. He seems to find the answer to Solomon's question, "Who can find a virtuous woman?" in the great majority of women. Woman's mission is, he says, in one word, Love; they are charged with the education of Sympathy, the source of human unity. As mothers and wives it is their office to conduct the moral education of Humanity. In return for these benefits women are to enjoy immunity from out-door and other toilsome labour, and besides they are to be the objects of Worship, publicly and privately, as the first permanent step towards the Worship of Humanity. Man will, in the days when Positivism prevails, kneel to Woman, and to Woman alone; the source of his reverential feelings being a clear appreciation of benefits received, and a spirit of deep thankfulness for them. To her, as the concrete form of the abstract idea of Humanity, Prayer—i.e. the outpouring of men's nobler feelings—is to be addressed daily. If a suitable living object of devotion does not present itself, a dead wife or mother may be selected, or even some historical personage, so long as she once really lived. For women themselves, however, Comte does not consider himself competent to suggest an object of devotion.

We have seen that love is said to be the principle of Positivism; it is to amount to an abnegation of self; the motto on the Positive flag is to be "Vivre pour autrui," Live for Others; and the great moral principle itself Comte called Altruism: hence "to love Humanity may be truly said to constitute the whole duty of man." And then, after having "lived as far as it is possible for others, both in public and private, and having given a charm and sacredness to our temporary life, we shall at last be forever incorporated with the Supreme Being [Humanity], of whose life all noble natures are necessarily partakers." [General View—condensed.]

If we look for the sources of this novel religion, we are not much assisted by Comte's own life. He seems to have been an eccentric genius, with one of those bitter despotical tempers which led him to quarrel with every one! He was separated from his wife, and lived on intimate terms with a married woman, Clotilde de Vaux, notwithstanding the strict morality of his system. We must rather turn for an explanation to what he calls "Catholicism," by which he means sometimes Christianity, sometimes modern Romanism; and then we cannot but be struck with the singular imitation of Christianity and the Christian Church which Positivism presents. Thus, for the Positive principle of love, "live for others," we have the Gospel grace of love as "the fulfilling of the Law," and "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," with the Christian rule of self-denial. For the abstract idea of Humanity, we have the Incarnate Son of God, the Second Adam, and the Church of many members, His Mystical Body. For the worship of woman, extended to women generally in imitation of Mediæval Chivalry, and perhaps not without reference to the goddess of Reason of the French Revolution, we have the Romanist cultus of the Virgin. The Madonnas of art had likewise their influence, for the Positivist flag has for its device a young woman with a child in her arms. For the festivals and commemorations we have the Christian Seasons and the roll of Saints. The leading principle and the form of the Religion of Humanity are thus obviously borrowed from Catholic Christianity.

Positivism is not on the increase, in this country, at any rate. It numbers amongst its adherents some men of high ability and many of good moral character. But a system that asserts that there is no sense of, or feeling after, a God in our nature, which does not acknowledge a sense of sin or guilt as we understand it, nor an instinctive longing for, or expectation of, immortality in man, gives us little ground for hope that the exalted love and the strict morality which it professes would bear fruit in practice if it were freed from the pressure of surrounding Christian opinion. It seems, by its negations, rather to be the philosophy of those who are absorbed in the sense of life, and to whom this world is the whole of existence. Taking Positivism at its own estimate, it would appear to be easier to live as a consistent Christian than as a moderately good Positivist; and certainly the promise of eternal life is more attractive than, at the best, the possibility of an idle commemoration after incorporation into the Supreme Being of Humanity.

Post-Communion.—The part of the Communion Service following the reception, beginning with the Lord's Prayer.

Postils.—Sermons or homilies. They followed the reading of the Gospel, whence the name [post illa—i.e. evangelica].

Postures.—The bodily attitudes assumed in the various parts of Divine Worship. Reason, Scripture, and universal consent testify that all postures are not equally appropriate in that worship and in its different departments. Kneeling and prostration seem peculiarly expressive of penitent humility; bowing, of deep veneration; standing, of joy and thanksgiving. Thus, as a general rule, the Church enjoins kneeling in confession and prayer; standing in praise, the reciting of the Creed, and in the exhortations of the liturgy; and allows sitting during the reading of Scripture and the delivery of sermons. In Scotland, however, they sit, and in Germany sit or stand, during the prayers.

Potamo, Bishop of Heraclea, was imprisoned for his faith in the Maximinian persecution. He was present at the Nicene Council, and was strongly opposed to the Arians. He also accompanied St. Athanasius to the Council of Tyre [335]. When the Arian Bishop Gregory seized the See of Alexandria in 342, Potamo was so tortured that he died.

Potter, CHRISTOPHER, D.D. [b. 1591, d. 1646], Dean of Worcester from 1635 till his death. He wrote, Want of Charity justly charged on all such Romanists as dare affirm that Protestantism destroys Salvation, which was an answer to Edward Knot's Charity Mistaken, who retaliated in Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholics.

Potter, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury, son of a linendraper of Wakefield [b. 1674, d. 1747]. He was educated at Oxford, and when only twenty-three years old published his book on Greek Antiquities, which until recent times has been a standard work, though it is now quite superseded. Next year he took Holy Orders, and from that time his studies were exclusively professional. Archbishop Tenison made him his Chaplain, and gave him the living of Great Mongeham in Kent. He was also Chaplain to Queen Anne, and Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford. He became Archbishop in 1737.

Power of the Keys. [KEYS, POWER OF.]

Premunire [corrupted from premoneri].—A term used in a writ passed in the reign of Edward III. Its primary object was to curtail the Pope's authority, and accordingly it ordained that no one, and particularly no clergyman, should appeal to the Pope against the authority of the sovereign, or on matters belonging to his jurisdiction. It also declared that the Pope had no right to dispose of ecclesiastical preferments in England. This writ became the Statute of Premunire in the reign of Richard II., and the penalty for the offence was fixed at imprisonment for life, confiscation of lands and goods, and forfeiture of the king's protection. Since that time the name has been applied to other statutes, all relating to the king's authority, but differing as to the offences forbidden.

Pragmatic Sanction.—A name applied to ordinances relating to the affairs of Church or State, more particularly those authorised by the Kings of France. An ordinance of this nature, issued in 1268, directed that cathedral churches should have the right of electing their own prelates; that simony and the selling of benefices should be abolished; that no money should be exacted for the Court of Rome but with the consent of the sovereign; and that the liberties granted to ecclesiastics by former kings should be respected. The most famous Pragmatic Sanction was one granted by Charles VII. in 1438, and confirmed by the Parliament of Paris in the following year. Its object was to restore the primitive custom of the election of prelates by the people instead of by the king, and it also regulated the matter of excommunication, appeals, and judgments, abolished expectative graces, and limited the number of cardinals. This sanction gave rise to numerous controversies, and it was finally revoked by Francis I. in 1516.

Praxeas.—A heretic, of whom nothing is known except that at the end of the second century he came to Rome from Asia [where he had suffered imprisonment], and taught the errors of Montanus. Thence he went to Africa, where he was convinced of his errors, and wrote a recantation, but soon relapsed into heresy. Praxeas was the first of the Monarchians who maintained the Catholic faith that Christ is Son and Man. By denying the distinct personality of the Son and of the Holy Ghost he inferred that the Father was Incarnate and suffered, and therefore is reckoned with the Patripassians; but he denied that he belonged to that sect, saying that the Father only sympathised with the Son and did not suffer in Him. The heresies of Praxeas are very similar to those of Noëtius. They soon died out.

Prayer.—In its wider meaning, and as used very often in Holy Scripture, prayer includes not only petition to God for ourselves and for others, but also confession of sin, thanksgiving for mercies received, and also the praise and adoration of God for His greatness and glory, to which last the term "worship" is properly applied. These various aspects of prayer are abundantly illustrated in the Psalms, the great book of inspired public and private devotion. Thus, in the compass of one Psalm we sometimes find two or more of these elements of prayer joined together, and this may remind us that the hard line we often draw between prayer and praise is an artificial one. In our Collects, and, indeed, in the prayers of the Western Church generally, petition predominates over worship or adoration; but in the longer and more rhetorical prayers of the Eastern Church adoration holds an important place.

We read of prayer ages before God directly enjoined it, and in such a way that we can only believe the idea of prayer to be intuitive. Man naturally turns to God in prayer. The Psalmist was but uttering a universal truth when he said, "O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come" [Ps. lxxv. 2]. Nor is this idea of prayer confined to those who know one God. In various ways heathens appeal to their gods; they hardly enter upon any event in their lives without first of all approaching, in some form of prayer, the powers they think able to help them. This is matter of history, as well as of observation by missionaries now. We find prayer made to God throughout Holy Scripture, from beginning to end, accepted by Him, and answered by Him. Here and there, as in the Psalms, there are declarations as to the kind of prayer to which God will hearken, until at last, in the New Testament, Christ was plainly set forth as the medium through whom it is to be offered, and the Holy Spirit was made known as co-operating with the human spirit in its utterance. Christians pray as members of Christ; God hears and answers our prayers only because we are members of His beloved Son. The duty of prayer is inculcated, not only by the example of the Old Testament saints, but also directly by our Lord and his Apostles [Matt. vi. 5-13, xviii. 19, 20; Luke xviii. 1-14; John xiv. 13, 14; xvi. 24; Rom. viii. 26; 1 Cor. xiv. 15; Ephes. vi. 18, 19; Philipp. iv. 6; 1 Thess. v. 17; Jas. i. 5, v. 13-18].

Remembering, then, the manysidedness of prayer, some points connected with it in its aspects of petition for ourselves, or of intercession for others, require examination. We must first clearly recognise that God puts prayer before us as necessary if we would gain our ends. There is a signal instance of this, and of the store which God sets by His people's prayers, when our Lord bade His disciples "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that He will send forth labourers into His harvest" [Matt. ix. 38]. The disciples were bidden to ask God to do His own work, and thus to co-operate with Him in His labour of love. But this is only a sample of all prayer. God is ever seeking the salvation and well-being of His creatures, and yet He requires them to ask Him for those very things of which He knows they stand in the direst need. How there can be a place for petition when God foresees everything, is the mystery of prayer; but there is likewise the mystery of our free-will, and the one is the necessary complement of the other. If we are free to rule or misrule our lives and conduct, our very nature leads us to prayer in our perplexities and distresses. If we are free to wander, we must appeal to a guide. This may be an intellectual difficulty, but it is one involved in the mystery of God, and in the mystery of our own being.

In the present day, other difficulties have been raised as to prayer and its efficacy.

[1] It has been said that prayer is merely a superstitious custom, handed on from generation to generation in civilised countries; that it is a human invention altogether. But, unlike other superstitions, which have crumbled away in the light of truth and of modern discovery, prayer still holds its ground. In spite of all that is alleged as to its uselessness, men of the acutest intellect, as well as uncultured men, still pray, and still believe in the power of prayer. Besides this, we cannot pass over the fact already mentioned, that prayer is an intuitive idea with man, and is not due to education—that it fulfils a universal need of human nature.

[2] It is said that prayer is unreasonable, because request is made for things contrary to the immutable laws of Nature. It is needful to state this objection to prayer plainly. The laws of nature are merely statements of the orderly condition of things in nature, a summary of what has been found by competent observers. The order is so perfect that we do not look for any deviation from it. And in the spiritual world, as far as we know it, we have every reason to believe that law likewise reigns, or, to speak more correctly, that the most perfect order prevails. Thus we must believe that every thought of our hearts is the result of some previous combination of ideas, either existing there already or introduced from without. Thoughts do not come into our minds by chance. Such being what we understand by law, we can suppose that prayer may be answered, or apparently answered, in two ways. Thus, fine weather may be prayed for, and many natural laws acting together may bring it about in the ordinary course of things, to all appearance as a direct answer to the prayer; or, on the other hand, natural causes not sufficing to cause fine weather, God may see fit to bring about the result prayed for by suspending or controlling some of the laws of nature. It is to the latter of these answers to prayer that objection is made. Again, prayer may be made for some spiritual blessing, and the blessing may come, either from ordinary causes, i.e. as a result of the religious circumstances in which God has placed us, or He may put a fresh thought into our minds, or change the intensity of some feelings already there, and thus bring the blessing prayed for. It is the latter case to which objection is made. Objectors regard those answers to prayer for temporal or spiritual blessings which come in the ordinary course of natural laws as the only possible ones; they look upon them as mere coincidences, and they wholly deny the possibility of answers of the latter kind, because they are contrary to unchangeable laws—in short, because they are miraculous, and miracles are incredible. [The question of the credibility of miracles is discussed in the articles MIRACLES and RESURRECTION, and reference may also be made to the article on NATURAL LAW.] But there is also a class of theologians who are disposed to deny that miraculous answers to prayer are vouchsafed; one of them has recently expressed his opinion as follows:—“To the best of my understanding, we do well and reasonably to ask God—just as we do for a daily sufficiency in the Lord’s Prayer—to bless and preserve the fruits of the earth, leaving the immediate process to the ordinary workings of His all-wise law; and then, after doing our duty in the matter, to trust that, in spite of appearances, He, ‘in perfect wisdom, perfect love, is working for the best.’ In all troubles, temporal or spiritual, we do well to put them up before God and ask for His guidance to do our duty towards mitigating or relieving them, and to take to heart the many moral lessons they inculcate. This prayer, with the understanding, I deem to be our reasonable service to the Almighty; while, according to our light and knowledge of God’s world-wide and salutary law of ‘reaping what we sow,’ I deem it unreasonable to ask Him to contravene this law for our special or national possible benefit.” This writer would think it unreasonable to be asked to pray against the inundations of the Thames in Lambeth, and would consider the Thames Embankment authorities the proper source of help. True, he would say, the seasons lately have been unfavourable for agriculture: the remedy for this is to alter our system, rents, etc. And he goes on, “Why I strike against special petitions to the Almighty to intervene directly in certain things when they become painful, is because we practically thereby charge God with directly and specially sending such visitations, when, as a fact, we are but reaping what we or others have culpably or ignorantly sown. . . . I do not say that God cannot so administer His law, moral and physical, as to give and withhold what we ask. I simply say that, to the best of our understanding, acquired from revelation and experience, God will not work signs and wonders that we may believe.” Now, as nearly the whole of our needs and adversities can be traced to the culpable or ignorant sowing of ourselves or others, prayer, according to this view, should be limited to petitions for patience and for guidance as to how we can best help ourselves. Unquestionably these are right objects of prayer, since all real prayer is always accompanied by work on our part; but it is impossible to accept them as the whole, or even the most important, matters of prayer, without ignoring what is told us in Holy Scripture. Prayer is there represented to us as the remedy for our sins and their effects, and the only conditions placed upon our petitions are, that they must be according to God’s will, and the outcome of a sincere and obedient heart. These conditions being fulfilled, the promise is that God will grant us our requests whatever they may be. [A reference to the texts already named will make this clear.] To deny this would be equivalent to denying the efficacy of prayer altogether, except as a moral agent affecting ourselves only as a kind of religious exercise; for it must be remembered that even if we only believe that God will give us patience and guide us as to how we should help ourselves, we yet admit—though we may not avow it—the efficacy of prayer, since patience and guidance are themselves, if specially granted, miraculous gifts of God.

For the sake of plainness, it may be added that: [1] No distinction can be made between prayer for temporal and spiritual blessings; both alike are put before us as proper objects of prayer in Scripture, and both the one and the other are promised in answer to it. [2] When prayer seems to be specially answered, we can rarely say how much is due to the operation of natural laws, how much to some modification of those laws; we know not where ordinary law, so to speak, ends, and where miracle begins. [3] Taking the history of the Apostolic Church for our guide, although we are encouraged to make known all our requests, freely, to God, we are not, generally speaking, led to expect such an answer to our prayers as would involve an obvious miracle—e.g. the raising of the dead, the floating of a hopelessly-sinking ship in mid-ocean—but we must believe that He does really and directly answer prayer, as well in our temporal as our spiritual concerns, though we know it not. By a logical necessity we are compelled to take one side or the other; there is no middle course. Prayer, in the Scripture sense of the word, is and can be, or it is not and cannot be, answered. [INTERCESSION; LORD'S PRAYER.]

Prayer-days.—The name given to the days of the week selected in the American Episcopal Church for the holding of morning or evening service, as it is not the custom there to hold daily services.

Prayers for the Dead. [DEAD, PRAYERS FOR.]

Preaching.—This function was at first performed by all grades of the Christian hierarchy, and sometimes even by laymen. Origen, when visiting the Holy Land in A.D. 215, was desired by the Bishops of Cæsarea and Jerusalem to preach in their churches, though he was not then ordained, and they defended themselves from the charge of irregularity by producing precedents showing that it had been sometimes permitted to laymen to preach in the presence, and with the sanction, of a bishop. Later, preaching was restricted to bishops and priests; but deacons, about the fourth century, regained the right. The history of preaching in the ancient Christian Church is one of the most interesting branches of ecclesiastical annals. Basil of Cæsarea, St. John Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, were among the most famous preachers of the Greek Church. In the Latin, Jerome and Augustine were probably the greatest. Such records as we have of the great preachers of ancient times show that they differed much in pulpit action, but the greater part seem to have used very moderate and sober gesture. They delivered their sermons extempore, while there were notaries who took down what they said. Probably an hour was about the usual length. Sermons were generally both uttered and heard standing, the preacher preceding his sermon with "Peace be with you," to which the assembly responded "Amen," and later, "And with thy Spirit." The Middle Ages produced great preachers like Bernard, Bonaventura, Anselm; but the development of the Scholastic philosophy was not favourable to the development of homiletical power. The Mendicant or Preaching Friars wrought a revolution in this matter by the vigour and homely common-sense with which they replaced the subtleties of their predecessors. The greatest preacher of mediæval times—the most like, it has been said, of all Christian preachers to the ancient prophets—was Savonarola. But, unfortunately, the ignorance of the clergy, and the neglect into which the study of the Scriptures had fallen, became a fatal drawback; and it was the first great work of the Reformation to restore preaching to its place of dignity as a means of grace. The avidity of the common people to read Scripture and hear it expounded was wonderful, and the result was that the "unpreaching prelates," whose pulpits, as Latimer expressed it, had been "bells without clappers" for many long years, were obliged to set up regular preaching again. The same variation which marked the early preachers characterised the great homilists of the Reformation. Thus, it was said, the preaching of Knox was like a thunderstorm; Calvin resembled a whole day's set rain, Beza was a shower of the softest dew. Latimer, in a coarse frieze gown, trudged afoot, and instructed the people in rustic style; while the courtly Ridley, in satin and fur, taught the same principles in his cathedral.

Since the Reformation the Roman Church has produced no famous preachers in England; but Bourdaloue, Massillon, and Bossuet, in France, were probably never surpassed. The English preachers of the same period have won themselves a deathless name: Jeremy Taylor, South, Baxter, Owen, Calamy, Wesley, and Whitefield, in the eighteenth century, roused England from the torpor into which she had fallen.

It is difficult to weigh accurately the estimate in which popular preaching is held at the present time. On the one hand it is certainly the fact that never probably were preachers who drew larger audiences than some in all denominations who could be mentioned at the present day. On the other it must be confessed that one hears "the sermon" often mentioned contemptuously, and the wish expressed that it might be omitted. The most powerful of living statesmen has expressed his conviction that the preaching power of the Church of England was never so great as it is at the present moment. But it is unpleasant to read advertisements in the Clerical newspapers of "manuscript sermons" at a cheap rate, which imitate handwriting so well that they cannot be detected in the gallery! This we may be sure of, that if preachers will take pains and have the ability to make their sermons worth hearing, they will not lack hearers, simply for the reason that the spirit of inquiry is abroad eager and keen. The writer of these lines has had a large experience of poor as well as rich audiences; and no one knows better, that the average agricultural labourer is one of the ablest of critics, knows a good sermon, and knows a bad one; no man better. A very clever essay by Mr. Mahaffy [Macmillan, 1882] thus analyses the causes of the decay of modern preaching:—

1. Historical Causes:

- Loss of novelty.
- Increase of education.
- Quietness of modern life.

II. Social Causes:

- Need of social uniformity.*
- Absence of debate.
- Friendly life of the clergy.

* The preacher is required, on fixed and very frequent occasions, however indispensed or empty he may feel as regards teaching, to ascend a narrow pulpit, where he has no power of movement or action. Indeed, all action more violent than that of speaking very loud, or thumping the cushion, is prohibited, and even these symptoms of energy have come to be considered excessive and ill-bred. He is obliged to find a text of Scripture from which to draw his lessons, even though there be none exactly appropriate and though he be forced to employ many quibbles and subtleties to graft on his discourse to the text. He is not to speak too loud or too low; he must not be too long or too short; if the former, he offends the worldly and idle, who only come to church from habit, and desire to escape as soon as may be convenient; if the latter, he annoys the serious and respectable people, who think that such brevity reflects on the importance of his subject. If he employs anecdotes and descends to particulars, in order to give colour to his sermon, he is thought familiar; if he keeps to dogma only, he is thought dry. In fact, every sort of departure from a fixed norm, a fixed way of speaking, a fixed way of thinking, is resented by some section of the congregation. Above all, to be amusing is a great crime. The shadow of Puritanism still hangs over our churches, and if, a generation ago, all ornament in churches was thought to savour of worldliness, or of all false doctrine, so all levity, as it is called, is considered as excluded by the solemnity of the subject. And yet men pleading for life and death, for

III. and IV. Personal Causes:

- Want of ability.
- Want of piety.
- Want of general culture.
- Want of special training in rhetoric and in theology.

V. Defective Types:

- The logical extreme.
- The emotional extreme.
- The orthodox extreme.
- The heterodox extreme.
- Excessive sameness.
- Excessive variety.

And this is followed by an able and striking chapter suggesting remedies.

The Church of England Liturgy, so far as the rubric goes, has made but scant provisions for preaching. The only place where a sermon is provided for in the Prayer Book is in the Communion Service. Preaching, therefore, it has been said, is an essential part of that service, while it is merely an adjunct to Evening Prayer. The rubric giving directions for the sermon allows, as a substitute, "one of the homilies already set forth, or hereafter to be set forth, by authority." But as we have shown, practically the Church has recognised the great value of this ordinance, and there are few churches probably where there are not at least two sermons a week. Queries on this point are always found in Bishops' Visitation returns.

Preaching Crosses.—Crosses set up in the highway or places of public resort, at which the friars and others were accustomed to preach. St. Paul's Cross was one of the most remarkable; it was there that Latimer preached some of his famous sermons.

Preaching Friars. [DOMINICANS.]

Pre-Adamites.—A name given to the supposed inhabitants of the earth before the creation of Adam; also to those who believe that such persons existed. The Pre-Adamite theory was first propounded in 1655, in a book by Isaac de la Peyrere, otherwise called Pererius, a native of Bordeaux, and in the service of the Prince of Condé. He says that great issues of poverty and wealth, for great party struggles which involve the weal and woe of millions, do not disdain to attract and to divert their audience by an appeal to that peculiarly human quality, the faculty of laughter. There is no orator in the world, speaking on the subject nearest to his heart, and most vital to those he addresses, who avoids this great help to persuasion, except the preacher. To him, while wit is wholly inadmissible, even humour is only allowed in the form of bitterness and sarcasm—the very forms which are really most unsuitable to his sacred office. There is, moreover, a large section of Christians, who will not tolerate any variety of subject, who think that the preacher has but one message to bring, and that so paramount in importance, that every moment not devoted to it is lost or wasted, and they require him to repeat this message every Sunday of his life."

on the sixth day God created men and women in all parts of the earth; and that long afterwards he made Adam and Eve to be His own peculiar people, the ancestors of the Jewish race. Moses intended to write the history of the Jews, and therefore says little of the first creation of man, or of his history; for the events recorded in Genesis are only those connected with the Jews, and have no reference to the other races living on the earth. As the Law was given to the Jews only, and not to the Gentiles, so no sin could be imputed to the latter, according to St. Paul; the only evil, therefore, which the author of the book recognises is natural evil. To prove his theory, Peyron had recourse to the fabulous antiquities of the Chaldeans, Egyptians, and Chinese, and to the opinions of some Rabbins, who imagined there had been another world in existence before that described by Moses. He was apprehended by the Inquisition in Flanders, but released through the intercession of the Prince of Condé, and retracted his opinions. Modern scientific discoveries, in the opinion of some, have afforded grounds for the revival of the Pre-Adamite theory. [EVOLUTION; MAN.]

Prebend [Lat. præbenda, "an allowance"] was originally the portion of food allotted to each monk at the table where they were all accustomed to assemble. In course of time the Church revenues were divided among the monks and clergy; according to the station of each; but the term continued to be used to denote the fixed income which the division gave. The prebends were either præbende capitulares or præbende domicellares, the former being those held by a regular member of the chapter, and the latter, by a junior. They were of four degrees—maiores, media, minores, or semi-præbende. The holder of a prebend is called a prebendary, and receives a fixed income in return for certain services.

Precentor.—The leader of the choir and musical director; usually in cathedrals and collegiate churches. The precentor may be either a clerk or a layman. In Scottish churches, where there is no organ, there is nearly always a precentor to lead the singing.

Preces.—Prayers said by the priest and people alternately, as distinguished from orationes, recited by the priest alone. In the old Offices, the preces were said daily at Prime and Compline, and also at Lauds and Vespers on week-days. The verses and responses following the Creed and Lord's Prayer in our Prayer Book are a selection from these preces, and hence are sometimes called by that name.

Pre-Communion. [ANTE-COMMUNION.]

Preconisation [Lat. præconizare = præconari, "to announce publicly"].—The notice given by the Pope, signifying his approbation of the appointment of any person to a high ecclesiastical dignity. The notice is sent to the Cardinal-Protector of the nation to which belongs the candidate submitted for approval, and a Bull of Preconisation is given to the latter, and also posted up at the doors of the church. The term is also used to denote a public proclamation in meetings of Convocation.

Predestination.—A word used to denote the eternal purpose of God, whereby He has preordained whatever comes to pass. The Seventeenth Article of the Church of England declares that "predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God," etc. But this doctrine has been the occasion of considerable disputes and controversies among divines. If, say they, God has foreordained some men to election, the converse must be true that He has foreordained some men to reprobation. It is impossible to reconcile the doctrine of reprobation with our ideas of the justice and goodness of God, as it makes God to be the author of sin, destroys moral distinction, and renders all our efforts useless. This doctrine had its origin in the attempts to define the relations between the human and the Divine will. It began with the discussions of Pelagius and St. Augustine. Pelagius held that a choice of salvation lay in man's will; Augustine, that at the Fall, man lost all freedom of choice, and was deprived of the exercise of his free will. [FREE-WILL.] But the first advocate of extreme Predestinarianism was Gottschalk, a monk of the ninth century, who was condemned at a Council of Mainz for heresy, and died during his imprisonment at the Monastery of Hautvilliers. Other Predestinarians came forward from time to time during the Middle Ages, but the doctrine reached its fullest development with the teaching of CALVIN [q.v.]. The doctrine of Predestination has been moderated within the present century, and in very few cases is the belief in double Predestination retained.

Preface to the Prayer Book.—The original preface [1549] was the Article now headed "Concerning the Service of the Church," and was almost entirely drawn from the reformed Breviary of Cardinal Quignon, published in 1535. The present one was prefixed in 1661, and was probably drawn up by Bishop Sanderson of Lincoln.

Prefaces, PROPER.—The special forms to precede the hymn Ter-Sanctus in the Holy Communion. Such prefaces are found in most ancient Liturgies, and have been variously styled Prefaces, Illations, Contestations, and Prayers of the Triumphal Hymn. In the early English Church there was probably one for every day which had a Collect; but the number was afterwards reduced to ten, of which the Reformers retained five, viz.: for Christmas Day, Ascension Day, Easter Day, Whitsunday, and Trinity Sunday. That for Ascension Day was probably written by Gregory the Great; those for Easter and Trinity Sundays are from the Sacramentary of Gelasius; while those for Christmas and Whitsunday were composed in 1549.

Prelacy.—The office or dignity of a prelate or bishop.

Prelate.—This term, which is now limited to the highest of the three orders of the ministry, was formerly applied to all clerics who bore rule over other clerics, or who were highly esteemed in the Church. So Archbishop Secker says, "Parish priests are Prelati;" and Latimer, "A Prelate is that man, whosoever he is, that has a flock to be taught by him."

Premonstrants. [NORBERT, ST.]

Pre-sanctified.—In the Roman Church it is customary to have no consecration on Good Friday, a portion of the bread consecrated on Maundy Thursday being reserved for the following day. In the Greek Church this principle is extended to every day of Lent, except Saturdays, Sundays, the Feast of the Annunciation, and Maundy Thursday. For the days on which the pre-sanctified or pre-consecrated elements are used, a special service, omitting the Act of Consecration, is appointed, called the Mass of the Pre-sanctified. The idea underlying this practice is that the Holy Eucharist, being essentially a feast, is unsuitable for fast days. The use of the Pre-sanctified was enjoined by the Council of Trullo [A.D. 680] on every day in Lent except the Sabbath Day, the Lord's Day, and the Annunciation. The Council of Laodicea had previously forbidden consecration during Lent, except upon the Sabbath Day and the Lord's Day.

Presbyter, Presbyterians.—The Greek word presbuteros, "senior" or "elder," is frequently used in the Greek translation of the Old Testament to signify a ruler or governor—one chosen not for his age, but for his merits and wisdom. In the Christian Church a presbyter or elder is one who is set apart to a certain office and authorised to discharge the several duties of that office and station in which he is placed. The office of the presbyter consisted in feeding the flock of God, and exhorting and convincing the gainsayers by sound doctrine, baptising, and celebrating the Eucharist, and leading the public prayers of the congregation. The body of Christians who call themselves PRESBYTERIANS hold that all the powers and rights of the Christian ministry, including ordination, are held and exercised by the single order of presbyters; that there is no order in the Church as established by Christ and His Apostles superior to that of presbyters; that all ministers, being ambassadors of Christ, are equal by their commission; that presbyter and bishop, though different words, are of the same import; and that prelacy was gradually established upon the primitive practice of making the moderator, or speaker of the presbytery, a permanent officer. This is the point of controversy between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians. They maintain their position against the Episcopalians by the following Scriptural arguments. They observe, that the Apostles planted churches by ordaining bishops and deacons in every city; that the ministers who in one verse are called bishops, are in the next, perhaps, called presbyters; that we nowhere read in the New Testament of bishops, presbyters, and deacons in any one church, and that therefore we must of necessity conclude "bishop" and "presbyter" to be two names for the same office. They take the passage 1 Pet. v. 2-3, and say it is evident that the presbyters not only fed the flock of God, but governed it with episcopal powers, and that Peter himself as a church officer was nothing more than a presbyter or elder. In Heb. xiii. 7-17 and 1 Thess. v. 12 the bishops are spoken of as discharging various offices which it would be impossible for any man to perform for more than one congregation, for if they were to be such as all the people were to know, esteem, and love, they could not have been diocesan bishops, whom ordinarily the hundredth part of their flock never hear nor see. Again, in James v. 14, the elders whom the Apostle James desires the sick to call for were the highest permanent order of ministers; it is evident that those elders cannot have been diocesan bishops, otherwise the sick would have been often without the reach of the remedy proposed for them. From Acts xx. 17, etc., where St. Paul sends from Miletus to Ephesus to call the elders of the Church, the Presbyterians argue that there was in the city of Ephesus a plurality of pastors of equal authority without any superior pastor or bishop over them, for the Apostle directs his discourse to them all in common, and gives them equal power over the whole flock. They argue, therefore, that Paul left in the Church of Ephesus, which he had planted, no other successors to himself than presbyter-bishops, or Presbyterian ministers, and that he did not devolve his power upon any prelate. Timothy, whom the Episcopalians allege to have been the first Bishop of Ephesus, was present when this settlement was made [Acts xx. 5]; and had he been their bishop, it is not to be supposed that the Apostle would have devolved the whole episcopal power upon the presbyters before his face; for if ever there were a season fitter than another for pointing out the duty of this supposed bishop to his diocese and his presbyters' duty to him, it would have been when St. Paul was taking his final leave of them. That Timothy resided at Ephesus, and was by the Apostle invested with authority to ordain and rebuke presbyters, are facts about which both parties are agreed. What, then, was his office in that city? To this the Presbyterian replies that his power was that of an evangelist, 2 Tim. iv. 5, and not of a fixed prelate. It will thus be seen that they identify the office of bishop with that of presbyter, and hold the presbyterate to be the highest permanent office in the Church, every faithful pastor of a flock being successor to the Apostles in everything in which they were to have any successors.

The modern Presbyterian theory of Church government dates from the Reformation. Luther earnestly taught that all Christians are priests unto God. Even had he been desirous of preserving an Episcopal form of government, the course which the Reformation took on the Continent, so different from that in England, would have prevented him. It was, however, Calvin, with that genius for organisation which so remarkably characterised him, who established the Presbyterian form of government. He incorporated his ideas with that of the State control, and so arranged that the Council of State in consultation with the people, should choose the presbyters, each of whom was to have his allotted work, and the assembly of whom together in Consistory were to deal with all cases of ecclesiastical discipline. There were ministers who were to preach and teach, and the elders who ruled the Church. Both, however, were recognised as holding spiritual office. His idea was adopted in the Reformed Church of France, and also in Scotland [SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF], where there are now three main bodies of Presbyterians, viz.: the Established Church, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterians. In England Presbyterianism was started in 1572 at Wandsworth, when a presbytery was opened with its "Book of Order." In the struggles between the House of Stuart and the House of Commons, Presbyterianism represented the side of the latter, and the downfall of Charles I. was the signal for the abolition of the Episcopal Church on June 29th, 1647. The famous WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY, and its Catechism, which we have noticed in its place, represents the zenith of Presbyterianism in England. But in a very few years it was displaced by Independency under Cromwell. The result was that Presbyterianism became altogether weakened as a power in England, and on the Restoration, the non-Episcopal ministers, most of them Presbyterians, were ejected from their livings. Even in Scotland, Presbyterianism was down-trodden until the Revolution. In England, where it had not gained the affection of the people, most of the congregations, in reaction from Calvinism, became Unitarian. Nevertheless, Presbyterianism upon the old Puritan lines has been revived in the present century in England. In 1836 two Presbyteries were opened in union with the Church of Scotland, two more were added in 1839. On the Scottish disruption, in 1843, the English Presbyteries severed this connection, and joined the English congregations of the "United Church." In 1876 they were all united under the title of the "Presbyterian Church of England." In the census of 1881, 275 congregations were returned, of which seventy-five are in London. One of its noblest works is the China Mission.

In Ireland, Presbyterianism is the largest denomination in the province of Ulster, where there is a large population of Scottish blood. In America the first Presbytery met at Philadelphia in 1705. After many divisions and offshoots a reunion was established in 1870, when a great General Assembly met again at Philadelphia. It was then found that the Presbyterian Church contained no less than 4,238 ministers, with 446,561 members. In 1882 the ministers were 5,143, the Church members 592,128. The Presbyterian Church, therefore, of the United States is at present a very flourishing body.

Presbyterii Corona ["the crown, or circle, of the presbytery"].—An allusion to the fact that the seats of the presbyters in ancient churches were frequently arranged in a semi-circle, with the bishop's throne in the centre.

Presbytery [from the Greek word presbuterion, a word which is used twice in the Greek translation of the New Testament for "sanhedrin" (Acts xxii. 5, Luke xxii. 66)]. In the early Christian Church it signified the assembly of all the clergy of the diocese, both presbyters and deacons, as may be seen from the writings of St. Cyprian, Pope Siricius, St. Ignatius, etc. The word is often used in Scotland to designate the presbyter's house.

Presence, REAL. [LORD'S SUPPER.]

Presentation is the offering of a clerk by the patron to the ordinary for institution into a benefice. It is sometimes confounded with nomination, which, however, signifies the offering of a clerk to the patron that he may be presented. After presentation the bishop may, if the clerk presented show want of learning, or if he has been convicted of perjury or other great crime, refuse to institute him. If a presentation is not made to the bishop within six months after the living is vacant, it lapses to the bishop; after another six months, to the archbishop, and from him to the Crown.

Presentation of Christ in the Temple. [PURIFICATION, FEAST OF.]

Prester John, or John the Presbyter.—A king whom tradition declared to be reigning in the Indies, or Tartary, during the twelfth century. It is now doubted whether he really existed, and the legends concerning him are vague and contradictory. It was reported that a Christian king was reigning somewhere beyond Persia who had gained brilliant victories over the Mohammedans, and who was a priest as well as a king. In the thirteenth century messengers were sent to seek the Presbyter John, or his kingdom; they returned saying that a Nestorian king of that name had existed some time before, but was now dead. It is now generally believed that the name was not John, but Jorkhan, or Coirkhan; that he ruled in some district of Central Asia, and was converted to Christianity from Buddhism.

Price Lectures.—A series of lectures delivered annually in Lent at Boston, according to the will of William Price [d. 1770]. The preacher receives £16, and after each lecture there is to be an offertory for the poor, to which the churchwardens must contribute 5s.

Prideaux, HUMPHREY, D.D. [b. at Padstow, Cornwall, 1648; d. at Norwich, 1724], was descended from an ancient Cornish family, and was educated at Liskeard, Bodmin, and Westminster, and Christ Church, Oxford. While at Oxford Prideaux published an edition of Lucius Florus, and a commentary on the inscriptions of the Arundel Marbles. He was presented in 1679 to the rectory of St. Clement's, Oxford, and to the Hebrew lectureship at Christ Church in the same year; became Archdeacon of Suffolk in 1688; and in 1781 he was made Prebendary of Norwich, and in the next year Rector of Bladen with Woodstock, near Oxford. This he exchanged later for the living of Saham, in Norfolk. He became Vicar of Trowse, near Norwich, in 1696, and Dean of Norwich in 1702. During his residence at Saham, Prideaux entered into a contest against the Roman Catholics, and wrote in favour of the validity of the orders of the Church of England. He afterwards did his best to preserve the Church of England from the plans of James II. He published a Life of Mahomet in 1697; Directions to Churchwardens in 1707; a work upon Tythes in 1710; and The Connection of the History of the Old and New Testaments, 1715-1717. At his death Dr. Prideaux left a large collection of Oriental books to the library of Clare Hall, Cambridge.

His Life of Mahomet is a most violent production, taking the lowest view of the prophet's character, and accusing him of being a rank impostor. The Connection is a very learned and valuable work, which is still read, and has never been superseded.

Priest [a contraction of the Latin presbyter, which is derived from the Greek presbuteros, "elder"].—The Greek and Latin words, hieruus and sacerdos, which we translate "priest," are derived from words which signify "holy," and so a priest's functions are of a holy or sacred character. But in the Jewish Church it signified one set apart for the performance of sacrifice, and it has often been said that there can be no official priest in the Christian Church but Christ, as He alone can offer a sacrifice to God. Against this is quoted,

"Ye are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices," i.e. of prayer, praises, and thanksgiving, etc. [1 Pet. ii. 5]. This passage, however, manifestly applies to the whole body of the faithful. In Episcopal language, the word "priest" designates the second order in the Christian ministry. The use of the word in the Prayer Book was objected to at the Savoy Conference in 1662 by the Presbyterians, who requested that "as the word 'minister,' and not 'priest' or 'curate,' is used in the absolution, and in divers other places, it may throughout the whole book be so used instead of these two words." To which the Episcopal commissioners replied that "it is not reasonable the word 'minister' should be only used in the Liturgy. For since some parts of the Liturgy may be performed by a deacon, and others, such as absolution and consecration, by none under the order of a priest, it is fit that some such word as 'priest' should be used for those offices, and not 'minister,' which signifies, at large, every one that ministers in that holy office of what order soever he be." The Church of England in her "Office of Institution" witnesses to the existence of "sacerdotal functions:" these are the offering of sacrifice, of praise, and thanksgiving in the Eucharist; "the declaring and pronouncing the absolution and remission of sins;" the blessing of the people in God's name.

Priestley, JOSEPH, an eminent Unitarian writer, the son of Jonas Priestley, a cloth-dresser at Birstal Fieldhead, near Leeds, was born at Fieldhead on March 13th, 1733. His mother dying when he was six, he was adopted by his aunt, who put him to a free grammar school, where he learnt Latin and Greek, and during his vacation taught himself Hebrew, Chaldee, etc. He was intended for the ministry, but was for a time obliged to give up study on account of ill-health, and was engaged in mercantile pursuits. However, in 1752, becoming stronger, he entered a Dissenting academy at Daventry. His father and aunt were Calvinists, but Priestley had many discussions on the subject, and was himself inclined to Arminianism, though he declares he then "by no means rejected the doctrine of the Trinity or of the Atonement."

On quitting the academy in 1755 he became minister at Needham Market, in Suffolk, went thence to Nantwich in Cheshire in 1758, and in 1761 was Professor of Languages and Belles-Lettres at the Dissenting academy of Warrington. He became very famous for his scientific works, and was made a member of the Royal Society and a Doctor of Laws by the University of Edinburgh. In 1767 he became minister at Millhill, near Leeds, and in 1773 librarian and literary companion to Lord Shelburn, on leaving whom he preached to a congregation at Birmingham. While here he wrote a reply to Burke, Reflections on the French Revolution, for which he was made a citizen of the French Republic. This so angered his fellow-citizens that a mob broke into his house and destroyed all its contents. In 1791 he removed to Hackney, but did not remain long, being very unpopular on account of his opinions. He sailed for America in 1794, and died at Northumberland in Pennsylvania, Feb. 6th, 1804.

Dr. Priestley is mostly noted for his discoveries in chemistry, etc.; but he also wrote many theological works, as The Scripture Doctrine of Remission, which shows that the Death of Christ is no proper Sacrifice nor Satisfaction for Sin, Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever, and other works containing criticisms of Hume's doctrines. This led to his being called in England an atheist, to refute which he wrote Disquisition Relating to Matter and Spirit, in which he argues that our hopes of resurrection must rest solely on the truth of the Christian revelation, and have no foundation in science; History of the Early Opinions concerning Jesus Christ, which led to a controversy between him and Dr. Horsley, Priestley maintaining the doctrines of Necessity, Materialism, and Unitarianism.

Primate.—A title formerly given to all metropolitans in the Western Church, but afterwards confined to those of the more important cities, or those who gained the title by request from the See of Rome. The Primate of the West corresponded to the Patriarch of the East. He was authorised to hold ecclesiastical synods, to confirm bishops, and to perform the most honourable functions in the Church, such as the consecration of the sovereign. These privileges were first granted by Rome to the bishops of Thessalonica. In Roman Catholic countries the title has become little more than a name, as the Pope has resumed the rights granted to primates. Such nominal primates are the Archbishop of Toledo, of Spain; Bourges and Lyons, of France; Pisa, of Italy, and others. The Archbishop of York is primate of England, and the Archbishop of Canterbury primate of all England; the Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin primates of Ireland; and St. Andrew's, of Scotland.

Prime. [CANONICAL HOURS.]

Primer or Prymer.—A manual of private devotion and elementary religious instruction. The Primer, in its earliest form, containing the Creed, Lord's Prayer, and Ten Commandments, was probably in use in Anglo-Saxon times. In course of time prayers and offices were added, and it seems clear that for two centuries, at least, before the Reformation "The Primer" was the book of devotion authorised by the Church of England for the use of the laity. It was usually in English, but sometimes partly Latin and partly English. The following is a table of the contents of one of a date about 1400:—

Matins and the Hours of Our Lady.
Evensong and Compline.
The vii. penitential Psalms [vi., xxxii., xxxviii., li., cii., cxxx., cxliii.].
The xv. Psalms [Songs of Degrees. Psalms cxx. — cxxxiv.].
The Litany.
Placebo [the Vespers for the dead, beginning Placebo Domino].
Dirge [the Office for the Dead, beginning with the anthem Dirige in conspectu tuo viam meam, Psalm v. 8].
The Psalms of commendation [Psalm cxxxix.].
Pater Noster.
Ave Maria.
Creed.
The Ten Commandments.
The Seven Deadly Sins.

In the reign of Henry VIII. several books of devotion were published under this title, but lacking authority. Such was Marsshall's Primer, published in 1530, which omitted the Litany, on account of the invocations of saints contained therein. The Litany was inserted in a second edition [1535], but a warning against the invocations was added. In 1539, Hilsey, afterwards Bishop of Rochester, published another, "at the commandment of the right honourable Lord Thomas Cromwell." Hilsey's Primer contains "the bidding of the beads," on which our "bidding prayer" [See Canon LV.] is founded, and retains the prayers for the dead, but omits most of the invocations of saints from the Litany.

In 1545, Henry VIII. authorised the issue of what is called King Henry's Primer, "set forth by the King's Majesty and his clergy, to be taught, learned, and read; and none other to be used throughout all his dominions." It contained:—

The Kalendar.
The King's Highness' Injunction.
The Prayer of Our Lord.
The Salutation of the Angel.
The Creed or Articles of the Faith.
The Ten Commandments.
Certain Graces.
The Canonical Hours.
The seven Psalms.
The Litany.
The Dirge.
The Commendations.
The Psalms of the Passion [xxii., lxi., lxxxviii., ii., and lix.].
The Passion of Our Lord.
Certain godly prayers for sundry purposes.

This was several times reprinted and revised by the Bishops. The edition of 1549 omitted the remaining invocations of saints from the Litany; that of 1551 expunged the "Hail Mary" and other passages. To the editions of 1552 and 1559 the Catechism, as far as the end of the Lord's Prayer, was added. In 1560 a Latin version of the Primer, called the Horarium, was issued.

Princeites.—Followers of Henry James Prince, an Evangelical clergyman [b. 1811], who established the sect about 1840, declaring that the Holy Ghost, in his own person, had established it by a new dispensation to supersede that of Christ. Prince studied at Lampeter College, where he organised a small body of students, under the name of the "Lampeter Brethren," to meet together for prayer and the study of the Scriptures, especially the Song of Solomon. He next became curate at a village near Bridgewater, where he converted the rector and some other persons to a belief in his mission, and created such an uproar that his licence was withdrawn, and he removed to a curacy in Suffolk, with the same result. In 1842 the Lampeter Brethren met together at Swansea to discuss their plan of action; Prince, as "the Holy Ghost personified," was acknowledged as their leader, and a temporary community, called the "Agapemone, or Abode of Love," was established at Weymouth. A great number of rich ladies joined the sect, and Prince became possessed of great wealth, with which he enlarged the institution at Weymouth, and he and his friends settled there to live in luxury. Adopting the principles of the American Perfectionists, the Princeites declared there was no need for prayer, and abandoned themselves to enjoyment, without seeking to gain fresh converts. As in other similar cases, there have been very gross scandals in relation to Prince's moral conduct, the more revolting as connected with certain blasphemous pretensions which can only be barely alluded to here.

Prior.—The superior of certain convents of monks, second only in rank to the abbot, and holding a position very similar to our deans. The use of the word in this sense seems only to date from the thirteenth century, the older term being prapostitus or "provost." Monasteries attached to a cathedral were ruled by a prior, as the abbot was in all such cases the bishop himself; and the alien priories were so called because they were under the abbot of some large monastery, the prior acting as his lieutenant. There were two kinds of priors—the priores claustrales, who were subordinate to the abbots, or acted as their substitutes; and the priores conventuales, who were masters in their own monasteries, and had under them other "officials," such as "chief dean," "cellarer," etc. There were also claustral and conventual prioresses.

Prisca.—A Roman virgin, whose martyrdom is commemorated on January 18th. She suffered in the reign of Claudius [about A.D. 270]. The story is that she was exposed to the lions in the amphitheatre, but the animals refused to harm her, and crouched at her feet instead. She was finally beheaded, and an eagle came and watched her body until it was buried.

Priscillian, an heresiarch of the fourth century, was a Spaniard of good family, considerable wealth, and great eloquence and learning. Numerous heresies, including Gnosticism, Manichæism, Arianism, and Sabellianism, contributed to form his system, and he was also addicted to the practice of astrology and magic. His principles were ascetic, and he has been falsely charged with secretly encouraging impurity. He allowed his followers to use deceit to conceal their opinions, and they were in the habit of attending Catholic services, and receiving, but not consuming, the consecrated elements. They held that Christ was not a real man, but had only assumed the appearance of one. They fasted on Sundays and Christmas Day. Women were allowed to officiate in their service. The system was mainly built on some apocryphal books, but Priscillian recognised the complete canon of Scripture, altered and explained to support his views.

Priscillianism gained many converts, especially of the weaker sex. About A.D. 378 a provincial Council was held at Saragossa, at which the heresy was condemned. Priscillian, however, found supporters in the Bishops Salvianus and Justantius, and Hyginus of Cordova, who, wishing to convert the heretics, was consecrated Bishop of Avila; but by the influence of the orthodox party these were banished from Spain with the heresiarch. After a time they returned, and, by means of bribery, procured their restoration to their Sees and the banishment of Ithacius and Idacius, their chief opponents. But after the murder of Gratian, Ithacius succeeded in persuading the usurper Maximus to call a Council at Bordeaux [A.D. 384], which condemned the heresy. Priscillian appealed to Maximus, but after a formal trial judgment was pronounced against him, and, in spite of the remonstrance of Martin, Bishop of Tours, he was put to death, with six of his companions, by beheading [A.D. 385]. The heresy did not disappear with the death of its founder. His followers flourished, in spite of their further condemnation at the Synod of Toledo [in 400], till the sixth century, when they began to diminish, and received their death-blow at the Synod of Braga in 563.

Private Baptism.—The present Prayer Book allows private baptism only when there is some "great cause and necessity," and does not provide for its administration by any but a "lawful minister." The mediæval Offices, however, provided for the private administration of the Sacrament by laymen, by rubrics of which the substance was retained in the first Prayer Book of 1549, as follows:—

"The pastors and curates shall oft admonish the people that they defer not the baptism of infants any longer than the Sunday or other holy day next after the child be born, unless upon a great and reasonable cause declared to the curate, and by him approved.

"And also they shall warn them that, without great cause and necessity, they baptise not their children at home in their houses; and when great need shall compel them so to do, that then they minister it in this fashion:—

"First, let them that be present call upon God for his grace, and say the Lord's Prayer, if the time will suffer. And then one of them shall name the child, and dip him in the water, or pour water upon him, saying these words: 'N., I baptise thee,' etc."

But lay baptism was regarded with disfavour among the clergy, and in 1575 a canon was passed by Convocation, forbidding laymen "to intermeddle with the ministering of baptism privately." Elizabeth, however, refusing to sanction this, the rubrics remained unaltered till 1604. In that year they were altered so as to exclude any hint of the performance of the rite by laics. There still remained considerable freedom as to the prayers to be used, but this was removed in 1661 by the insertion of the words which in the present rubric follow the phrase, "And say the Lord's Prayer."

Privilege.—An enactment in the Roman Church, granting some special benefit against or without the law; it differs from a dispensation in that it legalises many acts done in pursuance of it, whereas a dispensation refers to a single act. Privileges are against the law when the duty of paying tithes or of submitting to the ordinary is remitted, and outside the law in the cases of authorising acts allowable only in certain cases, as in dispensing, absolving, etc.

Probabilism.—The theory that in all matters where there is any doubt as to the right course of action, there is no sin as long as the probable course is taken. There are some glimpses of probabilism in the works of some of the early Greek Fathers, but the doctrine did not assume any importance till the sixteenth century, when it was adopted by Medina, a Spanish Dominican, and in the following century was held by many of the Jesuits. It soon divided into four classes:—Probabilism simple, that is, the doctrine that it is lawful to act upon any probable opinion, however slight its probability; Equi-probabilism, which declares that an opinion may be acted upon if it is equally probable with another; Probabiliorism, in which only the more probable opinion may be acted upon; and Tertiorism, which requires that the more safe opinion shall be followed, even if it be the less probable. The first Jesuit to adopt probabilism was Gabriel Vasquez. It was further developed by Escobar, Coninch, Hurtado de Mendoza, and Henriquez. There were very many who were hostile to the doctrines, especially in France, the most famous being among the Jansenists. It was first condemned at the Council of the Sorbonne in 1620, and it was afterwards condemned by several of the Popes, notably by Innocent XI. In the last century probabiliorism was the more popular doctrine, but in the present century that theory has entirely disappeared, and probabilism is the only existent theory. The greatest modern probabilist writer has been St. LIGUORI [q.v.].

Processional Banner.—A banner carried in processions (e.g. on Rogation Days). Usually embroidered with some sacred emblem or picture.

Processionale.—A book of services for use in processions.

Procession of the Holy Ghost.—The doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Ghost is important as distinguishing His personality from that of the Son, who is Begotten. The Council of Constantinople, in extending the Nicene Creed to meet the Macedonian heresy, asserted it in our Lord's own words from John xv. 26: "I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of Life; who proceedeth from the Father," thus expressing the belief of the universal Church. But though there was never any doubt in the Church as to the fact, there afterwards arose a serious controversy as to the manner of this procession. The Western Church generally held what is called the doctrine of the Double Procession, viz. that the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son, and the phrase "and the Son" soon found its way into copies of the Creed. The addition is first heard of at the Council of Toledo, A.D. 589, at which was recited a Latin version of the Constantinopolitan Creed, containing the words et filio. The records of the Council make no mention of any discussion or dissension on the point, and it seems that those present were ignorant that any addition had been made to the original Creed. It is probable, therefore, that this form of the Creed was already widely current in the West. Nor does it seem that the doctrine of the Double Procession was yet denied by the Eastern Church, for we find it asserted without discussion at the English synod of Hatfield [A.D. 680], presided over by Archbishop Theodore, who had lately come from Tarsus. But in the eighth century we hear of disputes on the subject at the Council of Gentilly, where the envoys of Constantine Copronymus reproached the Western Church with adding to the primitive Creed, and again at the Council of Friuli, A.D. 796, where the "Filioque" clause was defended as being an explanation, not an addition. About this time Charlemagne entered into a correspondence with Pope Hadrian, remonstrating with him for approving a version of the Creed put forth by Sarasius of Constantinople, in which it was said that "The Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father by the Son," and protesting against the statement "that the Holy Ghost proceedeth not from the Father and the Son, according to the Faith of the Nicene Symbol, but from the Father by the Son."

The Pope, in his answer, defended himself by quoting the Fathers, but, strange to say, does not deny that the words "and the Son" are in the primitive Nicene Creed appealed to by Charlemagne. The controversy had now assumed serious proportions, and in 809 a Council was convened by Charlemagne at Aix for its consideration. A complaint was here received that a certain monk of St. Saba's, named John, had attacked some Latin monks of Mount Olivet on account of this doctrine, and had even attempted to expel them forcibly from the place. The Council condemned John's action, and approved the Filioque clause. A report of the proceedings was forwarded to Pope Leo, with a request that he would confirm the decision; but he, while agreeing with the doctrine, condemned its insertion into the Creed as unauthorised, and caused two silver tablets to be set up in the church of St. Peter, engraved with the original form of the Creed in Latin and Greek. It was not long, however, before the addition was received and sanctioned by the Church of Rome as well as by the other Western Churches. The disputes on this subject between the Churches of the East and West seem now to have ceased for a time, but they were revived at a later period; and these, increased by the mutual jealousy of the bishops of Rome and Constantinople, led in 1054 to the schism between the two branches of the Church which continues to this day.

Processions.—Ecclesiastical processions are of early origin in the Church, being heard of as early as the time of Gregory Thaumaturgus [A.D. 254]. They were introduced into Constantinople by Chrysostom [A.D. 398]. The Church historian, Socrates, relates that the Arians, being forbidden to use any churches in the city, were accustomed to assemble about the porches, and march to their meeting-houses without the walls, singing anthems on the way. To counteract their influence, Chrysostom established processions of the orthodox, in which clergy and people perambulated the city singing hymns, and carrying large silver crosses and lighted wax tapers. By the fifth century, processions had come into general use in the Church. In 467, Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, on the occasion of a great earthquake, instituted processions to be held annually in Ascension week, for the purpose of imploring God's grace and protection. The observance of these Rogation days became general. In England they received the name of Gangdagas ("procession days"), and the perambulations of parishes then performed still survive in the custom of "beating the bounds." The joyful hymns and anthems, first sung in processions, were early replaced by solemn Litanies. Noteworthy amongst these is the Litania Septena of Gregory the Great, or the Great Litany of St. Mark's Day, which provides for seven processions setting out from different starting places and meeting at a central church for a solemn service. It was from this Litany that the anthem, chanted by Augustine and his monks on entering Canterbury, was derived. According to Scriptural and ancient usage, the procession was a distinct service in itself, and not, as now, a mere adjunct to some other service.

Procopius.—Successor to Ziska as leader of the Hussites. Procopius was born of noble though poor family. He had rich and influential friends, however, through whose means he received a good education, and was able to travel in foreign countries. He entered the Church; but on the outbreak of the quarrel between his country, Bohemia, and Germany, he threw himself heart and soul into the struggle, and took command under Ziska, the leader of the Hussites. After the death of Ziska, their opponents planned a vigorous attack, thinking that as the Hussites had lost their leader they would be easily conquered. They found out their mistake, however, on the field of Aussig [June 15th, 1426], where Procopius, with a small army, utterly defeated the Germans. After this battle the Hussites were joined by many of their Roman Catholic countrymen, and with their aid Procopius defeated an army led by those Electors of the Empire who had taken up the cause in consequence of a crusade preached against the Reformers of Bohemia by Pope Martin in the year 1427. In 1429 Procopius called together a Diet at Prague to ask permission to go to Vienna and plead before the Emperor personally the wrongs under which the Bohemians were suffering. He demanded of Sigismund the free preaching of the Gospel, communion in both kinds, and an arrangement with regard to ecclesiastical property. His journey was ineffectual, and the same year he marched into Germany at the head of 80,000 men, and returned home victorious. By this time the terror of their arms had spread throughout Europe, and Pope Eugenius IV. was prevailed upon in 1439 to preach another crusade, and to offer all sorts of indulgences and release from penances to all who should take part in the expedition, and the result was an army of 130,000 men. There is no doubt that the little army under Procopius would have been crushed by such overwhelming numbers had it not been that, when the armies met at Reichenberg on Aug. 14th, 1431, a sudden and most unaccountable panic seized the invading army, who to a man turned and fled without striking a blow. But this marvellous success was not destined to last long. A quarrel broke out between two sects of the Church in Bohemia, which resulted in civil war, and in the first battle, fought at Lipan in 1434, Procopius was killed. Without him the army could make no stand, and with him to a great extent died the energy and vitality which had stood the Bohemians in such good stead.

Procurations.—This was the name in the Middle Ages for banquets which at stated times were provided by the vassals for their lords, and also by the incumbents of parishes for their bishops and archdeacons at the time of visitation. It afterwards became the custom to give a sum of money instead, and under the name of "Procurations" they are still asked from the clergy.

Prodians.—A heretic of the second century, who founded the sect of Prodians, and held doctrines similar to those of the Antinomian Gnostics. They declared that, being the sons of God, they were exempt from government by law; for the same reason they would not keep the Sabbath, nor submit themselves to the external ordinances of religion. They professed to be the disciples of Zoroaster.

Propaganda.—A committee of cardinals and others at Rome established by Gregory XV. in 1622, for the Propagation of the Faith. It meets weekly under the presidency of the Pope, and deals with such matters as the mission and support of missionaries, the publication of religious books, and the assistance of converts. The full title is Collegium de Propaganda Fide.

Propagation of the Gospel, SOCIETY FOR.—This Society was founded by Archbishop Tenison in 1701, the objects being to care for the emigrants and colonists from our shores, and to evangelise the heathen. When it was first started there were probably not twenty clergymen of the Church of England in foreign parts, while now in the countries in which the Society labours there are 147 bishops, nearly 7,000 clergy, and about 3,000,000 members of the communion. The President is always the Archbishop of Canterbury; and the bishops of England, Ireland, of the Scotch Episcopal Church, as well as the colonial and missionary bishops in communion with the English Church, are vice-presidents. In 1885 the receipts amounted to £171,257 8s. 10d., and the payments to £164,597 8s. 7d. [MISSIONS.]

Proper Lessons.—Special lessons to be read on certain holy days, instead of those appointed in the Lectionary for the day of the month.

Proper Prefaces. [PREFACES.]

Proper Psalms.—Special psalms appointed for certain holy days, instead of the regular psalms for the day of the month. They are provided for Christmas Day, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, Easter Day, Ascension Day, and Whitsunday.

Prophecy [Gr. pro, and phasis, "speech"].—The prefix pro has the threefold meaning of "beforehand," "in public," "in behalf of." But in its original meaning the second and third are the most important, and the word "prophet" expresses the same idea as the Hebrew nabi, "forth-teller," rather than "foreteller," and in a yet deeper sense expounder and interpreter of the Divine Mind and Will. This is the ancient and Biblical meaning of the term, which includes all who are called prophets in the Old and New Testaments. There is no direct mention of a prophet in the early Patriarchal age. The name is, indeed, given to Abraham, but he utters no prophecies, and the predictions and prophecies which are made to him are never so called in the Bible. But Moses receives the name continually, and in the well-known passage in Deut. xviii. 15-18 he is made the type of the greatest of the prophets. With the death of Moses the gift seems to have fallen into abeyance. Joshua was highly indignant when he heard of Eldad and Medad prophesying in the camp. In the period of the Judges the only prophecy is that of Deborah. At the close of that period the office of Prophet becomes fixed and established. Samuel is the true founder of the Prophet order. The expressions in the New Testament, "until Samuel, the prophet," "Samuel and the prophets," exactly express his position. In his time we first read of the "companies of the sons of the prophets," called, in modern phraseology, the "schools of the prophets." Under the shadow of his name they dwelt as within a charmed circle. Their influence extended with a glow of inspiration over their lawless age of change and confusion. The two most remarkable of the succeeding age were Nathan and David. At the close of Solomon's reign the prophetic order became a ruling power in the State. Ahijah was the medium of transferring the crown of the kingdom of Israel to Jeroboam. From henceforth for two centuries, though glimpses of them appear from time to time in Judah, the prophets are almost entirely confined to Israel. The great prophetic centres were all within the northern kingdom:—Bethel, Gilgal, Carmel, Jericho, Ramah. The prophets of this period are essentially prophets of action. They are remarkable not for what they said but for what they did, not because they created but because they destroyed. Of this class Elijah is the great representative. He attained a place equal to those of Moses and Samuel in the annals of his country. He threw a new halo around the whole order. He prepared the way for the succession of prophets who come before us within the next hundred years. He was the one who lingered longest in the affections and the expectations of his countrymen. Others who bore a more or less prominent part in this period were Iddo, Jehu, Obadiah, and, chiefest of all, Elijah's immediate successor, Elisha.

The next period is that of written prophecies, represented by Amos, Hosea, and, according to some learned critics, the unknown prophet whose writings are contained in Zechariah ix.-xi., xiii. 7-9. These are the prophets of the northern kingdom; while in the southern kingdom we have Isaiah i.-xxxix., Micah, Joel, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Jeremiah, Obadiah, and, according to the same critics we have before referred to, the unknown prophet who has, like the one just mentioned, been incorporated in the works of Zechariah, and whose writings are contained in chapters xii., xiii. 1-6, and xiv. There are also two prophets especially connected with the Captivity—Ezekiel and the evangelical prophet called by the greatest German Hebraists, followed by Dean Stanley and others, the "Second Isaiah" or "the Great Unknown," whose writings are joined on to those of his great predecessor and namesake in chapters xl.-lxvi. In the period following the Captivity are Haggai, Zechariah, the unknown messenger called Malachi, and, if we accept the late date assigned by some of the modern critics, the Book of Daniel. The only prophet whose date cannot be fixed with any certainty is Jonah. An early Jewish tradition makes him the son of the widow of Zarephath. Others place him in the reign of Jeroboam II.; while many eminent critics think the book was not put together in its present form till long after the Captivity. It does not profess to have been written by Jonah, nor does it deal with the history of "the chosen people."

Such is a sketch of the history of the order; we proceed to consider its leading characteristics as an institution, and the character of the prophetic teaching.

We have said that in the highest sense of the word the prophets were the messengers and expounders of the Divine Will. They were usually called to their office through visions, such as those of the Burning Bush to Moses, of the Lord of Hosts to Isaiah, of the Wheels to Ezekiel. But their ordinary teaching was conveyed through the medium of their own thoughts, coloured by the circumstances in which they lived, and illustrated by the images of their every-day life. They were drawn from all classes of the community, from every station of life. David the king, Amos the herdsman, are instances to show the freedom of the order from any given circle of society. They were historians and biographers, though most of their work in this department is lost. The lives of David by Samuel, Gad, and Nathan; the lives of Jeroboam and Rehoboam by Iddo and Shemaiah; the acts of Uzziah and Hezekiah by Isaiah—unless we conceive Isaiah xxxvi.-xxxix. to form a part of the latter work—have all perished. It is, however, certain that, however composite their parts may be, the Books of Samuel and Kings were the work of one or more of the prophets. Another important feature is to be found in their relation to the State. They were statesmen; they identified themselves with their country more than any other class; they laboured to maintain the national unity. In this position, sometimes in opposition to, sometimes in agreement with, the sovereign of the time, they maintained the true religion. They dwelt with undeviating emphasis on the great truths of the unity and the spirituality of the Lord; on the supreme importance of charity, justice, goodness, and purity; and on the uselessness of the Ritual, apart from the Moral Law. They were constant, vigilant watchmen after every kind of abuse and crime, and the fact that they lived constantly in the presence of God gave them the courage to say and do what was right and to be indifferent to human praise and blame. Another reason of their independence was their constant looking forward to the future. As we have already said, the use of the word which confines their work to mere prediction is not in accordance with fact. The cases of prediction of minute details fade away when submitted to minute examination, so that some critics have not hesitated to assert, when a passage in a Prophet coincides with historical narrative, that this clearly indicates that the fact came first. This, however, is certainly an exaggeration, and though we may grant that the prophets of Christianity who come before us in the Acts of the Apostles are more declarers of the Divine Will than predictors of the future, prediction is certainly a part of their function [e.g. Acts xi. 28; xxi. 11]. The rationalising school of German divines have on this ground maintained that the Book of Daniel was not written until the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and is, in fact, simply history written in the form of prophecy. This view is accepted by Dean Stanley in his Jewish Church. It was earnestly controverted by Dr. Pusey, who wrote a very learned treatise for the purpose of proving that the commonly accepted date of Daniel is correct, that the book was written during the Captivity, and is, in truth, prophetic and not narrative. Yet it may be fairly asserted that there has been no diminution in the reverence with which, even by the most "free-handling" critics, the Hebrew Prophets are regarded. Their greatness is recognised by these critics as consisting not in the curious foretelling of future events, but in their unerring vision, their profound and admirable insight, the unflinching boldness and sublime force with which they said that the great unrighteous kingdoms of the heathen could not stand, the intense fervour with which they asserted that the world's salvation lay in a recourse to the God of Israel. It is by constantly bearing in mind that the prophecies have two sides—a side towards their nation and its history at the moment, and a side towards the future of all mankind—and that without the historical and literary substructure the full religious significance of the Bible can never build itself up in our minds, that we shall alone be able fully to understand them.

A remarkable illustration will be found in the famous prophecy of the child whose name shall be called "Immanuel" [Is. vii. 14]. That birth was to be a sign to Ahas that the confederacy of Rezin and Pekah should come to nought. It would certainly seem clear, therefore, that the prophecy had a fulfilment in the prophet's own time. But the Evangelist declared the perfect fulfilment was found in Christ, that He is the very "God with us." This is but one example. Such passages as Pa. xli. 9; Zech. xi. 12, 13; Hosea xi. 1, and a multitude of others, will occur to the reader, in which one class of interpreters refuse to see any reference to our Lord, while the extremes on the other side interpret of Him alone.

The right method of regarding the controversy seems to be to guard, on the one hand, against mere fanciful speculations, which tend not to edification, but to profitless ingenuity; and on the other, to weigh well the whole tenor of the prophetic writings. "The mind," well writes Mr. Maitland, "is irresistibly led on past them [the circumstances and times of the writers] to search for some wider, completer fulfilment. Each lesser application may possibly be true as far as it goes; each may, for aught we can tell, have in time adorned, and left its trace in, the texture of the marvellous strain. But surely the whole soars to a loftier place, and demands grander events for its full and final signification. In a word, nothing short of the great Messianic expectation seems at all adequate to satisfy it; and of Him it weaves together the brighter and the more sombre elements, the rejection and suffering with the exaltation and the glory, with the precision and a fulness that could scarcely have been surpassed if, instead of being a mysterious foreshadowing, it had been an actual history of the 'cross and passion, the precious death and burial, the glorious resurrection and ascension,' attributed by Christians to the Redeemer in whom they believe."

The simplest and the most striking explanation of the whole body of Messianic predictions is that they are typical rather than direct, that God so ordered the course of events and the formation of individual Churches, as to lead men's expectations by a series of steps to the golden age of the future, to the manifestation of the most unique Character, the most extraordinary Power, the greatest Name that has ever crossed the stage of history. When in the Prophets we are carried along with their burning words, we are admitted not by any fanciful straining of words, or by any doubtful application of minute predictions, but by the likeness of spirit with spirit, to their highest and most universal application. We gradually learn that the most natural meaning is also the most supernatural; that while not excluding a really predictive element, it is largely through the likeness of situation and feeling, that the connection of the words of the original author with Christ and with the Christian Church is to be explained. The Prophets are especially prophetic of Christ, because they treat of those truths of the spiritual life of which He was the Great Revealer and Illuminator; because more than any other characters of the Sacred History they share in the Divine views respecting life and death, righteousness and sin, success and failure, which were most fully exemplified in Him; because they gave utterance to the noblest hopes and aspirations that ever entered into the heart of man to conceive, and which find their first and only entire fulfilment in the life and death, in the teaching and the revelation of the Divinest and Greatest of the Prophets.

Prophecyings.—A name given to meetings in the latter part of the sixteenth century, the object of which was instruction and increase of spiritual life by means beyond those provided in the Liturgy of the Church. They were gatherings, sometimes of clergy, sometimes of both clergy and laity. A moderator presided, and each clergyman present delivered his views on some subject settled beforehand. They are first mentioned as taking place at Northampton in 1571, and became extremely popular. But there was obviously a danger of irregularity. The clergy were tempted to frame their discourses in such manner as to win popularity by flattering the prejudices of their lay brethren, and to become congregationalists rather than men controlled by their bishops. Before long Archbishop Parker took alarm at them, and when they reached Norwich, the head-quarters in those days of Nonconformity, he wrote to the Bishop commanding him to stop them. Some lay Privy Councillors wrote a counter-letter begging the Bishop to hold his ground; but Parker repeated his command, and they were stopped. Archbishop Grindal, believing that the Church was greatly lacking in efficient preachers, encouraged the prophecyings. Queen Elizabeth severely rebuked him, and commanded him to see that they were everywhere stopped. The Archbishop replied that they did much good, and that he would not suppress them. "I would rather offend your earthly majesty than the heavenly majesty of God." And he followed this by reminding the Queen that there was a judgment to come at which she must herself appear. She immediately convened a meeting of the Star Chamber, and proposed that Grindal should be deprived. With some difficulty the courtiers persuaded her to a milder course; the Archbishop was suspended, and confined to his house. Then the Queen sent a letter to all the bishops charging them to allow "no other service in the churches except that appointed by law, nor any to take part in public services except persons duly licensed." If any disregarded this command they were to be imprisoned. Most of the bishops obeyed. But Grindal's firmness—for he refused to apologise to the Queen, and remained for some years under her displeasure—had a great effect on public opinion. The prophesying still continued, and in 1585 the Bishop of Chester is found making regulations for their better management, chiefly in the direction of limiting them to the clergy. Jeremy Taylor wrote in their favour his treatise on The Liberty of Prophesying.

Proselytes.—Converts to some religion, or religious sect, but especially to Judaism. Among the Jews they were of two classes: the first were called "proselytes of the gate," and were allowed to live among the Jews and enjoy the same protection, on the condition that they should observe the moral laws given to Noah; the second were the "proselytes of justice," who received circumcision, bound themselves to keep the whole Law of Moses, and became thenceforward "sons of Israel," holding all the rights and privileges belonging to the Jewish race. Slaves born in the service of a Jew were circumcised, but this only bound them to slavery during their master's pleasure, and they were not regarded as "true Israelites." But if the master set him free, the slave was baptised in the presence of three witnesses; and, if he refused to undergo this ceremony, he was sold again within twelve months. A proselyte who was not the son of a Jewess was not allowed to be a member of the Sanhedrin, or to hold any other public office.

Protestant Confessions.—These are Creeds, or Confessions of Faith, drawn up by the Reformed Church. The chief are:—

[1] Confession of Augsburg.—A document drawn up by Melancthon with the approval of Luther, which was read at the Diet of Augsburg, June 25th, 1530, and was signed by the Elector of Saxony, the Margrave of Brandenburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and many others. It caused a deep impression, even on the Romanists. It was divided into two parts. The first, which contained twenty-one articles, stated the various points of belief held by the Reformers, and the second enumerated the seven principal abuses of the Church of Rome upon which Luther founded the necessity for leaving it, viz.:—Communion in one kind, celibacy of priests, private masses, confessions, the admission of tradition, monastic vows, and indulgences. Eck, and other Roman theologians, prepared a confutation, which was read on Sept. 3rd. The majority declared that the Reformers had been confuted, and they were commanded to conform to the Roman views, which they refused to do. Meanwhile Melancthon had prepared an

[2] Apology of the Augsburg Confession, which was presented to the Diet, Sept. 22nd, but refused. He re-wrote it, and published it, together with a German translation by Justus Jonas, at Wittenberg, April, 1531. It is seven times as large as the Confession, and greatly superior in point of style and learning. Its chief value is as a commentary on the Augsburg Confession.

[3] Confession of Basle, formulated by Oecolampadius in a speech at the Council of Basle in 1531, but elaborated by Myconius, and promulgated Jan. 21st, 1534. It is chiefly concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and takes a position between the doctrines of Zwingli and Luther.

[4] The First Helvetic Confession, sometimes known as the Second Confession of Basle, drawn up by delegates from several Swiss cantons at Basle in 1536. An attempt was made to draw up a confession that would be adopted both by the Lutherans and Reformers, and both agreed to the German translation by Leo Judæ. The Reformers first refused the Latin version; but after it had been altered by Myconius and Gryneus, both German and Latin were formally adopted by both parties [Feb. 26th, 1536].

[5] Confession of Wurttemberg, based on Melancthon's Confession, was adopted by the Swiss and Wurttemberg divines in 1552.

[6] The Forty-nine Articles, which were drawn up by Cranmer and others in 1552, and adopted the next year, and revised and reduced to Thirty-nine under Queen Elizabeth, and have ever since been retained in the Church of England. [ARTICLES, THIRTY-NINE.]

[7] Confession of France, adopted by the Huguenots at Paris in 1559, was Calvinistic. Their ecclesiastical constitution was representative, combining independent congregations and a united general Church.

[8] The First Confession of Scotland was consummated by the Scottish Parliament on August 24th, 1560. It corresponded with the German Confessions, but is not copied from any of them. It is much simpler in its structure than the Swiss Confession.

[9] The Belgic Confession was written in French by Guido de Bies and Adrien de Saravia in 1561. It was revised by Francis Junius of Bourges, a student of Calvin's, and was sent to Geneva and other Churches for approval. It was formally adopted at Antwerp in 1566, and translated into Dutch, German, and Latin. It is still the recognised symbol of faith in the Reformed Churches of Holland and Belgium, and in the Reformed Dutch Church of America. It contains thirty-seven articles, and is very similar to the French Confession, but is less elaborate, especially on the doctrines of the Trinity, the Sacraments, the Incarnation, etc. It is considered to be the best Calvinistic Confession, except that of Westminster.

[10] The Second Helvetic Confession was the work of Bullinger, who made the first sketch in 1562, and revised it in 1564. In 1566 the Elector Palatine, Friedrich III., had seceded from the Lutheran and joined the Reformed Church, and, fearing that he should be outlawed, appealed to Bullinger to write a Confession which should prove that the Reformed faith did not differ from the Apostolical doctrine. Bullinger sent this Confession, which was received favourably all over Switzerland, the former one of 1536 being considered too short. It also was adopted in Scotland, Poland, etc., and became the creed of the Reformed Church of Bohemia.

[11] The Bohemian Confession.—A Council was held at Seudonia in Poland in 1570, at which the Bohemian Brethren, the Lutherans, and the Swiss formed themselves into a confederacy upon certain conditions, which were afterwards published in a Confession of Faith.

[12] Confession of Ireland, drawn up by Archbishop Ussher in 1615. It contains 104 articles, including the nine Calvinistic LAMBERTH ARTICLES [q.v.]

[13] The First Baptist Confession, drawn up in 1644. That which is used at present in the society is, with a few exceptions, adapted from the following.

[14] Westminster Confession, which was completed Dec. 4th, 1646. [WESTMINSTER CONFESION.]

[15] The Confession of the Welsh Methodists, adopted in 1823, which also is based on the Westminster Confession.

[16] The Confession of the Congregationalists or Independents, which was adopted at the Congregational Union of England and Wales in 1833.

Protestants.—A name first taken in Germany by those followers of Luther who protested against the decree of the Diet of Spire in 1529, signed by Charles V. and other Roman Catholic princes. This decree entirely revoked that of the former Diet of Spire [1526], by which several reforms, including the marriage of the clergy, communion in both kinds, the use of the vernacular, were passed, and by which several abuses were abolished. The Protest was signed by the Elector John of Saxony, the Margrave George of Brandenburg, the Landgrave Philip of Hesse, and others. The name of "protestants" was given also to the Calvinists, and is now applied indiscriminately to all the Reformed Churches, though it has never been formally adopted by the Church of England.

Protevangelion.—The name of a book attributed to St. James, the first Bishop of Jerusalem, containing an account of the birth of the Virgin and that of Christ. A copy of the book in Greek was brought by Postellus from the East, and by him translated into Latin. The fables with which it is filled testify against its genuineness.

Prothesis.—A side-table in a church near the altar, on which the elements are to be placed before they are laid on the altar. This table, called in the East "Prothesis," and in the West "Credence Table," has been in almost universal use from the earliest Christian times. Though there is no actual mention of the prothesis in the Communion Office, yet there is a distinct allusion to it, as, immediately before the prayer for Christ's Church militant, it is made the duty of the priest to "then place upon the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient." Up to this point, then, the bread and wine must be in some convenient place near at hand, and this can only be on the Prothesis or Credence Table.

Protonotary.—This title seems to have been first used at Constantinople in the eighth century, and to have designated the chief of the notaries [from protos, "first"]. After A.D. 800 the title was introduced into the West, and now designates any of the College of Protonotaries Apostolic. Bishop Clement of Rome is supposed, in the first century, to have appointed a notary for each of the seven wards of the city, to keep a record of the sufferings of martyrs, etc. When it became necessary to appoint others, the seven original notaries were called "protonotarii Apostolici." Sixtus V. afterwards increased the number to twelve. In the Papal chapel they sit in the second tier, but in the consistories they sit with the Pope. Their duties are to register the Pontifical acts, to make and keep the official records of beatifications, etc.

Providence.—The superintending care which God exercises over creation. The arguments for the providence of God are generally drawn from the light of nature; the being of a God; the creation of the world; the wonderful disposing and controlling of the affairs and actions of men; the various blessings enjoyed by God's creatures; the awful judgments that have been inflicted, and the wonderful preservation of the Bible and the Church throughout every age, notwithstanding the attempts of earth and hell against them. Some have denied that the providence of God reaches beyond a general superintendence of the laws of nature, and say that He never interposes in the particular concerns of individuals. This would be to render His government imperfect, and would leave no ground for reposing any trust under its protection, for then the majority of human affairs would be fortuitous, without any regular direction, and tending to no special scope. But the uniform doctrine of Scripture is that nothing in the universe happens without God, that His hand is ever active, His decree or permission intervening in all ; that nothing is too great or unwieldy for His management, nothing too minute or commonplace to be beneath His care ; that while He is guiding the planets in their course through the heaven, or ruling the nations of the world, He is still watching over and guiding the humblest of His creatures. We cannot, it is true, understand the manner in which Providence interposes in human affairs, and we are equally at a loss to explain how it directs the motions of the heavenly bodies ; but the fact remains that there does exist an overruling influence in the moral world, as certainly as in the natural. It would be impossible to conceive God acting as the Governor of the world, unless He were to govern all the events which happen in it ; He would then be no more than an unconcerned spectator of the behaviour of His subjects, regarding the obedient and the rebellious alike with an eye of indifference. From the imperfection of our knowledge to ascertain what is good for us, and from the defect of our power to bring about that good when known, arise all those disappointments which continually prove that man is not master of his own lot ; that, though he may devise, it is God who directs—God who can make the smallest incident an effectual instrument of His providence for overturning the most carefully elaborated plans of man. Accident, chance, and fortune are words to which much is ascribed in the life of man ; but what are they but synonyms for the unknown operations of Providence ? In God's universe nothing happens in vain or without a cause : in that chaos of human affairs and intrigues, or that mass of confusion and disorder in which we can see no light, all is clearness and order in the sight of Him who is governing and directing all, and bringing forward every event in its due time and place.

Province.—The district under the jurisdiction of an archbishop. In England there are the provinces of Canterbury and York.

Provost [Lat. propositus].—A name used in many senses during the first eight centuries, but first applied to the official next in authority to the abbot in a monastery, and, according to the rules of St. Benedict, of equal rank with the diaconus. The office of provost in a cathedral chapter was often incorporated with that of the archdeacon, and the term is now used in the Roman Catholic Church to denote the head of the cathedral chapter. Formerly the name was also given to the president of a meeting ; to the chief of a body of canons ; and to the member of the chapter who managed church estates, distributed the common income, and superintended discipline.

Prudentius of Troyes.—A Spaniard, whose real name was Galindo. He became Bishop of Troyes in 847, and died there in 861. He took part with Gottschalk in the controversy concerning Predestination, and wrote Ad Hinkmarum and De Pred. contra Jo. Scotus. He also wrote part of the Annales Bertiniani, from 835 to 861. He was revered after his death as a saint.

Prussia, CONVERSION OF.—The earliest attempt to convert Prussia to Christianity was made at the end of the tenth century by Adalbert, Bishop of Prague, who made a few converts at Dantzic ; but was martyred by the savage inhabitants, April 23rd, 997. Boleslas, Duke of Poland, was more successful in continuing the work which Adalbert had begun, and compelled the people, about 1018, to submit to baptism ; but Christianity had not taken deep root, and in 1161 we find that the people made a bold stand against the new religion, which they feared would interfere with their freedom, and succeeded in throwing off their yoke. They continued to resist all attempts for their conversion till the thirteenth century, when the knights of the Teutonic Order undertook a crusade against them, and after about fifty years of war the heathen population was almost exterminated. By this means Christianity became permanently established in the country, as the Teutonic Knights settled in the territory from which they had driven their opponents.

Prymer. [PRIMER.]

Prynne, WILLIAM [b. at Swanswick, Somersetshire, 1600 ; d. in London, Oct. 24th, 1669].—A Puritan writer. He graduated at Oxford, 1620, and afterwards studied law. His Histriomastix, an attack upon the amusements and frivolities of the time, created a great sensation, and he was arrested on a charge of seditious writing. He was tried before the Star Chamber, 1633, and, at the instigation of Archbishop Laud, was condemned to mutilation, lifelong imprisonment, and the payment of an enormous fine. He was released by the Long Parliament, of which he was elected a member, 1641, and took an important part in the trial of Laud, in which he was the solicitor. He was violently opposed to Cromwell, and pleaded in the cause of Charles I., which caused his expulsion from the House of Commons. His services in the cause of the Restoration were rewarded by an appointment as Keeper of the Records in the Tower, a work which was carried out with the greatest accuracy. Prynne also wrote Necus from Ipswich, which was condemned with the Histriomastix as libellous and seditious.

Psalmists [SINGERS].—One of the inferior orders of clergy in the early Church, whose duty it was to lead the music. The origin of the order is to be placed not later than the beginning or middle of the fourth century. Psalmists were admitted to their office by the priest, with this formula, "See that what thou singest with the mouth thou believest in thy heart, AND WHAT THOU BELIEVEST in thy heart thou approvest by thy works."

Psalmody.—The art or practice of singing psalms.

Psalms, Psalter.—The Book of the Psalms. The use of the Psalms in Christian worship undoubtedly dates from Apostolic times [See Col. iii. 16], and has been continued in all ages of the Church. They were held in very high esteem, and St. Athanasius calls them "the epitome of the whole Scriptures." In Syria Christian education began with the Psalms; and in the early Church generally they were so often repeated that the poorest Christians knew them by heart, and used to sing them at their work. From St. Basil [A.D. 370] we gather that the service in his day consisted mainly of psalmody and prayer, and this is still the arrangement in the daily offices of the Greek Church. During the first twelve centuries, candidates for holy orders were usually required to have the Psalter by heart; Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople [A.D. 494], refused to ordain any who did not fulfil this condition. Canons to the same effect were passed at the Eighth Council of Toledo [A.D. 653] and the Council of Orviedo [A.D. 1050].

The arrangements of the Psalter for Divine service have been numerous. Some Churches appointed twenty or thirty psalms for a service, some as many as fifty or sixty; while others were content with twelve. By the rule of St. Columbanus, the number varied with the length of the night and the season of the year, the whole Psalter being sometimes sung through in two nights. In the mediæval Church, as in the Church of Rome at the present day, the Psalms were distributed amongst the days of the week, so that the whole Psalter might be read weekly. The faults of this arrangement were: [1] that those used on Sundays never varied; [2] that owing to the frequent occurrence of Saints' days, the arrangement was continually being disturbed, with the result that half the Psalms were not sung at all. "Notwithstanding that the ancient Fathers have divided the Psalms into seven portions, whereof every one was called a Nocturn, now of late time a few of them have been daily said, and the rest utterly omitted" [Prayer Book of 1549, Preface]. The gravity of this objection is shown by the fact, that in the Roman Church at present only about fifty psalms are practically in use.

To avoid these difficulties, the English Reformers divided the Psalter into sixty parts, so that it is read through monthly, and the Sunday congregation have the whole presented to them in course of time.

There have been several modes of singing the Psalms. The earliest practice was for the whole congregation to sing each verse; but the custom, derived from the Jews, of antiphonal singing was early introduced. Pliny, in his famous letter to Trajan, speaks of the Christians as singing a hymn in turns, and St. Basil states that they sang responsively. Sometimes verses were sung by the precentor and choir alternately, and sometimes the choir and congregation were divided into two bodies singing alternate verses. An order of singers [PSALMISTÆ] arose about the beginning of the fourth century, and Ambrose of Milan [A.D. 374] and Gregory the Great [A.D. 590] devoted considerable attention to the subject of psalmody, and introduced the systems of chanting which bear their respective names. [MUSIC.] In our Prayer Book the Psalms are said to be "pointed as they are to be sung or said in churches." This refers to the colon in the middle of each verse, corresponding with the division of the chant. The Gloria Patri is ordered to be said or sung at the end of every Psalm, "thus turning a Jewish Psalm into a Christian hymn." In the Breviary the Gloria was added to some, but not to all; and the American Church follows this rule to some extent in providing that the Gloria may be said or sung after every psalm, and shall be said or sung at the end of the whole portion or selection of psalms for the day. The Prayer Book version of the Psalms is taken from Cranmer's Great Bible, "set forth and used in the time of King Henry the Eighth and Edward the Sixth." It was retained when the present Authorised Version was published for two reasons: because the choirs and people had become familiar with it and because its language was smoother and more adapted for singing than the Authorised Version.

The Preface, giving the "Order how the Psalter is appointed to be read," states that "the Psalter followeth the division of the Hebrews." There are two other "divisions" besides that of the Hebrews followed in our Prayer Book, viz.:—the Greek, in which Psa. ix. 10 and cxiv. and cxv. are joined, and cxvi. and cxlvii. are each divided into two; and the Syriac, in which Psa. cxiv. and cxv. are joined, and cxlvii. divided.

Public Worship Regulation Act.
[ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.]

Publicani or Pauliciani.—A name given to the Western Cathari, whose religion was similar to that of the Pauliciani of the East. The name was given them by the crusaders in the twelfth century. A small band of Publicani arrived in England about the year 1160, under the leadership of one Gerard, an enthusiast who seems to have had some education, though his followers were entirely ignorant, and obeyed him blindly. In order to put a stop to the spread of their heresy, the King ordered them to be brought before a Council of Bishops at Oxford. On examination they professed a belief in the doctrine of the Trinity, and in all points connected with the attributes of God, but rejected the Sacraments and marriage. They were condemned to be branded as heretics, and whipped out of the town, and the people were forbidden to shelter or feed them, so that they soon perished of cold and hunger.

Pulpit.—An elevated place in a church, from which the sermon is preached. Formerly the sermon was preached from the altar steps, while the pulpit was used for the reading of the Gospel.

Punshon, WILLIAM MORLEY, a famous Wesleyan minister, was born at Doncaster in 1824. He was apprenticed to the lumber trade, but began preaching, and having passed through the Wesleyan College at Richmond, went to Marden, Kent, in 1845. While here the fame of his preaching spread, and he was ordained. In 1868 he went to America; but returned to England in 1873, and became a secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, which post he held till his death in 1881. He was made a member of the "Legal Hundred" in 1859, and an LL.D. in 1873. Among his works are: Select Lectures and Sermons, Life Thoughts, Sabbath Chimes, The Prodigal Son, and Sermons.

Purchas Judgment.—This was one of the several cases which have come before the legal courts of late years concerning the "ornaments" of the minister. The Rev. John Purchas, a clergyman of Brighton, was prosecuted for wearing the chasuble and a biretta. Sir R. Phillimore, as Dean of Arches, ruled that these were lawful; but the Privy Council set aside his judgment as regards the chasuble, and ruled that the biretta, which Mr. Purchas carried in his hand in the manner of a college cap, was not unlawful. They also ruled against the mixed chalice and wafer bread, and the Eastward position. This judgment was delivered before the passing of the Public Worship Regulation Act, the prosecution being instituted under the Clergy Discipline Act. It was delivered in Feb., 1871. An attempt was afterwards made to have the question reopened on the ground that Mr. Purchas had not appeared before the court, but the application for rehearing was refused. 4,700 clergy, however, signed a "remonstrance" against some portions of the judgment, and the whole question was afterwards reopened on a fresh suit. [FOLKESTONE JUDGMENT.]

Purgation, CANONICAL. [OATHS.]

Purgatory.—A place to which the souls of the faithful are supposed to go after death, to expiate sins committed during their lifetime, and not repented of, which yet do not merit

eternal punishment. In the Councils of Florence and Trent the Roman doctrine on the subject is given thus:—"That there is a Purgatory, and that the souls detained there are helped by the prayers of the faithful, and, above all, by the acceptable sacrifice of the altar." To prove this, it is said that all sin, being offence against God, deserves punishment from Him, and will be punished by Him hereafter; that small sins do not deserve eternal punishment; that no one dies absolutely pure in God's eyes, or free from the debt due to His justice, and that all must therefore suffer according to the rule of justice by which He treats every soul according to its works and the state in which it is found in death. To prove the doctrine, a text from Maccabees is quoted, and one or two from the New Testament. In opposition, it is alleged that the books of Maccabees have no evidence of inspiration; that the texts quoted from the New Testament have no reference to this doctrine, whereas numerous texts from Scripture give evidence against it; and it is derogatory to the doctrine of Christ's satisfaction. If Christ indeed redeemed the souls of the faithful, the idea of meritorious suffering detracts from the perfection of His work, and places merit in the creature. Article XXII. of the Anglican Church says that the doctrine is a "fond thing vainly invented, grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God."

Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary, or Presentation of Christ in the Temple. This double event is commemorated on Feb. 2nd, forty days after Christmas. [See Lev. xii. 3-4.] The festival was established not later than the sixth century, and was originally called the Hypapante, or Meeting of our Lord Jesus Christ, i.e. with Simeon in the Temple; but in the mediæval Church the great reverence paid to the Virgin Mary led to the substitution of the title of the "Purification." Our Prayer Book combines the two titles. The festival was substituted for the Pagan Lupercalia, which was celebrated with processions of torchbearers, and it was observed in like manner with the use of waxen lights; hence its name of Candlemas, and hence also the custom of women bearing lights at their churching.

Puritans.—This name was used in the primitive Church for the Novatians, because they would never admit to communion any one who from dread of death had apostatised from the faith. In the sixteenth century it was given in derision by their adversaries to the Nonconformists and Presbyterians. These as an English body first arose from those who had fled to Germany during the reign of Queen Mary, and who returned to England with new ideas at the accession of Queen Elizabeth. They refused to agree to the Act of Uniformity which the Queen had published on the ground that it was too favourable to Popery. Unfortunately the way that they were mlt did not tend to peace whilst peace was still within reach. They urged the Presbyterian form of government as that of the New Testament; Archbishop Whitgift met them, not by defending the Episcopal form and maintaining that it was in accordance with primitive Christianity, but by the argument that the form of Church government was a thing indifferent, and therefore the nation might choose whichever it thought most advisable. Such an argument was hardly one to offer to deeply religious men, as certainly some of them were, and when they resisted it they were sent to prison. But, moreover, the old-fashioned clergy who had sung Mass in the days of Mary, and now conformed to the Prayer Book, were unhappy and listless under the change. The younger spirits had no lingering regrets for the past, and inclined to Puritanism. Their zeal was on this side, though towards the end of Elizabeth's reign there was a reaction in favour of "comely forms and decent order," which the Puritans in their hatred of mediævalism had somewhat set at naught. They strove hard for ascendancy in Parliament, preparing the BOOK OF DISCIPLINE [q.v.] for acceptance, and urging the abolition of the Book of Common Prayer. But public opinion as well as the Queen's Minister went against them, and Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity marks the final position of the Church of England against them. Their anger manifested itself in the scurrility of the Martin Marprelate tracts, which called Church ordinances "froth and filth," declared that the books ought "to be sacrificed in fire to the Lord at Smithfield," demanded the destruction of the cathedrals with their "piping organs, trowling of psalms, and squeaking choristers," called the bishops "bastardly governors," "cozening knaves, who lie like dogs." It seems difficult now to believe that such expressions could have proceeded from religious men, and it is needful to remember the very different character of the time, and that the reputed author of the tracts (they are believed to have been written by Henry Barrow) paid the penalty with his life. On the accession of King James I. the Puritans presented the MILLENNARY PETITION [q.v.], demanding a revision of the Prayer Book. A conference was called to discuss the matter [HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE], and the Puritans were defeated and treated uncourteously and harshly. About 1620 some of them began to emigrate to America, and founded a colony in New England and Massachusetts. It is said that during twelve years the emigrants amounted to 21,000 persons. The tyrannical conduct of Charles I., both in the Church and government, resulted in the Great Rebellion and the overthrow for the time being of Church and Throne. In September, 1642, an Act was published abolishing prelacy in England, and commanding all to take the covenant. It is said that the number of clergymen who were rejected for refusing amounted to 7,000, and that more were turned out by the Presbyterians in three years than were deprived by the Roman Catholics in Queen Mary's time. After the Restoration the name "Puritans" was dropped, and that of NONCONFORMISTS [q.v.] adopted.

Pusey, EDWARD BOUVERIE, D.D.—A great Hebrew scholar and leader of a school of thought in the English Church [b. at Pusey, near Oxford, 1800; d. at Ascot Priory, Oxford, Sept. 16th, 1882]. In 1822 he took a first-class in classics at Christchurch, and in the next year was elected Fellow of Oriel, and was thus brought into contact with Newman, Keble, and Whately. He travelled in Germany during 1826 and 1827, and studied German theology—a region hitherto almost unexplored—under Dr. Tholuck; and the result was the publication, on his return, of a book in favour of German rationalism. The ability of the work was soon recognised, and at the death of Dr. Nicoll, Regius Professor of Hebrew, in 1828, Pusey was appointed to the chair, which carried with it a canonry of Christchurch. From this time he was accustomed to hold meetings of clergy for theological discussions at his house. Already the movement for Church reform had begun, and Pusey, after a long hesitation, joined the Anglo-Catholic party, and began writing some of the Tracts for the Times. The first which he wrote was Thoughts on the Benefits of the System of Fasting enjoined by our Church, and soon after followed Scriptural Views on Holy Baptism. The power with which he wrote placed him far in advance of the greater number of his fellow-workers, and on Newman's secession to the Roman Church Pusey took, by common consent, the leadership of the movement. As a matter of fact, the party was already known as "Puseyites," the reason being that, though Newman was the real leader, he was comparatively unknown except in Oxford, whereas Pusey held a greater position. Newman was Fellow and Tutor of his college, but Pusey was Hebrew Professor and Cathedral Canon. In 1843 he preached a sermon called The Holy Eucharist a Comfort to the Penitent, for which he was suspended by the Vice Chancellor from preaching at Oxford for two years. The sentence defeated its own end, for he was looked upon as a martyr, and his books gained a wider circulation than before. His teaching has exerted more influence on the Church of England than any other of the present century, and gave a new life and energy to religion, in its corporate or Church capacity, as distinguished from the individual direction which had been given by the Wesleyan movement a hundred years before. His works consist chiefly of sermons, two treatises on The Doctrine of the Real Presence in the Eucharist, and Biblical expositions. His quarto volume on the Minor Prophets is the best work on this part of Holy Scripture which has ever been published in England, and there is no book, whether produced at home or on the Continent, which displays the minute scholarship and research of his work on The Prophet Daniel. This work is not in the form of a commentary, but a series of disquisitions intended to show that the book is not the late production which the leading modern scholars of Germany, followed by Dean Stanley, have pronounced it, but that it was really written in the days of the Babylonian captivity. Dr. Pusey also published works on the Royal Supremacy, and on Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister. Dr. Newman in his Apologia expresses his conviction, that though they had worked together so harmoniously, Pusey was "never near the Catholic Church." In 1865 Pusey published his Eirenicon, intended, while justifying the position of the Church of England, to show that re-union with the Church of Rome by mutual explanations was within hope. One remarkable result came from this. Pusey had attacked very severely the cultus of the Blessed Virgin in the Roman Church, and had quoted some passages from popular books of devotion, to Protestant ears at least most painful and offensive. Newman wrote a reply in which, after saying that Pusey had "discharged his olive-branch from a catapult," he declared that the prayers and devotions quoted by Pusey were so shocking and repulsive to him that they were like a nightmare, that nothing should induce him to use them. One might say that here already was a concession made, an acknowledgment that the popular practice of the Roman Church needed correction. Another work of Pusey was occasioned by Archdeacon Farrar's work entitled Mercy and Judgment. Pusey replied to it in a volume What is of Faith Concerning Eternal Punishment? In conjunction with Keble and Charles Marriott, Pusey began editing the Library of the Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church, and the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology. No biographical notice of this remarkable man would be complete without reference to the revival of the Confessional in the Church of England, which was largely owing to him. He was in the habit of receiving many confessions, and acting as spiritual director, and some of his writings were in support of the practice. Of his deep personal holiness and fervent piety there was no question, and there is no name of this century which has been more generally revered in the Church of England.

Pyrrho, the founder of a school of scepticism, was born in Greece in the fourth century B.C. The mainspring of his teaching was the belief that there was no exact criterion for the knowledge and distinction of things; and therefore he suspended his judgment and declined pronouncing upon the nature and quality of anything. Eusebius quotes Aristotle as saying of these philosophers, "They fall foul of their own principles; and by bidding other people stand clear of all opinion are not aware that they recommend and dissuade at the same time; for they pronounce in some measure upon things, when they say nothing is to be affirmed about them."

Pythagoras.—A Greek philosopher, born in the island of Samos probably about the year 570 B.C. He is said to have been a disciple of the philosopher Anaximander, who taught him geometry. The high imagination and earnest spirit of the youth took fire at the possibilities of exploration seemed to open before him. The science spoke of limitation, of distinctness, and definiteness, but all around it he became conscious that there were mysteries and sublimities which it hinted at but did not reveal. Beyond the finite was the infinite, among all the numbers somewhere existed Unity. With the desire for further knowledge he set forth to travel, but although there are many traditions and stories of him they are but little to be trusted. Everywhere, however, the number mystery seemed to be present with him; all society, all government became connected with it in his mind; he observed the periodical occurrences in Nature, all the religious regulations and observances of different races, and so he reasoned on the Unit, on the Triad, on the Square, until numbers seemed to him living things. The vital principle of the World he held to be breathing, consequently he reasoned that the First Cause, the Unit, is "The Infinite Breath, or Spirit," which divides itself into a countless multiplicity of numbers and things. The world he conceived to consist of five elements—Fire, Air, Water, Earth, Ether. In the centre of the Universe was the Principle of Life, and all moved in harmony, the music of the spheres.

Turning from the Universe to Man, Pythagoras recognised that there is more than the physical frame. For he could carry himself back to the age of Achilles and Hector, and could project himself into the age to come. All limits of space and time were therefore transcended. And he came to the conclusion that the soul, which can thus look before and after, and can also shrink and shrivel itself into incapacity of contemplating aught but the present, must be capable of infinite exaltation and infinite degeneracy. Probably Pythagoras did not originate the doctrine of the transmigration of souls; he may have learned it in his Egyptian travels or from initiation into the sacred mysteries. But it harmonised with his thoughts and reasonings, and he adopted it. Soul, he taught, might descend into beasts or rise to Divine life; there is a law accurately determining their elevation or descent. Consequently the whole scheme was a direct system of moral philosophy. It was regularly established in a society which was set up in Southern Italy, and there exercised a very great influence. It wrought legislative and moral reforms, engaged in political intrigues, and was finally put down as a dangerous religious confederacy, incompatible with the existence of regular government.

Pyx.—The vessel in which the consecrated bread is placed in Roman churches. A lamp is kept burning before it whenever the Host is there.

Quadragesima.—The first Sunday in Lent, so called because it is forty days before Easter. The name does not, however, occur in the Prayer Book, and has to a certain extent fallen into disuse.

Quadratus, a disciple of the Apostles, was Bishop of Athens in the second century. At the time of the persecution of the Christians by the Emperor Hadrian, he wrote a very eloquent Apology for the Christian Religion, which he presented personally in 126. This work was in existence till the seventh century, when it seems to have disappeared entirely, with the exception of a few passages which had been quoted by Eusebius, and have thus been preserved. Two other men of the same name are mentioned by different writers as having lived in the same century, but later historians agree in identifying them all with the Bishop of Athens.

Quakers. [FRIENDS.]

Quarles, FRANCIS, prose writer and poet, was born at Romford, Essex, in 1592. His family possessed estates in that county, and his father held an honourable position under Queen Elizabeth. Francis Quarles was educated at Cambridge. After studying the law at Lincoln's Inn for some years, he set his mind upon serious private study and devotional reading, to the exclusion of all ambition for Court preferment which he might easily have had. In the Memoir by his wife we find that Quarles shared in the almost universal admiration and love for the Princess Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, herself a poetess, and that he served her as "cup-bearer" until the ruin of the Elector Palatine's affairs caused him to go over to Ireland. It is probable that the intimacy now began, 1621, between Quarles and Ussher, then Bishop of Meath. We find his son, John Quarles, asserting in one of his poems that he owed his education to this Prelate. The beauty of the writings of Quarles is marred by the eccentricity which pervades it, but his style is vigorous, and a high religious tone is to be found in nearly all his works. Emblems Divine and Moral, Divine Poems, and Divine Fancies are perhaps the best known and most admired of his works. The Elegies, written in memory of his friend, Dr. Allmer, Archdeacon of London, have a peculiar beauty and pathos of their own. In 1631 he lost his friend Drayton, and he wrote the epitaph on the monument to him in Westminster Abbey. The Hieroglyphics resemble the Emblems, but are very eccentric in measure, yet are peculiarly impressive. Some beautiful lines were written by Quarles on the death of Archbishop Ussher, to whom he was secretary for some time, and who wrote of Quarles to a friend as "a poet held in considerable esteem for his sacred compositions." The home life of Francis Quarles showed consistent piety. His wife writes, "that he was courteous and affable to all, and moderate and discreet in all his actions." He was an ardent student, rising before three o'clock in the morning for that purpose. He possessed, too, a great charm in conversation. His fatal illness is said to have been brought on by sorrow when a petition was presented by eight men, imputing to him serious errors in his religious belief. He died in September, 1644, and was buried at St. Leonard's, in Foster Lane. His widow writes in the Memoir that "the blessed end of her dear husband was in every way answerable to his godly life." It has been said that if Quarles had written Enchiridion at Athens or Rome, he would have been classed among the wise men of his country.

Quartodecimans.—On what day the festival of the Resurrection ought to be celebrated was a question which caused much anxious thought and bitter dispute in the primitive Church. Some aimed at observing the actual anniversary by keeping it on the same date in each year. Others, guiding themselves by the Jewish reckoning for the Passover, chose the fourteenth day of the first moon in the new year, whatever day of the week that might happen to be; others again deferred the commemoration to the first Sunday after the first full moon. For both of the two latter customs Apostolical authority was pleaded: the former was said to have been sanctioned by St. Philip and St. John, and was generally observed by the Churches of the East, while for the commemoration on the Lord's Day appeal was made to the authority of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the Western Church adopted the custom. One pleasing incident in the controversy was the visit of the saintly Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, to Anicetus, Bishop of Rome, to confer with him on the vexed point. Unable to agree, each thinking himself supported by the practice of Apostles, they agreed to differ, and Polycarp was invited by Anicetus to be celebrant at the Holy Eucharist, and they parted in peace respecting each other's convictions. This was in A.D. 158. Shortly after the Quartodeciman rule (so-called because relating to the fourteenth day) became associated with Judaistic opinions and practices, and, in consequence, called forth the reprobation of Pope Victor, A.D. 180. Henceforward the dispute was carried on with intense bitterness, and after the Council of Nicaea had decreed in favour of the commemoration on the Lord's Day, the Quartodecimans were regarded as heretics and schismatics.

Queen Anne's Bounty.—A full account of this fund will be found under ANNATES, but we may add here a few more details derived from recent returns. The Royal Bounty was ratified by an Act passed in 1704, but for the first few years the Corporation was unable to devote any substantial sum out of the £13,000, which was the average amount of their gross income, to the purposes of the trust. An Act passed in the year 1708 which discharged all livings not exceeding the yearly value of £50 from the payments of Tenths, still further reduced the revenue to about £10,000; and it was not till 1713 that any scheme of augmentation was entered upon. In that year two lists were prepared, in the first of which all livings under £10 per annum were scheduled, and in the second all under £35 per annum. In 1788 the trustees were further empowered under the Sign Manual to give £200 to cures not exceeding £50, and this maximum value of benefices to be similarly augmented was in 1804 increased to £60, and in 1834 to £200 a year. The system of making grants only to meet benefactions now became general, and it was reported in 1868 that the total amounts of such free grants between 1836 and 1868 was only £10,600, while the total yearly appropriations averaged £11,600. The total value of the trusts vested in the Corporation on Dec. 31st, 1881, was £4,171,470 14s. 11d., which is the gross sum of the appropriations made by the board since its institution, and of the private and other benefactions vested in the governors as trustees of the clergy. The Royal Bounty Fund in 1881 amounted to £48,591, of which £27,800 was appropriated in grants to meet benefactions.

Queanel, PASQUIER [b. 1634, d. 1719], was educated at the Sorbonne, ordained priest in 1659, and in 1662 appointed Director of the Seminary of the Oratory. Soon after, he began to publish his celebrated work Réflexions Morales, written for the instruction of the young men under his charge. These found many readers, and were recommended by many bishops. But it was found that his work contained the obnoxious doctrines of Jansen [JANSENISM], and having refused to sign the formula against these opinions in 1675 he left Paris, and went to the Netherlands. Here he continued his Réflexions, which were published at Brussels in 1693-4. De Noailles, as Bishop of Châlons, in 1695 strongly recommended Queanel's writings to his diocese; but scarcely a year later, when he was made Archbishop of Paris, he became their opponent and condemner. Queanel was arrested and imprisoned by order of Philip V., but made his escape and fled to Holland, and died at Amsterdam at a great age. His book was condemned by the celebrated Bull Unigenitus. He wrote also a Life of Arnold, Traditions of the Romish Church, The Discipline of the Church, and some dogmatical essays.

Quietists.—A school of mystics which sprang up in the seventeenth century. The Quietists stated that they resigned themselves absolutely to God's will, that in so doing they renounced self entirely, and were without thought, hope, or wish; in fact, in a state of mental inactivity. The doctrines of Quietism were first given to the world in a book called The Spiritual Guide, written by MOLINOS [q.v.], which was published in Spain in 1675, and was translated into several languages. It represented to a great extent in Spain the teaching of the Jansenists in France, and one of the chief supporters of its theories was MDMR. GUYON [q.v.], a Jansenist, who was defended by Fénelon. They taught that the worship of the Church was not to be compared to private devotion for help and comfort to the soul, and the tendency all through is to promote thought of self rather than thought of God. The same notions have been held by various sects under different names, and will be found under the following heads:—EUCHITES, BEOHARDS, and HESYCHASTS.

Quignon was the son of a Spanish earl, who, while still very young, became a member of the Franciscan Order of monks. He was made a General of the Order in 1622, and so came under the notice of the Emperor Charles V., who made him one of his Council of Conscience. At the time of the struggle between the Emperor and the Pope, Clement VII., Quignon was employed to negotiate between the two, and the manner in which he settled the business pleased the Pope so much that he sent him a cardinal's hat as a reward. He is however chiefly famous for the Breviary which he compiled, in which his main idea was to make the reading of the Bible the most prominent feature in the services, and in this respect the compilers of our Prayer Book followed his example. He denied and condemned certain superstitions and narratives which had crept into the services of the Roman Church, and for this reason, although recommended by two Popes, his Breviary was never in favour, and had very small circulation. Copies of it are, therefore, now scarce.

Quinquagesima.—The Sunday before Ash Wednesday. It was so named from the fact that it is fifty days before Easter. The two Sundays preceding Quinquagesima are named Sexagesima and Septuagesima, because they were considered to be, in round numbers, sixty and seventy days before Easter respectively. That the custom of so naming them is ancient we know, for we find them mentioned in the writings of Gregory the Great; but the practice of keeping them, as a preparation for Lent, has always been confined to the Western Church.

Quintilians.—A sect which was founded by Quintilia, a so-called prophetess, in Phrygia in 189. The peculiarity of its ritual was that women were admitted into priests' orders and were allowed to take part in the services. Women were regarded with extreme veneration, and Eve was particularly honoured, because she had first eaten of the tree of knowledge. Miriam, the sister of Moses, and the daughters of Philip the Deacon, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, were also regarded as prophetesses. At first their teaching was treated with utter contempt, but later on it appears to have spread considerably, until it was condemned by the Council of Laodicea in 320. Tertullian wrote a book against this heresy, and accused the sect of opposing Baptism.

R

Rabanus, MAURUS MAGNENTIUS [b. at Mainz about 776, d. there Feb. 4th, 856]. He was educated at the Monastery of Fulda, then studied under Alcuin at Tours, and returned to the school at Fulda, of which he was made Abbot in 822. In the disputes which arose between Louis le Débonnaire and his children, Rabanus acted the part of peace-maker, and his wisdom and precaution gained him the goodwill of both parties. At this time he wrote a treatise urging the duty of children to their parents, and of subjects to their sovereign. In 842 he resigned his post at Fulda, and retired to a church which he had built at Petersberg, in order to devote himself to religious contemplation and the study of the Scriptures; but in 847 he was elected Archbishop of Mainz, and thus drawn from his retirement. He was an able administrator, and the diocese flourished during his archiepiscopate; but his chief fame rests on his literary works. He wrote commentaries on the Old Testament and on some of the Gospels and Epistles, numbers of hymns and other books of devotion, and treatises relating to the book on Transubstantiation by Paschasius Radbertus.

Rabaut, PAUL, a French preacher who did much to encourage the Protestants during the times of persecution, was born at Bédarieux, in January, 1718. He studied at Lausanne, and in 1744 became Pastor of Nîmes. In 1745 decrees were published forbidding the assembling of congregations, and as Rabaut continued to preach, a price was put upon his head, but he always managed to escape. In 1755 he presented a petition, begging for the release of those who had been sent to the galleys on account of their faith, recognition of the baptism and marriage of Protestants, etc.; but the only answer was further persecution, and Rabaut wrote a pastoral letter advising his people to emigrate rather than submit to the Government. However, in 1774 a reaction was caused in their favour by the repeated cruelties of the Romanists, and thirteen years later the Edict of Toleration was passed. Rabaut died at Nîmes in 1794.

Rabbinism.—A form of Judaism which prevailed among the Jews from the dispersion to the end of the last century. It may be divided into two periods, the first from the fifth century B.C. to the fifth century A.D. and the second from the fifth century A.D. to its disappearance. It was caused by the reorganisation of the social, moral, and religious life of the Jews according to the Mosaic Law, which brought about a union between school and government. The Hebrew was rendered into Chaldee, and was added to by explanations, illustrations, etc., and a tradition was formed which became in the eyes of the people of equal importance with the written Law. Later on, the Mishna was edited by Hillel and Jehuda; by it the Mosaic Law, which had formerly been treated under 613 heads, was now reduced to six. During the latter part of the fourth century a rivalry grew up between the Persian and Babylonian schools. The Babylonian Talmud was re-arranged by Rabbi Ashe, the head of the Rabbinical schools: the Rabbinical schools throughout Persia were closed.

The second epoch of Rabbinism is less interesting than the first. The Babylonian Talmud was brought to Europe and translated into Arabic. Maimonides succeeded in reconciling the liberal form of Rabbinism which had grown up in Spain and the orthodox form which had appeared in Gaul and Italy, and it flourished till the thirteenth century, when the persecutions of the Inquisition partly destroyed it. However, the Cabbala was studied till the last century, when Moses Mendelssohn rose against it. At the present time Rabbinism is superseded by Rationalism.

Radbert, PASCASE. [PASCASIUS RADBERTUS.]

Baikes, ROBERT, Founder of Sunday-schools, was born at Gloucester in 1735. His father was a printer and editor of the Gloucester Journal, who, after giving his son a liberal education, brought him up to the business, to which he afterwards succeeded. He began visiting the prisons, and, finding the bad condition in which they were, drew attention to it in his paper, and brought about a great reformation in the county bridewell.

In 1781, being struck by seeing the ragged groups of children playing in the streets, he determined to try and improve their condition; so, finding four decent, well-disposed women who kept schools for teaching to read, he hired them to instruct as many children as he could assemble together on Sunday in reading and in the Church catechism. For this he agreed to pay them a shilling each a day. There is a letter in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1784 [p. 410], in which he describes the wonderful success of his plan, saying that the place was quite a heaven on Sundays compared to what it used to be. The system soon spread all over England, Scotland, and America. [SUNDAY SCHOOLS.] Raikes died suddenly at Gloucester, on April 5th, 1811.

Raleigh, ALEXANDER, an Independent minister, the author of many theological works, was born at Kirkcudbright in 1817, carried on business for a short time in Liverpool, and went to Blackburn College, and in 1844 became pastor of a chapel at Greenock, whence he moved successively to Rotherham [1850], Glasgow [1855], and London [1859]. He died in London in 1880.

His chief works are, Quiet Resting-Places, The Story of Jonah the Prophet, The Little Sanctuary, and other Meditations, Thoughts for the Weary and the Sorrowful, etc.

Ralph de Diceto, old English historian, born in the twelfth century, was Dean of St. Paul's, and flourished in the reign of King John. He was greatly eminent for his learning, and was esteemed one of the best English historians in the reign of Edward I., when the sovereignty of the kings of England over the kingdom of Scotland was claimed and set forth from records and history. His history begins with William the Conqueror, and reaches to the death of King John. It has been reprinted among the works of the old English historians.

Rammohun Roy, a Hindoo reformer, was born in Burdwan, Bengal, in 1772. He was educated in the Brahman faith, but early renounced polytheism, and formed in Calcutta the BRAHMOO SOMAS, or "Church of God" [q.v.]. In 1830 he came to London as representative of the Sovereign of Delhi, to demand an increase of stipend, which was granted. He died at Stapleton Park, near Bristol, September 27th, 1833. He translated the Vedanta, or Resolution of all the Veds; published selections from the New Testament under the title, The Precepts of Jesus, the Guide to Peace and Happiness; and wrote Apology for the Pursuit of Final Beatitude. While in England he worshipped with the Unitarians, as, though he admired the precepts of Christ, he did not believe in His Divinity.

Ramsbury, BISHOPRIC OF. [See SHERBORNE.]

Rance. [TRAPPE, LA.]

Ranke, LEOPOLD VON [b. Dec. 21st, 1795, d. May, 1886].—A famous historian. He was not of the nobility by birth, the title von being granted him in 1866 by the Emperor [then King] of Prussia. He had four brothers, all of whom have made names for themselves in one way or other. Leopold was educated at Leipzig, and while there showed a remarkable talent for historical criticism. Soon after he left he was appointed to a professorship at Frankfort-on-the-Oder; but it was considered desirable that he should reside in Berlin, so he resigned this appointment in 1825 for that of Professor of History at the University of Berlin. He published his first work, entitled History of the Germanic and Latin Nations in the Reformation Period, in 1824. He was a man of great strength and industry, and his books, all involving great research, followed each other all through his life with extraordinary rapidity. His History of the Popes is generally thought to be the most brilliant as regards critical power and style. It was quickly translated into most modern languages, and certainly was the chief means of gaining for Ranke the European reputation which he enjoyed to the end of his life. Macaulay, speaking of this work in one of his essays in the Edinburgh Review, says it "is known and esteemed wherever German literature is studied." In 1841 the late King of Prussia, Frederick William IV., asked him to write a full account of the history of Prussia, and this work was published six years later. He lived for the most part a very quiet and retired life, seldom leaving his house in Berlin, and taking no active part in the politics of the time, though he studied each movement thoroughly with regard to its probable bearing on future history. He made one exception to this rule in 1848, when a Parliament met at Frankfort with the idea of reconstructing the German Constitution, and above all of uniting the German nation under one head. The scheme came to nothing, and from that time Ranke devoted himself to his historical studies and to his lectures. During the years that followed he published a History of France at the Time of the Reformation, History of England during the Seventeenth Century, Studies of the Characters of the Chief Statesmen of Italy and Spain, and several essays and books on different periods in the history of his own people. These occupied him constantly until 1880, and in that year, at the age of eighty-six, he announced his intention of writing his great Weltgeschichte. It was never expected, of course, that his scheme would be in any way completed, but the "Altmeister," as his fellow-countrymen admiringly called him, worked steadily every day, giving one volume a year to the public, and at his death he had brought the work far into the Middle Ages. To have finished the book according to the plan he worked out at the beginning would have taken three more years. Although he lived so quietly, and, except by his books, made so little stir in the world, he was given all the honours which it is possible for a literary man to receive, both by his own country and foreign ones, France conferring the greatest distinction she has in her power to give, that of being a Member of the Academy. He was always ready to give advice and help to any student, either of history or politics, who chose to apply to him, and was revered by all classes from the Emperor and Crown Prince downwards, the latter being one of his pupils.

Banthers.—An Anabaptist sect which first appeared in 1645. They set up the light of nature under the name of "Christ in men," and are said to have declared themselves incapable of sinning, and in the condition of Adam in Paradise. It is no wonder that, according to Fuller, they degenerated into lewdness. The name came to be applied in popular language to the Primitive Methodists, who, in their open-air preaching, were distinguished by their violent gesticulations.

Rabbists. [HARMONY SOCIETY.]

Rashi [i.e. Rabbi Shalemo Izaaki, sometimes erroneously called Yarchi], the celebrated Jewish commentator, was born in 1040 at Troyes, in France. The range of his studies was extraordinarily wide, comprising philology, philosophy, medicine, astronomy, law and exegesis, and a complete mastery over the whole range of Scripture and the sources of the Talmud. He travelled for seven years in Italy, Greece, Germany, Palestine, Egypt, and Persia, studying under the greatest scholars of the time. His chief work is the commentary on the whole of the Old Testament, containing the literal sense, and also allegorical illustrations. This was the first book ever printed in Hebrew, appearing at Reggio in 1476. It was translated into Latin by Breithaupt, and partly into German by Lucas Prague. Among his other works are a commentary on twenty-three treatises of the Talmud and on Midrash Rabba, a book of medicine, a poem on the Unity of God, etc. He died at Troyes in 1105.

Rascólniki. [RUSSIAN CHURCH.]

Rationalism.—The setting up of reason as the supreme arbiter, and causing the Scriptures and the mysteries of Christianity to be interpreted and judged by it alone. Such a system was the natural outcome of the Reformation so far as this: the traditional method was abandoned, for men claimed the right of appealing to the Scriptures against it. The authority of the Church to impose fetters on opinion was denied when Luther burned the Pope's Bull. It thus became necessary to find another basis of belief, and it was in good faith that the early

German rationalists declared that the evidence for Christianity was found in its harmonising with the instincts and needs of the soul. It was later developments which, ignoring the presence of sin in the world, and of the darkness produced by sin, exalted reason above mystery, and proceeded to eliminate everything supernatural from religion, to discredit miracles, or to regard them as Oriental exaggerations of natural operations, and to question the inspiration of the Bible. [KANT, DEISM, MIRACLES, EVIDENCES, INSPIRATION, REVELATION.]

Ratisbon, CONFERENCE OF, which met in 1541, was the sequel to the one held in Worms the previous year. The Emperor, Charles V., hoped by these conferences to settle the religious differences in Germany, without having to proceed to hostilities, but at the conclusion of the proceedings the members agreed that more was wanted to heal the divisions than a mere theological formula, and the Conference ended without having arrived at any real result.

Ratramnus or Bertram.—A priest and monk in the Monastery of Corbie, Picardy, in the ninth century. Nothing is known of his private life, but he was famous in his time as a writer, and was consulted by Charles the Bald in matters of ecclesiastical controversy. He was employed to reply to the encyclical letter of Photius, and wrote against the doctrine of Transubstantiation as given by Paschasius Radbertus, though he taught that there is a mystical presence under the symbols in the Eucharist. His book was written after 844, and called De Corpore et Sanguine Domini. The book was condemned two centuries later, as it was supposed to have been the work of John Scotus Erigena; but was used by Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, in 1526, in opposition to the arguments of Ecolampadius. Ridley's views on the Sacrament seem to have been formed by the study of this book. It continued to be regarded as spurious till the seventeenth century, when Sainte Beuve proved its authenticity. Against Photius Ratramnus wrote Contra Græcorum opposita, and in the Gottschalk controversy De Prædestinatione Dei and Trina Deitas.

Ravenna.—A city of Italy which formerly stood on the shores of the Adriatic, but is now about five miles inland, owing to the deposits made by the Po at its mouth. It is famous in secular, but especially in ecclesiastical, history. Tradition says that a pupil of St. Peter named Apollinaris preached Christianity there in 79 A.D., and was martyred there. The truth of this is doubtful, but that the city contains Christian monuments of a very early date is certain, and the architecture of the churches marks distinctly the three nations which have at different times occupied the city—the Theodoxians, the Goths, and the Byzantines. It was made the seat of a bishop in very early times, and in 419 Honorius choosing to live there, it was raised to a metropolitan see. It became at last so powerful that we read of several bishops asserting that they were absolutely independent of the Bishop of Rome, and the question was only definitely decided in favour of the Pope in 861. Ravenna was chosen several times as the meeting place of synods, but none of them were worthy of note. The town is famous also as being the place where Dante finished his Divina Commedia, and where he died, on Sept. 14th, 1321.

Raymond Martini.—A Dominican monk [b. at Suberta, in Catalonia, early in the thirteenth century; d. after 1284]. He entered a monastery at Barcelona, and distinguished himself by his learning, especially in Oriental languages, which in those times were very rarely studied. He afterwards became a missionary among the Spanish Jews, and went to Tunis to convert the Mahometans, against whom he wrote Pugio Fidei. He wrote also a refutation of the Koran, which no longer exists, and a Capistrum Judæorum; this and the Pugio Fidei were made use of by a Carthusian monk in a book called Victoria contra Judæos.

Readers.—In the early Church the readers were looked upon as an inferior order of clergy, and we often find them mentioned in the writings of St. Cyprian. We cannot trace their existence further back than the third century, but after that time they appear to have been very numerous, and to have been distinctly recognised by the Fathers of the Church. In the present day the title of LAY READER [q.v.] is given to a man authorised by the bishop to help the priest in certain parts of public worship.

Reading Pew. [DESK.]

Real Presence. [LORD'S SUPPER.]

Realists.—The opponents of the NOMINALISTS [q.v.] among the Schoolmen of the Middle Ages. Their main doctrine, which is also attributed to Aristotle, was that "UNIVERSALS" [q.v.] have an independent existence; nay, that they, or Ideas, are the only real existences, inasmuch as all visible things grow, change, and perish. Wise men perish, but their wisdom is eternal. Universals exist, therefore, independently of things, and of our conceptions of them in the Divine Intellect. And the supreme reason of man is to have his thoughts in conformity with the Divine ideals. Realism, therefore, accepting the Divine origin of the Church, taught complete submission to authority, and the necessity of looking to God only for revelation and light. The founder of this school of thought was Anselm, and the work was taken up and carried on by Thomas Aquinas and William of Champeaux.

Rebaptising.—A word employed, for want of a better, to denote the administration of baptism, by a lawful minister, to those who at some previous time have been invalidly baptised by heretics or schismatics. Baptism by laymen, if orthodox, is by nearly all, if not all, Churches recognised as valid.

Recluse.—Properly speaking the term should only apply to those who have taken monastic vows and wish to lead the most secluded lives possible. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries, those who had proved themselves able to lead a thoroughly solitary life were allowed this so-considered privilege, many of them being locked up in their cells for life. When they had once given themselves up to this life they were obliged to continue, and could not get absolution from it, except by order of the bishop. The term has now a wider meaning, and is often applied to people who simply live in retirement and away from the world.

Recollects.—A minor branch of the Franciscan Order of monks. The name is supposed to have been given them by Clement VII., who in 1531 granted houses to such as possessed "the Spirit of Recollection." From its foundation the Order of St. Francis has been divided into two parties, the Conventualists and the Observants, the former living in monasteries under a not very strict rule, and the latter following more exactly the laws of their founder, especially those relating to poverty. At the end of the sixteenth century the Observants in Italy were named by the reigning Pope "Reformed Franciscans." They spread very rapidly in France during the seventeenth century, and were in great favour at Court. It was in this country that we find the term "Recollects" most frequently in use. They stood their ground well all through the agitation caused by the Jansenist movement, and refused to relax their rules in the slightest degree. The Order was suppressed at the Revolution, but has lately reappeared in a few towns in France.

Rector ["governor"].—A term applied to several persons whose offices are very different:—[1] The rector of a parish is a clergyman that has the charge and care of a parish, and possesses all the tithes, whereas a vicar only has a portion, the rest going to the impropriator of the great tithes. [2] The same name is given to the chief officer in some of the colleges, as at Exeter and Lincoln Colleges at Oxford, as well as at the Scotch Universities; it is also sometimes given to the head master of a large school. [3] Rector is also used in several convents for the superior officer who governs the house. The Jesuits gave the name to the superior of such of their houses as were either seminaries or colleges.

Rector, Lay.—A name given to laymen who are impropriators of the great tithes of a parish.

Recusant.—One who refused to attend the worship of the Church of England. Popish recusants were Roman Catholics who so refused attendance, and one tried and convicted of the offence was a "Popish recusant convict."

Redemption. [WORK OF CHRIST.]

Redemptorists.—An Order founded in 1732 by St. ALPHONSUS MARIA DE LIGUORI [q.v.], its chief object being to provide a set of men to work amongst the poor. In this he received the assistance of Falcoia, Bishop of Castellamare, and the work was begun at Scala, where he had previously founded a community of nuns. In 1749 the Order was confirmed, and its rules approved by Benedict XIV. He gave it first the title of the "Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour," but as there was an Order of the same name in another part of Italy, the Pope ordained that the title should be changed to that of the "Most Holy Redeemer," to prevent confusion. The members, who were called Redemptorists, had, in addition to the general vows of obedience, poverty, and chastity, to take an oath that they would work diligently in the Order till their death. Their great object was to be the conversion of the most poor and miserable, especially those living in great cities who would otherwise be left to a large extent destitute. Besides this, Liguori insisted on constant study among his disciples as a means towards being of more use to the Church. The Order still exists in most countries of Europe, although at different times, through revolutions and various other causes, it has been banished. It was introduced into England in 1843, and has now six houses in the British Isles. The nuns are called Redemptoristines; they live in strict enclosure, and employ their whole time in praying for the success of the Redemptorist missions. The chief seat of government is Rome, where the head of the Order, who has the title of Rector Major, superintends the general working of the society in all parts of the world. He is elected for life, but the heads of the different houses, who are appointed by him, assisted by six councillors, can only hold office for three years.

Rees, Thomas, D.D.—A Congregational minister [b. at Llanddeilo, Cardiganshire, 1815; d. 1885]. Author of a History of Protestant Nonconformity in Wales [1861], and translator of Barnes's Notes on the New Testament into Welsh. He was a minister at Swansea for twenty-two years, and was President of the Congregational Union the year of his death.

Reformation.—To give in detail the history of the great religious revolution of the sixteenth century would be almost to write the history of Europe. Our object in the following article will simply be to indicate the causes and the occasions which produced the mighty changes in the several countries and the most prominent results. Let it be remembered that causes and occasions are by no means synonyms. An occasion furnishes reason for present action, but the causes lie further back. Henry VIII.'s divorce was the occasion of England's breach with Rome, but the causes had been gathering for whole generations before.

As far back as the twelfth century St. Bernard, called "the last of the Fathers," had sadly cried out that he longed before he died to see the Church of God as it was in the ancient days. And the cry had gathered strength in succeeding years. The great Councils of the fifteenth century—Pisa, Constance, Basle—had called for "purification of head and members." And so there is also a long list of illustrious names—Gerson, Grostète, Bradwardine, Colet, Sir Thomas More—men who would have been indignant at any suspicion thrown upon their faithfulness to the Church, who were urgent in their demands for reform. Bossuet, in his Variations des Églises Protestantes, attempts to break the force of this fact by saying that these doctors never thought of changing the faith of the Church, or of correcting her worship, or of subverting the authority of her prelates, and chiefly that of the Pope. But unhappily the conscience of men came to the conviction that the practical evils of the Church had their root in doctrine. The shameful sale of indulgences and masses came out of corrupt teaching concerning the intermediate state. So, again, when it was seen that in one year nearly a thousand pounds were offered at the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket, and during the same period not one penny at the altar of Christ, it is no wonder if the suspicion arose that errors had crept into the Church concerning saintly intercession and invocation.

Of the manifold causes which wrought together to produce the Reformation, three stand out the most prominent:—

[1] The Papacy.—No Roman Pontiff—not Gregory VII. nor Innocent III.—ever advanced loftier claims than did Boniface VIII., when, in 1302, he addressed to the Christian world his Bull UNAM SANCTAM [q.v.]. That was the culminating point of Papal power, and the two centuries that followed saw its rapid decline. The removal of the Papal Court to Avignon brought more clearly to the light its corruptions and cruelties, and exhibited the Supreme Pontiff as the puppet of the French King. The Great Schism, which followed and lasted through forty years, gave a still ruder shock to traditional reverence for the See. At this moment, too, the nations of modern Europe were consolidating and settling their national life, a state of things which "could not fail to give an impulse, hitherto unknown, in calling up the nationality of many a Western State, in satisfying it that the Papal rule was not essential to its welfare, and in thereby adding strength to local jurisdictions" [Hardwick's Reformation]. How strong this impulse was may be seen in the fact that at the Council of Constance the vote was taken, not by individuals, but by nations—viz. the English, German, French, and Italian. That method of voting was the precursor of national reformations. To this must be added the personal character of the Popes themselves. Blunt's statement is no exaggeration when he says that "for sixty years before the final breach was made, there had not been a Pope, except Clement VII., who could be called even a decent Christian" [Blunt's Reformation, p. 242]. It is a shame even to mention the deeds of villainess which make up the life of such men as Pope Alexander VI.

[2] The revival of letters and the impulse given by it to human intellect was a second cause of the demand for reformation. The revival of learning in Italy—and Italy led the way in everything in those days—was, in its temper, simply Pagan. The Decameron of Boccaccio was saturated with the Pagan spirit. An eclogue of Geraldini on the Passion spoke of the Lord Jesus Christ as "Daphnis," and "Daphnis in an odoriferous garden" is the commencement of the agony in Gethsemane. At the Court of the Medici it was a characteristic of good society to dispute the fundamental principles of Christianity, and the narratives of Holy Scripture and the mysteries of the Faith became subjects of derision. Leo X., in all probability, was an infidel. "Marvellous," says Dr. J. M. Neale, "was the infatuation which could expend all its zeal in the discovery of the last books of Tacitus and Livy, in the production of the purest Ciceronian Latin, in the erection of Classical churches, and which could pay for all these Pagan amusements by the infamous mission of 'etzel, unconscious of the approaching earthquake, regarding the discontent of one German monk as something that might—it mattered not which of the two—be hushed at the stake or silenced by the sop of a fat benefice." The very greatness of the evil brought a reaction, and thoughtful men endeavoured to stay the general corruption by revived religious conviction. But the attempt failed through two causes. The one was the timidity expressed in the saying attributed to Cardinal Pole, that men "ought to content themselves with their own inward convictions, and not concern themselves to know if errors and abuses existed in the Church." The other was the irreformable character of the Roman Court. Meanwhile, let the causes have been what they may, this Pagan tendency was remarkably kept in check in England, though signs of it appeared all through from Chaucer to Shakespeare. Signs—but only on the surface: none of the great English writers can be charged with the moral foulness and scornful unbelief of the Continental Paganism.

[3] The third cause of the cry for reformation lay in the tremendous sense of responsibility which rests on the reason and conscience of individuals with reference to their belief, and the necessity which they feel rests upon them of personal faith in, and personal communion with, the Lord. The other causes live in the outward world, this dwells in each man's soul. It was a mark of Western theology, as contrasted with Eastern, that whereas the latter loved to meditate upon God and upon the Christian doctrines as defined in the Creeds, the Western Church contemplated more practically the great phenomena of human nature and the relation of the soul to God. And Christian anthropology, it has been well said, "ranged itself under two heads—the objective one of the Sacraments and ordinances of the Church as such; and the subjective one of the progress of grace in the heart of each one of us" [Foulkes's Divisions of Christendom]. The mediæval divines had mainly concerned themselves with the former of these two heads, though not exclusively so, for the "Friends of God" and the Mystics had eagerly inculcated personal earnestness in religious life. But, taken as a whole, mediæval Christianity was preeminently the sense of corporate membership, and an exaggerated idea of the value of a perfunctory discharge of routine and merely external duties; "the form of godliness without the power" was the result. This, probably, more than anything else, honeycombed the Church with corruption. And this furnishes the key to the preaching of Luther and its mighty effect upon men. It was the passionate assertion of personal religion and individual responsibility.

The cry for reform, then, was general before the great Revolution appeared. By what method might it be looked for? That which most commended itself to the thoughtful men of those days was the convoking of a General Council. Attempts had been made, but in vain; and in 1460 Pope Pius II. forbade any attempt "to invoke the aid of Councils under pain of damnation." This seemed to close that door. Yet men hoped even against hope. Constitutional reform had taken strong hold in France. When Pagan Leo X. was succeeded by Adrian VI. men hoped again, especially when that Pontiff declared that "many abominations had existed for a long time, yea in the Holy See itself;" but he died after a brief pontificate, and the Roman Curia was confirmed in its resolution to resist all change. But Luther's preaching had by this time stirred the waters too profoundly to suffer any further stagnation. Men's hearts were moved to their very depths, and the cry for reformation was too universal to be put down. Two methods remained. The one was a movement under individual leaders, the other the assertion of the rights of autonomous national Churches, as against Papal centralisation. The one marked the movement in Germany and Switzerland, the other was pursued in England. And this last was no afterthought. It was a recurrence to the practice of the purest ages of the faith. In all time and everywhere, national synods had discussed and dealt with the heresies, errors, and evils of national Churches, whether such evils and heresies had grown up within or been thrust in from without. The method was an old one revived, not a new one invented [Hardwick on the Articles, ch. i.]. Archbishop Laud thus wrote concerning these three methods of reform: "It is true a General Council, free and entire, would have been the best remedy and most able for a gangrene that had spread so far and eaten so deep into Christianity. But what! should we have suffered this gangrene to endanger life and all rather than be cured in time by a physician of weaker knowledge and a less able hand? We live to see since, if we had stayed and expected a General Council, what manner of one we should have had, if any; for that at Trent was neither general nor free. . . . And I much doubt whether even that Council (such as it was) would have been called, if some provincial and national synods, under supreme regal power, had not first set upon this great work of reformation, which I heartily wish had been as orderly and happily pursued as the work was right Christian and good in itself. I make no doubt but that as the universal Catholic Church would have reformed herself, had she been in all parts freed of the Roman yoke, so while she was for the most in these Western parts under that yoke the Church of Rome was, if not the only, yet the chief hindrance to reformation."

These causes, it will be seen, affect the whole Church, and may be observed in the history of reformation in each nation. The special occasions which set the causes in operation will be seen as we now glance through the history of each nation.

Germany.—On Oct. 31st, 1517, Luther's conflict with the Church of Rome began, when he boldly attacked the doctrine of "Indulgences." This date has been kept throughout Protestant Germany as the Festival of the Reformation. Luther soon had to defend himself against the charge of insubordination. The arguments which his opponents advanced rested upon the supreme power of the Pope; e.g. one of these arguments was that "the Pope alone has power to determine those things which are of Faith," and another was that "Christians are to be taught that the Church holds many things as Catholic verities which yet are placed neither in the Canon of the Bible, nor among the more ancient Fathers." Luther replied, quoting Augustine, that the canonical books of Scripture alone are an infallible guide. Luther was now led to inquire more fully into the authority of the Pope; consequently he was cited on Aug. 7th, 1518, to appear in Rome, to answer the charge of heresy. Eventually, however, his trial took place before the Papal Legate, Cardinal Cajetan, at Augsburg, on Oct. 10th. Luther persisted in renouncing the doctrine of indulgences, and denied the authority of Papal edicts when unsupported by Holy Scripture, the ancient Fathers, or the decisions of General Councils. He was ordered peremptorily to recant. Luther, however, fearing violence, escaped by night from Augsburg [Oct. 16th], and returned to Wittenberg. In July, 1519, an important theological debate took place at Leipzig, between Carlstadt (who had joined the new movement, but who eventually pushed his principles to such extravagant lengths that he was silenced by Luther) on the one side, and Eck, a very learned champion of the Papacy, on the other. During the debate Luther spoke, and advanced a step farther in his conflict with the Papal power. He denied [1] that the Latin Church is exclusively the Church of Christ; [2] that the ascendancy of the Pope of Rome was of Divine institution; [3] that the Councils of the Church are infallible. The result of this boldness was his excommunication by Pope Leo X. in June, 1520. The Papal Bull was publicly burnt at Wittenberg the same year. Luther at this time attracted many followers; among others, Martin Bucer—who subsequently took refuge in England and received a theological professorship at Cambridge—and Melancthon, a brilliant and earnest student at Wittenberg. In 1521, Melancthon drew up a text-book for Lutheran divines, entitled Loci Communes Rerum Theologicarum; it contained a calm statement of their special doctrines, supported by Scriptural proofs. Meanwhile, in 1520, Luther had appealed to the Christian potentates of the German nation to summon a Council for redressing grievances and removing abuses in the Church; and later in the same year he published The Babylonish Captivity of the Church, a violent treatise against the mediæval doctrine concerning the Sacraments: he reduces them in number from seven to two, and lays very great stress on the necessity of faith, without which the Sacraments convey no benefit. The prospect of his excommunication caused Luther to bring forward another doctrine of great importance, viz. that all Christians are the priests of God, quoting Rev. i. 6 and other texts in support. Henry VIII. replied to this by stating that for the same reason all Christians must be kings. Luther, however, used this doctrine for giving more importance to the laity, and for reducing the tyranny of the Papal priesthood. Luther's views were popular, and at length the Elector Frederic became an ardent champion of the Reformation movement. In 1521 Luther was summoned by the Emperor Charles V. to appear before the Diet at Worms. On this occasion he made his memorable stand, saying that unless he were convicted of heresy by the testimony of Scripture, he could not and would not retract anything, adding, "Here stand I, I can no farther; God help me. Amen." In spite of opposition, the Diet eventually proclaimed the Imperial bann against Luther as a heretic and outcast from the Church of God, and his writings were prohibited. On his way back to Wittenberg, he was secured by order of his friend and patron, the Elector of Saxony, and carried off to a safe shelter in the Castle of Wartburg. Here Luther worked actively with his pen, his most important work being the translation of the New Testament into the Saxon dialect. During Luther's retirement, some of the Reformers, headed by Carlstadt, had broken out into extravagances, and many sympathisers had in consequence shrunk from throwing in their lot with the Reformers. At this period, too, the fanatical and lawless sect of the Anabaptists had started into birth. Luther, in consternation, reappeared at Wittenberg on March 7th, 1522, to save his work from destruction; he silenced the ultra-Reformers, undid their work, and in his own teaching laid great stress on the necessity of Christian quietness and charity. The Peasants' War, in 1524, brought the Lutheran doctrines into fresh discredit; although Luther sternly denounced the insurgents, and preached obedience to the civil magistrate, still much of his influence was gone, owing to the revolutionary proceedings of fanatical Reformers. In this year, Erasmus, who had been an exceedingly able advocate of Reformation principles, went over to the opposite side, and violently attacked Luther and his teaching. The States of the Empire now formed themselves into religious leagues, either in opposition to or in defence of the new doctrines. The "League of Torgau" [1526] was constituted of those princes who supported reform; they agreed to stand by each other in case they were attacked "on account of the Word of God or the removal of abuses." The Diet of Spire, which opened immediately afterwards, recommended many reforms, such as allowing the clergy to marry [Luther had already married an escaped nun], restoring the chalice in the Eucharist to the laity, and that private masses should be abolished. The Emperor, however, refused his sanction to these reforms; whereupon the individual States took it upon themselves to work out their own reforms; so, in 1527, in Saxony, "visitors" were nominated by the Elector to examine into the condition of each parish; the visitors did not interfere with old institutions, provided they were not repugnant to Scripture; their motto was to reform and correct, not to destroy and abolish. The Reformation, however, received a check at the new Diet of Spire, which assembled in 1529. The reforming edict of the former Diet [1526] was repealed; the Emperor was angry and intolerant. The Reformers hereupon drew up their protest against these proceedings, and so obtained for themselves and their posterity the name of "Protestants." Their influence, however, was now much weakened by internal divisions. A new set of Reformers, headed by Zwingli, and opposed to the Lutherans in their opinions as to the Sacraments and other doctrines of the Gospel, arose in parts of southern Germany and in Switzerland. The Conference of Marburg was held in 1529, in order to bring about an understanding between the two sets of Reformers, but without success. At this conference the Lutherans drew up and agreed upon fifteen dogmatic definitions; these were revised and increased to seventeen at the Conference of Schwabach [Oct., 1529], and subscription to them became a necessary condition of membership in the league of Reformers referred to previously. These seventeen articles were finally revised by Melancthon, and were incorporated in the celebrated Confession of Augsburg—an apology for Lutheranism, presented to the Emperor Charles V. at the Diet of Augsburg [1530]. The Confession is remarkably clear and outspoken, but humble and modest in tone. In setting forth the articles of the Lutheran Reformed Faith, it was seen that the Reformers held almost everything in common with the Catholic Church; for the errors and abuses which they rejected they gave their reasons, taken from Scripture and the early Fathers of the Church. After the Lutheran views had been discussed, the Diet, with threats, ordered the Reformers to conform in all things to the established usage of the Roman Church. Owing to these threats the Reformers entered into a covenant, called the "Schmalkaldic League" [1531], by which they agreed to help each other for six years in defending their Faith. They also sought the aid of France against their own Emperor—a fatal and unpatriotic thing to do. Charles V. was now glad to pacify the Protestant Reformers, in order to concentrate his forces against the Ottoman Turks, who were attacking his dominions. Accordingly the Peace of Nuremberg was signed [July, 1532], by which it was agreed that the present state of things was to continue until a "General Free Council" could authoritatively settle the matters in dispute. Pope Paul III. attempted to call a Council at Mantua in 1537, but the Lutherans could not regard it as a free Council, so the attempt failed. The Lutherans then issued a manifesto, embodying their principles, and called the "Schmalkaldic Articles," because issued by the Protestant League of that name [1537]. At the same time the Emperor, his brother Ferdinand, and many powerful princes, formed themselves into "the Holy League," for the purpose of opposing the Reformation. In 1541 the Colloquy of Ratisbon was held between champions of the Reformed and Unreformed Faith, and although an agreement was nearly arrived at, yet in the end the matters in dispute were in the same position as before. Another fruitless Council was held at Ratisbon in the beginning of 1546, followed quickly by the death of the great Reformer, Luther, in February of the same year. He held his opinions firmly to the last. He had proved them, and found that they did not fail him in the hour of his need; but his last days were saddened by the religious animosities of the age, by the divisions among the Reformers themselves, and especially by the rise and growth of Zwinglianism. Immediately after his death a terrible religious war broke out between the Romanists and Reformers. The Lutherans struck the first blow, but the Emperor had been openly making his preparations for bloodshed before this. The Pope granted plenary indulgence to all who fought against the Lutheran "heresy." The Protestants were utterly defeated at the battle of Mülberg [April 24th, 1547]. In May of the following year the Diet of Augsburg, under Charles V., issued an edict, called the Interim Augustanum. This was a formulary of faith and worship for the Protestants to adopt, as a temporary arrangement, until a General Council settled matters. The "Interim" was opposed to the Reformed Faith, but it made two concessions, by legalising the marriage of such ecclesiastics as had already taken wives, and by tolerating communion in both kinds. It met with great opposition among the more strict Lutherans; the more moderate tried to modify its operation, and were in danger of compromising their faith, when, in 1552, Maurice, the Elector of Saxony, took the field on their behalf. The war was ended honourably for the Reformers by the "Peace of Augsburg" [1555]. It was agreed that every land proprietor should be free to choose between the old religion and that embodied in the Confession of Augsburg [1530]; his tenants and dependents were expected to follow his example. Meanwhile the long-promised Council met at Trent in 1545, but by its protracted and wearying disputes all hope was dispelled of its effecting any speedy reformation of existing abuses. The two great religious parties, the Romanists and the Reformers or Protestants, lived in comparative quietness for the remainder of the century; but in the latter part of it, owing to the divisions among the Lutheran and Swiss Reformers, and to the persevering zeal of the Jesuits, founded in 1540, Protestantism in Germany greatly declined; whole districts were gradually brought back to allegiance to Rome. The Reformed Faith was to go through another terrible ordeal

—the Thirty Years' War [1618-48]—before it was finally recognised and supported by the German Government, by the peace of Westphalia [1648].

The Reformation spread through the following States in the German Empire:—

The Electorate of Saxony, the starting-place of the movement, and where as early as 1527 the majority of the people embraced the Reformed Faith.

Ducal Saxony yielded in 1539, Leipzig, Dresden, and other chief towns joining the movement.

Hessen, under Philip, eagerly received Lutheran doctrines in 1526.

Bavarian Brandenburg joined in 1528, at the Diet of Anspach.

Electoral Brandenburg did not cast off the Papal yoke till 1539.

Lüneburg joined in 1527; Scriptural preaching was enforced, but ritual and worship remained much as before.

Mecklenburg, Holstein, and Pomerania also were among the first to join.

A few years later, in 1535, Württemberg and other minor States joined the Protestant League.

Frederic, Elector Palatine, and his people, took the same side in 1546.

In the Duchy of Bavaria, the Reformation made much progress at first among the people, but owing to the opposition of the civil power, and to the efforts of the Jesuits, Lutheranism was extinguished in the duchy before the century closed.

In East Friesland and in Silesia Lutheranism had a peaceful triumph about the year 1527.

The rapid spread of the movement in Germany was almost entirely owing to the influence of Luther; in 1523 he is said to have issued as many as 183 books or pamphlets in promoting the cause; his writings were perfectly clear and practical, and adapted to influence the people. The force of his arguments, his homely illustrations, his simple boldness, and especially his deep earnestness, completely won the people, and made them ardent champions of the Reformation. Melancthon's influence, though of a different nature, was also very great in forwarding the movement; his learned lectures at the University of Wittenberg were the means of raising up many able coadjutors in the work of Reformation; but the Lutherans were chiefly indebted to Melancthon for the Confession of Augsburg and other symbolical writings containing systematic statements of Lutheran doctrines; by these the truth, after it had been discovered, was preserved and kept intact for themselves and their posterity. He died in 1560. The masses of the people, however, were probably most influenced by the itinerant friars who went from village to village, and town to town, preaching the doctrines of Luther.

Eastern Prussia received Lutheran preachers in 1523, and George Polents, one of the Prussian Bishops, embraced the Lutheran doctrines, and promoted the Reformation. In 1525 the whole country was converted. A German Liturgy, adhering as much as possible to ancient usage, was introduced. Convents were converted into hospitals, and for the instruction of the clergy, Postils, or explanatory sermons on the Epistles and Gospels, were regularly sent from Wittenberg. In 1548 the Reformers were aided by a large influx of Bohemian Protestant refugees, and so became independent of aid from Wittenberg.

Polish Prussia became reformed about 1560, Sigismund Augustus being their sovereign.

In Denmark Lutheranism was first taught at Wiburg, in Jutland, by John Tausen, who had studied under Melancthon at Wittenberg. Lutheran preachers came in 1526. When Frederick I. was crowned King of Denmark [1523], the Danish hierarchy required him to extirpate the "heretics of Luther's school." Hence the King, though personally favourable to reform, was unable to advance the work immediately; but in 1526 he passed over to the side of the Reformers, and in 1527, at a Diet held at Odense, "liberty of conscience" was granted to both parties. In 1530 the Danish Protestants issued a manifesto at Copenhagen similar to the Augsburg Confession, holding fast to all Lutheran doctrines. Christian III., who succeeded his father on the throne in 1533, was an ardent Reformer; he had attended the Diet at Worms [1521], and had listened with admiration to Luther. The Reformation now spread throughout the whole of Denmark, bishops were deposed, and twelve Superintendents established in the ancient Sees. In the University of Copenhagen three Divinity professors were appointed to lecture on the Old and New Testament and on the Fathers. A Danish liturgy was compiled on Lutheran models. Christian III. joined the Protestant League in 1538. The Confession of Augsburg was accepted by Denmark in 1569.

Norway and Iceland, after brief struggles, gave in their adherence to Lutheranism about 1539.

All these countries have remained Lutheran to the present day.

Sweden. — Students from Wittenberg had brought Lutheranism into Sweden in 1519. Gustavus Vasa, crowned in 1523, supported the Reformers in his kingdom. Accordingly when Brask, Bishop of Linköping, began a persecution of "the heretics," the King interfered on their behalf. In 1524 a Council was called to prepare the Church for the changes that were to be made by the Court. The King constituted himself supreme in matters ecclesiastical, appointed and deposed bishops on his own authority, seized a large part of the ecclesiastical revenues, suppressed monasteries, and organised the Church much on the same model as the Reformed Church in Denmark. He advocated the use of nearly all the ancient service books and ritual, until the people were better instructed; and this course was adopted by the clergy at the Synod of Örebro in 1529. One great characteristic of the Reformed Church of Sweden is that the government of the Church by bishops has been preserved and perpetuated to the present day. Lawrence Peterson, a moderate Lutheran, was made Archbishop of Upsala. In 1539, however, the King threatened to constitute the Swedish Church on the Presbyterian model, but the threat was not accomplished. In 1544 the Reformation changes were established throughout the kingdom. These changes, however, led to an insurrection among the poorer classes, urged on in several cases by the Romish priests [1537-1543]. The insurrection was quelled, but another reaction occurred in 1576, when King John introduced a new liturgy, based on the missal authorised by the Council of Trent; it was adopted by the Diet in 1577, two Bishops strongly protesting against it, viz., Linköping and Strengness; the King moreover entrusted the management of a college at Stockholm to certain Jesuits whom he had invited from Louvain. But when Lutheranism was just at its lowest ebb, the King suddenly changed his course; the Jesuits were compelled to leave the country, and Lutheranism regained the ground it had lost. At the kirk-mote held at Upsala in 1593, the Augsburg Confession was adopted by Sweden; the followers of Zwingli and Calvin were denounced, the Romanising liturgy of King John was revoked, and the service book of Lawrence Peterson took its place. Luther's short catechism became also the recognised manual of instruction.

Poland. — Sigismund I., King of Poland from 1548 to 1572, tolerated Lutheranism, and during his reign it penetrated among all classes. Large numbers of Protestant refugees from Bohemia came to Poland in 1548, and aided in spreading the Lutheran doctrine. An ecclesiastical synod held at Piotrkow in 1551 advocated the most bitter persecution of the Protestants. On the other hand, the Polish Diet in 1562 was favourable to them. The Protestant Reformers, however, were greatly weakened by the desertion of their champion, Orichovius, formerly a student at Wittenberg, who rejoined the Roman Church in 1559. After Sigismund's death, most of the succeeding kings favoured the Romanists. Stephen Bathori came to the throne in 1575, and proclaimed himself favourable to religious toleration, saying that God had reserved to Himself the government of men's consciences. He was, notwithstanding, a patron of the Jesuits, and winked at their persecution of the Protestants. He was succeeded by Sigismund III. [1587-1632], Crown Prince of Sweden, whose parents had resisted Protestantism in Sweden. In this reign Protestantism in Poland was completely overthrown. This result was brought about partly by the Jesuits and partly by serious divisions among the Reformers themselves. The cause of the Reformers was also greatly weakened by some of their number adopting the Anti-Trinitarian heresy.

Bohemia and Moravia.—The followers of John Huss, the great Bohemian Reformer, entered into negotiations with Luther in 1519. In Feb., 1520, Luther writes, after reading the works of John Huss, that "I, without being conscious of it, have both taught and held all the things of John Huss . . . in brief we are all Hussites without knowing it." An alliance was soon formed between the Bohemians and Lutherans. In 1532 the Bohemians, with the sanction of Luther, presented a formal statement of their tenets to George, Margrave of Brandenburg, followed in 1535, by a regular "Confession of Faith to Ferdinand, King of Bohemia." At the breaking out of the religious war in 1546, the country sent an army to aid the Protestants; after the disastrous battle at Mühlberg [April 24th, 1547], they were subject to severe persecution. Many were ordered to leave their country within six weeks, and a thousand of them settled in Prussia [1548]. The Jesuits began to work against them in 1552. The three divisions of Protestants, viz. Lutheran, Swiss, and Bohemian Brethren, now united and presented the Confession of their Faith to Maximilian II. in 1575, and again to Rudolph II. in 1608. In 1609 perfect religious equality was granted to them, but it was soon withdrawn. The Jesuits were successful in once more getting rid of Protestantism in 1627, when Ferdinand II., a former pupil in their school, rigorously banished all who held fast to the Reformed Faith. Many fled to Moravia and formed the nucleus of the Moravian Church, which continues to this day. Protestantism subsequently revived in Bohemia, and in 1781 Joseph II. issued in its behalf the Edict of Toleration. There are now about 100 Protestant congregations in the country, the majority of them belonging to the Swiss or Calvinistic division of Reformers.

Hungary and Transylvania.—As early as 1521 we find traces of Protestantism in these countries, for in that year George Szákmáry, Archbishop of Grán, ordered a condemnation of Luther's books to be read from the pulpits of the principal churches. Severe edicts against Lutheranism were issued in 1523 and 1525. But, in spite of these, the Reformation triumphed in several towns and districts; students who had been sent to Wittenberg returned and taught the Lutheran doctrines. In 1527 King Ferdinand I. complained that even Anabaptists and Zwinglians were gaining ground. Monks and nuns were driven from their cloisters. In 1533 John Huter, on his return from Switzerland, established a printing office at Cronstadt for publishing Protestant teaching. About the same time a Magyar translation of the New Testament by Matthew Devay, a former pupil at Wittenberg, appeared. He was called the Luther of Hungary. Eventually he joined the Swiss school of Reformers [about 1544], and was followed by the great majority of Hungarian Protestants. They drew up their Confession of Cseenger in 1557, and it still remains their standard of orthodoxy. In Transylvania the majority of the Reformers were Lutheran; religious liberty was granted to them in 1557. It is said that only three families of the magnates then adhered to the Pope, the nobility were nearly all reformed, and the people thirty to one in favour of the new doctrine; but owing to divisions, and the heresy of the Anti-Trinitarians, the Jesuits regained a great part of the country [1579–1588]. In the latter year, however, the Jesuits were forcibly expelled. After a further reaction under Rudolph II., full religious liberty was secured by the treaties of Nikolsburg [1622] and Linz [1646].

Spain.—Luther's writings were circulated in Spain as early as 1520, and converts were made in great numbers, especially in Seville and Valladolid. But the cruelties of the Inquisition successfully extirpated Protestantism from the country, and in 1570 hardly a trace of it remained. The accession of Philip II. in 1559, "the Nero of Spain," had made its destruction only a matter of time. Among the more prominent of Spanish Reformers were two brothers, Juan and Alfonso de Valdés, Rodrigo de Valero, Egidius, Domingo de Rojas, and Dryander, who published a Castilian translation of the New Testament in 1543, and in 1548 took refuge in England, and was made Professor of Greek at Cambridge.

Italy.—Lutheranism between the years 1530 and 1542 made good progress in different parts of the country, e.g. in the Duchy of Ferrara, where Calvin and other Reformers took refuge about 1535; in Naples, where Juan de Valdés was Spanish Secretary; throughout the Republic of Venice, in Modena, Milan, Lucca, and other places, and even at Bologna in the Papal States. But in 1542, Cardinal Caraffa, afterwards Pope Paul IV., brought the cruelties of the Inquisition to bear upon the Protestants, and quickly exterminated them. Two of the principal Reformers, Bernardino Ochino and Peter Martyr, an able scholar, and formerly Canon of the Augustinians, took refuge in England in 1547. Ochino was made a Prebend of Canterbury, and Peter Martyr, Professor of Divinity at Oxford. At the accession of Queen Mary, in 1553, both fled from England and took refuge at Zürich. Ochino was subsequently accused of advocating Anti-Trinitarianism and polygamy.

Switzerland.—The Reformation in Switzerland was commenced under the leadership of Huldreich Zwingli, born in 1484, seven weeks after the birth of Luther; he, too, like Luther, was educated for the priesthood, being ordained in 1506. In 1513 he began to devote himself to the study of the Bible, and especially to the New Testament, in order, as he says, that he might draw the doctrine of Christ direct from the fountain; he did not place much value on the writings of the Fathers, but looked forward to a time when "Divine Scripture alone would be precious among Christians." Unlike Luther, he had no reverence for ancient uses and traditions of the Church, and abolished as far as he could every such use not specially mentioned in the New Testament. He came into contact with, and was greatly influenced by Erasmus in 1514 and following years. His first efforts at reform began in 1517; when at Einsiedeln he exerted himself to abolish image-worship and other corruptions. In 1519 he was appointed to a preachship at Zürich, and here he soon took a commanding position, his talents and force of character being very conspicuous. It was his custom to explain the Scriptures to his people, instead of reproducing the mediæval interpretations of them; he is said also to have done a good work in purifying the morals as well as the worship of the citizens. In 1519 we find him successfully resisting the disgraceful sale of Indulgences. The Papal authorities evidently wished to retain Zwingli on their side. For this purpose the Pope, Leo X., granted him a pension of fifty gulden, and made him one of his Chaplains in 1518. Pope Adrian also wrote him a cajoling letter. But in 1522 the Bishop of Constance formally accused the Zwinglians of disobedience, in breaking the fasts of Lent; public opinion, however, was now entirely on the side of Zwingli, and the Bishop's action was futile. Zwingli about this time married, against the law of the Church; he kept his marriage secret, however, till 1524. In 1523 a sweeping change was effected in Zürich, the authority of the Bishop was destroyed, the ancient liturgy was swept away, the Mass was reduced to a memorial, and the monasteries were converted into schools. The Bishop of Constance and several cantons, including Lucern, Freyburg, and Zug, protested in vain at these changes:—Zwingli's ascendancy was now complete. Meanwhile, the Reformation had been making headway in Basle. Its chief author was Æcolampadius, a friend of Melanchthon and Erasmus; he was made a preacher in the cathedral of Basle in 1516, where he set forth the Reformed opinions; in 1522 he allied himself to Zwingli. The Bishop and his party opposed the movement, but the Senate asserted the supremacy of the Bible and permitted disputations to be held, in which many Papal doctrines were openly attacked [1524]. The canton of Berne was disposed to follow in the footsteps of Zürich and Basle. In 1526 a general assembly of twelve Swiss cantons was held at Baden, and the Zwinglian doctrines condemned by a majority of nine out of the twelve cantons. Yet the Reformation, in spite of this severe check, still continued to make way. The hatred, however, between the opposing parties culminated on the battlefield of Cappel, where Zwingli was slain [1531] and his followers routed. Zwingli's teaching in regard to Original Sin, the Sacraments, and Predestination was at variance with all other branches of the Church. With regard to Christian Baptism, he represented it as standing on the same level with John's baptism—merely a sign; yet at the Conference of Marburg, in 1529, he signed the statement of the Lutherans that baptism is not "a naked sign, but a work of God, by which we are regenerated." Hence Luther considered him guilty of dishonesty and insincerity.

The death of Zwingli was closely followed by that of Æcolampadius; but the work of reformation was carried on by two able successors, Henry Bullinger and Oswald Myconius: the latter, a bosom friend of Zwingli, had been forcibly expelled from Lucern in 1522. Another prominent Reformer was William Farel, a refugee from France, who was very successful at Berne, Neuchâtel, Basle, and especially in Geneva, where he brought about the overthrow of the Papal power in 1535. But a far greater leader now appeared on the scene in the person of John Calvin; in him began the second generation of Reformers. Born in 1509, at Noyon, in Picardy, he was originally destined for holy orders, but eventually devoted himself to jurisprudence at Orleans and Bourges Universities. He first began the work of reformation in Paris, but some of the more violent and indiscreet Reformers there having posted up anti-Papal placards, he fled to Basle in October, 1534. It is remarkable that although Calvin was unusually severe in his general character, yet he was deficient in Christian heroism, and describes himself as being "naturally timid, and of a soft and faint-hearted disposition."

At Basle Calvin drew up, in 1536, his Institutes of the Christian Religion, which quickly became the text-book for Calvinists generally. In it are contained all his distinctive doctrines. Calvin succeeded in getting his principles adopted in Lausanne this same year. But in Geneva the people rebelled against the severity of his discipline, and both he and Farel were banished in 1538. He was invited to return, however, and he did so in 1541, thenceforth exercising despotic power. He established a consistory, consisting of twelve lay elders and six ministers, Calvin himself presiding, and exercising a controlling influence. To this body was entrusted the jurisdiction over the religion and morals of the whole community, together with the power of excommunication. The decisions of this tribunal were marked by great sternness and severity; in 1553, by its orders Servetus was burnt for heresy. In 1549 Calvin brought about the religious union of the cantons of Switzerland by the Consensus Tigurinus, and so consolidated the Swiss Reformation. By this Consensus the Sacraments are treated as much more than mere outward signs, as Zwingli treated them. Calvin spoke of them as "organs" which God uses for conferring grace; but he restricted the benefits of the Sacraments to "the elect." Calvin died in 1564, and was succeeded by Beza, who continued for a time to uphold the standard of Geneva. But in 1569 a powerful reaction began under Carlo Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, a man of great piety, and devoted to the Church of Rome. The Jesuits were busy in different parts of the country, and in 1586 the Romish cantons formed themselves into "The Golden League," to resist the Calvinists, and at the beginning of the next century the Calvinists lost still more ground, owing to the inroads of the Duke of Savoy, and the titular Bishop of Geneva, François de Sales. Peace was not finally concluded till after the battle of Vilmergen, 1712.

France.—The earliest Reformer in France was Jacques Lefèvre, who in 1512 was engaged with Briçonnet, Bishop of Meaux, in the reformation of that diocese, both men being persuaded that the Papal religion of that day was not a true form of Christianity. In 1523 the Theological Faculty of Paris, called the Sorbonne, having previously condemned Luther's writings, began the work of persecuting the French Reformers. The monarch, Francis I., professed to be neutral, but he took no measures to pacify the perpetrators of the savage massacres of the Protestants. In 1534 Calvin and others fled from the country; in 1545 the towns of Merindol and Cabrières, with twenty-eight villages, were literally destroyed, as many as 4,000 people being slain. In spite of all this, the Reformers had increased in importance in 1547, when Francis I. was succeeded by his son Henry II., who married Catherine de' Medici, niece of Pope Clement VII. During this reign the persecution went on with even greater severity; but, nothing daunted, the Reformers in Paris organised themselves, in 1555, as a distinct congregation, adopting the Calvinistic discipline of Geneva, and in 1559 they issued their first Confession of Faith.

France at this time was divided into two rival parties, one headed by the Dukes of Guise, the other by the Bourbon family. The Bourbons now allied themselves with the Protestants, or Huguenots, as they were called in France, and the Guises became the champions of the Roman Catholics. The two parties were inspired with mutual hatred of each other. In 1560 a Huguenot conspiracy to rid the kingdom of the Guises was discovered; the chief mover was Geoffrey de la Barre, a friend of Calvin. On the other hand, the Cardinal of Lorraine tried to force every Frenchman, at the peril of his life, to sign a creed, drawn up by the Sorbonne, and which he called the "Huguenots' rat-trap." A conference between the two parties took place at Poissy in 1561, Theodore Beza and Peter Martyr representing the Huguenots; but no good result followed. By this time the Huguenots had greatly increased in the country, and were being continually aided by disciples of Calvin sent from Geneva; in January, 1562, they were granted religious liberty, but shortly afterwards the massacre of several of their number at Vassy rekindled the strife, and civil war broke out. The Huguenot leaders were the Prince of Condé and Admiral de Coligny. At the battle of Dreux [Dec., 1562] the Huguenots were routed; immediately afterwards the Duke of Guise was assassinated by a fanatical Huguenot. Peace was concluded at Orleans, and the Pacification of Amboise [March, 1563] secured a certain amount of religious liberty to the Huguenots. A second religious war raged from 1567-70. At the battle of Jarnac [1569] the Prince of Condé was taken prisoner, and subsequently assassinated. The Peace of St. Germain-en-Laye was concluded in 1570, by which the Huguenots were to be free to worship in their own way; but in 1572, by an act of gross treachery, under the guidance of Catherine de' Medici, a massacre of the Huguenots was planned, and carried out under circumstances of great atrocity on St. Bartholomew's Day [1572]. Over twenty thousand Protestants were murdered in different parts of France, among them Admiral Coligny. The Calvinists rose again, and the Guise family entered into an alliance with Philip II. of Spain in order to extirpate Protestantism. But in 1589 the Protestant Prince, Henry of Navarre, came to the throne as Henry IV. Four years later, in order to stop further bloodshed, Henry IV. renounced Protestantism; perfect religious liberty, however, was granted to the Huguenots by the "Edict of Nantes" [1598], solemnly declared to be perpetual and irrevocable. But the despotism of Richelieu and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV. in 1685 overthrew the Reformation in France.

Netherlands.—The country had been prepared for the Reformation [1] by the cruelties of the Spanish Inquisition, which had aroused hatred to the Papal power; [2] by the writings of Erasmus, a native of Rotterdam, exposing the vices of the age in 1500; [3] by the writings of Luther. The Emperor Charles V., born at Ghent in 1500, was lord of these provinces, and mercilessly persecuted all who held the "new opinions;" in 1521

he issued an edict against the writings of Luther, "whether in Latin, Flemish, or any other modern language." The first two martyrs suffered at Brussels in 1523, whereupon Luther wrote his Epistle to the Christians in Holland and Brabant. In 1525 converts abounded, and executions became fearfully numerous, the victims during Charles's reign being reckoned by thousands, among them being the Englishman, William Tyndall, who, in 1536, was put to death at Vilvorde, near Brussels; he had translated the New Testament into English in 1525, and had also exerted great influence in Belgium. These measures not succeeding, Charles V. introduced the terrors of the Inquisition to subdue Protestantism [in 1550]. Philip II., who succeeded his father in 1560, carried on the work of persecution. Many troubles came upon the Reformers, owing to their being confounded with the fanatical and lawless Anabaptists, who abounded in the country; so in 1562 they drew up The Belgic Confession, containing the doctrines of their Faith. This Confession is based on The Confession of the French Reformers, and so is distinctly Calvinistic. In 1566 the Belgic Confession was ratified at a Synod of Reformers, held at Antwerp. Meanwhile the continued persecution was exasperating all classes against the Government. At length, when the Duke of Alva, at the head of a Spanish army, renewed the massacres, the Protestants took the field under the Prince of Orange, Philip van Marnix, and many other nobles, in 1568. A desperate struggle ensued, ending in the independence of Holland in 1579, the seven northern provinces separating from the remaining ten. In 1581 the Roman religion was forbidden in the new kingdom, and Protestantism had triumphed in every quarter, aided materially by the Protestant University of Leyden. The neighbouring provinces, under the Spanish Duke of Parma, entered into an agreement at Arras, in 1579, to help in counteracting the Reformation; and this, coupled with the aid of the Jesuits, finally caused the Papacy to be re-established in a great part of the country.

England.—It has been thoughtfully said that the downfall of the Papal power in England began from the shameful day when the miserable King John laid his crown at the feet of Cardinal Pandulph, and shocked the sense of the English nation by that shameful enormity. From that time a reaction against Papal tyranny began, and the history of the Plantagenet Kings is continually marked by struggles between Papal tyranny and national independence. The growth of intelligence and piety in the English Universities, as witnessed in the lives of such men as Dean Colet, Sir Thomas More, Linacre, and others, was another factor in the great movement. Erasmus had visited Oxford in 1497, and was Professor of Greek at Cambridge in 1505-1508. The immediate occasion of the breach was the quarrel between Henry VIII. and Pope Clement VII. concerning the King's divorce, which resulted, in 1534, in the overthrow of the Pope's authority in England. Henry had already assumed the title of "Supreme Head of the Church in England," and the Convocations of Canterbury and York had acknowledged the title, with this limitation, "so far as may be consistent with the law of Christ" [1531]. Henceforth appeals to Rome were forbidden, and a Court of Delegates appointed by the King was the ultimate Court of Appeal in all ecclesiastical cases. Thus far the English bishops and clergy had accepted the changes; but beyond this neither they nor the King seemed to contemplate any reformation of doctrine or manners. Henry VIII. remained attached to the mediæval system until his death. Although he suppressed monasteries, it was not done to benefit the Church, but to meet his own requirements. So far from being a Reformer, he was the great obstacle to the progress of Reformation. Cranmer, who had been made Archbishop of Canterbury in 1532 for espousing the King's cause in the matter of his divorce, was still a believer in the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation. In 1536 the Convocation of Canterbury issued ten Articles of Religion, retaining all the old doctrines, but cutting away flagrant abuses connected with them. The sermon at the opening of this Convocation was preached by Latimer, Bishop of Worcester, who afterwards was one of the most prominent of the Reformers. In 1537 an English translation of the Bible was presented by Cranmer to Henry VIII.; and The Bishops' Book, or The Institution of a Christian Man, was issued. But from this time the Anti-Reforming party, headed by Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, and Tunstall, Bishop of Durham, gained the upper hand, the King siding with them. Thus, in 1539, "The Six Articles" were enacted for abolishing diversity of opinion. They enforced belief in [1] Transubstantiation. [2] Communion in one kind. [3] Celibacy of the clergy. [4] Absolute obligation of vows of chastity, etc. [5] Private masses. [6] Compulsory confession. In 1543 an Act of Parliament was passed denouncing Tyndall's "false translation" of the Bible, and forbidding the use of the New Testament in English to "women and artificers, prentices, journeymen, serving-men, husbandmen, and labourers." Cranmer, however, still managed to retain his influence with the King, and in 1541 and 1542 a revised and purified form of the Sarum Breviary was issued for use in the Canterbury diocese. In 1544 a Litany in English was published by Convocation, and preparations were being made for a new service book in English up to the time of the King's death in 1547.

In the reign of Edward VI. [1547-1553] the Reformation made rapid strides. The Protector, Somerset, supported the movement, though probably on selfish grounds. Royal injunctions were at once issued directing the clergy to provide one book of the whole Bible, of the largest volume, in English, within three months, and within twelve months, the Paraphrase of Erasmus, also in English, upon the Gospels; both of these being set up in churches for the use of parishioners. Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, refused to obey, and was committed to the Fleet [Sept. 25th, 1547]; he was deposed from his bishopric for nonconformity in 1551. The first act in Edward's reign legalised communion in both kinds. The first book of Homilies also appeared this year, for the instruction of ignorant preachers and their flocks. Meanwhile a Committee of Divines, under Archbishop Cranmer, was engaged in compiling Service Books in English. In 1548, they produced an English Order of the Communion, and shortly afterwards The Book of Common Prayer, which came into general use on Whitsunday, 1549. Bonner, Bishop of London, refused to adopt its use, and was deprived, Sept. 21, 1549. This book was compiled from the old Offices; it retained all the traditions and sentiments of the past that were not considered wrong in themselves. The compilers sought to restore the worship of the Church to the model of the early Church, before the rise of mediæval errors. On this account the book was obnoxious to many ultra-Reformers, especially to John Knox, who had received a preachingship at Berwick-on-Tweed, and who was even offered the Bishopric of Rochester, in order to urge Cranmer on to a more violent Reformation.

The state of parties in England was now greatly affected by the arrival of a multitude of foreign Protestants in 1549. Bucer, a Lutheran, became Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr, a follower of Zwingli, at Oxford. John Hooper, also, who had retreated to Zürich in 1539, returned to England this year, an ardent and persistent advocate of Zwingli's views concerning the Sacraments; he refused to wear the vestments prescribed in the Prayer Book, and was committed to the Fleet, 1551. He soon complied, however, and was consecrated Bishop of Gloucester in the same year. All these sought to introduce much greater changes. Meanwhile Cranmer's views concerning the Eucharist had undergone a change; he had renounced Transubstantiation, and followed Calvin in believing a real, virtual, but not a corporal presence. Ridley, Bishop of London, held the same views; the result was that a second Prayer Book was introduced in November, 1552, with a few alterations in the Communion Service to suit the modified views, but the book still remained in accordance with the doctrines of the early Church. In 1553 a regular Confession of Faith of forty-two Articles was published, based upon the Confession of Augsburg of 1530, differing in one important point, viz. in the doctrine of the Eucharist, which followed Calvin's tenets.

The death of Edward VI., in July, 1553, and the accession of Queen Mary, threatened utter destruction to the Reformation. Mary had inherited from her mother, Catharine of Arragon, a thorough hatred of the Reformers' teachings. Immediately, therefore, the old Latin service-books were reintroduced; the Book of Common Prayer forbidden; the Romish doctrine of Transubstantiation reaffirmed by Convocation, five members only opposing it. This may be accounted for partly by the fact that the rapid changes during the latter part of the last reign under the influence of the foreign Reformers, and the extreme views of Hooper, had caused a reaction, and partly by the fact that the leading Reformers were silenced and imprisoned, including Bishops Coverdale, Hooper, Latimer, Cranmer, Ridley, Holgate of York, and Farrer of St. David's. Many more, reckoned at 800, fled from the country. Bishops Bonner, Tunstall, and Gardiner, who had been deprived in the last reign, were now restored to their Sees, and in 1554 England was once more brought under the supremacy of Rome, through the agency of Cardinal Pole. Meanwhile, some of the Reformers who had settled at Frankfurt [1554] sought to reject the second Prayer Book on the ground of its being still superstitious. Calvin and Knox joined in condemning the book, but through the influence of Dean Cox in March, 1555, the English residents were ordered by the Senate of Frankfurt to conform to the Prayer Book, whereupon the malcontents, under John Knox, retired to Geneva, and cut themselves off from the English Reformers. Far worse troubles were occurring in England. Mary, provoked by the violent language of some of the extreme Reformers, and by the insurrection under Wyatt, and influenced by her marriage with the bigoted Philip of Spain, began a most bitter persecution in 1555. As many as 288 persons are said to have been burnt for their religion, including Cranmer, and four other bishops, Hooper, Farrer, Ridley, and Latimer. Cranmer, after being induced by disgraceful artifices to make a recantation, was executed at Oxford [March 21st, 1556], holding fast to the Reformed Faith. Cardinal Pole was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury on the following morning; but both he and the Queen died in November, 1558. The mistaken policy of persecution had destroyed any chance the Papal Supremacy might have had in England. The death of Mary was felt as a relief, and the accession of Elizabeth hailed with joy.

Elizabeth's first efforts were directed to quieting religious controversy and strife. A Royal order, dated Dec. 27th, 1558, silenced all pulpits. In 1559, the acts of the late reign in reference to religion were all repealed, and the Royal Supremacy once more established, the Queen, however, refusing the title of "Supreme Head," preferring to be called "Supreme Governor." The Prayer Book, revised by Edmund Guest, Bishop of Rochester, was reissued on June 24th. A few of the changes in the second book of Edward VI. were omitted or modified, and the whole book was brought more into conformity with the first book of Edward VI. With one exception—Kitchen, Bishop of Llandaff—all the Marian bishops refused to take the Oath of Supremacy to Queen Elizabeth, and were deprived of their Sees. Matthew Parker was duly consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth by Bishops Barlow, Scory, Coverdale, and Hodgkin; the remaining bishoprics were filled by Reforming prelates. When Convocation assembled in 1562 the Forty-two Articles of Edward VI. were remodelled and reissued as the Thirty-nine Articles in their present form. New troubles now began to vex the Reformed Church. The refugees, some of whom we saw quarrelling among themselves at Frankfort, 1554, now flocked back to England, many of them imbued with Genevan principles. On their arrival they immediately raised opposition to the Prayer Book, and the established customs of the Church, advocating a more radical reformation. The malcontents were nicknamed PURITANS [q.v.], and some of the more advanced of them separated themselves entirely from the communion of the Church [1567]; but owing to the firmness of Archbishop Parker, the doctrines and discipline of the Church, as it had been established, were preserved intact.

A second separation began in 1570, when the Romanists, on the arrival of Pope Pius V.'s Bull of Excommunication, cut themselves off from the Church of England. Shortly afterwards Romish plots and intrigues came to light, resulting in repressive measures being taken against Catholics. Executions became frequent, especially after Babington's plot to assassinate the Queen; and all their hopes were shattered by the destruction of the Spanish Armada in 1588. As the Romanists declined, the Puritans increased in numbers and influence; but all their endeavours to model the Church after the fashion of the Reformed Churches on the Continent were frustrated by the firm rule of Archbishops Whitgift and Bancroft [1604]. Thus the Reformed Church of England has come down to us, not a new Church, but merely purged from distinctively Romish doctrine, and freed from Papal oppression. Cranmer, in all the changes that he made, continually appealed to the Word of God and the custom of the primitive Church as his authority. Unbroken ties of holy orders, the preservation of the ancient doctrines, organisation, and traditions of the Church, a Prayer Book compiled almost entirely of pre-Reformation materials, prove the present Reformed Church of England to be one and the same with the Church of Christ that had existed in this land from the earliest times.

Scotland.—Owing to the frequent alliances between Scotland and France, the work of Reformation did not begin under favourable auspices in Scotland, the French influence being employed to uphold the "old religion." Accordingly, when Patrick Hamilton, a student at the Protestant University at Marburg, in Hessen, returned to Scotland and preached against the corruptions of the Church, he was burnt at the stake [1528]. Yet after Hamilton's death the new opinions rapidly spread, so rapidly that in 1535 the Scotch Parliament passed a severe Act against all who held "the damnable opinions of the great heretic Luther." Many Reformers took refuge in England, as that country had, in 1534, thrown off its allegiance to the Pope. The Papal Church in Scotland now saw the need of reformation, and in 1541 passed an Act requiring clerics of every rank "to reform themselves in habit and manners to God and man;" and in 1543 the Parliament allowed all persons to have "a good and true translation," in English or Scotch, of the Holy Bible. In 1545 Cardinal Beaton, the "Wolsey of Scotland," an able and powerful man, but guilty of the grossest irregularities, began a bitter persecution. Among his victims was George Wishart, who was put to death March 1st, 1546. This act of violence caused the celebrated John Knox, Scotland's Reformer, to rebel against Rome, and to avow his sympathy with the Protestants. Cardinal Beaton was himself murdered on May 29th following, and Knox showed his approval by taking refuge with the murderers in the town of St. Andrew's [April, 1547]. The town capitulated to the French [July], and Knox was taken, with other prisoners, to Rouen, and detained there till February, 1549. Knox had been ordained to the priesthood in 1530; after studying the writings of St. Augustine, his fiery and fearless temper roused him into the greatest hostility to the Church of Rome; justly indignant at her many abuses, he speaks of that Church as "the synagogue of Satan," and of the Pope as "the man of sin." Upon his release from Rouen, the English Privy Council gave him a preachship at Berwick-on-Tweed, and in 1551 a royal chaplaincy. But on the accession of Queen Mary, in 1553, Knox left England and settled at Geneva, where for about five years he lived in constant intercourse with Calvin. Meanwhile in Scotland the Reformers, under the Earl of Argyle, renounced "the congregation of Satan, with all the superstitious abomination and idolatry thereof," and formed themselves into what they called "the congregation of Jesus Christ" [1558], adopting for their Liturgy the English Prayer Book of 1552. [In 1564 the English Liturgy was replaced by the Prayer Book used by the English at Geneva, and which had received the approval of Calvin.] Knox returned to Scotland on May 2nd, 1559, a thorough Calvinist. The violence of his preaching at once roused the passions of the people to such a height that abbeys and churches were sacked, monuments destroyed, and many kindred acts of violence perpetrated. Knox lost no time in completing the work of reformation. A Protestant League was formed on May 31st, and began its work by decreeing the suspension of the Queen Regent, Mary of Guise. The Queen now placed herself at the head of her army, and troops were sent from France to aid her in subduing her disaffected subjects. Knox and his party made a treaty with England, Feb. 27th, 1560. A religious war was only prevented by the death of Mary of Guise on June 10th. On Aug. 17th "The Confession of Faith" of the Protestants was adopted by the Scotch Parliament, and immediately afterwards Bills were passed abolishing the Mass and the jurisdiction of the Pope. The Reformers, considering themselves as exclusively the "Congregation of Christ Jesus," felt it their duty to utterly eradicate all traces of the old religion, just as the Canaanites were driven out by the Hebrews. So not only old customs and traditions in worship and ritual, but Episcopacy also was abolished in 1562, and "Superintendents" appointed in their place. Two bishops, viz. Alexander Gordon of Galloway and Adam Bothwell of Orkney, conformed to the new religion. In the midst of these changes [1561], Mary Queen of Scots returned from France; but the Reformed Faith was so firmly planted that she was powerless to prevent its growth. Knox and his followers assailed her with great harshness and severity, boldly calling upon her to renounce her idolatrous religion, and protesting against the Mass in her private chapel. Eventually she was forced to abdicate [1567], partly on the ground that she was plotting to restore the old religion. It is said that the murders of Rizzio (the Queen's secretary, and also a pensioner of the Pope) and of John Black, a learned champion of mediævalism, on the same night in Holyrood Palace were committed in order to frustrate the intended persecution. In January, 1572, the titles of "Archbishop" and "Bishop" were restored to the "Superintendents," but they were still only bishops in name. In November of the same year Knox died. A further change took place in 1592, when, under the influence of Andrew Melville, Presbyterianism was established in the place of the nominal Episcopacy. In 1610, Episcopacy in its English form was established by the King, but only to be again rejected by the people in 1639. The last hopes of a reaction in Scotland had been extinguished with the execution of Mary Queen of Scots in 1587. Except as regards Church government, the Scotch Reformation was entirely Calvinistic.

Ireland.—The Irish Parliament in 1537

rejected the Papal Supremacy at the instigation of Henry VIII., and accepted the Royal Supremacy in its place. A great part of the clergy, however, headed by Archbishop Cromer, of Armagh, remained faithful to the Pope. But as the Sees fell vacant English prelates were appointed in their place, favourable to the reform of the Church; very little, however, was done during Henry's reign beyond suppressing monasteries. Edward VI.'s first act enjoined communion under both kinds, in Ireland as well as in England. The first Prayer Book of Edward VI. was used for the first time on Easter Day, 1551, in Christchurch Cathedral, Dublin, George Browne being Archbishop; arrangements were made for the Prayer Book to be translated into Irish, and also into Latin, but the plan fell through. Archbishop Dowdall, who succeeded Cromer in 1543, was deprived for refusing to use the English Prayer Book [Oct., 1551], and henceforth the Archbishops of Dublin held the Primacy. In Mary's reign the Papal Supremacy was restored, and with it the mediæval ritual and doctrines. In 1554 Archbishop Dowdall, restored to his See, acting under a commission, deprived the Archbishop of Dublin and three other prelates favourable to the Reformation. In Elizabeth's reign, with two exceptions, the Irish bishops retained their Sees; but after 1570, the date of the Pope's Bull of Excommunication, rival bishops were nominated both by the Queen and the Pope. The Irish translation of the New Testament was not issued till 1602. In 1585 Bishop Walsh, of Ossory, was murdered in his house while engaged on the work. The degraded and ignorant state of the people, and of many of their ministers, was the great barrier which stood in the way of a general Reformation.

Reformed Dutch Church. [DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.]

Reformed Episcopal Church.—In 1873 a meeting took place in America of members of various Protestant denominations, including one English Dean, to receive the Communion, which was administered by Dr. Cummins, Assistant-Bishop in the diocese of Kentucky. His brother Bishops immediately protested against what they considered a public recognition of schism and a blameworthy laxity of opinions; whereupon he sent in his resignation, and assembled a meeting at New York, in the house of the Young Men's Christian Association. The result was the organisation of the Reformed Episcopal Church, Dec. 2nd, 1873. Bishop Cummins having severed his connection with the Episcopal Church of America, and consecrated fresh bishops of the new body, and become its first president, a statement was drawn up defining the position and doctrines of the sect. At the present time it has over a hundred clergymen, and has several parishes in the United States and Canada, and in England. In England, however, it is losing ground, owing to a division which has taken place.

Reform of the Church.—One mark of the increased interest of the nation in religious matters is the demand which has been made during recent years for Church reform. In 1885 a Committee of the Upper House of Convocation was appointed to consider this subject, and from their report we make the following extracts :—

The Committee are of opinion that the reforms which require immediate attention are five in number, viz. :—

(1) The removal of the varied evils and abuses connected with the sale of patronage, and, for further security against the appointment of unfit presentees, the increasing of the power of bishops to refuse institution in certain cases under specified limits and conditions.

(2) Simpler and more effectual methods of removing from the cure of souls incompetent, persistently negligent, and criminous clerks. It is also most desirable that the laws affecting sequestration of benefices should be further amended, so as to prevent the diversion of the income of the benefice from its original purpose to the payment of the debts of the incumbent.

(3) The correction, so far as may be found expedient and practicable, of existing anomalies in the endowments of the Church—a reform which we believe would largely help to meet the changed character of many localities, and the shifting of population to which some of the memorialists refer.

(4) The enlargement of Convocation by an increase in the number of the Proctors for the clergy, and the statutory concession to Convocation of increased freedom in the internal regulation of matters involving the efficiency of the Church, subject always to the supremacy of the Crown and the authority of Parliament.

(5) The assignment to the faithful laity of the Church of a more clearly defined share in the administration of its affairs.

In their comment on each of these heads, they anticipate in [1] the Archbishop's Bill on Patronage [PATRONAGE], and on [2] express the opinion that further steps are required beyond the Pluralities Acts recently passed [PLURALITIES], in order to the more easy removal of unworthy clergymen. As regards [3] they say :—"We note with satisfaction that no proposals have been brought before us for any equalisation of the official incomes of the clergy, but we are distinctly of opinion that steps should at once be taken to reduce existing anomalies, and to improve the incomes of benefices of small value, especially where the population is large. This, we believe, will be best effected by the formation of a large central fund raised by equitable taxation of ecclesiastical incomes. The principles for the formation of this fund already exist in the system of first fruits and tenths—a system which, it will be remembered, this House and the Lower House have proposed largely to modify, with the view of facilitating the retirement of aged and infirm incumbents, and effecting other salutary changes in the disposition of the funds of the Church." They make other suggestions as to LAY SERVICES and PAROCHIAL BOARDS, which will be found under those heads.

Refugees.—A name first applied to the French Protestants who, during the Flemish persecutions in 1569, and again after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, were forced to leave their country and take refuge in England and elsewhere. Since then it has been extended to all who leave their country in times of distress.

Regalia.—In early times the king of the country claimed the revenues of all Sees so long as they remained vacant, and this claim was called regalia. We often read in history of the kings, when in want of money, purposely deferring the appointment of a bishop, so that the revenues might be theirs, and in order to prevent this scandal in England, a promise was extracted from Henry II. by the Pope, that the custom should thenceforth be discontinued. In France the kings had the regalia for a much longer period, for we read of Louis XIV. making laws for the more strict carrying out of the custom. He was ordered by the Pope, Innocent XI., to desist, but at that time Louis was strong enough to refuse to obey. A compromise was made later by Innocent XII., and the question permanently settled.

Regeneration ["a new birth" or "being born again"].—The work of the Holy Spirit, by which man's heart is changed. The nature of regeneration is declared in the New Testament to be a new birth from above [Gr. anōthen], a quickening of the Spirit, a partaking of the Divine nature, the formation of Christ in the heart. It is a passive work, and differs thus from conversion, which is the turning of man to God by his own will; it comes from God alone, and is utterly out of the power of man to perform, since before regeneration he is in a state of spiritual inability. Regeneration is a work of God's grace, and completely changes the whole state of man. It is an instantaneous act, and thus differs from sanctification, which is the progression of man towards perfection: it consists in an internal act, which is nevertheless visible in its effects, and the blessings of which can never be entirely lost. This view of regeneration, set forth by the Apostles, was almost lost sight of in the Middle Ages, and was regarded rather as the first stage of justification. Luther and Calvin approached more nearly to the orthodox idea: but their followers did not lay enough stress on the progress of the soul after regeneration, and considered that justification by faith was the only thing necessary. Arndt and Spener did much to establish the right faith concerning regeneration.

The word "regeneration" only occurs twice in the Scriptures [Matt. xix. 28; Titus iii. 5]. In the former it has no relation to Christian doctrine. A controversy which agitated the Church of England some forty years ago has almost died out, and this chiefly because it is felt that the dispute was more upon terminology than upon essentials. It was the question, whether Baptism is the means of regeneration. Probably now-a-days not merely Churchmen, but Christians of all denominations are nearer in reality than they might express in words. That the Church of England teaches the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration in her formularies is indisputable. The words are clear. As soon as the baptism has taken place, the minister says, "Seeing now, dearly beloved, that this child is regenerate and grafted into the body of Christ's Church." But the trouble arose from an interpretation being placed upon the word "regenerate" which it was not able or intended to bear. They who bring an infant to baptism do so in the belief that a blessing is to be looked for therein; that admission into visible covenant is of itself a gift from God. And all gifts of God must of necessity imply life. There is a covenanted means herein of moral and spiritual advancement, but a condition at the same time expressed of Christian duty. Thus Archbishop Sumner, the leader, in his day, of the Evangelical party, writes: "St. Paul intimates with clearness that the Christians he addresses were thus regenerate: as having 'put off the old man with his deeds;' and having become 'the temple of the Holy Ghost,' and 'the members of Christ;' as having 'the spiritual circumcision, and being buried with Christ in baptism;' as having 'received the spirit of adoption,' and as 'being washed, sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.' To the Galatians, 'bewitched,' as he says they were, 'that they should not obey the truth,' he still writes: 'Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptised into Christ, have put on Christ'" [Apostolical Preaching, page 91]. Such a view is no "magical conception of the Divine activity." It involves to the full the need of personal faith, issuing in holy living. The outward act is the act of obedience to a Divine command. The grace is the gift of God alone. And the words of the Baptismal Service which follow show that the Church of England holds no doctrine of opus operatum to the exclusion of the inward faith, which is necessary to acceptance before God. A necessity of an entire change of heart and life is absolutely declared. Even in the prayer which follows the act of baptism, the doctrine of renovation, as distinguished from regeneration, is clearly announced. There the prayer is that the person now regenerate "may crucify the old man, and utterly abolish the whole body of sin," proving that the Church does not regard this as comprised in the fact of regeneration. Furthermore he is to "continually mortify all his evil and corrupt affections, and daily proceed in all virtue and godliness of living."

Registers are required, by an Act of Henry VIII.'s Minister, Cromwell [A.D. 1536], to be kept, in every parish church, of the baptisms, marriages, and burials which have taken place. Books were ordered to be kept for the purpose at the expense of the parish, and entries made therein to be sent once a year to the bishop of the diocese. The method of keeping varied greatly at first, according to the idiosyncrasies of the clergy. Some of them neglected the duty altogether; some entered only the names of the persons baptised and buried, while others entered in the one case the names of the parents and in the other the occupation. Successive Acts of Parliament have altered this. Registers of baptisms are now required to give the name of the person baptised, the names, occupation, and residence of the parents and the officiating minister, as well as the time and place. In marriage registers the names and residences of the persons must be given, the time and place, names of witnesses and of the clergyman; and registers of burials give the name, age, and residence of the deceased.

All marriage registers are to be kept in duplicate marriage registry books. Certified copies of all registers of births and deaths are sent quarterly to the Registrar-General. At the general office in London indexes are kept of all the certified copies of the register, and every person is entitled, on payment of a fee, to search them, and have a certified copy. There are only eight register books known to exist prior to 1538. Beginning with that year, there are 812 registers in England. In 1599 an order came out that all existing registers were to be transcribed into parchment books. In a very few cases the originals and the copies are both found in the parish chest.

Registration.—The following are the rules for the registration of chapels:—[1] It must have been used as a place of public worship by the congregation requiring it to be registered during a year at the least preceding such registration. [2] If the building be one erected and used in lieu of some other building which has been previously registered, and subsequently disused as a place of worship, the registry of the disused building must be cancelled, whereupon the new building may be immediately registered in its stead.

Regium Donum Money, given to the Presbyterian ministers in Ireland by Government. Charles II. began the practice in 1672 by giving £800 per annum as a reward for the loyalty of the Presbyterians, and though afterwards discontinued, it was revived by William III., and George I., in 1723, still further augmented it in return for services rendered by the Presbyterians to the House of Brunswick. Dissenters were excluded from lucrative employment in the Church, and as much as £40,000 was given annually to the heads of Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist congregations to be distributed among their poorer ministers. This ceased in 1869, when the Irish Church was disestablished and disendowed.

Regius Professor.—Henry VIII. endowed certain chairs at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the lecturers who occupy those chairs are called Regius Professors. There are about seven at each University. At the Universities of Scotland the title is given to those professors who receive their appointment from the Crown.

Regula Fidei.—An expression used in the early days of the Church to designate the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, or rule of faith. Probably at first the statement of the doctrine of the Trinity was all that was considered necessary for admission to baptism, but this was at different times added to and amplified, until at last the Church was possessed of the Apostles' Creed, which contains the whole basis of her teaching, and is the regula fidei in the Western Church. The Eastern Church requires the Nicene Creed.

Regular.—One who has taken the vows of a monastic house, and is obliged to live according to its rules of poverty, chastity, and obedience. All monks, friars, and mendicants were included under the head of regulars, they lived under special orders, and were distinguished from the seculars, who had to live in the world. Cardinals might call themselves either regulars or seculars, and had the privileges of both states; bishops and archbishops, if they had formerly been regulars, gave up their claim to the name on entering upon their office. Regular benefices were those which could only be bestowed on members of some regular Order.

Reid, THOMAS, D.D.—Founder of Scottish philosophy [b. at Strachan, Kincardineshire, of which place his father was minister, 1709; d. at Glasgow, 1796]. He studied at the Marischal College, Aberdeen, and was appointed Librarian; resigning this post in 1736, he visited London, Oxford, and Cambridge, and after a year he settled at New Machar, Aberdeenshire, as parish minister. Here he wrote an essay on the application of mathematics to morals, with a view to contradicting an assertion made by Dr. Cheyne that there is a close affinity between them. The essay met with such success that Reid was elected, in 1752, Professor of Moral Philosophy at King's College, Aberdeen, and in 1763 he was chosen to occupy the same post at the University of Glasgow, as the successor of Dr. Adam Smith. His Inquiry into the Human Mind, published in 1764, procured for him the degree of D.D. from the University of Aberdeen. From this time till his death he continued to write on metaphysics, natural law, and philosophy, and in order to do so uninterruptedly he resigned his professorship in 1781. Essays on the Intellectual Powers appeared in 1785; Essays on the Active Power of the Human Mind in 1788; a treatise on Matter and Mind, and Physiological Reflections on Muscular Motion. Reid has been called by F. D. Maurice "the philosopher of consciousness." "Common sense" is a phrase which recurs over and over in his writings, he meaning by it the sense which is common to men, and which belongs to philosophers so far as they care to take up the position of men. His senses convey to him certain ideas, but that implies that he himself is the centre of these ideas—he the living recipient. But having got so far, he was perforce carried on further. When beyond all outward phenomena and all sensations he perceived an inner self independent of them, he came to discern that man has certain obligations of right and wrong—certain duties. The easy-going philosophy of Hume, making sensible experience the all in all of human life, seemed unsatisfying to Reid, and he wrote to the popular philosopher, courteously arguing against the shallowness of his conclusions. Hence, as the above-named critic remarks, arose a Scotch philosophy, basing itself upon "consciousness." "So philosophy became a profession in Scotland, as it had become in France, mixed with the professions of Belles Lettres, of Natural Science, of Economy, and Statistics; sometimes subordinate to these, but still delighting to assume the name of psychology or metaphysics. Vast talent was, no doubt, exhibited and consumed in the theory and practice of this profession; but the most serious and profound Scotchmen of later days have hailed the appearance of the Ayrshire ploughman poet as an element of wholesome human reality, brought into the midst of an atmosphere thick and heavy with notions and booklore. They say that his songs brought back to them the belief in green fields and hills, as well as the fact of their belonging to a land on which their fathers had dwelt and suffered before them, and that his life showed them there is need, in the heart of every peasant, of a hope to raise him, and protect him against himself, as well as against his rich patrons, which neither the divinity nor the philosophy of Scotland at that time afforded; which was not offered by old light formalism or new light experiences; which was not found necessary by the polite circles that Hume frequented, and which only glimmered faintly through the consciousness and common sense of Reid; but of which Burns could see the pledge and the promise in the domestic life of his sires, and in the testimony they bore to a Father whose righteousness the earthly father was feebly to exhibit in his own."

taught theology and philosophy there and at Dillingen. In 1613 he was appointed Court Preacher to the Count Palatine, Wolfgang William, of Neuburg, who had lately left the Protestant religion, and who employed Reihing to write against the Reformers. In order to meet the arguments of the Lutherans, he set himself to study the Scriptures, and becoming persuaded thereby of the errors of the Roman Catholics, he fled to Stuttgart in 1621, and declared himself a Protestant. In 1622 he was made Professor of Theology at Tübingen, and the remainder of his life was spent in writing against the Jesuits and in defence of Protestantism.

Reimarus, HERMANN SAMUEL, was born at Hamburg in 1694, and was educated at Wittenberg. He first attracted public notice by his Primitia Wismariana in 1723. Four years later he became Professor of Philosophy in Hamburg. In 1728 he married the daughter of J. A. Fabricius, and afterwards assisted his father-in-law in his philological works, and published a Latin memoir of him on his death. He was the author of works on both natural and political history, but his most important work was the Wolfenbüttel Fragments, published anonymously by Lessing. These fragments were essays, written from a deistical point of view, impugning the Sacred History. The first appeared in 1774, On the Toleration of the Deists, and was followed at intervals by others. In 1777 two of the fragments attacked the passage of the Red Sea and the Resurrection, and the sensation produced by them was deepened by a new one On the Purpose of Jesus and His Disciples. This publication lost Lessing the privilege of free publication. The fragments were afterwards collected and published together. The authorship was never disclosed by Lessing, but after the death of Reimarus letters were published showing that he was the writer. He died in 1768.

Reinhard, FRANCIS VOLKMAR [b. 1753, d. at Dresden, Sept. 6th, 1812].—A celebrated German Protestant preacher, appointed in 1782 to the Chair of Theology at Wittenberg, and made, two years later, Preacher to the University and Assessor of the Consistory. In 1792 he was appointed, first, Preacher to the Court of Saxony, Ecclesiastical Counsellor, and a Member of the Supreme Consistory. His thirty-nine volumes of sermons are said to furnish the best specimens of German pulpit eloquence since the days of Luther; he also published several theological works, and Memoirs and Confessions of F. V. Reinhard were published after his death. His teaching was Evangelical, while not uninfluenced by the modern development of culture which had already begun to influence Germany.

Reland, ADRIAN, an eminent Orientalist, was born at Ryp, in North Holland, in 1676. He studied for three years under Surenhusius, and showed a wonderful talent for learning Oriental languages and literature. He was made Professor of Philosophy at Hardwijk in 1701, and afterwards Professor of Oriental Languages and Ecclesiastical Antiquities at Utrecht. He died of smallpox in 1718. His principal works are Palestrina ex Monumentis veteribus illustrata (still regarded as a most valuable work), Dissertationes quinque de Nummis veterum Hebræorum, De Religione Mohammedica, etc.

Relics [Lat. reliquia, "remains"] originally meant the remains of saints and martyrs, which were cherished and revered by the Church; the term afterwards came to be used in a wider sense, to signify anything which had once belonged to the deceased person, or with which he had been in contact. The respect with which relics were regarded increased to adoration, and so great was the passion to possess them that the churches were filled with spurious relics, as the desire to obtain them blinded the eyes of enthusiasts, and laid them open to being defrauded. The Synod of Nicæa, 787, commanded that no churches should be consecrated which were not in possession of some relic, and the penalty was excommunication. Reverence to them was enjoined as a Christian duty; wonderful powers of healing or sanctification were attached to them; and every person thought it necessary to carry about a relic to preserve him from danger, and to make his prayers of greater effect. In Roman Catholic countries the worship of relics is still maintained, but they are expressly forbidden by the Church of England, and Luther says they are but "dead things which sanctify nobody."

Religion comes from the Latin, either, according to Cicero. from relegere, "to reconsider" or "read over"; or, according to Lactantius and others (which seems the more probable derivation), from religare, "to bind fast." The word is sometimes used as synonymous with "sect"; but in a practical sense it is generally considered as the same with "godliness," or a life devoted to the worship and fear of God. Dr. Doddridge thus defines it: "Religion consists in the resolution of the will for God, and in a constant care to avoid whatever we are persuaded He would disapprove, to dispatch the work He has assigned us in life, and to promote His glory in the happiness of mankind." The foundation of all religion rests on the belief of the existence of God. [GOD; INSPIRATION.] Religion has been divided into natural and revealed. These are discussed under NATURAL THEOLOGY and REVELATION. The religions which exist in the world are usually classified under four heads—Pagan, Jewish, Mahometan, and Christian—to the articles dealing with which the reader is referred.

Religious.—A term employed in England before the Reformation, and still in use upon the Continent, to designate persons who had devoted themselves to the monastic life. It is common to both sexes; but generally male religious are called monks or friars, and female, nuns or canonesses.

Religious Houses.—Houses set apart for the service of God; particularly those for the reception of monks, nuns, penitents, and others wishing to lead a religious life. All religious houses of this description were done away with in England at the Reformation, but the term is still in use in Roman Catholic countries.

Religious Liberty. [PERSECUTION; TOLERATION.]

Religious Orders. [MONASTICISM.]

Relly, JAMES.—A Unitarian preacher, about the middle of the eighteenth century, who became the founder of the Universalists in London. His followers were known as Rellyanists; but the London society did not last long. Relly was a voluminous writer, a careful student of Scripture, and a good controversialist. His principal work is Union, or a Treatise of the Consanguinity and Affinity between Christ and His Church, in which he elaborates his doctrinal views, and shows the ground on which they rest. He said that Christ had made satisfaction for all the human race, and bore their sins in His body, so that he knew nothing of demanding justice on the sinner; and he maintained that the state of unbelievers after death cannot be a state of punishment, because Christ, who tasted death for every man, bore the chastisement of their peace. He admitted the doctrine of misery in a future state only so far that men in unbelief did not know what Jesus had done for them by the sacrifice of Himself, and, therefore, might be oppressed with guilt and fear; but he looked forward to a time of universal restitution, when all mankind would be brought to a knowledge of salvation. His earliest convert was John Murray, who had been a disciple of Whitfield; he, shortly after joining Relly, went to America, and there founded the UNIVERSALISTS [q.v.].

Remigius, SAINT.—The apostle and patron saint of the Franks, Bishop of Rheims [b. probably in 437; d. Jan. 13th, 533]. He became Bishop in 459, and converted and baptised Clovis, the first Christian King of France. Various fictions were invented concerning him, as, for instance, that, having no chrism ready for completing the baptism by confirmation, a dove from heaven brought him the consecrated oil in a vial or AMPULLA [q.v.], with which he anointed Clovis. He has left several letters, still extant, and was said by Sidonius Apollinarius to be one of the most eloquent men of his time. His name is retained among the black-letter saints of the Church calendar on Oct. 1st.

Remission [literally, "sending away"]—Hence it is used to signify the removal of a sentence of punishment, forgiveness of sin, and absolution.

Remonstrants.—A name given to the Arminians, who, in 1610, presented a remonstrance to the States of Holland, complaining of the sentence of the Synod of Dort, which had condemned them as heretics. A counter-remonstrance was presented by the Calvinists. The Remonstrants were headed by Episcopius and Grotius, and were for some time favoured in England by Archbishop Laud, who afterwards altered his opinions.

Renaudot, EUSÈBE, a learned Orientalist, was born at Paris in 1646, and was educated by the Jesuits. The great facility with which he learnt and spoke many languages attracted the eyes of the Court towards him, and he was sent by the King on several important missions to England, Spain, etc. He also accompanied Cardinal Noailles to Italy in 1700, to a conclave held to elect a Pope. Renaudot died in 1720. He wrote much on the subject of the divisions of Christendom. His principal works are Defence of the Perpetuity of Faith, directed against J. Aymon's Authentic Monuments of the Religion of the Greeks; and History of the Alexandrian Patriarchs, and Collection of Oriental Liturgies.

Repentance.—A term used for the sorrow for sin which produces newness of life. The Greek word most frequently used in the New Testament for repentance is metanoia, which signifies a change of mind and disposition. Another word which is also used is metamelomoi, which signifies anxiety or uneasiness upon the consideration of what is done. True repentance involves a real hatred of sin on the ground that it is offensive to God; sorrow on account of the wrong done to God and man; and a hearty desire and resolution to forsake everything repugnant to the Divine Will. Repentance is preceded by regeneration, the chief difference between the two being that the latter is the work of the Holy Spirit, while the former is the effort made by the human will to act in accordance with the Spirit. The Roman Catholics held that repentance imposes certain exercises, obligations, and burdens on those who have sinned, and these are known as PENANCES [q.v.]. At the Reformation, however, Luther defined repentance as a "transmutation of the mind and affections," and declared that it consisted in faith in God and sorrow for past sins. The Pietists laid a great stress upon the necessity of repentance, and held that it necessitated a great spiritual struggle, which led to a controversy between them and the Lutherans. Others again hold and teach that the essence of repentance consists in the change of mind and attitude towards God, and the turning toward Him, irrespective of the amount of sorrow for sin consciously experienced. Appealing to Scripture, they urge that it is called repentance (or change of mind or heart) "toward God;" and that we are expressly taught by Paul [2 Cor. vii. 9, 10] that true godly sorrow worketh or produces repentance, being therefore a means to it, and so distinct. It is also urged that in the case of the young man who refused to go into the vineyard, but "afterward repented and went," the essence of his repentance consisted not in the amount of contrition he may have felt, which was only of value for the effect produced, but in the fact that he changed in his own mind or will toward his father's command, and did what he had refused to do. It has been said further that the distinction so drawn is not a vain or meaningless one, since God "commands" men everywhere to repent, and the lack of a conscious sorrow they do not feel is made by many an excuse for inability to obey; whereas it is urged that God never commands any man to do what his conscience does not tell him he might do, and that if the command were clearly interpreted and understood to mean the giving up or surrender of the will to God, which every man feels he might do, a great and real practical hindrance to many would be taken away. All agree that the evidences of true repentance are to be sought and found in works "meet" for it.

Reprobation.—The Greek word adokimos, "disappointment," is translated "reprobate" in Rom. i. 28; 2 Cor. xiii. 5, 6, 7; 2 Tim. iii. 8; Titus i. 16. It does not fall within our province to discuss the meaning of these several passages, but the word in its technical and ecclesiastical usage is used in the Predestinarian controversy as the antithesis to ELECTION [q.v.]. It should, however, be observed that there is a large school of divines who do not consider that the Scriptural doctrine of Election involves the Calvinistic doctrine of Reprobation. Their contention is, that when the world lay in wickedness and condemnation Christ came from God to call it to Himself for reconciliation, and that the Election was simply His choice of men who were to become His Church for the purpose of carrying out this Ministry of Reconciliation. St. Paul was "a chosen vessel" with the object of "carrying the Name of Christ to the Gentiles." This view, it will be seen, rests Reprobation not upon the Divine Will, but upon the perversity of wilful sinners. [ELECTION; PREDESTINATION.]

Repton.—A village in South Derbyshire interesting ecclesiastically as being the seat of the mother church of Christian Mercia. That great kingdom, comprising the midlands of England, stretched from the Thames to the Humber, and the first Bishop of Repton was consecrated in 656. In the outer walls of the crypt, beneath the chancel of the present, is a portion of the ancient church. That church was destroyed by the Danes in 874. Its successor was probably erected in the days of Edgar the Pacific [958-975], and was dedicated to St. Wystan, a grandson of one of the Mercian kings. The present chancel is a portion of that church. The whole church has been to a great extent restored under the care of Mr. Blomfield, and is a very beautiful structure. It was hoped to restore the pre-Norman chancel in 1887.

Requiem.—A Mass for the dead performed in the Romish Church, so called from the first words of the introit, "Requiem æternam dona iis, Domine." Some musical compositions performed on occasions of mourning are also called Requiems.

Reredos [Fr. arriere dos].—The screen at the back of an altar. In cathedrals or other large churches a reredos was usually necessary to separate the sacrum from the apse or chapel behind it; in small churches, where there is no space behind the altar, a reredos is sometimes erected as an ornament, or the wall is painted or otherwise adorned instead. Beautiful examples of ancient reredoses are to be seen at Winchester, Durham, and St. Alban's, and several cathedrals have modern ones.

Reservation, MENTAL. [MENTAL RESERVATION.]

Reservation of Benefices.—In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the Popes, in order to appoint favourites to benefices, made certain decrees which said that all livings which became vacant by death, if the last incumbent had died in Rome, should be reserved for the Pope. We read of Honorius IV. claiming the right to appoint when the living was vacant by resignation, and in course of time the practice was extended in all sorts of ways. It was put a stop to by the general rebellion in various countries against the despotic rule of the Bishop of Rome.

Reservation of the Sacrament.—The practice of reserving the consecrated elements of Holy Communion, which is the custom in the Church of Rome, was altogether abandoned by the Church of England at the Reformation. In the Roman Church the Host, after the conclusion of the Sacrament, is placed in a "tabernacle." In olden times this tabernacle was frequently in the shape of a tower, sometimes in that of a covered cup, sometimes (especially in France) in that of a dove. The ambry, or eupboard, which is so frequently seen in old churches, was oftentimes the receptacle of the Reserved Host. Its presence was indicated by a light burning before it.

That reservation was practised in the early

Church is clear from the words of Justin Martyr. In a passage which is the very earliest mention of the Eucharist after Scripture, he says, "The deacons communicate each of those present, and carry away to the absent of the blest bread and wine." A passage in Tertullian would seem to imply that the faithful received the reserved Eucharist daily, and the early Fathers are full of proof that the Sacrament was "carried about" in the early Church. But probably the dangers of persecution, preventing the free meeting together, in great part accounts for this. And the practice led to such great abuses and superstitions that it was very early forbidden, except in special cases. One of these cases was reservation for the sick. As there was no office for private celebration in the Early Church, we conclude that reservation on their behalf was the ordinary rule, and those Canons which forbade reservation especially excepted the cases of the sick from such prohibition.

The conviction of the Church of the Reformation that abuses had come in by means of the practice of reservation beyond those which had caused the limitation in early times, led to the prohibition of the practice altogether, and a special service was placed in the Liturgy for the communion of the sick. The Twenty-eighth Article declares expressly that reservation is not according to Christ's ordinance. Of late years a movement has been made for reviving the practice of reservation, on the plea that in times of sickness the minister who has a large population will be unable to go through several communions in a day. But the movement has found no favour among the rulers of the Church, who apprehend, not without reason, that there is a desire to revive a practice which is of comparatively modern growth in the Church—namely, the exposure of the Sacrament in churches—for the purpose of sacramental adoration—a practice which is not to be separated in thought from the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation. In fear lest any countenance should be given to this doctrine, the Bishops, in 1885, after a careful discussion in Convocation, published a declaration that reservation of the Sacrament is contrary to the principles of the Church of England.

Residence.—Rules for the residence of ecclesiastics at their cures were laid down by several Councils in very early times, as abuses in the matter soon began to arise. Before the Reformation the evil of non-residence had greatly increased, partly in consequence of pluralities, and partly for less important reasons. It had again become a monstrous evil in the 18th century. Thus a return issued in 1737 gives 455 livings in Cheshire alone, where the incumbents were non-resident, 105 in Middlesex, etc. Since that time this evil has been remedied. The law concerning residence at the present day is that every clergyman must reside on his cure for at least nine months in every year, except when prevented by ill-health or other efficient cause, and that during his absence he must provide a curate to discharge his duties. Pluralities are forbidden, except under certain conditions; and a licensed pluralist is required to preach at least thirteen sermons every year at the benefice from which he is most absent, and to exercise hospitality there for two months yearly. There are still a few cases of clerics living who held benefices before the Act came into operation and who are thereby exempt, and thus the scandal remains of a few livings in which grown-up inhabitants have never once had an opportunity of seeing their rector.

Residentiary.—Those members of a cathedral body who are bound to reside in the vicinity of the cathedral, to conduct the services and to regulate ordinary affairs. Canons residentiary are attached to all cathedrals of the old foundation, and it was formerly required that they should all reside at the same time; but this caused much inconvenience, as many of them held other benefices, and regulations were made requiring certain conditions of residence, and specifying three months as the very least time in each year which a canon shall spend in residence.

Resignation.—The giving up a charge or preferment by a beneficed clergyman to the superior by whom it was originally presented to him. If the resignation is made in consequence of bodily or mental infirmity, the incumbent is entitled, under certain conditions, to a pension not exceeding one-third of the income of the benefice resigned. The resignation must be made in person, and without bargaining for preferment to some better appointment, though a difference is made when there is a question of exchange.

Resolutioners.—After the battle of Dunbar it was thought necessary to repeal certain Acts which had been passed at the beginning of the Commonwealth. The so-called Acts of Classes had declared that Royalists, or, to use the term employed in the Acts, Malignants, were incapable of holding any office in the State. In 1651, however, the "Resolutioners" wished to modify this decree, and brought a Bill before the Scotch Parliament which should allow any man to be a servant of the Crown unless he had been excommunicated by the Church. The leader of the party, who had great influence in England, and was in Cromwell's favour, was James Sharp, afterwards Bishop of St. Andrew's. The opposing party, headed by James Guthrie, were called Protesters. The struggle lasted till after the Restoration, but finally ended in the victory of the Resolutioners.

Responds or Responsories.—A name used in the ancient Church for short verses of Scripture introduced into the middle of, or at the end of, the Lessons. The former were the "Short," and the latter the "Long Responsa." These are referred to in the Preface Concerning the Service of the Church, when, in speaking of the reading of the Bible, it says, "This godly and decent order of the ancient Fathers hath been altered, broken, and neglected by planting in uncertain stories and legends with multitude of responsa, verses," etc.; and afterwards: "For this cause be cut off anthems, responds, and invitatories, and such things as did break the continual course of the reading of the Scripture."

Response.—An answer made by the congregation to the prayers of the clergyman, according to the directions in the Prayer Book. Many of the Psalms are obviously designed to be sung or said alternately by minister and people, and it was customary in the early Church that this form of worship should be used. It has been banished from the Liturgy of the Roman Church in great measure, as the prayers are said in Latin, which is unknown to most of the congregation; and the custom of depending upon extemporaneous prayers among Dissenters also precludes the use of responses. The Church of England maintains them for three reasons: [1] they show the unity of mind and will which ought to exist between the minister and people, and emphasise the fact that he only leads the prayers of the whole congregation; [2] they increase the devotion of the people, making them feel that they are in close relation to God; and [3] they arrest attention. Responses are of four kinds: [1] The "Amen" after each prayer; [2] the alternate verses; [3] repetitions, as in the Lord's Prayer, confession, etc., and [4] the "Kyrie Eleison," after the rehearsal of each commandment.

Restorationists.—A name given to a branch of the UNIVERSALISTS (q.v.). They were separated from the original body in 1840 on what was regarded as the original principle of Universalism—that there is a future state of punishment for the wicked, but that it is of limited duration, and that in the end they will be restored to happiness.

Resurrection.—The historical fact of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ is the keystone of all Christian teaching, the foundation of all Christian life. Upon it the whole fabric of Christianity rests. "If Christ be not risen your faith is vain," wrote St. Paul to the Church at Corinth; and every Christian teacher and apologist in the same full and unqualified manner makes the truth of this fact the one test by which all he propounds must stand or fall. Not only does the whole of Christian doctrine depend upon it, but the entire question of miracles is bound up with it. Remove the Resurrection from the arch of miracle, and the other stones that form it fall away at once; but let this be clearly established, and it will bear the whole weight of the rest.

The first preachers of Christianity proclaimed clearly that Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified upon Calvary and died upon the Cross, came to life again in the tomb wherein He was laid, and appeared to His disciples at various times and in different places for the space of forty days, and then ascended out of their sight into heaven, since which He has never been seen by bodily eyes, except by St. Paul, when he was stricken down on the road to Damascus, and possibly afterwards.

The risen Jesus, according to the teaching of Christianity, was no spirit or ghost, but one who could be handled [Luke xxiv. 39], who had flesh and bones, who ate before His disciples; and yet whose body was no longer subject to those limitations of matter which govern the existence of earthly bodies, for it appeared and disappeared at a moment; it came into the midst of the disciples when they were sitting with closed doors, and finally it rose from the earth until a cloud received it out of the sight of the onlookers. It is manifest, then, that while the body of the risen Jesus was in a real sense identical with that which was crucified, since it bore the marks of the wounds inflicted upon it, and was recognisable to all who had previously known it, yet some great change had passed upon it, irreconcilable with all we at present know of the laws of matter. The fact of the Resurrection, however, rests upon human testimony of the strongest kind. Let us see what it is, and then state the objections made by those who are compelled to admit the testimony, but who try to explain it away.

All that we know of the Resurrection is told us in the writings of St. Paul and the Gospels of the New Testament. The existence of St. Paul, and the genuineness of his chief writings, is now universally admitted. He is as real a personage as Cicero, Julius Cæsar, or Thucydides. He was living at the time of the Resurrection as a member of the strictest sect of the Jews, and was a bitter and active opponent of those who believed in the claims of Jesus to be the Messiah. But, as he himself tells us, while on a journey to Damascus, he was struck to the ground, and then actually saw Jesus, heard Him speak and replied to Him, and ever after spent his life in proclaiming the doctrines he had bitterly opposed. Within a few years, twenty-eight at the most, he had written four letters known as the Epistle to the Romans, the two Epistles to the Corinthians, and the Epistle to the Galatians, in which he treats of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ as an admitted fact, upon which he founds a system of practical teaching affecting the whole lives of believers. Within seventy years of the Crucifixion—which it must be noticed was to the general public nothing more than the ignominious execution of a fraudulent political adventurer, a blasphemer against the God of His own race, and a traitor to the State (for it was the fact that He was supposed to be aiming at the throne of Judæa that made Him obnoxious to the Roman Government, and that He called Himself the Son of God that inspired the enmity of the Jews)—arose Churches of Christians all over the known world, whose members were prepared to die rather than deny the fact of the Resurrection. And from that day to this such Churches have continued to flourish and multiply.

Let it also be noted that one day of the week, the first, has from the very day on which our Lord rose from the grave been observed as the festival of the Resurrection, completely obliterating among Christians the observance of the seventh day of rest, the Sabbath of the Jews; and in addition to this weekly commemoration, there is the Great Feast of Easter, annually celebrated, the sole reason for which is the fact of the Resurrection of Jesus.

It being impossible, then, to deny that from the very day on which the Resurrection is said to have taken place there have been an ever-increasing number of people thoroughly believing in it as a fact, who have relied upon the word of those who were alive at the time, it becomes necessary to inquire into the nature of the objections urged against it. It has once been said that Jesus did not die, but merely fell into a deep swoon, from which He recovered; but this is never seriously advanced now, for it involves so many difficulties that the most inveterate adversaries of the Resurrection reject it with scorn. Others have declared that the disciples stole away the body of Jesus, and practised a fraud upon the world by saying that they had seen Him alive again. But, had such an imposition been attempted, is it likely that a few days afterwards its authors would have boldly proclaimed the Resurrection to a hostile crowd in the very city where the crucifixion took place, and where there would be hundreds of men eager to expose it? Would men and women have endured persecution, and even death, for the sake of a profitless fraud? Would there not have been some traitor in the camp, ready to sell his secret, as Judas was to betray Jesus? Such a theory, like the first, has been abandoned by every one, and there remains only one to be seriously examined, which is that commonly spoken of as the Theory of Visions. By those who hold it, it is asserted that the disciples, in their ardent affection and excited state of feeling, imagined that they had seen the Crucified One alive again amongst them on various occasions, and that He had said and done the things recorded of Him.

The strange power of imagination under certain conditions to give form and reality to mental impressions may be readily admitted, but we must note carefully what those conditions are. They are that what appears in vision must accord with previous desires of what should appear, with fixed ideas, and with an earnest expectancy of what shall occur. Were these the conditions under which the supposed visions appeared? Those who followed Jesus before His crucifixion were now a scattered, frightened few. Almost all who had once believed in Him had now forsaken Him. Two or three women and one or two men were all who remained faithful enough to care for His body, nor do we know of any who looked for a resurrection. Jesus had spoken to them of rising again, but, so far from their expecting such a thing, only one of His disciples, a woman, came to His grave on the morning of the third day, and that with no expectation of meeting Him alive, but with the wish to render affectionate offices to His corpse. When at length she recognised Him she ran to tell others of the fact, but they were naturally incredulous. The same day towards evening Jesus appeared to two others on the road from Jerusalem to Emmaus, and so unprepared were they for the resurrection of their Lord that they failed to recognise Him, even while He talked to them. Upon their return to Jerusalem, they told what they had seen to the eleven and those who were with them, and as they spoke Jesus appeared in the midst of them. To quiet their alarm, He had to assure them He was no ghost, but a body of flesh and bones. Eight days after that He again appeared, the doors being shut, and invited the unbelieving Thomas to put his finger into the print of the nails and his hand into the wound in His side. Once by the Lake of Galilee, at another time to five hundred at once, and last of all upon the Mount of Olives, He appeared to different groups of His disciples, and then, with the exception of His appearance to Saul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus, He ceased to be seen of men, nor from that time onward did any one claim to have seen Jesus.

The objection has been made—How was it, if these appearances were anything more than visions, that they were granted to disciples only, when surely His enemies might have been for ever silenced, crushed, and confounded, if He had openly walked the streets of Jerusalem, or taught in the Temple? To such an objection the reply is obvious. The time of Christ's contact with the world had gone by. It had deliberately rejected Him. It was and is no part of the mission of Jesus to force Himself upon the Jews, or upon anyone. He always said that it was those who "were of the truth" who would hear His voice.

But further, as has been ably pointed out by Prof. Henry Wace, D.D. [The Gospel and its Witnesses], the objection springs from an entire misconception of the object with which the gospel histories of the Resurrection are recorded. "It is not, and never was, the empty grave upon which the faith of the Apostles and the life of the Church was founded. It was the existence of the Saviour in glory, and more than that, His actual energy and life-giving power, through His Spirit, which gave the Church its foundation. . . . The disciples did not yield to the impulse, to which mere visions would have led them, to proclaim simply our Lord's deliverance from the grave. They waited quietly for ten days after His last disappearance from them, and then they appealed to the patent fact of His exercising a new and living power." This explains the simplicity of the gospel records. "The witness of the Apostles did not rest simply upon their assertions respecting what they alone had seen; it was not simply that they, and they only, had found the grave empty, and that our Lord had appeared to them and had subsequently ascended to heaven. Had that been all they had to say [the italics are ours], it might not have been difficult for the enemies of our Lord to have either described them as mere enthusiasts, or to have charged them with deception. . . . The testimony of twelve unlearned and ignorant men, despised as the followers of a crucified master, would scarcely, if it had stood alone and unsupported, have found credence for so great a miracle. At all events, the Apostles did not proclaim this testimony so long as it stood alone. When they proclaim it, they are able to appeal to a present fact, to a number of successive facts, which verify it. They are suddenly endued with new spiritual powers: in the name of the Lord Jesus they work miracles on the bodies of men, and convert thousands to repentance and a holy life; and it is with the support of these facts, and in order to explain them, that they declare what they had seen and heard of our Lord after His resurrection. They proclaim to the Jews that Christ is living; and here, they say, is the proof of it, that the Holy Spirit is bestowed on us, that miracles are wrought in His name, that He actually gives power, both spiritually and bodily, to those who believe on Him. This it was, and not mere testimony to the past, which produced so great an effect at Jerusalem and so alarmed the Jewish rulers. . . . The essential part of the Resurrection was our Lord's reappearance to His disciples in glorious form, and the fact that He was still living, as a Prince and Saviour, to them. But of this great fact believers were assured, not only by the Apostles' report of His appearance to them, but by the daily evidences they had of His living power and grace. . . . The events narrated in the Acts of the Apostles proved that the Lord was with His Church, and this fact was to them the most certain of all realities. The Evangelists did not write, therefore, to prove the Resurrection. They wrote under the living conviction of the Resurrection being true; and they were only concerned to give such details of it as might suit their particular purpose." Thus, spite of the hostile attitude of the rulers and the opposition of the Sadducees, who denied both the resurrection and the existence of spirits, the preaching of the Apostles made its way amongst men, so that where, as at Corinth, there lived believers who regarded their own resurrection as a merely spiritual matter, they made no question of the actual bodily resurrection of Jesus.

Again, not only was the reappearance of Jesus at variance with any ideas that could previously have been entertained by His disciples, but it was not confined to single individuals, and was given to many, amongst whom, in course of time, arose divisions and jealousies, which would, no doubt, have called forth denials or doubts of the resurrection, could there have been any. Visions are transitory; the appearances of Jesus to the disciples were prolonged. During them He was able to enter into extended teaching as to the Kingdom of God, and the nature of the commission with which He entrusted them. Then, again, these appearances came suddenly to an end with the Ascension of Jesus into heaven. Had they been merely the visions of excited and hysterical subjects, would they not have continued for an indefinite period? Is it not likely that men of ambitious or jealous temperaments would have claimed similar privileges to those which had been granted to the Apostles and others? But we do not hear of any others in the early Church who claimed to have seen the Lord, except St. Paul. Yet further, belief in Jesus as the Messiah died with His death upon the Cross. "We trusted," said the disappointed disciples on the road to Emmaus, "that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel." Affection survived in the hearts of Mary and others, but faith was dead. With the Resurrection faith revived, and so much more powerful was it in its renewed life, that in a short time belief in the crucified but risen Jesus had made its way into the heart of Asia Minor, amongst the thriving Greek colonies on the shores of the Ægean, in the centres of commerce and culture at Corinth and Athens, and in the imperial city of Rome.

One question may be asked of those who do not believe in the fact of the Resurrection, and yet cannot deny the existence of Jesus. If the story of the Resurrection be not true, what became of the body of Jesus? Two facts are now universally admitted by all serious critics: that on the first Easter morning the grave of the Lord Jesus contained no body; and that His disciples, by the close of that day, honestly believed that He had risen from the dead. The great fact upon which Christianity is founded is the Resurrection of her Lord. Destroy belief in that, and the whole fabric falls to the ground; but to him who truly believes it, Christianity at once becomes a Divine revelation.

Retreats are times of retirement from the active work of life, whereby the spiritual life may be deepened by means of prayer and meditation in those already leading religious lives.

For a very long period it has been customary in the Romish Church for the members of religious communities to go into retreat for some time every year, and a series of "Exercises" for use on such occasions, consisting of meditations on the Life and Work of Christ, on Death and Eternity, were drawn up by Sr. IONATIUS LOYOLA [q.v.]. They are called the Mauresa, from the place where they were written. Retreats were also held for ordinands before their ordination.

The practice of going into retreat has been largely revived in the Anglican Church of late years, and retreats are now held both for men and for women—for clergymen, for schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, for the members of sisterhoods and guilds, and for men and women in the ordinary walks of life.

A retreat ordinarily lasts from one to three whole days; in the stricter ones, silence is observed during the whole time, and, in all, the transaction of everyday business is suspended. A clergyman of experience acts as conductor, and holds private interviews with and advises those who wish to see him. A retreat begins with an address by the conductor on the first evening, and he usually gives three meditations or addresses each day in church or in the chapel of the college, the subject of which is the increase of personal holiness, both for its own sake and also as the source whence a right influence over others must flow. Sometimes the address takes the form of an "Instruction" as to the best way of meeting various temptations to worldliness and other sins, and of grappling with the spiritual difficulties peculiar to the occupation or circumstances of those in retreat. It is usual in retreats for the clergy to have a daily celebration of Holy Communion, and, in other cases, at least on the first and last days.

The intervals between the addresses are occupied in services in church, in prayer and meditation and self-examination, and it is often urged that each of those in retreat should make some definite resolution in writing as to amendment of life before returning home.

Retreats are best held in a college or religious house, or in some place so arranged that distraction by the outer world may be avoided during meals and at bedtime.

Retreats are sometimes called "Quiet Days," but the name is not particularly happy, as many—the country clergy, country schoolmasters, and others—may have many peaceful days at home. The name "retreat" aptly expresses the need which many feel for a period of retirement from the worldliness which is as much present in quiet as in busy days.

Retribution.—The belief that sin brings its punishment after it, has belonged to all religions from the beginning. It is true that, as at first mooted, this principle turned mainly upon consequences to follow in this life. A hoary head found in the paths of righteousness was to be a crown of glory, while the grey hairs of the violent and the treacherous were to be brought down to the grave with blood. The law laid down in the Second Commandment of the sins of parents visited upon children, is recognised in our own country as a biological law, and we call it hereditary. It is a generalised fact of social science. But with the coming of Christ the horizon has widened. The Christian idea of retribution rests upon the fundamental law that here we have no continuing city, that earth is a place of probation, that God's judgment will be thorough and complete, such as the whole universe will acquiesce in as perfectly just, but that it will require the two worlds, the present and the future, to reveal that perfect justice. We believe, as Christians, that when we quit this world it is not to melt into the infinite Past, but to live in an infinite Future. [See ESCHATOLOGY; ETERNAL PUNISHMENT, etc.]

Reuchlin, JOHANN, an eminent German Hebrew scholar, called also La Fume and Capnio (these being the German, French, and Greek names for "smoke"), was born at Pforzheim in 1455. When he was at school his sweet voice and talent for music were remarked, and he was placed in the choir of the Margrave of Baden Durlach, who sent him to Paris with one of his sons. Here he devoted himself chiefly to the study of Greek under Andronicus Contoblaeos, and in 1474 went on to Basle, where he lectured on Latin and Greek. He remained at Basle for four years, and then, meeting with opposition from certain theologians who were jealous of his popularity, he returned to Paris, and continued to study Greek under Hermonymus of Sparta. In 1478 he went to Orleans, and thence to Poitiers, in both of which towns he studied law, and in 1481 took a doctor's degree, and went to Tübingen. In 1482 Reuchlin accompanied the Duke of Württemberg as secretary to Italy, where he became acquainted with Politian, Marsilius Ficinus, and others, whose influence made a decided change in his views. In 1496 he went to Heidelberg, where he spent much time in the university. In 1498 he again visited Rome, where he took Hebrew lessons, having previously begun the language under Jakob Jehiel Loanz, the Emperor's Jewish physician. He then went to Stuttgart, and was resolved to devote himself to learning, but in 1501 was chosen judge of the Swabian League. In 1506 appeared his Rudiments of the Hebrew Language, which rendered possible the free study of the original Scripture. In 1509 a converted Jew, named Johann Pfefferkorn, of Cologne, advised Maximilian to burn all the books of the Rabbis, and the Emperor named a commission, of which Reuchlin was one, to consider the question. He accordingly wrote a document containing his opinion that the act would be very disastrous to Christian learning, and also shows that he had a decided inclination to religious toleration. This was shown to Pfefferkorn, who wrote a violent abuse of it in his Handspiegel, to which Reuchlin answered by Augenspiegel. The monks of Cologne were greatly incensed at this pamphlet, and declared that it contained forty-three Judaizing propositions, and in 1513 selected Hoogstraten as accuser. Reuchlin was acquitted; but the Dominicans, not content, appealed to Pope Leo X., who appointed a commission to inquire into the matter, the majority of which were again on the side of Reuchlin, and the monks were forced to pay his expenses, and to make him compensation and apology. In 1519 Reuchlin went to Ingolstadt, where he received 200 gold crowns annually from the Duke William of Bavaria. He remained till the outbreak of a plague there two years after, on which he returned to Stuttgart, and died there the same year [1522] of jaundice. Besides the Hebrew Grammar, Reuchlin wrote De Verbo Mirifico, De Cabbala Placitis, a manual of civil law, etc.

Reunion.—It has become of late years a matter of growing sorrow to many true and earnest Christians that the Church is divided into the numberless sects which now exist; and the desire for unity among Christians has led to the formation of three societies within late years. These are: [1] the Association for Promoting the Unity of Christendom, the object of which is to unite the Church of England, and all Protestant bodies, with the Romish and Greek Churches; [2] the Evangelical Alliance, to unite Protestants against the Church of Rome; and [3] the Home Reunion Society, whose object is "to present the Church of England in a conciliatory attitude towards those who regard themselves as outside her pale, so as to lead towards the corporate reunion of all Christians holding the doctrines of the Ever-blessed Trinity, and the Incarnation and Atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ." [UNITY.]

Revelation.—God, says the Epistle to the Hebrews, made Himself known to the fathers "by divers portions and in divers manners." And, therefore, Revelation is a subject which covers much ground. The works of nature are to the devout soul a revelation—"the heavens declare the glory of God." To deny this is really Atheism, for it denies that the world has an author. But the Christian believer declares that God has made Himself known, not only by the works of nature, but by special interventions since the heavens and earth were finished, and specially by the voice of Christ. He "hath in these last days spoken to us by His Son." Nature does not speak with such power as is needful to convince the world. And, therefore, we generally understand by Revelation a more distinct, a closer, more definite utterance. Such utterance involves a miraculous interposition, the direct action of a Divine Will, clearly to be distinguished from the realm of ordinary physical law.

We assume the existence of a personal God or Creator. We assume also that He speaks to the conscience and the heart. This may be denied to be a demonstrable truth, but there is, at least, nothing improbable in such an hypothesis. If it be credible on other grounds, there are no arguments which militate against it. The facts of nature are bewildering—the many races of men, their conflicts, their troubles and sorrows, the shortness of life, the curtain hanging over futurity, the constant defeat of good. No light comes from nature to explain all these things. But there is no antecedent improbability in the supposition that the Creator, who has yet left marks upon His works of a beneficent and loving purpose, may interfere in the anarchy, and defeat the suicidal passions of men, and bid them look to Him and be at peace. There is no improbability that He who was able to make the world should be able to influence His work. It is not improbable that an intercourse should take place between God and the soul. The real question at issue, and the only one, is, What is the evidence on which this intervention is believed? The doubt is not whether God can intervene, nor whether He is likely to have done so, but whether there is proof that He has intervened. This is a question which has already been considered under the head of MIRACLES.

Mr. John Stuart Mill, while confessing that there is no ground for denying the possibility of the Creator's interference, holds that the probability is against it, because "the whole of our observation of nature proves to us by incontrovertible evidence that the rule of His government is by means of second causes; that all facts, or, at least, all physical facts, follow uniformly on given physical conditions, and never occur but when the appropriate collocation of physical conditions is realised." But, on the other hand, it is strangely improbable, on the face of it, that God, having wrought His will in creation, having done so with minute and wondrous skill, should straightway cease to work at all. Creation involves duties. The parent having given birth to a child, does not leave it on a doorstep to take its chance of existence. We believe, then, that God, while always working, and sustaining His works, has at certain periods so exerted His will as to reveal the fact of His existence, and the purpose of His workings. He declared that He ruled the nations, that He hated iniquity, and loved righteousness, and in visible proof of this He interfered in the case of Israel and overthrew Pharaoh, in manifestation of His eternal and unchanging laws. He declared from the beginning that He is the Lord of Life, and would deliver His children from death. The miracles of Christ were one and all a revelation of this truth, and His resurrection is a witness sufficient for all ages that death is not the lord of man. The following passage from a valuable work entitled The Mystery of God, by T. Vincent Tymms, puts the case fairly:—"Tennyson sings: 'God fulfils Himself in many ways, lest one good custom should corrupt the world.' Is there not a profound suggestion here? If there be such a God, as we have reason to believe, one long custom might deceive the world into thinking there is no Worker at all! In spite of all the alleged miracles of Revelation, and the inexplicable events observed by science, men do infer the non-existence, or the non-activity, of God from that measure of uniformity they perceive. Would it not tend to cure this confusion of mind if God condescended to work a miracle of self-revelation? If continued life be the law for all human beings, would not a visible resurrection remove a false inference drawn from the general uniformity with which bodies remain in their graves? Would it not be corrective of some disastrously false calculations based on the supposition that death makes an end of all, and that there is no judgment to be looked for hereafter? If kindness be the law of God's treatment of men, would not a few visible samples of His mercy assist a true faith in danger of being confounded by the prevalence of disease? If active sympathy with man be the real condition of God's mind, would not the revelation of such sympathy in a personal form be the dissipation of a false impression derived from the non-appearance of any superior Being to care for the inhabitants of a mechanical world? If, in spite of all human sin and misery and apparent failure, God is working out a plan which will bring in everlasting righteousness, would it not promote that result, and remove an intellectual confusion which is fitted to paralyse man's moral endeavours, if God were to grant a special disclosure of His purpose, and were to afford, by works no human might could perform, some illustration of His own power to upward, and thus, indirectly, also some assurance that the message was no cunningly devised fable, but a true word from Himself, and worthy of universal faith?"

Revenues of the Church.—In the days when persecution was rife, it may easily be imagined that the Church did not possess, and did not care to possess, lands or immovable property of any kind. The clergy were supported by voluntary offerings, made chiefly monthly, and distributed monthly, the funds being at the disposal of the bishop. But in quieter times it became of frequent occurrence that lands and houses were assigned by will or otherwise to the augmentation of the revenues of the Church, for the relief of the poor, the maintenance of the fabric, and the support of the clergy, and the bishop was assisted by his aeconomus, or steward, elected by the votes of the clergy. Besides such bequests, tithes and first-fruits came to be settled on the Church, and some of the Emperors gave allowances of corn out of the public exchequer.

Reverend [abbreviated Rev.].—The title given to the clergy generally. Archbishops are called "most reverend;" bishops, "right reverend," and deans, "very reverend." At the time of the Reformation the title was greatly objected to by some, on the ground that it may only be said of God, "Holy and reverend is His name." In the seventeenth century the general title for clerics was "master." But it is now used by all, including most Dissenting ministers.

Revised Version.—The so-called "Authorised Version" of the Holy Scriptures was published in 1611, being itself a revision of numerous predecessors. Since that revision was made new MSS. have been discovered, and carefully compared, with the result of showing many inaccuracies in the text from which the version of 1611 was made. Besides this, the sciences of geography, natural history, and of history have been formed and cultivated, and by their means light has been thrown on many parts of Scripture, and the names of several places, plants, animals, etc., in the version of 1611 have been discovered to be wrongly translated. Again, a number of words and phrases perfectly understood in the time of James I. have changed in meaning, and no longer express the ideas they once did. For such reasons as these, Biblical scholars have for a long period wished for a revision of the Bible, and several of them made advances in the way of partial translations from time to time. In the early part of 1870, the Convocation of Canterbury formed a committee for the purpose of preparing a scheme for the revision of the Authorised Version. As the result, two companies of revisers were chosen from the most eminent scholars in England—twenty-four for the revision of the Old Testament and twenty-four for the revision of the New Testament, who were to take counsel with two companies of American scholars. The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol (Dr. Ellicott) was chairman of the New Testament company; Bishop Thirlwall (St. David's), and afterwards Bishop Harold Browne (Winchester), of the Old Testament company.

The labours of the New Testament revisers extended over a period of ten years and five months, and were brought to a close on November 11th, 1880, whilst the revision of the Old Testament was not completed until July 10th, 1884. The leading rule for both companies was "to introduce as few alterations as possible into the text of the Authorised Version consistently with faithfulness."

Revised Version of the New Testament.—By a systematic comparison of MSS., the New Testament company formed a revised text of the Greek Testament (afterwards published in full as the Revisers' Text of the Greek Testament), which was the basis of their revision. A few specimens of the various kinds of changes made may be given. The well-known text of the three heavenly witnesses [1 John v. 7] disappears, because it is found only in one or two Greek MSS., and those of not the slightest authority. This was a necessary correction of the text. Amongst words and phrases which have altered in meaning may be mentioned, "by and by" [Matt. xiii. 21], which formerly meant "straightway," as it now appears in the Revised New Testament. In the same verse, the word "is offended" has given place to "stumbleth," since the meaning is, not that the man is irritated and angry at persecution, but that it makes him stumble in his religious walk or life, and so become unfruitful. To "precede" takes the place of "prevent" in 1 Thess. iv. 15; and "judgment," of "damnation" in John v. 29 and 1 Cor. xi. 29. These various emendations are very numerous, and especially valuable in the epistles, the meaning of which in many difficult places has been rendered quite clear: thus, "I know nothing by myself," is now, rightly, "I know nothing against myself" [1 Cor. iv. 4]; and Philipp. ii. 6, "Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God," is now made plain by being rendered "... counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God."

Revised Version of the Old Testament.—Whilst the oldest MSS. of the New Testament date from the fourth and fifth centuries, the oldest Hebrew MSS. of the Old Testament only date from the tenth and eleventh centuries, and these, unlike the MSS. of the New Testament, belong to one family—i.e. have come from one source—and do not differ in essentials from the Masoretic, or traditional Hebrew text, printed in ordinary Hebrew Bibles; hence the Old Testament revisers had not the materials for forming a new text. Besides this, the ancient versions of the Hebrew Bible, of which the Septuagint is the oldest and most important, yield a text which, in the opinion of scholars, is inferior to the ordinary Hebrew one, so that although very valuable emendations have been made by the help of these various materials, the number of them is much less than in the New Testament. A few specimens of the changes in the revised Old Testament may be given. Gen. xii. 6; xiii. 18, etc.: "the plain of Moreh," "the plain of Mamre," become "the oak of Moreh," "the oaks of Mamre." In Exod. xxxiv. 13, "cut down their groves," is rendered "cut down their asherim," since asherah is not a grove, but the wooden symbol of a goddess, of which the plural is asherim. This change has been made in several places. Generally speaking, the translation of the Psalms in the Authorised Version is a good one. There are, however, some valuable changes in the revision; thus the meaning of Ps. xvi. 2, 3 is now made plain. Authorised Version: "O my soul, thou hast said unto the LORD, Thou art my Lord: my goodness extendeth not to thee; But to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight," reads in the Revised Version, "I have said unto the LORD, Thou art my Lord: I have no good beyond thee. As for the saints that are in the earth, They are the excellent in whom is all my delight."

It is a great gain to the unlearned reader that he should have before him in the Revised Version of the New Testament an exact translation of what is, in the judgment of competent scholars, a close approximation to the actual text of the original Greek, instead of one made from a text confessedly imperfect; and in the Revised Version of the Old Testament a translation of the Hebrew, much more accurate than that of the Authorised Version. The gain is so great that it is to be regretted that anything should have hindered the popularity of the revised Bible; but in the New Testament (not in the Old) there are a considerable number of small verbal alterations, which, without conveying to the ordinary reader any point in the original Greek, mar the rhythm of well-known passages; the repetition of "and" in Matt. xiii. 37-39 is one instance in point.

To many it will be a consoling thought to remember that in the Revised Bible no Scripture doctrine, no Scripture precept has been changed; and that whatever can be proved from the old version can be proved from the new. The great truths of religion remain firm; indeed, the accuracy of the translation renders them far less exposed to challenge than they were before.

The interesting preface—"The Translators to the Reader"—of the revisers of 1611, and the prefaces of the Old and New Testament companies of the present time, are well worth careful perusal.

Revision of the Prayer-Book.

In the article on COMMON PRAYER we have told how the attempted revision of 1689 came to nothing. About twenty-five years ago the question was again raised, the arguments adduced being twofold. In the first place, it was maintained that there is a general tendency in all human productions to require correction and amendment, and, secondly, that there were certain specific blemishes which it was asserted might be safely and easily removed. But the proposal was strenuously resisted on the ground that though the first statement may be freely admitted, it is not well in a time of controversies, and of the need of fighting greater evils, to run the risk of injuring where improvement is sought. "The fit time for alteration," said Bishop Wilberforce, in his charge of 1860, "the fit hands for altering the model after which the change will be fashioned, the amount of good which can be gained, as set against the amount of evil which may be incurred, each and all of these must be separately and minutely weighed, before a man of understanding will be ready to apply to any proposed alteration the general proposition, which he cannot dispute, that all the works and inventions of man are capable of improvement. A valuable and intricate piece of productive machinery may be capable of great improvements; but what wise man would suffer an engineer to interfere with its imperfect completeness until he was satisfied that the would-be improver comprehended the whole design of the constructor, and could weigh all the difficulties, and grasp all the capacities, and provide for all the necessities of the instrument he sought to make more perfect? A well within a besieged fortress might unquestionably be made more valuable by a deeper sinking of its shaft, and yet a wise general would not allow the improvement to be attempted at a time when the life of the garrison depended on, and could be maintained by, the supply of water which was then to be obtained from it, and which must needs be for the time interrupted to carry out the desired improvement. Still less would he allow it, if there were the remotest risk of altogether losing the present supply, though it were but barely sufficient, or of letting in, perhaps, some unwholesome or unpalatable streams to poison its present sweetness, without the certainty of obtaining in its stead a spring at once as wholesome and more abundant."

The Bishop then goes on to apply his parable, and declares that the hands by which the alterations would have to be made, are not qualified as were those which settled our present Liturgy. "The problem which they had to solve was, how to maintain the old Catholic element, and yet to clear it of the accretions and corruptions by which, during centuries of superstition, it had been gradually overlaid, and its purity tarnished. This could be effected safely only by a rare combination in those who were to work the change of a loving reverence for the old truth, with a keen, clear-sighted view, and a resolute rejection of the newer corruptions. What a history is that of our present Reformation, with its great divines deeply trained in the old learning, and yet full of the new light of a recovered Gospel, with its struggles, and its sorrows, and its checks—of the working out of this problem. Can we say that the present advocates of revision are men of this stamp? Do they manifest the deep knowledge of liturgical principles, the shrinking reverence for the old Catholic element, which would free their desire of eliminating evil from the certain ruin which would follow if haply men of a narrow, dry, captious spirit were to obtain the mastery when the work of revision were begun, and succeed in remodelling, according to their view, our great inheritance of primitive prayers?

"There is some risk in beginning alterations even when all have agreed beforehand where they shall stop, because the love of change grows by its indulgence. But this danger is indefinitely increased if there be no agreement as to the limits of alteration, and if behind the moderate and somewhat impassive favours of change stand a sterner body, with deeper convictions, ulterior ends, and a far more restless energy. And this is our condition. Behind the modern revisionist, who would change a few obsolete expressions, render definite a few obscure rubrics, retrench a few redundancies, and give us a better compacted, and, where it is desired, a briefer office, stand men with far other objects and far different claims. Alleged doctrinal purity, an accomplished reformation, such a cleansing of the Common Prayer as would cleanse out of the ministry of the Church all who differ from their own view of truth—these are the avowed intentions of some; the desire, half hidden from themselves, of more. There is no disguise or concealment as to this. Both before, and since the Reformation, the sacramental and anti-sacramental view has wrought strongly in the religious mind of England. It was a mighty and anxious problem whether the favours of these different views could be combined in one Reformed Church, with articles and formularies free from dishonest ambiguity of diction. This problem God gave to our fathers the grace to solve. To a marvellous degree the Church of England did combine all the men of both sections of thought who possessed any moderation of character. The struggle, indeed, was long, and often renewed; but, upon the whole, the fusion was most happily accomplished, and a rare inheritance of peace and purity was bequeathed to English Churchmen.

"This is exactly the character of which our more ardent revisionists would deprive her. It is an easy process. It is but to take from the common document that which expresses the side of truth to which we are disinclined, and the Catholic statement is transmuted into the confession of a sect. This is all that is asked of us. Only let us alter the language of the formularies of baptism, absolution, and ordination, and we shall remove occasions of misconception; only let us make, that is, the common document sufficiently one-sided to speak none but our own views."

Revivals of Religion.—The word "revival" in a religious sense is used to signify a movement in the Church which results in the quickening of religious feeling. Such events have undoubtedly occurred both in ancient and modern times. Thus Elijah, when "he restored the altar of the Lord, which was broken down," symbolised thereby that he came as the great reviver of religion when it was ready to die. The work of the Prophets was of a like character. St. Peter in his first sermon on the day of Pentecost addressed the Jews in language that implied that Christ Himself had come to revive in their hearts the religion of their fathers, to complete and not to destroy it. The history of Christianity has furnished marked epochs of a revival of religious life. Such, in spite of all faults and errors, were the Benedictine and Cistercian movements, and the Crusades; such the zeal of the Mendicant Friars and the Reformation. The Methodist movement of the last century, known by the name of "The Great Awakening," influenced the whole of England, Scotland, Ireland, and America. The Evangelical zeal of the last century, and of the Tract writers in the present, must be recognised as religious revivals. Mistakes are made, and much is said and done of which religious men on this side and that disapprove; but where there is genuine zeal for the souls of men and their well-being, it is always seen, when the din of controversy has died away, that good has been wrought and the kingdom of the Redeemer advanced. The most prominent of more recent revival movements has been that promoted on several successive occasions by the visits of Mr. Daniel Moody and Mr. Ira Sankey, two American evangelists, in which the distinct singing by the latter of hymns conveying simple truths of the Gospel—or what they considered to be such—formed a feature as prominent as the homely addresses of Mr. Moody. The testimony adduced on all sides to the great practical results of these services must be to any but prejudiced minds evidence of the real use and occasional need for such so-called revivals. Many doubtless relapse; but many more do not, and have testified by the consistent conduct of years to the blessing they had gained. It has, however, been felt and expressed by many of late that there is a danger in the so-called "undenominational" character of such services as those now referred to, though there may have been excuses for it in the neglect of express evangelistic effort by the various organised Churches. In some cases it has led to a development of Plymouth Brethrenism; but, apart from this, it has been felt that such movements often fail to provide subsequent responsible oversight and care for the new converts, and that it is better every way for the Churches themselves to undertake revival, or, strictly, evangelistic work. The Church of England has felt this very strongly, and has latterly introduced what are called "mission" services, with special preachers, often called "missioners," who make periodical visitations to parishes, by arrangement, with a view to stirring up religious life among the inhabitants. These are in reality revival movements and services under another name. Other denominations have, to a smaller extent, done the same thing, and this awakening of the Churches to their own duty seems gathering in force.

Reynolds, EDWARD, Bishop of Norwich, was born at Southampton in 1599, and educated at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became a Probation Fellow in 1620. On his ordination he became Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and Rector of Braynton in Northamptonshire. He was a prominent member of the Presbyterian party, and one of the Westminster Assembly. On the ejection of Dr. Fell from Oxford in 1646, Dr. Reynolds became Vice-Chancellor of the University, and afterwards Dean of Christ Church. However, he offended the zealots, and was ejected from the deanery by the Independents. He then became Vicar of St. Lawrence Jewry. At the Restoration he was appointed chaplain to King Charles, and Warden of Merton College. When the Bishopric of Norwich was offered him, it was much doubted whether he would take it; but he at last consented, and was consecrated, Jan. 6th, 1661. He ruled the diocese for sixteen years, working hard to improve the condition of the poorer clergy. He was present at the Savoy Conference in 1661, and composed the "General Thanksgiving," which was then inserted. He died in 1676.

Reynolds, JOHN, D.D. [sometimes written RAINOLDS] [b. at Pinho, Devonshire, 1549; d. at Oxford, 1617], a Puritan divine. For a short time he was Dean of Lincoln, and then was chosen President of Corpus Christi, Oxford. He was one of the four Puritans who represented their party at the HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE [q.v.], and is said to have been the first to propose the present Authorised Version of the Bible, to which he contributed the greater part of the Prophets.

Richard of St. Victor was born in Scotland in the twelfth century, and became prior of the Augustine abbey of St. Victor, in Paris, in 1162. He wrote several moral, theological, and mystical works, as De Statu Interioris Hominis, De Eruditione Interioris Hominis, De Verbo Incarnato, De Trinitate, De Emmanuele, and De Gratia Contemplationis.

Richelieu, ARMAND JEAN DU PLESSIS, CARDINAL, DUKE DE, was born at Paris in 1585. He was educated for a military career, but his brother, the Bishop of Luçon, giving up his See and entering a convent, Armand was looked upon as his successor. He therefore applied himself to the study of divinity, took his Doctor's degree, and was consecrated Bishop in 1607. He gained the favour of Marie de' Medici, mother of King Louis XIII., and became her Almoner; but on a quarrel breaking out between Marie and her son, Richelieu was banished to his diocese. He afterwards arranged a reconciliation between them, and gained influence over both. He was made a Cardinal in 1622, and in 1624 gained a seat in the Council, and became Prime Minister of France. His three great objects throughout his Ministerial career were [1] to render the power of the Crown absolute, and to humble the feudal nobility; [2] to annihilate the Huguenots as a political party; [3] to reduce the power of the House of Austria, both in its German and Spanish branches, and to extend that of France. In order to gain the latter object he assisted the Protestant Grisons against the Roman Catholic insurgents of Valtelina, while in France he was doing his utmost against the Huguenots, thus showing that he cared much more about their politics than their religion. Richelieu's death, which took place at Paris in 1642, caused much rejoicing to the people, on account of the burdens which he had laid upon them. He was buried in a mausoleum erected by Girardon in the church of the Sorbonne.

Richmond, LEIGH, the author of The Annals of the Poor [b. 1772, d. 1827], having graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, became Curate in the Isle of Wight, and in 1805 Rector of Turvey in Bedfordshire. One of his Annals, namely The Dairyman's Daughter, was at one time the most popular religious work in existence. Besides the work above mentioned he wrote Domestic Portraiture, and edited The Fathers of the English Church, or a Selection from the Writings of the Reformers and Early Protestant Divines of the Church of England, with Memorials of their Lives and Writings.

Ridley, NICHOLAS, Bishop of London, one of the most learned fathers of the Reformation, was born of good family at Willymondwhyte, in Northumberland, in 1500. At the expense of his uncle, Dr. Robert Ridley, he was sent to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, having received his early education at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. His progress in learning was rapid, and raised him to high repute, not only in his own university, but in that of Oxford, where he was invited to accept an honourable and profitable appointment, which, however, he declined. With a view to his further improvement his uncle enabled him to travel to foreign universities. After three years spent abroad he returned to Cambridge, and devoted himself to the study of divinity, and to the reading of the Scriptures in their original languages. In a walk in the orchard of Pembroke Hall, which is to this day called "Ridley's Walk," he learned to repeat without book almost all the epistles in Greek. Of this study Ridley himself speaks, in the affecting farewell which he wrote to his friends just before his death: "Though in time I did forget much of them again, yet the sweet smell thereof I trust I shall carry with me into heaven, and the profit thereof I have felt in all my life hitherto." He was Senior Proctor when the point of the Pope's right of universal dominion in Church and State was examined upon the authority of Scripture; and he signed the resolution which declared "That the Bishop of Rome had no more authority or jurisdiction, derived to him from God, in this kingdom of England than any other foreign bishop." His uncle died in 1536, but his great learning and abilities procured for him the patronage of Cranmer, who made him his Chaplain, and presented him to the vicarage of Herne, in East Kent. After about two years at Herne, he was chosen Master of Pembroke Hall, and appointed Chaplain to Henry VIII. He obtained also a prebendal stall in Canterbury Cathedral, and was considered, next to Cranmer, the greatest support of the Reformation among the clergy. In 1547 Edward VI. made him Bishop of Rochester, and in 1550 translated him to London. It is said that his preaching on charity before Edward VI. so moved the King that it induced him to found three institutions—one for the sick and wounded, another for such as were wickedly idle or mad, and a third for the education of poor children. His Majesty endowed St. Bartholomew's Hospital for the first, Bridewell for the second, and Christ's Hospital (the Blue-coat School) for the third.

Ridley assisted Cranmer in the first edition of the Common Prayer, published in 1548, and his treatises on questions then in dispute were many and valuable. On the accession of Mary, Ridley, together with Cranmer and Latimer, was sent to the Tower. Here they lay all the winter of 1553; but it being resolved to hold a public disputation with the Protestant divines, they were in the following spring removed to Oxford, and though they were shortly to be called upon to defend their views, they were denied the assistance of their books and even the use of pen, ink, and paper. After their first examination they were separated from each other.

In 1555 a commission was issued to several bishops to proceed still further against Latimer and Ridley, who were brought before the commissioners for examination on the last day of September and again on October 1st. Notwithstanding all the persuasions and threats of their enemies, they continued steadfast in the profession of that faith which they had received as the faith of Christ; they were accordingly judged to be obstinate heretics, sentenced to be degraded from all offices in the Church, and delivered over to the magistrates to be punished. On October 15th, Dr. Brooke, Bishop of Gloucester, with the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, and many other heads of the university, came to the house of Mr. Irish, then Mayor of Oxford, where Ridley was confined, for the purpose of degrading him from the dignity of priesthood. He was again exhorted to return to the faith of the Roman Church and submit to the authority of the Pope; but, on his refusal, they began the ceremony of taking off the cap and putting a surplice upon him. They then brought the chalice and the host, and desired him to hold them in his hands; but he said, "They shall not come into my hands; if they do, they shall fall to the ground for all me." Upon this, some one was appointed to hold them in his hand, and Dr. Brooke said in Latin, "We do take from thee the office of preaching the Gospel." At these words Ridley sighed deeply, looked up towards heaven, and said, "O Lord God, forgive them this their wickedness." This ceremony being ended, Ridley said, "If you have done, give me leave to talk with you a little concerning these matters." Brooke answered, "We may not talk with you, you are out of the Church." Then Ridley said, "Since you will not talk with me, nor will vouchsafe to hear me, what remedy but patience, and I refer my cause to my heavenly Father, who will reform things that be amiss when it shall please Him." As they were going, Ridley said, "My lord, I wish that your lordship would vouchsafe to read over a little book of Bertram's concerning the Sacrament; you will find therein much good learning if you will read it with an indifferent judgment." To this Brooke made no answer, but was going away, when Ridley said, "Well, as it is to no purpose, I will say no more; I will talk of worldly affairs." He then entreated Dr. Brooke to interest himself with the Queen on behalf of a great many poor men to whom he had granted leases while he was Bishop of London, which had been taken away from them by Bonner, who had succeeded him in the bishopric. On behalf of these Ridley wrote a supplication to the Queen, wherein he prayed her Majesty that they might be restored to their possessions, or, if this request could not be granted, that their loss might be made up by the sale of his own plate and other effects which he had left in his house at the time of his imprisonment. He also further besought the Queen to take under her protection his sister and her husband, who, with three children, had been dependent upon him. For their support he had made a small provision, which Bonner had deprived them of, notwithstanding the great kindness which Ridley had shown to Bonner's mother and sister. This supplication Ridley delivered to his brother-in-law to present to the Queen, requesting Dr. Brooke to second it with his support, which he promised to do, and then formally delivered Ridley to the bailiffs, charging them to bring him to the place of execution when they were commanded. The same evening, being the night before he suffered, as he sat at supper, he bade his hostess and the rest at board to his "marriage," as he termed his death, which he believed would admit him to the marriage supper of the Lamb. At this conversation Mrs. Irish wept; but Ridley comforted her, and said, "Oh, Mrs. Irish, quiet yourself; though my breakfast be somewhat sharp and painful, yet am I sure my supper shall be more pleasant and sweet." When they arose from table, his brother offered to watch all night with him; but he said, "No, that you shall not, for I intend (God willing) to go to bed and to sleep as quietly to-night as ever I did in my life." His brother then departed, exhorting him to be of good cheer and to take his cross quietly, for the reward was great.

The place appointed for the burning of Ridley and Latimer was on the north side of Oxford, close to Balliol College. Hither, on Oct. 16th, 1555, the prisoners were brought by the Mayor and bailiffs. Ridley was dressed in a black gown, furred and faced with ermine, such as he used to wear when he was a bishop. He also had a tippet furred about his neck, a velvet night-cap upon his head, with a corner cap upon the same. He walked to the stake in slippers between the Mayor and Aldermen. The aged Latimer followed. When they were come to the stake, Ridley, earnestly holding up both his hands, looked towards heaven. Then seeing Latimer, with a cheerful look he ran to him, embraced and kissed him, saying, "Be of good heart, brother, for God will either assuage the fury of the flame or else strengthen us to abide it." He then went to the stake, kissed it, kneeled down by it and earnestly prayed; beside him kneeled Latimer, likewise earnestly calling upon God. Ridley took his gown and tippet, and gave them to his brother-in-law, who had affectionately remained at Oxford the whole time of his imprisonment, to provide him necessities; some other of his apparel he also gave away, the rest the bailiffs took. He made presents also of some other small things to gentlemen who were standing by weeping. Then, being in his shirt, he stood upon the stone by the stake, and held up his hands and said, "O heavenly Father, I give unto Thee most hearty thanks, for that Thou hast called me to be a professor of Thee even unto death. I beseech Thee, Lord God, take mercy upon this realm of England, and deliver the same from all her enemies." A smith brought a chain and bound Ridley and Latimer round the middle to the stake. As he was knocking in a staple, Ridley said, "Good fellow, knock it in hard, for the flesh will have its course." His brother brought some gunpowder in a bag, and tied it about his neck. Ridley said, "I will take it to be sent of God; have you any for my brother Latimer?" Ridley then addressed the Lord Williams, who presided on this awful occasion, respecting his letter of supplication to the Queen, entreating him to favour the cause of the poor men on whose behalf he had petitioned her Majesty, saying, "There is nothing in all the world troubleth me, I thank God, this only excepted." A lighted faggot was brought and laid at Ridley's feet; upon which, Latimer said, "Be of good comfort, brother Ridley, and play the man; we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust never shall be put out." When Ridley saw the fire flaming up towards him, he cried with a loud voice, "Into Thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit; Lord receive my spirit," and afterwards repeated often, "Lord, Lord, receive my spirit." Latimer died very soon, and appeared to suffer little pain; but Ridley, by the ill-making of the fire, the faggots being green, and built too high above the furze, which prevented the flame from ascending, while the fire burnt fiercely beneath, was put to so much exquisite torture, that he desired them, for God's sake, to let the fire come at him. His brother-in-law heard his cry, but not understanding well what he said, heaped up more faggots upon him, intending to put an end to his sufferings. This, however, made the fire rage more fiercely beneath, so that his lower parts were burned before the flame had touched the upper. Yet in all this torment he forgot not to call upon God, still saying, "Lord have mercy upon me," mingling his cry with, "Let the fire come unto me, I cannot burn." In these pains he laboured till one of the standers-by with his bill pulled off the faggots above, and opened a passage for the flames. When the fire touched the gunpowder he ceased to move, but turned on the other side and fell down at Latimer's feet.

Righteousness. [JUSTIFICATION.]

Right side.—The right side of the altar was anciently understood to mean the side on the right hand facing eastwards, and in this sense it is used in the old English Liturgies, in which it is directed that the Epistle should be read at the right side and the Gospel at the left. In 1485 it was ordained in the Roman Pontifical, published at Venice, that henceforth the right hand and the left should be taken from the crucifix on the altar, and not from the position of the officiating priest, by which arrangement the old direction was reversed.

Rigorists.—A small section of the Jansenists [q.v.] were contemptuously given this name by their opposers on account of the stern rules and severe discipline practised by them. It was particularly applied to those Jansenists who lived in the Spanish Netherlands.

Ring [in matrimony].—The custom of placing a ring on the bride's hand after the vows are taken in the Marriage Service is very ancient, though by the early Christians it appears that it was employed in the ceremony of espousal, and not at the marriage itself. In the Marriage Service the ring is said to be "a token and pledge" of the promises which have just been made; and it has also been considered as a type of the endowment of the wife with her husband's worldly goods, and of her admittance to his closest confidence. The ring is made of gold to symbolise truth and constancy; and it is placed upon the third finger of the left hand for three reasons:—[1] It was formerly believed that a vein came direct from the heart to that finger; [2] this finger being little used, the ring was less likely to wear out; and [3] there was an ancient ceremony connected with the placing of it. The bridegroom placed it successively on the bride's thumb, first and second fingers, saying, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;" then he left it on her third finger, saying, "Amen." The extreme antiquity of the custom caused it to be generally accepted among Christians, though for some time after the Reformation it was regarded with some suspicion by the stricter Protestants, as being superstitious and Popish. Jeremy Taylor's Sermon on the Marriage Ring is one of the most famous works of the illustrious preacher.

Ripidia were fans used in the early Church to keep away flies and dust. The Liturgy of St. Chrysostom directs that the deacon shall use a fan to preserve the elements upon the altar from all impurities, and, where there is no fan, the chalice-veil is to be used for the purpose.

Ripon, BISHOPRIC OF.—In the year 678, on the division of the great northern diocese, Archbishop Theodore is said to have appointed one Eadhed to a new bishopric at Ripon; but he had no successors, and it was not till 1836 that it was reconstituted into a See, taken from the dioceses of York and Chester, and comprising the important towns of Bradford, Halifax, Huddersfield, Leeds, and Wakefield. There have been three bishops—

Charles Thomas Longley	1836
Robert Bickersteth	1857
William Boyd Carpenter	1894

The cathedral body consists of a dean, two archdeacons, four canons, three minor canons, and eighteen honorary canons. The endowment of the See is £4,200 a year.

The Venerable Bede is the first to mention a church at Ripon, said to have been erected by St. Wilfrid in the seventh century; but archaeologists differ in opinion as to whether the present structure occupies the same site, or whether St. Wilfrid built a second church. It was originally the church of a monastery, over which the saint presided, and the crypt, known as "St. Wilfrid's Needle," is considered without doubt to belong to his foundation. His abbey became one of the three great churches of Yorkshire, and the immunity of sanctuary and the right of using the ordeal were among the privileges granted to it by Athelstan. The church was rebuilt by Archbishop Roger of York [1164-81]; of this there are only small remains in the choir and transepts, but they form a valuable specimen of the Transition period. Archbishop Gray [1215-65] added two western towers and rebuilt the façade which connects them. About 1280 the east end of the choir gave way and was rebuilt. In 1319 the Scots, during one of their incursions, set fire to it; and a century later it suffered from a storm which shattered its lantern tower, but it was restored. At the close of the sixteenth century the minster again suffered by lightning. In 1842 it was declared to be unsafe, and precautions were taken to ward off the danger; and in 1861 it was put into the hands of Sir Gilbert Scott, who carried out a complete restoration of the cathedral.

Rippon, JOHN, D.D., Baptist minister [b. at Liverton, Devon, 1751; d. in London, 1836], for sixty-three years minister of a Baptist congregation in London. He is known as the editor of A Selection of Hymns, published in 1787, and afterwards enlarged; it contains hymns by many authors, and is one of the most important hymn-books in the English language. He edited the Hymns of Dr. Watts, and the Baptist Annual Register from 1790 to 1802.

Rite [Lat. ritus] is a solemn form or prescribed office of religion. The title of the Book of Common Prayer speaks of "Rites and Ceremonies," the distinction between the two being that a rite is an act of prescribed worship whether including ceremonies or not, while a ceremony is any part of religious worship which prescribes action, position, or the assumption of any particular vestment.

Ritule.—The name given to the book containing the liturgy of the Roman Church, which is mainly for the use of the priests. It contains the services for baptism, penance, marriage, etc. It was drawn up during the thirteenth century, to prevent any change or alteration in the ritual of the services.

Ritualism.—Strictly speaking, a Ritualist is one who studies the history and character of the ancient rites of the Church, like Bingham, the author of the Ecclesiastical Antiquities. But the name of Ritualism is now given to the practical developments of the High Church views promulgated in the Tracts for the Times [TRACTARIANISM], and in other writings of Pusey and Keble. Those views taught that the Sacraments were actual means of conveying grace, that Baptism conveys Regeneration, and that in the Eucharist Christ is verily and indeed present, though in a spiritual manner. The use of new ritual in the Church of England, which sprang up almost suddenly about the year 1869, was the assertion of these views by visible symbolism. No new doctrine was advanced, but the doctrines which had hitherto been taught to the ear were now sought to be inculcated through the eye.

There are, however, two distinct elements to be traced in the Ritualistic movement. The one is the æsthetic. A great wave of antiquarian, artistic, architectural feeling has passed over Europe. Partly this was a reaction against the French Revolution; in our own country it was against the Whiggism of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The revival of Gothic architecture, strange to say, was largely owing to a Quaker, Rickman, but it has been strong and continuous. Thousands of new churches have arisen beautiful of form, and in which music has been cultivated to a degree which would have struck our forefathers, with their trombones and Tate and Brady Psalms, with astonishment. In Presbyterian Scotland the change has been no less wonderful. Glasgow Cathedral is filled with stained glass, and many churches have organs, which once were considered the special mark of the Beast. The other element is the sacerdotal doctrine. The adoption of special vestments marks a conviction on the part of the adopters that the doctrine of the Sacraments is at one with that of the Church of Rome, so far as regards real efficacy in them, and a special presence of Christ. It is said by its advocates, "There is no evil in approximating to Rome or to any other Christian body; whatever promotes Unity is good and not bad. It is true that there have been those who held the Pope to be Antichrist, but this is not the doctrine of the Church of England or of educated men. We will, so far as we can, assert our points of union. There is in every religious ceremonial a dramatic element—the breaking of the bread and the pouring out of the wine is such; therefore we do right to attach importance to the teaching of the eye."

Thus it is matter of fact that our generation has seen the introduction into public worship of practices, some of which have not been in use since the days of Elizabeth, the alleged ground for the renewal being that the Church has suffered and lost ground through their disuse. These practices, known as the "Six Points," are:—[1] the use of Coloured [or White] Vestments; [2] Lights on the Lord's Table; [3] the Mixed Chalice; [4] Unleavened Bread; [5] the Eastward Position; [6] Incense. [Each is considered in its place.] In 1867 Dean Stanley wrote an article in the Edinburgh Review advocating the toleration of the Ritualists. "Alien," he wrote, "as many of their tenets are to the general spirit of their Church and nation, they have enough in common with the composite aspect of the formularies of the Church, and the double-sided character of the nation, to give them a standing-place in the eye at once of law and of charity. It must also be added that they have virtues of their own which supply a useful counterpoise to the narrowness or perverseness of other elements in the ecclesiastical world. In the earlier days of the movement they counted amongst their ranks lofty characters and noble deeds and persuasive words, which the English Church will not willingly let die. Amongst them are still to be found some endowed with ardent, self-denying activity; some gifted with a refined or fiery eloquence, which redeem much that we condemn in their theory and their position, and which place them thus far on a level with the equally ardent and more successful leaders of the Wesleyan movement in former times, and with those numerous clergy in our own time who need no stimulant from party-spirit, or from sectarian zeal, to devote themselves to the unobtrusive performance of their Master's work. And we must remember that these High Church Dissenters are more amenable to the control of English law, to the softening effects of social and Christian intercourse, inside the National Church, than if they were cast out from it. By expelling them from it we should not divest ourselves of our responsibility in regard to them. We cannot burn them, as in the days of Mary; we cannot hang them, as in the days of Elizabeth; we cannot banish them, as in the days of Charles I. or Cromwell. By driving them to extremities we might perpetuate the evil for generations. If they became a separate sect, they would remain like other Nonconformists, with the additional extravagance which every isolated and exasperated sect is sure to take to itself. If they became Roman Catholics, they and those who are guided by them would be parted from the national interests and national sympathies by a gulf which it might take centuries to close. On the other hand, if they were allowed to retain their position within the Church, the fashion would probably pass away with the present generation, and their children and grandchildren would be the staunch Puritans or Liberals of the coming age; and even they themselves, judging by the changes which come over individuals and parties, would imperceptibly melt away into the adjacent shades of opinion, by which they are inextricably attached to the diverse, but still homogeneous, body of the Established Clergy."

The counsel thus given was not followed. Before it was given, attempts had been made to put down Ritualism. An attack was made on some coloured altar-cloths at Knightsbridge, and the judgment in favour of them incidentally laid much stress on the ORNAMENTS RUBRIC [q.v.], and, in consequence, around this rubric the controversies multiplied. The resumption of the vestments was avowedly based upon the ground that they were certainly in use "in the second year of Edward VI.," and that the Rubric therefore sanctions them. In fact the Ritualists steadily affirmed that they were only reviving what that Rubric sanctioned. Unhappily the controversies which arose were carried on with extreme bitterness and even insolence of language; and when, in place of the toleration of opinion for which Stanley pleaded, fresh prosecutions were set on foot, both parties were fierce in their animosities. The various judgments that were given were conflicting: they were the Knightsbridge, in 1857; the Mackonochie, in 1868; and the Purchas, in 1871. The Ritualists, acquiring boldness both from the conflicting views which had been laid down, and also from the success which they claimed to have had in drawing people to the churches and in influencing large masses of the population for good, refused to be bound by the judgments. Their opponents pointed out that the older fathers of the Tract movement had never adopted these practices; but Dr. Pusey immediately came to their defence, and declared that he and his friends had always understood the Ornaments Rubric as did the Ritualists, and were conscious of themselves disobeying it, but that they felt that they had to teach the faith to a forgetful generation, and therefore they left it for their successors to revive. Two societies sprang up: the English Church Union, to defend and protect the Rubric as the Ritualists understood it; and the Church Association, to maintain what their opponents understood as the Protestantism of the Church of England. In anxiety to bring about a uniformity of practice, Archbishop Tait brought in the Public Worship Regulation Act in 1874, and the FOLKESTONE JUDGMENT [q.v.], in 1877, declared almost entirely against Ritualism. The repudiation of this decision by the whole main body of the High Church party led to a fresh endeavour of the Archbishop to revise the ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS [q.v.]. A Report has been made, but has never been sanctioned by Parliament. Meanwhile peace has to a great extent returned. Archbishop Tait himself, in at least a dozen cases, prevented prosecutions by the exercise of the resc which the Act gives, and his example has been almost universally followed by the bishops. It is felt on all sides that the evangelisation of the people, and the relief of misery, are of infinitely greater moment than "questions about vestments and candlesticks," to use the late Archbishop's phrase, and that any system which promotes these works must possess elements of good. Mutual forbearance has done much already, and will do more.

Robertson, FREDERICK WILLIAM, a famous English preacher, was born in London on Feb. 8rd, 1816. At the age of nine he was sent to the grammar school of Beverley, in Yorkshire, where he remained till his parents removed to Tours. He attended a French seminary while he was abroad, and returned to England with his father on the breaking out of the Revolution in 1830. He attended Edinburgh Academy for a year, and then removed to the University. In 1833 he was articled to a solicitor, but the work was uncongenial to him, and his health broke down. It was then arranged that he should enter the army, but he waited in vain for a commission, and finally, in 1836, entered Brasenose College, Oxford, in order to study for the Church. He took a great interest in the debates at the Union, but the chief influence on his life here was that wrought by the writings of Arnold and Wordsworth. He was ordained in 1840, and was appointed curate to St. Maurice and St. Mary Calendar in Winchester; but his health broke down in the course of a year, and he was obliged to go abroad. On his return, in 1842, he became curate of Christ Church, Cheltenham. In 1846, whilst in the Tyrol, occurred a great struggle in his mind, the result of which was that his views, which had previously been strongly Evangelical, became very "Broad," as it is popularly termed; and he manifested a peculiar animosity against the Evangelical party ever afterwards. On his return to England he resigned his appointment at Cheltenham, and early in 1849 went to St. Ebb's, Oxford, where he was just beginning to attract the attention of the undergraduates, when he removed to Trinity Chapel, Brighton. Here he continued to work for exactly six years, dying on the anniversary of his arrival there, August 15th, 1853. He was chiefly noted for his sermons, and for the lectures he gave for the benefit of the working men. The chief charm of these lay in the delicacy and strength of thought, poetic beauty, and homely lucidity of speech. He was at one time of his life grossly misunderstood and considered as unorthodox, owing partly to his rejection of what is commonly called the propitiatory view of the Atonement, and partly to his constant recognition of "the soul of good in things evil," a favourite phrase in his sermons; but his death greatly widened his influence. He published none of his sermons, but four volumes of them were prepared from reports which he had written after they had been preached, or from his notes, some of them being merely skeletons, which were largely amplified in actual delivery. These ran through many editions, and were followed by others, including Notes on Genesis and on The First Epistle to the Corinthians, the last being The Human Race, and other Sermons, published in 1881. His Life and Letters have also been published, written and edited by the Rev. Stopford Brooke.

Robertson, JAMES CRAIGIE [b. 1813, d. 1882], Canon of Canterbury, and Professor of Ecclesiastical History at King's College, London, wrote several works on that subject, as How shall we Conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England? [1843], History of the Christian Church to the Reformation [1853-73], Sketches of Church History [1855-78], Biography of Thomas Becket [1859], and Plain Lectures on the Growth of the Papal Power [1876]. His Church History is now regarded as the standard work on the subject.

Robertson, WILLIAM.—An eminent Scottish historian and controversialist [b. 1721, d. 1793]. Little is known of his early life, but he was a volunteer in the '45; four years after, he received his licence to preach, and became minister of the Old Greyfriars in Edinburgh in 1758. Next year he published his history of Scotland, in 1769 that of Charles V., and in 1777, of America. He was made one of the King's Chaplains in 1761, and Principal of the University in 1762. In 1751 he appeared on the General Assembly, and was soon recognised as the leader of the "Moderates" in the great Patronage Controversy which was then going on [SECESSIONISTS], a position which he held for many years. He retired into private life in 1780, living in a country house thenceforward till his death. He proved how faithful he remained to his moderate principles, by pleading in the year of his retirement for relaxation of the penal statutes against the Roman Catholics. For this he incurred great odium, and his house was attacked by the mob.

Another curious controversy in which he was engaged arose out of Home's once famous tragedy of Douglas. Home was a minister, and a great outcry was made both against him and against some of the ministers who went to see the play performed in Edinburgh. So fierce was the storm that Home resigned his pastoral charge. Carlyle, one of the Edinburgh ministers, was suspended by his Presbytery, and appealed to the Synod, which reversed the suspension; but by a majority of three carried a sentence of "admonition." From the Synod the case was carried to the Assembly, when Robertson stood forth as Carlyle's defender and the advocate of liberty, and the judgment of the Synod was confirmed by 117 to 39. During the sitting of the General Assembly, Mrs. Siddons was acting in Edinburgh, and the business had to be arranged so that unimportant matters should be taken on her days, as the younger clergy all went to see her. Robertson was much admired as a preacher in his day, but is better remembered now as the historian, the liberal theologian, and the friend of Hume. His histories have been superseded, owing to the immense stores of knowledge which have been opened since his time, but his dignity, learning, and grasp of his subject merit the highest praise.

Robinson, EDWARD, D.D., LL.D., Biblical scholar and explorer of the Holy Land [b. at Southington, Connecticut, April 10th, 1794; d. at New York, Jan. 27th, 1863]. He first studied law; then in 1821 entered a theological seminary. In 1826 he came to Europe, studied at Göttingen, Berlin, and Halle, and returned in 1830 to his native country; became Biblical Professor, and published several works elucidating sacred history and literature. His Dictionary of the Bible and Greek and English Lexicon are much used by students. He was obliged to resign his professorship in 1833 on account of ill-health, after which he published a new edition of Newcome's Harmony of the Gospels, and in 1837 made a voyage to the Holy Land, for the purpose of study and exploration, returning to Berlin in 1838. He spent two years in writing Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinai, and Arabia Petraea, which appeared in several editions, and permanently established his reputation as a Biblical scholar. After the publication of this work, he again took up his professorship at Andover, which he held till his death. In 1851 he made another visit to Palestine, and again to Europe in 1862. Besides the works above mentioned, Robinson assisted Professor Stuart in editing a Hebrew grammar, and wrote a Physical Geography of the Holy Land.

Robinson, JOHN [b. 1575, d. 1625].—The minister of the Independent Church in Holland from which departed the earliest settlers of New England. He was a native of Lincolnshire, and educated at Benet's (Corpus Christi) College, Cambridge—a college then much inclined to Puritanism. He gained a Fellowship after taking his degree, and was ordained to a charge in the diocese of Norwich; but his Puritan convictions deepening, he left the Church in 1604, and became pastor of a small Independent congregation. To enjoy the religious liberty then only to be found in the Dutch Republic, these endeavoured to leave England in 1607 for Holland, but were prevented by the authorities. Another attempt, in 1608, was, however, successful, and they reached Amsterdam and afterwards Leyden. How a little band from this settlement started, in 1620, for America, is told in the article upon the PILGRIM FATHERS, Robinson remaining behind with the intention of following with the rest when the way should be cleared; but this intention was frustrated by his death in 1625. Robinson was a man of great intelligence and candour, and, though a strict Puritan and thorough Independent, was liberal and tolerant, and on various occasions after his secession communicated with the Episcopalians. He published A Defence of the Brownists; Justification of the Separation from the Church of England; People's Plea for the Exercise of Prophecy [1618]; Essays, Moral and Divine [1618]. One passage uttered by John Robinson has become historical, and has been quoted times without number by men of widely different schools of thought. It was in his memorable address to the emigrants at the close of their last solemn religious service, on the eve of their departure for the New World. He said, "If God reveal anything to you by any other instrument of His, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive any truth by my ministry; for I am verily persuaded—I am very confident—that the Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of His Holy Word. For my part I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the Reformed Churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go at present no further than the instruments of their reformation. The Lutherans cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw: whatever part of His will our good God has revealed to Calvin, they will rather die than embrace it. And the Calvinists, you see, stick fast where they were left by that great man of God, who yet saw not all things."

Robinson, ROBERT, an eminent Baptist minister, was born at Swaffham, in Norfolk, in Jan., 1735. He attended a grammar school till 1749, when he was apprenticed to a hair-dresser. He rose early to continue his studies, and his master, noticing his gifts, cancelled his indentures before the time. Robinson first belonged to the Calvinistic Methodists, but left the society, and in 1759 he became a Baptist minister to a congregation near Cambridge. His sermons were very popular, and it became the fashion for undergraduates to attend his services. He died while on a visit to Dr. Priestley, at Birmingham, in 1790. His chief work was a History of Baptism, published after his death. He also wrote Ecclesiastical Researches, translated Saurin's sermons, and published some of his own. He was the author of some popular hymns.

Roch, St., the son of a gentleman of Languedoc, was born at Montpellier at the end of the thirteenth century. His mother, Liberia, is said to have found the mark of a small red cross on his breast when he was a child, and arguing from that that his life was to be one of sanctity, she took the greatest pains that his education should be fitting to such a life. When he was about twenty his parents died, and he found himself the possessor of a rich and beautiful estate. By the laws of France he could not give up his rights entirely, as he wished to do, so he handed over the management of it to an uncle, and set out as a pilgrim, begging his way to Rome. Passing through the town of Aquapendente, in Tuscany, he found that the plague was raging fiercely, and immediately offered his services to the Governor of the Hospital. When the town was free of the pestilence he moved to another town which was afflicted in the same manner, and devoted himself to nursing and caring for the victims—to all appearance almost miraculously free from risk of infection. He spent three years at Rome, and then journeyed through Lombardy. At Piacenza he was himself at length stricken with the plague, and in spite of all his self-denying care of others, he was left entirely alone, and even told with great sternness that he must leave the town, though almost unable to move. He got as far as a poor hut in a neighbouring wood, and there took shelter. Here he was found by a charitable nobleman named Gothard, who, in spite of the deadly and infectious disease from which he was suffering, nursed him most tenderly. When Roch got well he persuaded Gothard to give up the world and devote himself to the religious life. He then returned to France, and died there Aug. 17th, 1327. He was buried in his native town; but in 1485 his body was removed to Venice, where, in consequence of the great veneration in which his name was held, a large church was built for the reception of his relics.

Rochester, BISHOPRIC OF.—This See was established by King Ethelbert and St. Augustine, the first Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 604, at the same time with the re-establishment of that of London. The Bishops of Rochester seem originally to have occupied a position somewhat similar to that of Suffragans to the Archbishops of Canterbury, with a small fixed diocese also assigned to them, somewhat irregularly distributed in the west of Kent. In 1840 a great change was made in consequence of the vast increase of the Metropolis, and the counties of Hertford and Essex, with some small exceptions in the latter case, were formed into a new Diocese of Rochester, only the district around the cathedral city being retained for it in the county of Kent. By still more recent legislation, the two counties north of the Thames were formed into the Diocese of St. Albans, and a new Diocese of Rochester was again constituted, which embraced the district around the cathedral city, together with the eastern or Metropolitan portion of the county of Surrey, which was taken from the Diocese of Winchester. It has thus become a populous Metropolitan diocese, extending along the Thames from Woolwich to Kingston, and reaching southward to the border of Sussex, and containing also detached portions at the mouth of the Thames and the Medway from Rochester to Gravesend.

The endowment of the See of Rochester amounts to £3,000 a-year.

Bede says that a cathedral was built by King Ethelbert at the foundation of the bishopric in A.D. 604, and dedicated in the name of St. Andrew. Of this cathedral there is no further notice until the Conquest, when it is stated to have been in ruins. It was rebuilt by Bishops Gundulf, Ernulf, and John of Canterbury, between 1077 and 1130 (when it became the church of a Benedictine monastery), and was consecrated four days after the consecration of Canterbury Cathedral on Ascension Day, May 11th, 1130, in the presence of Henry I. and most of the Bishops of England.

In 1137 and 1139 great fires occurred in the cathedral, which necessitated a partial rebuilding. A new choir was constructed early in the thirteenth century, and the church was so much renewed that it was reconsecrated in 1240. In the next century much destruction occurred during the siege of Rochester by Simon de Montfort, whose troops turned the nave into a stable; but it was fully restored by Bishop Haymo de Hythe in the first half of the fourteenth century, when the central tower was erected, the upper part of which was rebuilt in 1749. Between 1871 and the present time very effective works of restoration have been going on, which have substantially secured the fabric for many generations to come.

The general aspect of the cathedral from the west end is that of a Norman church passing into Early English, with Early English transept and choir, and many Decorated and Perpendicular additions. It is rich in tombs, including that of Bishop Walter de Merton, etc. etc., and the pavement was once full of brasses, destroyed during the domination of the Puritans.

The cathedral foundation consists of a dean, four canons, three archdeacons, twenty-four honorary canons, and three minor canons.

Rochet.—A short surplice of lawn, with sleeves, worn by bishops under the chimere. It does not appear to have been worn before the thirteenth century, but at a later time it was customary for a bishop always to wear his rochet in public. The sleeves were at first tighter than those now worn. In modern times it has become usual to have the sleeves attached to the chimere, or black satin robe, instead of to the rochet, to which they properly belong.

Rock, DANIEL [b. 1799, d. 1871].—A Roman Catholic, who was educated in the English College at Rome; he returned to England, and became Chaplain to the Earl of Shrewsbury in 1829, Pastor at Buckland in 1840, and Canon of Southwark in 1852. He wrote Hieringia, or the Sacrifice of the Mass Expounded, Did the Early Church in England Acknowledge the Pope's Supremacy? and The Church of Our Fathers.

Rogation Days [from Latin rogare, "to ask or beseech"].—The name given to the three days which precede Ascension Day, which have been set aside in the Church as days of fasting and supplication for God's special blessing on the fruits of the earth. It was formerly the custom to have public processions on these days, while litanies were sung, rogatio in Latin being equivalent to the Greek word litaneia. This seems to have originated with Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, in 450, when the city was greatly injured by earthquakes; it became an annual observance in the diocese, and other bishops followed his example. The keeping of the Rogation Days was enjoined by the Council of Orleans in 511, and in England at that of Cloveshoo, in 747. They were not received at Rome till the time of Leo III. [795]. There were services for them in the old missals. In the Roman Church the Litany of the Saints is ordered to be recited, which is called the Lesser Litany to distinguish it from that chanted on St. Mark's Day. There is no office or even collect in the English Prayer Book for these days, but among the homilies there is a special one for the Rogation Days. Hymns Ancient and Modern provides two special hymns and a metrical litany for use at this season.

Rogation Sunday.—The fifth Sunday after Easter, so called from the three days which follow.

Rogers, HENRY [b. 1806, d. 1877].—An Independent minister, who was Professor of English Language and Literature at University College, London [1839]; Professor of Philosophy at the Independent College at Birmingham; and in 1858 became Principal of Manchester Independent College. He wrote the Eclipses of Faith, Lives of John Howe, Jonathan Edwards, and Thomas Fuller, and The Superhuman Origin of the Bible Inferred from Itself, and many articles and essays. He was strongly Anti-Tractarian, and also Anti-Rationalistic, the Eclipses of Faith showing scant courtesy to any of the Neologian theories. The immediate cause of its being written was the publication, by one who had been a clergyman, of a sceptical volume called the Nemesis of Faith.

Rogers, JOHN, a Protestant martyr, was born at Birmingham about 1500, educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and in 1535 became pastor in Antwerp. Here he became acquainted with Tyndall and Coverdale, and joined the Reformed Church. He afterwards issued a translation of the Bible known as Matthew's Bible. [BIBLE.] He removed from Antwerp to Wittenberg, where he remained till the accession of Edward VI., when he returned to England, and soon after received a prebend of St. Paul's. On the accession of Queen Mary he strongly denounced Romanism, on which he was seized, and, having suffered some months' imprisonment, was burned at Smithfield, Feb. 4th, 1555.

Rollock, ROBERT, the first Principal of the Edinburgh University, was born near Stirling in 1555. He was educated there, and in 1574 joined the College of St. Salvador, in St. Andrews, where he became very intimate with Dr. Andrew Melville. In 1583 Lawson founded Edinburgh University, and Rollock was called upon to act as Regent. In 1586 he was appointed Principal, and in the next year Professor of Divinity. In 1597 he acted as Moderator in the General Assembly at Dundee. He died in 1598, at Edinburgh.

Rollock's chief theological works are On Effectual Calling, On God's Covenant and on the Sacraments, On Providence, Excommunication, and Justification. He also wrote commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans, on select Psalms, Daniel, St. John's Gospel, Ephesians, Galatians, Colossians, Thessalonians, and Hebrews.

Romaine, WILLIAM, a celebrated Evangelical preacher, the son of a poor Alderman, a refugee, and one of the victims of the Edict of Nantes, was born at Hartlepool, Sept. 25th, 1714. He was educated primarily at a school founded by Bernard Gilpin, the great Apostle of the North in the days of Queen Mary. Later on he entered Christ Church, Oxford, and soon distinguished himself there. He was naturally slovenly in his dress, and it is said that a gentleman seeing him pass him in the quadrangle one day, asked, "Who is that slovenly fellow?" His friend replied, "That slovenly fellow is one of the first geniuses of the university, and will probably be one of the brightest ornaments of literature in the present age." Romaine at first associated with a party in the university who opposed Newton's generally received philosophy, and studied the writings of Moses assiduously, professing to find in them a complete system of philosophical as well as Evangelical truth. He entered the Church when twenty-three years of age, and his first curacy was at Hereford. After some years spent in different parts of the country, where he made no small stir by his eloquent sermons, he determined to come to London, where, it is said, he hoped to attract more notice. He was doomed to disappointment, however, and found himself neglected, unnoticed, and without a church. He at last was actually on his way to the ship, intending to leave England, when a gentleman was so struck by the likeness to his father, whom he had known well some years before, that he asked him if his name were "Romaine." This question led to the full history of his present distress, and his father's old friend persuaded him to give up his intention of leaving England. Eventually this same friend, who had come across his path in such a strangely opportune way, was the means of securing him the lectureship of St. George's, Botolph Lane, which he held for many years; and later on, when his views had become thoroughly Evangelical, and his preaching had been marked with the greatest success, he was also appointed Lecturer at St. Dunstan's. On being dismissed by the Rector of St. George's, who disliked seeing the crowds who flocked to hear him preach, Romaine was hospitably treated by Lady Huntingdon, who allowed him to preach to rich and poor in her own house. When prevented by the Rector of St. Dunstan's from entering the church to preach at the usual hours to the immense crowds who always assembled regularly to hear him, it so happened that Dr. Terrick, the Bishop of London, was one day passing by the church, and hearing the cause of such a scene in the streets, he ordered that Romaine should be allowed by the Rector to preach at the ordinary hour, and that the doors of the church should be opened also earlier, so as to avoid the crushing and crowding. This interference of the Bishop on his behalf put an end to the system of opposition which he had so meekly and patiently endured so long. His style in preaching was simple, plain, eloquent, and marked by a touching earnestness. In 1757 he obtained a preacher-ship at St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield, and in 1776 was chosen by the parishioners Rector of St. Andrew Wardrobe and St. Anne, Blackfriars—an office he held till his death. His habit of living was simple and regular in the extreme, which tended to give him such a long and healthy life. He died at the age of eighty-one, on July 26th, 1795.

Rome, CHURCH OF.—The very extent and influence of this vast Church, and the fact that it is the historical parent of all Western communions—as much so of those who most dissent from it as of the others—have made it necessary to treat various branches of the subject so extensively elsewhere under various headings, that less is needed in this place than has been devoted to other denominations of far less importance. The foundation of this Church is uncertain, but we know that when St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans he had not yet visited Rome, though he did so afterwards. St. Peter is said to have been the first Bishop, and tradition says that he was martyred there. The mighty importance of the City of Rome naturally gave its bishop a great position, but the fact that it became for a while the arbiter and ruler of all Christendom is the most remarkable fact in the history of Christianity. The causes of the great silent change will be found under the heading PAPAL POWER, GROWTH OF; and the list of Bishops, under POPES; and the emancipation of a large part of Christendom, under REFORMATION. The controversy between Rome and Protestantism involves two main questions. In the first place, Protestants deny the authority of the Pope over them at all; and secondly, a large portion of the doctrine of the Roman Church is rejected as being a corruption of Apostolic Christianity. The Roman Church recognises seven Sacraments, viz. Baptism, Confirmation, the Holy Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Holy Orders, Matrimony. One of the chief characteristics of this religion is that of invoking help of the Virgin and the Saints. In defence, Roman Catholics say that they do no more than ask the prayers of those who, from their perfected state, must be more worthy to offer them than they; but in most books of devotion the prayers addressed to the Blessed Virgin and the Saints are such as Protestants consider it sinful to offer to any but God. The public service is in the Latin tongue, which has caused their opponents to say that they wish to keep the laity in the dark as to what they are doing. [LATIN, SERVICE IN.] With regard to all matters relating to faith, Roman Catholics draw a hard-and-fast line between what is of doctrine and what of discipline. Doctrine is what was taught by Christ and His Apostles; discipline, different rules laid down by the various Councils of the Church, and liable to change at any time. Since the Vatican Council of 1870, when Pius IX. put forth the doctrine of the Infallibility of the Pope, the utterances of the Pontiff have been taken as the groundwork of the faith and practice of the Church. There are various religious Orders both for men and women, who all are obliged to take the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Their work consists in superintending charitable institutions, such as asylums, orphanages, and hospitals, and some of the Orders have large schools attached to them. The number of Roman Catholics all over the world is about 220,000,000, those in Great Britain at the last census being 6,000,000. In England there is one Archbishop (Westminster) and sixteen Bishops; in Scotland, two Archbishops (Glasgow and St. Andrews) and four Bishops; in Ireland there are four Archbishops and twenty-three Bishops. The peculiar doctrines, practices, and terms of the Roman Church will all be found under their proper headings.

Romuald, St., the son of a nobleman of Ravenna, was born in 956. He spent his youth in a vain and frivolous way; but when he was twenty years of age, his father, Sergius, had a violent quarrel with one of his neighbours, which ended in a duel and the death of Sergius's adversary. Romuald, who had been compelled to witness the duel, was filled with such horror and remorse at his unwilling share in it, that he was convinced it could only be atoned for by his retirement from the world. At the end of seven years, spent in a most severe and austere manner, Romuald decided to put himself for a time under the tuition of Marinus, a hermit who lived near Venice—Peter Urseoli, famed all over Italy for his learning and piety. While with him he brought to repentance the reigning Doge of Venice, who had been guilty of several crimes in order to get the government into his own hands. Meanwhile, Sergius, Romuald's father, had also entered a monastery. He did not find the quiet, regular life agreeable to his taste, however, and the news came to his son that he intended returning to the pleasures of the world. Romuald immediately determined to go to Ravenna, in the hope of dissuading his father from what he considered such a fatal step. His father listened to all the arguments Romuald brought forward in favour of the monastic life, and at length promised to stay where he was till his death. About this time the monks of Classis were without an abbot, and Otho III. was petitioned to nominate Romuald. He had not been there long before he saw signs of dissatisfaction and mutiny in the community. Under these circumstances, he resolved to resign, and went to Tivoli, which town the Emperor was then besieging, in order to inform him of his design. On his arrival there he found that the town had just surrendered. The Governor, Crescentius, took shelter in the Castle of St. Angelo at Rome, Otho feeling it hopeless to get him into his power by force. The Emperor therefore despatched a messenger, Tham, with a promise, bound by an oath, that if Crescentius would leave the castle his life should be spared. In spite of the solemnity of the promise, Otho no sooner saw the man in his power than he ordered him to be beheaded. Romuald declared that such a crime necessitated a public penance, and accordingly the Emperor performed barefoot a pilgrimage from Rome to Mount Garganus. Romuald founded several monasteries, but the only one that became famous was that of Camaldoli, about thirty-six miles from Florence; it adopted to a great extent the Benedictine rules, but altered them in some particulars, so that we find the members spoken of in some books as a separate Order. St. Romuald died June 19th, 1027, at the Monastery of Val-de-Castro; but Feb. 7th, the day of his translation, was ordered by Clement VIII. to be kept in his honour.

Ronge, JOHANNES [b. at Birchofswalde, in Silesia, Oct. 16th, 1813] was the founder of the "German Catholic movement," a formidable separation which took place from the Roman Church. He studied at the University of Breslau, and after spending a year as a volunteer in a rifle battalion, was ordained a priest of the Roman Catholic Church, and in 1841 became Pastor of Grottkau, in the county of Neisse, Saxony. He was suspended in consequence of an article which he published in the Sächsische Vaterlandsblätter in 1842, called "Rome and the Chapter of Breslau," in which he criticised severely the conduct of the extreme Romanists with regard to an ecclesiastical appointment. In 1844 Arnoldi, Bishop of Treves, published an announcement to the effect that the "Holy Coat" would be exhibited for the space of six weeks, during which an indulgence would be granted to all who came to see it and paid for its preservation. [TREVES, HOLY COAT OF.] Much indignation was expressed among the Protestants and among the less bigoted Romanists, and Ronge published his Letter from a Catholic Priest to Bishop Arnoldi, denouncing the exposition, and challenging the authenticity of the tale which the Bishop had caused to be published concerning the relic. The article was responded to in all quarters with tokens of sympathy, and a great stir was made among all religious denominations in Germany. Ronge was excommunicated by the Chapter of Breslau in Dec., 1844; and in January, 1845, the German Catholic Church was founded, with Ronge at its head as pastor. Another congregation, which had been formed at Schneidemühl, in Posen, a short time before, headed by Czerski, and calling itself the Christian Apostolic Catholic Church, became united to the German Catholics, and the two met at Easter, 1845, to agree upon a creed and arrange the new organisation. The Nicene Creed was retained, Scripture declared to be the standard of faith, and the celibacy of the clergy, the doctrines of Purgatory, Transubstantiation, and the Seven Sacraments of the Roman Church were rejected. There were strong hopes entertained that a German Reformed National Church would be re-established holding the faith of the Creeds, but rejecting Papal domination. But the hope vanished when it was seen that the Divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ was treated as a doubtful question, though Czerski strove hard to preserve this cardinal doctrine of Christianity. The number of congregations increased rapidly; but they were opposed by Conservative Protestants, who dreaded infidelity more than Papal domination, and by the powers of the State, who feared that an attempt was being made to undermine existing institutions, and especially all religion. They were expelled from Baden as dangerous to the public welfare; and internal discords began to arise, through which the cause gradually declined. By 1858 the number of congregations had diminished by one-half, and in 1860 Ronge himself took refuge in England, and occupied himself with preaching to German exiles in London. The greater part of the societies have been suppressed, and the rest have become absorbed among the Rationalistic sects.

Rood [Saxon, rode, "a cross"].—This name is sometimes applied to the cross on which Christ died, although when used to signify the relics of the true cross the prefix "holy" is generally added, as Holyrood in Edinburgh. It is more commonly applied to the cross which was formerly erected at the entrance of the chancel in mediæval times. It generally stood in a gallery called the ROODLOFT, on which was erected a large crucifix or cross, sometimes with figures also of the Virgin Mary and St. John. In England after the Reformation the rood was, as a rule, removed; but there are some still remaining, and where they have been removed many churches have the rood galleries remaining.

Rosa, Sr., was born at Lima, in the kingdom of Peru, in 1686. Her parents were of good family, and rich, until Rosa was about fifteen, when they fell into most distressing poverty. Their daughter devoted herself to them, but they were continually urging her to accept one of her many suitors. She, however, had determined to remain single, and as a sure safeguard against being shaken in her resolution, she took the habit of the Third Order of St. Dominick in 1606. She spent a life of severe fasting, and in remembrance of our Saviour's Passion wore round her head a circlet of silver studded inside with sharp pins. She was possessed of a very vivid and excitable imagination, and was haunted for years by most horrible phantoms and apparitions, all of which she regarded as assaults of the Evil One, but which were no doubt owing to want of due nourishment. After years of suffering from a complication of diseases, she died Aug. 24th, 1617, and was buried in the Dominican convent of Lima. She was canonised by Clement X., who ordered her festival to be kept on Aug. 30th.

Rosary [Lat. rosarium, "a chaplet of roses"].—A form of prayer recited on beads by the Roman Catholics. It consists of fifteen decades of Ave Marias, each preceded by a Paternoster and followed by a Gloria. The rosary is divided into three parts, each of which is called a chaplet or corona. It was instituted to commemorate the fifteen mysteries—five joyful, five sorrowful, and five glorious—of the Virgin Mary. The practice of using beads, etc., is very ancient, having been in use as early as the fifth century; but the rosary was introduced much later. Some say it was instituted by St. Dominic, who learned its use from the Virgin in a vision in 1268.

Roscellin or Roscelin, was born in the diocese of Soissons in the eleventh century, and educated at Rheims. About 1089 he became Canon of Compiègne, and put forth heretical views of the doctrine of the Trinity—namely, that the three names of the Trinity are the names of three individual substances, as distinct as three angels, and that the unity of the Trinity is a mere verbal expression, implying a unity in power, as there may be among the angels. In 1092 a Council was called at Soissons, at which Roscellin was condemned, and obliged to recant. He fled to England, where he retracted his recantation, and wrote against his principal antagonist, Anselm (who had written De Fide Trinitatis against him), accusing him of holding heretical views on the Incarnation. Anselm had lately become Archbishop of Canterbury, and this caused a quarrel between him and the King, but they were reconciled, and Roscellin was forced to return to France. He became Canon of Tours, and shortly after began a controversy with his former disciple, Abelard. The latter had in his early years been a strong partisan of Roscellin, but his views took a more modified form, and greatly resembled Sabellianism. Roscellin accused him also of other heresies, whereupon Abelard violently attacked his former leader. No account remains of Roscellin's latter years, but he is supposed to have died about 1106. [NOMINALISTS.]

Rose, HUGH JAMES [b. 1795, d. 1838], was born at Little Horsted. His father removed to Uckfield in 1800, where he took pupils, and educated his son till his entry at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1813. In 1814 he gained the first Bell's scholarship, and in 1817 took his B.A.; the following year he gave up college residence to become private tutor in the family of the Duke of Athol; in the same year he took holy orders. In 1821 he was preferred to the vicarage of Horsham. Here his ministerial labours were greatly blessed; but the work of the parish, added to taking pupils, proved too much for his health, and in 1824 he started on travel through Prussia, Austria, and Italy. While on this journey he collected materials for one of his leading works, Discourses on the State of the Protestant Religion in Germany. In 1825, 1826, 1828, and 1830-33, he was Select Preacher at Cambridge, and in 1829 was appointed Christian Advocate under the will of Mr. Hulse. In 1830 he was appointed to the rectory of Hadleigh; but this place suited his tendency to asthma as little as Horsham, and in 1833 he was compelled to exchange that valuable preferment for the livings of Fairsted and Weeley, in Essex, and these again for the small benefice of St. Thomas's, Southwark, which he retained till his death. In 1831 he became the editor of a Church publication, the British Magazine. In 1833-4 he delivered some inaugural lectures at the new University of Durham, where he had temporarily accepted the Chair of Divinity—one, entitled An Apology for the Study of Divinity, and the second, The Study of Church History Recommended. He was the one great representative of Cambridge in the movement which produced the Tracts for the Times. In 1836 he succeeded Mr. Otter as Principal of King's College, London. He prepared and delivered (partly by deputy) two courses of Divinity lectures, those in 1836-7 on the Evidences of Christianity, and for 1837-8 on Ecclesiastical History. His edition of Parkhurst's Greek Lexicon of the New Testament turned a fanciful and somewhat unscholarly book into a very valuable one. In the autumn of 1838 he again went abroad in search of health, but died at Florence, Dec. 22nd, 1838. Dr. Newman thus dedicates to him his fourth volume of Sermons:—"To the Rev. Hugh James Rose, B.D., Principal of King's College, London, and Domestic Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, when our hearts were failing, bade us stir up the gift that was in us, and betake ourselves to our true mother, this volume is inscribed by his obliged and faithful friend, the author, Nov. 19th, 1838."

Rosenfelders.—In the middle of the last century a man who had formerly been a gamekeeper, named Hans Rosenfeld, appeared in Prussia with the announcement that the Gospel was all untrue, for that he was the real Messiah. Incredible as it may seem, he succeeded in getting a goodly following; he averred that Frederick the Great was Satan in human shape, whom he, as the Messiah, was to struggle with and subdue, after which he would cause all the nations of the earth to submit to him, and he would rule over them, assisted by the twenty-four elders mentioned in the Book of Revelation. He lived a grossly immoral life, and at last, in 1782, the King ordered him to be imprisoned for life. At this total collapse of all his schemes, his followers dispersed, and no more was heard of the heresy.

Rosenmüller, ERNST FRIEDRICH KARL, a distinguished Biblical critic and Orientalist, was born at Hesseberg, in Hildburghausen, 1768, studied at Leipzig, became Professor of Oriental Literature there, and died in 1835. His chief work is Scholæ in Vetus Testamentum, which, on account of the profound Oriental learning and untiring industry of its author, is one of the most valuable commentaries upon the Old Testament. He also wrote Handbuch der Biblischen Alterthumskunde, which he left incomplete; Institutiones ad Fundamenta Lingue Arabicæ; Analecta Arabica; and Das alte und das neue Morgenland, oder Erläuterungen der Heiligen Schrift.

Rosicrucians.—A society formed in Germany at the beginning of the seventeenth century. An anonymous pamphlet published at Cassel, in 1614, asserted that the founder, Rosenkreutz, had lived 200 years before, but that, according to the rules drawn up at the foundation, its existence had up to that time been kept a profound secret. The pamphlet declared the members to be possessed of fabulous scientific knowledge, and to be absolutely exempt from illness or suffering of any sort. Another derivation of their name is from ros, "dew," which they held to be the most powerful dissolvent of gold; and crux, "cross," which in the chemical style signifies "light," became the figure of the cross, "X," exhibiting at the same time the three letters in the word lux. They were alchemists, who sought for the Philosopher's Stone by the intervention of dew and light. In 1622 the society published the following:—"We, deputed by our college, the principal of the brethren of the Rosencrucians, to make our visible and invisible abode in this city, through the grace of the Most High, towards whom are turned the hearts of the just; we teach without books or notes, and speak the languages of the countries wherever we are, to draw men, like ourselves, from the error of death." The whole thing created a great sensation at the time both in England and on the Continent, some prominent men—as Robert Fludd and Jacob Behmen—defending it boldly, others declaring that it had some hidden purpose in view against Lutheranism, and that this talk about science, etc., was simply to put people off their guard. Gradually the name “Rosicrucian” became a generic term for every species of occult pretension; in general usage the term is specially associated with that branch of the secret art which has to do with the creatures of the elements. [THEOSOPHY.]

Rosminians or Fathers of the Institute of Charity.—A congregation founded in 1828 by Antonio Rosmini, an Italian philosopher. Their chief aim was to be the practice of the virtue of charity, and their work was to consist in preaching, visiting the sick and prisoners, relieving the poor, missionary-work and education, and praying for the dead. Their first house was at Monte Calvario, near Domo d'Ossola, and within a few years they established branch institutions at Trent, Verona, and Bath. The congregation was approved by Pope Gregory XVI. in 1838, and in the following year its members took the vows required by the rule, and Rosmini was made Superior-General of the Institute for life. Some of his philosophical works were condemned in 1850 by the Congregation of the Index, but the whole collection was subsequently examined, and pronounced undeserving of censure from a theological point of view. Some years after Rosmini's death, a house at Stresa belonging to the Order, and occupied by the founder during the later years of his life, was confiscated by the Piedmontese Government. Nine houses belonging to the Institute are in existence in England and Wales.

Rothe, RICHARD [b. at Posen, 1799; d. at Heidelberg, 1867], German theologian, was educated at Breslau, and studied theology at Heidelberg, Berlin, and Wittenberg. At Berlin he became acquainted with the leaders of the Pietists, and he was an early friend of Tholuck, Müller, and Olshausen. In 1823 he was appointed Chaplain to the Prussian Embassy at Rome; and he there became intimate with the Chevalier de Bunsen, who had much influence on his later theology. In 1828 Rothe became Director of the Theological Seminary at Wittenberg, and then Professor and Seminary Director at Heidelberg, where he remained till the close of his life, with the exception of two years spent at Bonn as Lecturer, in which post he succeeded Dr. Nitzsch. Though remarkable for his modesty and retiring disposition, Rothe exercised a widespread influence among his pupils and contemporaries, and his books hold a foremost place in speculative theological literature. His chief works are: Anfänge der christlichen Kirche und ihrer Verfassung, published in 1837, and Theologische Ethik

[1845-8]. The first is a comprehensive history of the growth of the Christian Church from the Apostolic age to the time of St. Augustine, in which Rothe (himself a Protestant) proves that the tendency of the early Church was towards Romanism, especially in the Nicene age, which the Oxford School represented as the type of primitive Catholicity. The Theologische Ethik is divided into three parts—the doctrine of the good, the doctrine of virtue, and the doctrine of duties. Rothe professes to be a theologian rather than a philosopher, and disclaims the following of any philosophy. He defines piety as the consciousness of God in the soul, which to a pious man overmasters, for the time, all self-consciousness—self-consciousness only grows by degrees out of the primary all-absorbing feeling. He says, “God is as immediately certain to me as myself, because I cannot feel or conceive of the consciousness or the thought of myself in any other way than as immediately connected with the feeling and the thought of God; God is to me the absolutely and immediately certain, and I become first truly certain of myself by means of my certainty of God.” He believes that the Church is destined to permeate all human life with religion, and that when this is accomplished she will become absorbed in the State. With regard to his creed, Rothe was a Protestant as far as he attached himself to any established form of orthodoxy; he regarded the Bible as the unchangeable standard of theology, but said that to him theology was a simple faith in Christ, the “sunrise in history, which alone sheds light over all the objects that fall under our observation.”

Roundheads.—A name given to the Puritans, because they wore their hair cropped close to their heads, in contradistinction to the Cavaliers, who wore long lovelocks.

Rousseau, JEAN JACQUES, French philosophical writer [b. at Geneva, June 28th, 1712; d. at Ermenonville, near Paris, June 3rd, 1778], was the son of a watchmaker. His mother died in his infancy, and he was brought up by his aunt. In 1722 he was sent to a school at Bossey, where he remained for two years. He was then sent to a notary's office, but dismissed for inaptness and inaccuracy. He was next apprenticed to an engraver, M. Ducommun, a rough and violent man, under whom Rousseau contracted many wicked habits. He at length escaped in 1728, and journeyed to Confignon, near Geneva, where he was hospitably received by the priest, who was ever on the look-out for one whom he might convert. He was confined to the care of Madame de Warens, a lady living at Annecy, and placed in the monastery of the catechumens at Turin, where he abjured Protestantism simply, as he wrote afterwards in his Confessions, because he could not bear the idea of returning to Geneva, and saw no other way out of his destitute condition. As he refused to take orders, he was dismissed from the establishment, and wandered about Turin for some time, and then became foot-boy in a house, whence he was dismissed for stealing. And after six weeks he gained another situation, where he was treated with great consideration, but, on a visit from an old comrade of Geneva, grew so lazy that he was again turned upon his own resources. In 1729 he returned to Annecy, and threw himself on the charity of his former patroness, Madame de Warens. He was sent to a seminary to learn Latin enough to become a priest, but was dismissed as deficient in intellectual faculty. He next tried music, and wandered about France and Switzerland till 1732, when he returned to Madame de Warens, who was now living at Chambéry. For the next eight years he lived a desultory life, chiefly as the lover of Madame de Warens. In April, 1740, he went to Lyons as tutor, and thence to Paris, where he remained till, in 1743, he gained the post of secretary to the Count of Montaigu, French Ambassador at Venice. However, they quarrelled, and Rousseau returned to Paris towards the end of 1744, and in the beginning of the next year became acquainted with Thérèse Le Vasseur, a kitchenmaid, with whom he lived for the rest of his life. He gained his bread as secretary to M. Dupin, fermier-général, and also wrote music for the stage which he did not sell. All his five children were sent at their birth to the foundling hospital. In 1749 the Academy of Dijon proposed, as a theme for a prize essay, "Has the restoration of the sciences contributed to purify or to corrupt manners?" Rousseau immediately determined to write on the negative side and gained the prize, this being his first literary work. Three years afterwards the same Academy propounded the question, "What is the origin of inequality among men, and is it authorised by the natural law?" He again competed, and though he did not gain the prize, his essay was more powerful than the former one. In 1754 he revisited Geneva, and there re-embraced the Protestant faith. Rousseau had become acquainted with Madame d'Epinay, who in 1756 invited him to reside at her country seat—the Hermitage; there he met with Diderot, d'Alembert, and Condillac, who engaged him to write in the Encyclopédie. [ENCYCLOPÉDISTS.] Here he began his novel, La Nouvelle Héloïse. In 1757 he quarrelled with Grimm, Diderot, and, in fact, almost all his friends, and in December moved to Montmorency. Here he completed his novel, which was published in 1760. He at first greatly enjoyed his life at Montmorency, but his health broke down, and in 1761 he was several times inclined to commit suicide. The appearance of Le Contrat Social and Emile in 1762 caused a great sensation. They were condemned by Parliament, and the author had to fly for his life. He went to Yverdon, in the canton of Berne, in Switzerland; but the Senate of Berne ordered him to leave the canton, and he removed to Motiers, in Neuchâtel, then a part of the dominions of the King of Prussia. But persecution followed him here, and in 1765 he moved to the island of St. Peter, in the lake of Biennne, and, being again driven away, came in Jan., 1766, to England, with Hume. He resided at Wootton, near Ashbourne, in the Peak. Here, during the autumn and winter of 1766, he wrote the first part of his Confessions. He quarrelled with Hume, and worked himself up into the delusion that the English nation had formed a plot against him, and at last fled, arriving in France in May, 1767. He lived for a year at Trye, near Gisors, still believing that all were against him, then stayed at Bourgoïn and Monquin, and finally reappeared in Paris in July, 1770. He lived by copying music, by which he gained only £60 a year. Thérèse's health and his own were declining, and in 1778 M. Girardin prevailed upon him to come and live at Ermenonville, an estate about twenty miles from Paris, where he suddenly died July 2nd, 1778. It is said that he committed suicide, but the doctors said that he died of apoplexy, and it has never been decided. He was buried on an island in the midst of a lake in the park, and sixteen years after his remains were removed to the Panthéon at Paris.

Rousseau's principal works were the Discourses, The New Héloïse, The Social Contract, Emile, and his Confessions. These discourses, which were the answers to the problems started by the Dijon Academy, made his reputation. They were the first signs of reaction against Montesquieu's historic method of inquiring into society. The first was an elaboration of the truth that virtue without science is better than science without virtue. It was wholly one-sided, admitting none of the conveniences, alleviations of suffering, or increase of mental stature which knowledge has brought. Rousseau said that his object in writing La Nouvelle Héloïse was to reconcile the two opposing parties—the devout and the rationalistic—but his design is not perceptible. It contained very democratic ideas, tending to bring the manners of the great into contempt by the presentation of the happiness of a simple life. Its chief defect is, that feeling is raised into the highest place instead of being put into an equal place with understanding.

The Social Contract is a denial of human perfectibility. In it Rousseau renounced his views which appeared in the Discourses. Its central conception is the doctrine of the sovereignty of the people, which he had borrowed from Locke. He also held that the instant the Government usurps the sovereignty, the social treaty is broken, and the citizens are restored to their natural liberty, and are not obliged to obey. This book kindled the revolutionary fire both in France and Germany. Emilius, or Education, had a great effect on the religion of France. It is full of Rousseau's deism, and brought about a reaction from the materialism and atheism of the time. Rousseau held that the three first precepts that ought to be instilled into the mind of a child are—a respect for truth; a deep feeling for things of the spirit—a sense of awe, mystery, and sublimity—that he was not to hear the name of a God or Supreme Spirit till his reason had ripened; and a love of justice.

His Confessions, which he had not intended to appear before 1800, but which were published surreptitiously in 1785, contain a full account of his whole life, with all the minutest details. He is very candid about his faults, but seems at the same time to be almost proud of some of them.

Routh, MARTIN JOSEPH, D.D. [b. at South Elmham, in Suffolk, Sept., 1755; d. at Tylehurst, near Reading, Dec., 1854]. He matriculated in 1770 at Queen's College, Oxford, entered the College of St. Mary Magdalen in the following year, was elected a Fellow in 1776, and took the degree of M.A. He was appointed to the office of College Librarian in 1781, became Senior Proctor of the University and Junior Dean of Arts, and was elected President of Magdalen College in 1791. He became Rector of Tylehurst in 1810, and held it, with his Presidency, till his death, employing his time in literary work, which he continued till within the last years of his life. In 1784 he edited Platonis Enthydemus et Gorgias, with notes; in 1814–15 he published three volumes of Reliquia Sacra, and in 1832 Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Opuscula. Two more volumes of the Reliquia Sacra were added in 1846–8, and he published two editions of Bishop Burnet's History of His Own Times.

Rubrics.—Directions in the Prayer Book as to the manner in which the parts of the service are to be performed; from the Latin rubric, "red," because they were formerly written in red ink to distinguish them from the service, which was printed in different type and in black ink. The first service books of the Church seem not to have had any rubrics, but the directions were contained in other books. The first to combine the two seems to have been Burchard, Master of Ceremonies under Innocent VIII., and Alexander VI., whose Pontifical containing the ceremonies and words of the Mass was printed at Rome in 1485.

Rufina and Secunda, SAINTS. — Daughters of a nobleman of the first rank in Rome. They were betrothed to two brothers, and would most likely have married them, but when, in the year 257, Valerian raised a persecution in Rome, the brothers renounced their faith in order to save their property. Rufina and Secunda, not feeling sure that they would have strength of mind to resist the persuasions of their friends, left the town secretly. Armentarius and Verinus were so angry when they found their betrothed had escaped, that they informed against them. The sisters were brought before the Governor, Junius Donatus, and by his direction were beheaded in a wood near Rome. A church was built in the fourth century on the place of their martyrdom, but it was destroyed some years later during an invasion of barbarians. The relics of the sisters were removed to the Church of St. John Lateran at Rome. The 10th of July is dedicated to their memory.

Rufinus, TYRANNIUS, Presbyter of Aquileia [b. at Aquileia about the middle of the fourth century; d. in Sicily, 410]. He was educated at a monastery in Aquileia, and there became acquainted with St. Jerome, who mentions him as one of the most promising students. Rufinus was baptised about 370, and went soon afterwards to Egypt to visit some of the famous hermits living in the deserts; he spent six years in Egypt, and during this time received a letter from St. Jerome full of tenderness and commendation. In 378 he went to Jerusalem, and built a cell upon the Mount of Olives, in which he lived for nearly twenty years. He is famous on account of his Latin translation of Origen and other Greek writers, his commentaries on Hosea, Joel, and Amos, and his bitter contest with St. Jerome; this was caused by the latter's disapproval of his translation of Origen's De Principiis, and, though at one time they became reconciled, the contest broke out afresh when Rufinus returned to Rome in 397. He lived for some time before his death at Aquileia; but was cited to appear before Anastasius, Bishop of Rome, and, failing to do so, his writings were condemned, and he was degraded from the rank of Presbyter. He retired to Sicily, and died there. He translated the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, and continued it to the death of Theodosius. He also translated the Orations of St. Gregory Nazianzen, and the Rules of St. Basil. His translations are paraphrases rather than literal versions.

Ruinart, THIERRY. — A Benedictine monk of the Congregation of St. Maur [b. at Rheims, 1657; d. at the Monastery of Hautvilliers, near that city, 1709]. He entered the Congregation of St. Maur in 1674, and went in 1682 to St. Germain-des-Prés, where he became the pupil of Mabillon, and worked with him upon the last volumes of the history of the Order of St. Benedict. His chief works were Acta Primorum Martyrum; and Historia Persecutionis Vandalicæ, which some believe to have been the work of an African Bishop, edited by Ruinar ; and he edited the works of Gregory of Tours.

Rural Deans.—Ecclesiastical officers who are supposed to superintend the clergy within their district, to see that their churches and houses are in proper repair, to discuss with them the leading church topics of the day, and to report the result to the bishop. They are of older origin in the English Church than in any other, and are mentioned in the laws of Edward the Confessor as the decanus episcopi, or bishop's dean. They were unknown in Italy, but existed in Belgium and France, and are still to be found in Austria. Till recently the division into rural deaneries was merely geographical, as no rural deans were appointed since the Reformation until about forty years ago. The former office of the rural dean, as shown in the oath which was administered to them on taking office, was to inspect the lives and manners of the clergy and people within their district, and to report the same to the bishop ; and in order that they might carry this out they were allowed to convene rural chapters which consisted of all the instituted clergy, or their curates as proxies, and the rural dean as president. These Chapters continued till Otho, the Pope's Legate in Edward I.'s reign, required the archdeacons to be present at them, and, they being superior to the rural deans, virtually took the presidency out of their hands. From this time the power of the rural deans became less. At the Reformation it was proposed to give them certain legal powers, but nothing was done. At the Synod of Convocation held in London, April 3rd, 1571, it was ordered that "the archdeacon, when he hath finished his visitation, shall signify to the bishop what clergy he hath found in every deanery so well endowed with learning and judgment as to be worthy to instruct the people in sermons, and to rule and preside over others ; out of these the bishop may choose such as he will have to be rural deans." But the office was not much used till about forty years ago, when the deans were revived to help the archdeacons in their work. The office was of ancient date also in France and Germany, but in Italy the smallness of the dioceses rendered deans unnecessary, and they were not introduced there till the sixteenth century by St. Carlo Borromeo.

Rush Bearing.—An ancient English custom of carrying rushes to the churches on the day of each village Wake, and strewing them there. It prevailed chiefly in the north of England among the lakes, and in Cheshire.

Russian Church, THE.—The Russians claim to have been converted to Christianity by the Apostle Andrew, but it has been conclusively proved that the conversion did not take place till the ninth century. The State

Church of Russia is a branch of the Greek or Eastern Church. In the year 955 Olga, widow of the Grand Prince Igor, went to Constantinople to receive baptism at the hands of the Patriarch. An account of the progress of Christianity in Russia will be found under OLGA, St., and her grandson, VLADIMIR. Vladimir died in 1015, and his son, Yaroslav, caused the Scriptures to be translated into Slavonian, founded an archbishopric at Kieff, and by getting Greek priests to settle in his country sought to render his Church independent of the Patriarch of Constantinople ; but in this he did not succeed, and for six centuries it remained attached to the Greek Church. After the seizure of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453, the Russian bishops elected their own metropolitans without the sanction of Greek patriarchs, and in 1551 a Synod held at Moscow framed a code of ecclesiastical laws for the government of the Church. These laws were called Stoglav, or a hundred chapters. In the reign of the Czar Theodore the Greeks consented to the consecration, in 1588, of an independent patriarch of Moscow. The most important of these patriarchs was Nikon [1652-7]. In 1642 a catechism was composed in the Russian language by Peter Mogilas to check the growing tendency of the Russo-Greeks to conform to Rome, and Nikon did much to correct the errors which still remained in the Slavonic version of the Scriptures and in the service books. These changes in the liturgy caused great commotion in the Church, and in 1666 a large number separated themselves from the rest, and were called Rascolniks, from raskol, "cleft," to signify schism or dissent. They, however, call themselves Staroveretsi, or the "Old Believers." Peter the Great, in 1700, on the death of the tenth Patriarch, Adrian, ordered that for the future the Russian Church should be governed by a synod consisting of a certain number of bishops, several presbyters, and an imperial procurator. Accordingly, in 1723, the Most Holy Synod was established at Moscow. It has now been removed to St. Petersburg. It is usually composed of two metropolitans, two bishops, the chief secular priest of the imperial staff, and the following lay members: the procurator, seven secretaries, and some clerks. It decides on all matters of faith, and superintends the administration of the dioceses. The law of the land with regard to religion is as follows: "The ruling faith in the Russian Empire is the Christian Orthodox Eastern Catholic declaration of belief. Religious liberty is not only assured to Christians of other denominations, but also to Jews, Mohammedans, and Pagans ; so that all people living in Russia may worship God according to the laws and faith of their ancestors." In some respects the Russian creed resembles that of the Latin, but yet it differs in a few very important particulars, notably that of the doctrine of the Trinity. The Russians deny the double Procession of the Holy Ghost. [ФИЛОСОФЪ КОНТРОВЕРСІИ.] The worship of the Virgin is not so common as in Italy or Spain, but the invocation of the Saints is quite as usual. The laity communicate in both kinds with the priest, but with this difference, that while he partakes of each separately, the laity receive the bread soaked in the wine. The Russians take their fundamental doctrines from the Bible and the first of the seven General Councils of the Church. The number of Sacraments recognised by them is seven, namely, Baptism, Chrism, the Eucharist, Orders, Confession, Matrimony, and the Unction of the Sick. In the latter there is again a difference from the Roman Catholic idea of the same service. In the former unction is administered only at the certain approach of death, whereas in Russia prayers are added for the recovery of the patient. There are three orders of clergy: bishops, priests, and deacons, but numerous sub-divisions exist in each order. It will suffice if we mention those of the bishops, which are three in number: First, the metropolitans, of which there are only three in Russia; second, the archbishops; third, the bishops. The lower clergy are paid by the State, and although their incomes are for the most part very small, they manage, by total exemption from taxation, to live. They are forbidden to marry after their ordination, but there is no law against their keeping their wives if they should have been married while still laymen. The number of members of this Church is said to be as great as 64,000,000, of which 15,000,000 are sectarian dissenters. The ritual of the service is elaborate in the extreme; a description of a festival service has been published in Dr. Pinkerton's account of his visit to Russia. Great superstition prevails, especially amongst the lower classes, and this is fostered by the priests. Image worship, or, to speak more correctly, picture worship, is a great feature of the religion of the people, many thinking it utterly impossible to say a prayer unless they have a picture either of the Saviour or of the Virgin before them. A few years ago a book written by the late Mr. William Palmer was published, with a preface by Cardinal Newman. The author not only fully describes what he saw in Russia, but freely gives his views and impressions received while on a visit to the country. He went with the idea that it would be possible in time to unite the Russian and Anglican Churches, a union very much desired by many Russians; but returned with the conviction that with such an utter dissimilarity of opinion on many vital matters, such a union was quite impracticable.

Rutherford, SAMUEL, a Covenanter, celebrated for his piety and learning, was born at Nisbet, in Roxburghshire, about 1600, and educated at Edinburgh University. In 1627 he was appointed minister of Anworth, where he worked unceasingly among his people. In 1636 he was banished for preaching against the Articles of Perth, and went to Aberdeen, but returned to his charge on the overthrow of Episcopacy in 1638. In the next year he became Professor of Divinity at St. Andrews, and in 1643 came to London as one of the Scotch Commissioners to the Westminster Assembly. He did so much for the cause of Presbyterianism, that Milton wrote against him in The New Forces of Conscience under the Long Parliament. At the Restoration Rutherford was in great disfavour. The Lex Rex, a book which he had published in 1644, was burnt before his windows, and he was summoned before Parliament; but he died March 20th, 1661, before the time appointed for his appearance.

Among Rutherford's works are The Due Right of Presbytery [1644], The Trial and Triumph of Faith [1645], The Divine Right of Church Government [1646], The Covenant of Life [1655], Civil Policy [1657], and Life of Grace [1659].

Sabaites. [SABAS, ST.]

Sabaoth.—A Hebrew word, meaning "hosts" or "armies." It occurs in the fifth verse of the Te Deum, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth." Some doubt has been expressed as to the reference; the general opinion is that the angels or angelic hosts are meant, or the stars, which are often spoken of as the host of heaven. One critic believes that it means the hosts of Israel, and others that it is a general reference to all created things.

Sabas, St., Abbot, was born at Matalasca, in Cappadocia, in 439. At a very early age he entered the monastery at Flavinia, not far from his native town. After living here ten years, he went to Palestine, and, taking St. Euthymius as his model, began adopting this Saint's custom of living in a cell quite alone, far away from all his fellow-men. But Euthymius, thinking this too severe a trial for a young man, advised him to take a cell near Jerusalem, which formed one of a sort of cluster of hermitages. After the death of Euthymius, the discipline of the monastery was relaxed, and Sabas went to a desert, where he remained four years without speaking to a single soul. At the end of that time, having had several applications from different men to be allowed to share his solitude, he agreed to form a small lawra. He had never been admitted into priest's orders, and as the want of a priest was severely felt in the community, he was ordained by Sallust.

Bishop of Jerusalem, in 484, and made head of his monks, who were called, after him, Sabaites. His rule of discipline was so rigorous that his monks rebelled, and on the death of Sallust lodged complaints of their superior with his successor Elias. Sabas fled to the desert, but when Elias was firmly enthroned at Jerusalem he sent a message to him that he was to resume his work as before. At first the monks disputed every command he gave, threw down the buildings which he had raised, and some of them left again. But Sabas, by constant patience and sympathy, even when their conduct was at its worst, at last gained them all to perfect submission. At the end of his life he was sent by Elias on a difficult errand. The Emperor Anastasius had banished several Catholic bishops, and supported the Eutychian heresy, and Sabas, at the age of seventy, was sent to try to restore peace to the Church. The Emperor treated him with honour, and at his request promised not to molest Elias. Soon after his return he fell ill, and died Dec. 5th, 531. He founded several monasteries, amongst them one on the shores of the Dead Sea.

Sabbatarian.—This word has been used in several senses in ecclesiastical history. [1] In the sixteenth century it was applied to the "Seventh Day Baptists," who, alleging that the Church had departed from Apostolic order, insisted that the observance of the seventh day is binding upon Christians, and that the substitution of the first day was a corrupt innovation of the second century. On this opinion the Seventh Day Baptists were organised, and in the beginning of the seventeenth century there were eleven congregations of them. They still barely exist in England; in the United States there are about 9,000. [2] The word is now commonly applied by way of reproach to those who oppose any relaxation of the law as regards the opening of museums and picture-galleries on the Sunday, and who hold that it is the duty of Christians and of the State, on behalf of religion and morality, to vigorously oppose any secularisation of the Lord's Day.

Sabbath.—A Hebrew word meaning "rest." The seventh day of the week, on which it is commanded by the Law of Moses that man should rest from labour, in commemoration of God's rest on the seventh day after the creation of the world. It is also a memorial of the release of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage.

The question whether the Sabbath is to be regarded as a mere Jewish ordinance, and, therefore, no more a matter of universal obligation than the sacrifices or other requirements of the Mosaic code, is one which is very earnestly discussed in the present day. On one side it is asserted that Sabbath observance does not rest merely on the Fourth Commandment, but was pre-Mosaic and was observed by the Apostles. To support the pre-Mosaic view reference is made to Gen. ii. 3; iv. 3; xxix. 27. To this, reply has been made that none of these verses speak of command, but merely state fact. The Sabbath is not mentioned in the Book of Genesis, yet, in contrast with this fact, there are strict commands concerning the Tree of Knowledge and the institution of marriage. It is also argued that if the Sabbath had been pre-Mosaic it must have been applicable universally; yet the heathen are nowhere rebuked for non-observance, while the chosen people have the most stringent commands on the subject. In fact, the Sabbath is made a distinguishing mark between the chosen people and the rest of the world [Exodus xxxi. 13 and Ezekiel xx. 12]. And this, it is maintained, was the view of the early Fathers. Justin Martyr speaks of "the patriarchs justified before God without keeping the Sabbath." "From Abraham was the circumcision, from Moses the Sabbath." Irenæus: "Abraham without circumcision, and without Sabbaths, believed in God." Tertullian: "They must show that Adam and Abel were circumcised and kept the Sabbath." Of the Sabbath during the period of the Judges we know absolutely nothing; no mention is made of it in the Books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, or Samuel. The Prophets, however, apparently seeing that it must degenerate into a mere day of idleness, seized upon it, and devoted it to the religious improvement of the people [compare Psalms lxxxi. and xcii.]. Only ten times is it mentioned in the Historical Books. In two of these passages it is desecrated by the dethronement of Athaliah [2 Kings xi. 5; 2 Chron. xxiii. 4], a marked contrast to the continued insistence on its observance by the Prophets. From the Captivity the Jews seem never to have incurred the charge of disregarding the Sabbath; nay, in a mistaken spirit, they allowed themselves to be slaughtered to the number of one thousand, rather than resist on the Sabbath [1 Mac. ii. 34]. Hereafter they decreed it should be lawful to resist, but not to initiate an attack. This seems the first example of minute distinctions which the Rabbis afterwards put forth—such as, one man might carry a loaf, but two might not carry it between them; a man with the toothache might not rinse his mouth with vinegar, but he might use it for alleviating the pain if he swallowed it. How opposed to the spirit of the Law these additions were, is shown by our Lord's observance of the Sabbath; for, as He came to fulfil the whole Law, we cannot doubt that He kept the Sabbath as God intended it to be kept. Had the opponents of Christ examined their Pentateuch with a candid mind, they would have seen that, as the Sabbath, a day of rest and freedom from servile work, was their distinguishing mark, so they must, above all other nations, be distinguished by their kind and tender treatment of dependants.

There have been some who, taking the strictest views of Sabbath observance, have held that the observance of the seventh day is still binding; such are the Seventh-day Baptists. And others who do not go this length maintain that the substitution of the first for the seventh day being made, the obligation to observe that day as the Sabbath strictly remains as before. Some hold that the substitution, though not mentioned in the New Testament, must have been by our Lord's command; others, that the day is fixed by Apostolical precedent, and that its manner of observance is a matter of ecclesiastical authority.

In the New Testament there are six distinct notices which relate to "the first day of the week." On that day our Lord rose from the dead, and He appeared to His disciples on the same day five times. After eight days, that is, on the first day of the week, He appeared to the eleven when assembled together [John xx.]. The Pentecostal Feast that year fell on the first day of the week, and on that day the Holy Ghost was given. In Acts xx. 7 the disciples come together on the first day of the week to break bread. In 1 Cor. xvi. 2, St. Paul bids the Corinthians lay by for the poor on the first day of the week. It is matter of dispute whether by the Lord's Day in Rev. i. 10 is meant the first day of the week or Easter Sunday, or the Jewish Sabbath. These passages seem enough to show, to any reasonable thinker, that the Apostles observed this day. But there is no mention of cessation from labour, nor of any connection with the Sabbath, nor is the observance required of the Gentiles under the decrees of the Council of Jerusalem.

The ante-Nicene Fathers are unanimous as to the weekly observance of the day. Thus in the Epistle of Barnabas: "We celebrate the eighth day with joy, on which Jesus rose from the dead." Justin Martyr speaks of Christians assembling on "the day called the day of the Sun." Ignatius writes: "No longer observing Sabbaths, we keep the Lord's Day." Irenæus is the first who speaks of cessation from labour. He says that reaping and gathering into barns is forbidden on that day. Tertullian too says [A.D. 202]: "On the Lord's day of resurrection we ought to abstain from all habit and labour of anxiety, putting off even our business, lest we give place to the devil." But he also calls it a day "on which we allow ourselves to be joyous." The edict of Constantine, in 321, decreed that all business and employment, except agriculture, should cease on "the honoured day of the Sun." The Emperor Leo, in 469, included agriculture in this prohibition.

During the Middle Ages Sunday was observed as a holy day, and it is curious that from the Waldenses and the Lollards came objections that this was an infringement of Christian liberty. The same line was taken by the great Reformers. Tyndall declared that no holy day was needed if the people could be taught without it. Luther repudiated the obligation so long as it rested on the Fourth Commandment: "If it be set upon a Jewish foundation, then I bid you work, ride, dance on it." Calvin used to play at bowls on the Sunday. The consequence was that a gross and open disregard of the day spread itself throughout Europe. So it was in England also. Even the itinerant preachers sent out by Archbishop Parker betook themselves, after the German fashion, to "tabling, carding, shooting, and bowling." At Kenilworth dancing took place on Sundays. Then those who could not assert the authority of the Church to make holy days, fell back on the Fourth Commandment. It was genuine reverence for religion which led the Puritans to call for greater strictness. The Book of Sports, published in 1618, it should be remembered, in behalf of James I., was not intended as a secularisation of the Lord's Day, but a check upon that. No one was allowed to join in the games but those who had previously attended the Church service. But the licence gave offence, and Archbishop Abbot refused to have it read. The whole subject was bound up with that of Puritan strictness, and the Pilgrim Fathers forbade travelling, cooking, shaving, making beds on the Sabbath. It was part of King James's legislation which fined a man for not going to church on Sunday, and there are many old statutes tending in the same direction which have fallen into disuse. The writer of an interesting article in the Guardian of Dec. 2nd, 1885, points out that the first statute of the reign of Charles I. was directed against meetings of people out of their own parishes "for any sports or pastimes, or any bear-baiting, bull-baiting, interludes," etc. In 1627 carriers were forbidden to travel on the Lord's Day under a penalty of 20s., and butchers were forbidden under a penalty of 6s. 8d. to sell meat. But the law known as the Lord's Day Act was passed in 1676, and forbade every tradesman, artificer, workman, or labourer, to exercise any work of their ordinary calling, works of necessity or charity alone excepted. The fine was, and still remains, on the Statute Book as 5s. for each offence. The interpretation of this law by the judges has produced some anomalies. "It was quickly noticed that the work to be punished was work done in the exercise of a man's ordinary calling. So a horse may be sold on a Sunday, but if it is sold by a horse-dealer the bargain cannot legally be enforced, and, strictly speaking, the horse-dealer may be fined. . . . A farmer is not liable for making hay on a Sunday, but, strange as it may seem, his labourers may be punished for the same act." The Lord's Day Act has been modified by an Act of 1871, which provides that no prosecution can be instituted except by or with the consent in writing of the chief officer of police of the police district in which the offence is committed, or with the consent in writing of two justices of the peace or a stipendiary magistrate having jurisdiction in the place. Another Sunday Act was due to Bishop Porteus. It forbids the opening of any place for entertainment, amusement, or public debating to which persons are admitted by the payment of money or by tickets sold for money. The keeper of such a place is liable to a fine of £200, the chairman of the meeting to £100, and every doorkeeper £50. Religious meetings of any sort are protected. A good deal of litigation followed the opening of the Brighton Aquarium on Sundays. This was clearly within the meaning of the Act. The company adopted several plans to get rid of their liability, but were convicted. The Home Secretary, however, remitted the penalty, on the understanding that no special attractions were to be provided which would necessitate putting on extra hands. [LORD'S DAY.]

In further considering the subject in relation to present-day questions, it ought to be pointed out that it is by no means an alternative, as is so often represented, between one or the other of the more extreme views; and it is the more important to urge this, because it will have been already evident that the extreme view is one exceedingly difficult to maintain from a Christian standpoint. Even the Jewish Sabbath was to be predominantly a period of rest—a welcome interlude in the toil of life. The command itself is emphatic in its merciful detail—"that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou,"—and this is further pointed by the admonition, "thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt." But there was nothing austere in this: innocent feasting was usual amongst the Jews; and our Lord Himself attended a feast on that day. The main command was that a man should rest, himself, from his customary toil, and take care to give all his servants and dependants a rest also. Even this Jewish Sabbath was "made for man, and not man for the Sabbath," and the degree to which man had been already subordinated and enslaved to it, was due to Pharisaic glosses, and to attempts at the manufacture of a quite new and Pharisaic sort of righteousness, unknown to the original Divine law.

Now, in the first place, the securing of such an object as this is fully within the right and the province of a civil Legislature, apart from any religious question at all. Of this a singular proof was afforded during the French Revolution, when the Lord's Day was "abolished" by public edict. It was soon found that the human frame could not bear with impunity an unbroken round of daily toil. The people suffered from it. And accordingly a periodical rest on every tenth day was decreed—called for by sheer physical necessity under the stress of modern life. A vast amount of experience has shown beyond doubt, and every man's own experience confirms it, that the nightly sleep alone is not sufficient to repair the exhausted energies of the human frame when subjected to steady toil of any kind. Every one knows how different is the feeling on Saturday evening to that experienced on Monday morning, after the day's rest. To secure such benefits was the right of even an anti-Christian Legislature; and in a professedly Christian country, manifestly there is but one day to be chosen for such purposes, and possible to be so guarded.

Christians themselves, again, have the express command to "forsake not the assembling of themselves together;" and this command, much more when aided by the unbroken usage of the Church, will ensure some kind of stated religious services. On no other day is there the quiet and the same opportunity, apart from the cardinal event which is by them commemorated, and ever borne in mind. Now it will be obvious that, so long as the Legislature faithfully guards the right of a people to rest and leisure, and the Church does her duty in turning such opportunities to account, the essentials for a true and reasonable observance of the Lord's Day Sabbath-rest are present. The amount and kind of religious observance must obviously depend in any case upon the individual conscience; and if it is grossly neglected as a whole, it can only be because the Church herself has, for the time being, neglected her duty, or lost her power, or ceased, at all events, to "draw" men to the worship of her Lord.

As to how far the Legislature should go, such matters of detail must always be left for time and circumstance; but it should never be lost sight of that the true basis of law on this, as on other subjects, should always be the protection of individual rights, rather than the restriction of any purely individual liberty. The true province of the law is to preserve, as far as possible, the Sabbath-rest for all under its care, not to dictate either directly or by implication how each individual should employ it. The thoughtful Christian will ever seek to remember how often—how continuously in fact—his own Lord was Himself traduced as a Sabbath-breaker, and will seek to temper his own judgments thereby. And, on the other hand, those who conscientiously seek to give to their poorer neighbours greater facilities on this day for some study and contemplation of the wonderful works of God, should see to it that this may be done by such efforts as may place no further burden upon already overworked public servants, who now enjoy their day of rest, and who ought not to have it taken from them. How to secure the fulfilment of this, the really fundamental idea of the Sabbath, amidst the multifarious and complicated engagements of modern life—to servants especially, and most of all to public servants—seems really the most pressing problem connected with the Christian Sabbath at the present day.

Sabbatians.—A sect of the NOVIATANS [q.v.]. They took their name from Sabbatius, a presbyter ordained by Marcian, who attempted to bring some Jewish rites into the Church. The Sabbatians were among the heretics condemned by the Council of Constantinople in 381.

Sabbatum Magnum ["the great Sabbath"].—A name given to Easter Eve, and formerly observed as the most solemn fast in the whole year, not excepting Good Friday. A vigil was kept throughout the night till cockcrow, the supposed time of the Resurrection, and the early Christians used to assemble at this time for prayer and reading the Scriptures. It was also customary to baptise catechumens on this day, that they might be admitted to the Easter Communion; and those who had been excommunicated, and had done penance, were re-admitted to all the privileges of the Church.

Sabeans. [MENDEANS.]

Sabellius was the author of the Sabellian heresy. Very little is known of his history. He was born at Ptolemais, in Libya, early in the third century, and afterwards became, perhaps, the bishop of that city. He owed some of his heretical views to Noëtus of Smyrna, whose disciple he was, and began to publish his errors about A.D. 260. They did not die out till the fifth century.

Sabellius denied the doctrine of the Trinity, maintaining that God is Unipersonal, and that the names Father, Son, and Holy Ghost merely designate the same person in different capacities. As the Father, God created the world; as the Son, He redeemed it; as the Holy Ghost, He sanctifies the elect. These three, he said, are no more different persons than the body, soul, and spirit of man are three persons. A deduction from this view is that the Father suffered on the Cross, hence the Sabellians are often included among the PATRIPASCIANS [q.v.]. Later, the Sabellians became divided, and one section—the Low Sabellians—held that Jesus Christ was not Divine, but that an "energy" or emanation from God dwelt in Him. They all accepted the Scriptures, but acknowledged also some apocryphal books, the chief of which was The Gospel to the Egyptians.

Sabellianism was the cause of the introduction of the word person in describing the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. The word had not been used before in that connection.

Sabinus, St.—Very little is known of the life of this saint, except that he was martyred under the persecution of Maximian in 303. He was Bishop of Assisium, and was arrested with others, and kept in prison till the arrival of the Governor, Venustianus, who ordered that both of Sabinus's hands should be cut off, and that his two deacons—Marcellus and Exuperantius—should be beaten with clubs and torn with iron nails. Venustianus was later converted to Christianity, and was immediately expelled from his office. Under the rule of his successor, Lucius, Sabinus was cruelly put to death at Spoleto. His festival is kept on Dec. 30th.

Sacerdotalism [from sacerdos, a "priest"].—The word is applied to that view of the priesthood which, accepting the doctrine of a sacrifice in the Holy Eucharist, regards the priest as the minister of that sacrifice. Opposed to this is the view that the priest is an elder of the congregation, and that there is no sacrifice in the Lord's Supper—only a memorial of the death of the Saviour. [PRIEST; LORD'S SUPPER; RITUALISM.]

Sacheverell, HENRY, was born in Wiltshire in 1672, and was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, of which he became a Fellow, and where he took his M.A., B.D., and D.D. degrees. He seems to have been a dull man, but obtained a marvellous notoriety through two sermons which he preached in 1709—one at Derby and the other in St. Paul's Cathedral. They asserted strong Tory principles and the duty of "non-resistance," which so angered the Whig Parliament that they brought him to trial, and he was suspended for three years, and his sermons were burnt by the common hangman. But the victory which they gained ruined the Whigs. Sacheverell became a popular hero and martyr, and when his suspension was expired he was surrounded with great rejoicings. He preached before the House of Commons on May 29th, and became Rector of St. Andrews, Holborn, where he died in 1724.

Sachs, HANS [b. 1494, d. 1578], a Nuremberg shoemaker, who has been called "the prince and patriarch of the master-singers." He is said to have composed upwards of six thousand poems, etc., some of which had a great influence on the Reformation. Some of the most famous are Die Wittenbergische Nachtigall, which is a transcription of Luther's translation of the Psalms: Die ungleichen Kinder Eves; Heccatus; etc.

Sack, BRETHREN OF THE.—A division of the Boni homines, or PERFECTI [q.v.], founded in France in 1200, so called from the sack which they used as a garment. They increased rapidly for a time both in France and England, but were dissolved in 1275, probably because they had adopted heretical doctrines.

There was also an Order of nuns of the same name founded by Saint Louis in 1261, but it was dissolved within a few years. As late as 1357 hempen sacks were worn in London by an Order of nuns.

Sacrament.—This word signified in classical Latin the oath which a soldier took to be faithful to his commander, and its ecclesiastical use appears to be due to Pliny, who, in his celebrated letter to Trajan, A.D. 112, says that he found that the Christians bound themselves with an oath [sacramento] to be faithful to Christ, and to abstain from crimes. Evidently this refers to the baptismal covenant. Tertullian uses the word regularly in its present sense.

The controversies in the Christian Church concerning the Sacraments are manifold. First with respect to the number. Protestants receive two; the Church of Rome declares there are "neither more nor less than seven," these being Baptism, Lord's Supper, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction. But this is a question more about definitions than realities. Taking Augustine's definition that a Sacrament is "a visible sign of invisible grace," it is difficult for those holding Episcopal views to deny that the laying-on of hands in Ordination and Confirmation can be other than sacramental acts. But then, Protestants, while admitting the latitude with which ancient writers used the word, maintain that the same latitude debars us from stopping at seven, and might include at least a dozen more. "Tertullian," remarks Bishop Jewell, "calleth the helve wherewith Elisha recovered the axe out of the water, the 'sacrament of wood;' and the whole state of the Christian faith he calleth 'the sacrament of the Christian religion.' St. Augustine, in many places, hath 'the sacrament of the cross.' Thus he saith, 'In this figure, or form of the cross, there is contained a sacrament.' St. Jerome saith, 'Out of Christ's side the sacraments of baptism and martyrdom are poured forth both together.' Leo calleth the promise of virginity a sacrament. St. Hilary, in sundry places, saith, 'The sacrament of prayer—of fasting—of the Scriptures—of weeping—of thirst.' St. Bernard calleth the washing of the Apostles' feet a sacrament." But yet these same writers made an evident distinction between the two divinely appointed Sacraments of the Church, and those ordinary things to which, by a figure, they extended the term. Both Protestants, however, and Roman Catholics, agree that Baptism and the Lord's Supper stand on a different level to those of the other ordinances and rites of the Church. The one supplies grace to begin with, the other grace to go on with; they are the two great sacraments of life. These are pronounced by the Church of England in the Catechism to be "generally necessary to salvation," i.e., necessary to all Christians alike; and another mark which Protestants add of the essential sacraments is that they were instituted by Christ Himself. The Church Catechism defines a Sacrament as—[1] An outward visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace.

[2] Ordained by Christ himself. [3] A means whereby we receive grace, and a pledge to assure us thereof.

But a second question touches the nature of the Sacraments themselves. The Reformed view makes them "badges of Christian men's profession," signs and seals of living faith. The Roman view regards them as the absolutely necessary channels of Divine grace. According to the Reformed view, faith is required to make them efficacious, while the Roman doctrine of the opus operatum makes the virtue absolute.

Sacramentals.—A name given in the English Church to rites which have a certain resemblance to the Sacraments in that they are held to be outward means by which Divine gifts are conferred, but they have no visible sign or ceremony ordained of God. Such are Confirmation and Orders and Matrimony. The Roman Sacramentals are: "orans, tinctus, edens, confessus, datus, benedicens;" that is, the prayers of the Church, alms, blessed bread, confession at Mass and in the Office, the blessing of bishop or abbots, and holy water.

Sacramentarians.—A name given by the Lutherans to the Zwinglians, who believed that the elements in the Eucharist are nothing more than symbols, and that the Body and Blood of Christ cannot be present in them, nor be received in any way by the faithful. The name has been given to all who hold what were considered to be unorthodox opinions concerning the nature of the Sacraments, and has also been applied by Roman Catholics to Lutherans, Calvinists, and other Protestants indiscriminately.

Sacramentary or Liber Sacramentorum.—A book of the rites of Mass, and the other Sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church, with other sacramental rites, such as the dedication of churches, etc. It is represented by the Missal, Pontifical, and Ritual. Among the earliest sacramentaries are the Leonine, published by Muratori in the Liturgia Romana Vetus, and several Gallican sacramentaries, published by Cardinal Thomasius, one of which, the Gelasian, was reprinted from a manuscript of the ninth century in the Vatican.

Sacred Heart of Jesus.—This devotion, now very common in the Roman Church, originated in 1684 with the Sister Margaret Mary Alacoque, of the Order of the Visitation, a French nun, who declared that our Lord Himself had appeared to her in the flesh, and directed her to propagate the worship. It was preached by a Jesuit named La Combière, and rapidly attained to the popularity which it now holds, fulfilling its object of familiarising the people with the doctrine of our Lord's humanity. At the outset it encountered firm opposition, especially from the Jansenists; and those who attached themselves particularly to this worship were nicknamed Cordicola or Cardiolatra. In 1766 Pope Clement XIII. sanctioned the celebration of the feast of the Sacred Heart, and its foundress was canonised as lately as 1864. It is now kept on the Friday or Sunday after the octave of Corpus Christi.

In 1880 an Order of nuns, Dames du Sacré Cœur, was founded in Paris, and branches of them spread rapidly; but as they followed Jesuit rules, they shared in the general expulsion of the Jesuits.

Sacrifice.—The worship given to God by the oblation of some victim. Sacrifices at first were offered by the fathers of families, or the eldest persons in every house; but afterwards priests were ordained to that function. The “coats of skins” with which God clothed our first parents have been held by some of the greatest divines to indicate the Divine institution of sacrifice. But the first direct mention of sacrifice is in Gen. iv.: Abel “brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof,” while Cain offered of “the fruit of the ground.” The second is that of Noah, who, when he came out of the ark, sacrificed to God for his deliverance. Scripture makes mention likewise of the sacrifices offered by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The sacrifices of the Mosaic dispensation were initiated by the institution of the Passover, which was followed by a code set down by Moses according to the order he had received from God. After the appointment of the priesthood, the sacrifices were only offered by the priest in the Tabernacle or the Temple. Before the victim or beast designed for sacrifice was slain, the person for whom it was offered laid his hand upon its head, and made a public confession of his sins, whereon the beast was slain, flayed, and divided into parts. The priests took the blood, and sprinkled with it the four horns of the altar, and poured the rest at the foot of it. This done, if the sacrifice were an holocaust or whole burnt-offering, the victim was wholly consumed by fire; but in other sacrifices, the inside and fat only were burnt, the Levites meantime singing hymns of praise to God, and entreating Him to accept the sacrifice. The parts that were not burnt were for the use of the priests. The law as laid down in Leviticus distinguishes three main forms of sacrifice, the Expiatory (the sin and trespass offering), the Impetratory or Supplicatory (the burnt offering), and the Eucharistic (the meat offering and the peace offering). The same classes are observable in the Temple services. Sin Offerings were made at the great feasts as well as on the day of atonement, and at each new moon [Num. xxviii. 15]; there were daily Meat Offerings of flour, oil, and wine, besides the shewbread renewed weekly, the special offerings on the Sabbath and great festivals, and the first-fruits at Pentecost and harvest; and there was a daily Burnt Offering, doubled on the Sabbath, and special at the great festivals. To these must be added the morning and evening incense, and the offerings made on special occasions; as, on the presentation of the first-born, the cleansing of lepers, the fulfilment of Nazarite vows, etc.

From remotest times, the heathen nations sacrificed to their gods to propitiate them, but they also introduced the sacrifice of human beings. In the Scripture we have the burning of victims to Moloch, and the causing children to pass through the fire to Baal, and it was even so in European countries, in the worship offered to Saturn and Jupiter; Dionysius of Halicarnassus speaks of it in the first ages at Tyre, Carthage, and Italy. Plutarch, in his book of Superstition, mentions the sacrificing of children to Saturn; and Pliny tells us the custom had been observed in Rome. It was practised in our own country in Druidical times. We cannot but recognise in all such sacrifices a deep and unconquerable sense in mankind of alienation from God, and the sense of the soul that it needs forgiveness. How this need has been met to the full Christians make no question. [WORK OF CHRIST.]

Sacrilege.—The act of violating sacred things, or subjecting them to profanation; or the desecration of objects consecrated to God. The following were the chief acts of sacrilege punished by the ancient Church:—Accepting the Eucharist from any one other than a priest, the seizure of sacred property, the robbing of churches or graves, the abuse of sacred vessels and altars by employing them for unhallowed purposes, the plundering and misappropriation of alms and donations, a bishop's delivering over a monastery to spoliation, and, according to some, the abstaining from the cup in Holy Communion. There were also acts classed as sacrilege, but which have not been so called by conciliar decree, as, not consuming the Eucharist in church, giving the Eucharist to the dead, misuse of the chrism for medicinal or other purposes, drawing crosses on the ground where they may be trodden upon, etc. Committers of sacrilege were often put to death, and were sometimes ranked with murderers, and sometimes with heretics, felons, thieves, and wizards. Those who had stolen church property were thrice ordered to make restitution, and if they still refused were excommunicated and anathematised.

Sacring Bell or Sancte Bell.—A small bell rung during the celebration of Mass in the Roman Church, to draw the attention of the congregation to the more solemn parts of the service. It is also called the Saints', or Mass, Bell. In former times, a bell hung in a turret outside the church, was rung at the elevation of the Host, to give notice to the sick and others unable to attend Mass.

Sacristan.—The name in the early Church for the minister who took care of the sacred vessels, vestments, and furniture. This office is still retained in many foreign cathedrals. In most of the old English cathedrals the sacristan was the treasurer's deputy and a vicar choral, while in the new foundations he is a minor canon. At the present time, both the name and office of the sacristans of churches have been degraded, the former having changed to saxton, and the latter to an employment including not only the care of the church vestments and furniture, but also many other duties, formerly performed by inferior classes.

Sacristy.—Formerly a part of the diaconum or building attached to ancient basilicas, used by the deacons to keep the sacred vessels for the Mass, and by the priests to put their vestments on and off. It answered to our modern vestry.

Sacy, LOUIS ISAAC LE MAISTRE DE, was born at Paris in 1613; died, 1684; educated at the College of Beauvais, under his uncle, Anthony Arnauld, Doctor of the Sorbonne. He was very clever, and applied himself to the study of divinity; was ordained in 1648, and two years afterwards became Confessor and Spiritual Director of the recluses of PORT ROYAL [q.v.]. His first work was his translation of the Divine Service into French, with the hymns in verse, which is commonly called The Canonical Hours of Port Royal. During the persecutions of the Jansenists he withdrew into retirement in the suburb of St. Antoine; but was discovered and imprisoned in the Bastille, where he remained two years and a half. Here he wrote the history of the Old and New Testaments under the name of Royamont. After his release he went to live with his cousin, the Marquis of Pomponne, till his death. His translation of the New Testament, which appeared in 1667, was attacked by several bishops and condemned by Pope Clement IX.; Arnauld and Nicole, two of the Port Royalists, defended it, and the controversy lasted twenty years.

Sadolet, Cardinal and Bishop of Carpentras, born at Modena in 1478; died at Rome, 1547. He was educated at Ferrara and at Rome. In 1514 Pope Leo X. made him his Secretary, and three years after Bishop of Carpentras, in Avignon. On the death of Leo he retired to his bishopric; but Clement VII., the successor of Adrian VI., sent for him to return to Rome, which he did for three years. In 1536 Paul III. again called him to Rome, and made him Nuncio to France, to persuade King Francis to conclude a peace with Charles V., and on his return Sadolet was made Cardinal. He was buried in the Church of St. Peter ad Vincula. He wrote a commentary on St. Paul's epistle to the Romans; Interpretatio Psalmsorum; De Philosophica Consolatione et Meditatione in Adversis; De Liberis Rerum Institutandis; De Philosophia Laudibus, etc.

Saint [the Gallicised form of the Latin sanctus, which is the equivalent of the Greek hagios].—This word is of constant use both in the LXX. and Greek Testament as a simple adjective, applied both to persons and to things. It is used absolutely, in the sense of "Holy One," four times of our Blessed Lord [Mark i. 24; Luke iv. 34; Acts iii. 14; 1 John ii. 20].

It is applied to those who have been brought into the Jewish covenant many times in the Old Testament and once in the New [Matt. xxvii. 52], and to all baptised Christians in Acts ix. 13, 32, 41, xxvi. 10; Romans i. 7, viii. 27, xii. 13, xv. 25, 26, 31, xvi. 2, 15; 1 Cor. i. 2, vi. 1, 2, xiv. 33, xvi. 1, 15; 2 Cor. i. 1, viii. 4, ix. 1, 12, xiii. 13; Eph. i. 1, 16, 18, ii. 19, iii. 8, 18, iv. 12, v. 3, vi. 18; Phil. i. 1, iv. 22; Col. i. 2, 4, 12, 26; 1 Thes. iii. 13; 2 Thes. i. 10; Tim. v. 10; Phil. 5, 7; Heb. vi. 10, xiii. 24; Jude 3, 14; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, 4, xiii. 7, 10, xiv. 12, xv. 3, xvi. 6, xvii. 6, xviii. 24, xix. 8, xx. 9.

This shows clearly that all Christians are regarded as saints ["consecrated ones"] by virtue of their calling. And this is the meaning, at least in part, of the words of the Creed "the Communion of Saints"—the union which all those who "have put on Christ" have with Christ, and with each other through Him.

In the earliest days of Christianity this wide meaning continued. All who professed the name of Christ were called and consecrated to be holy. Soon came a secondary and inner meaning—those Christians who walked worthy of their calling by leading holy lives. And inasmuch as the Christian profession in the first days involved danger from persecution, the word soon came to be applied to those who "loved not their lives unto the death," but gave evidence of their love and faithfulness by sealing their confession with their lives. Consequently the observance of saints' days arose. Each Church commemorated its own martyrs and confessors, and the day of their martyrdom was the day of commemoration. On such occasions there was a celebration of Holy Communion in token of the doctrine expressed in the Creed.

This was the origin of saint's day observance. The intercommunion of Churches which grew with the organic and outward unity led to the general adoption of such observances. Saints of one Church were felt to be the common heritage of all. As years went on the number multiplied, and naturally, therefore, the custom still held of specially commemorating saints who belonged to particular Churches. The growth of Papal Usurpation led to the claim of the Popes to declare who were true saints. [CANONISATION.] At the Reformation the names of the greater number were removed from the Calendar. Those of the Apostles and Evangelists were retained, and special provision was made for Holy Communion on those days. [RED LETTER DAYS.] Others were retained in the Calendar, but without such provision. [BLACK LETTER DAYS.] The Festival of All Saints was instituted in the Eastern Church in the fourth century; one of Chrysostom's homilies was written for it. The festival was not adopted in the Western Church until the seventh century.

Saint Alban. [ALBAN, ST.]

Saint Simon de Rouvroy, COMTE CLAUDE HENRI DE, a French social philosopher, born at Paris in 1760; died there 1825. He was educated as a soldier, and in 1777 went to aid the Americans in their war against the English. He was from his earliest years possessed of the idea that he was born to play a great part, and on his return to France gave up his profession, convinced that his business was to "study the march of the human spirit, in order eventually to labour for the advancement of human civilisation." In 1785 he travelled in Spain, where he formed a project for making a canal to join Madrid with the sea, while in Mexico he had proposed to make an isthmus through the country. He was strongly in favour of the Revolution, though he took no active part in it. He, in partnership with the Prussian Graff von Redem, bought up a large quantity of the confiscated estates, intending to found a scientific and industrial school, but squandered his money, and in 1797 found that he had only £6,800 remaining to him. It was at this time that he began the studies that he thought necessary to the carrying out of his plan of remodelling society; but when, in 1807, his education was finished, he found himself in the most abject poverty. In 1812 he published his first work, Letters from an Inhabitant of Geneva to his Contemporaries, stating his Views of Modern Society. This was followed by Introduction to the Scientific Labours of the Nineteenth Century. In 1814 he and Augustin Thierry wrote The Reorganisation of European Society. Saint Simon had by this time gained round him a few ardent admirers, as Rodrigues, Thierry, Comte, Bazard, and Enfantin, but his books were little read, and no notice was taken of him outside his narrow circle. This and his poverty so depressed him that he attempted to commit suicide, but was prevented. His last work was an exposition of a new religion, Nouveau Christianisme [1825], of which the prominent idea is that Christianity is a progressive system, continually gaining new power, but retaining through all ages the principle, "Love one another." The first stage had been Catholicism, then came Protestantism, and lastly Saint-Simonianism. So far as the nature of this new or Saint-Simonian religion was defined, its peculiarity was to rest on two principles—the one relating to the end after which humanity was to strive, the other to the means whereby this end was to be attained. "The most rapid possible amelioration, physical and moral, of the condition of the class the most numerous and poor"—such was the first principle, defining the end prescribed by the new religion for all the efforts and labours of humanity. To the attainment of this end, however, a right organisation of society was indispensable; and the principle of this organisation or reconstruction was formulated thus—"To each man a vocation according to his capacity, and to each capacity a recompense according to its works." His last act was to found Le Producteur, a journal which was to proclaim this new religion. The Saint-Simonians became extinct in 1832, but there are still traces of their doctrine among the modern French school of thought.

Saints, INVOCATION OF. [INVOCATION OF SAINTS.]

Sales, FRANCIS DE. [FRANCIS DE SALES.]

Salisbury, BISHOPRIC OF.—The seat of this diocese was originally Old Sarum, the Saxon town of Searobyrg, to which place the See was removed in 1075 by Bishop Herman, who in 1068 had become bishop of the united dioceses of SHERBORNE [q.v.] and Ramsbury. He commenced to build a cathedral here, which was completed by his successor, Osmund. In 1220 Bishop Poore removed the seat of his diocese to Salisbury. In 1542 Dorsetshire was transferred to the newly-formed See of Bristol; in 1836 Berkshire was joined to the diocese of Oxford. Gloucester and Bristol were united under one bishop, and Berkshire was restored to Salisbury.

Bishop Richard le Poore, in 1220, set about building a cathedral, and continued it till he was translated to Durham in 1229. He founded also a Cistercian nunnery in his native place of Tarrant, in Dorsetshire. Amongst English cathedrals it shares, along with St. Paul's, the characteristic of being built all in one period, the first half of the thirteenth century. The lofty spire, upon which the repute of Salisbury Cathedral is rested, seems to have been no part of the original design, and was added some time after by an unknown architect, who nearly overtaxed the capability of the existing building, which was not designed to bear such a weight. Salisbury is peculiarly rich in the survival of consecration crosses, which in mediæval days were carved or painted on the walls of churches. There were no monks at Salisbury—a fact of which we are reminded by the choir-stalls being all placed east of the transept. One curiosity.

among the monuments is the recumbent figure of a so-called boy bishop [Boy Bishop], but some suppose that this may be a small stone erected to cover the relics of St. Osmund, the founder of the See.

From the time of Bishop Poore to the Reformation, the bishops of Salisbury were not men of mark, excepting Hallam [1407-17], who was made a Cardinal and was present at the Council of Constance, at which place he died. Since the Reformation there have been John Jewell, Gilbert Burnet, and others who were translated to other Sees, of whom short biographical notices will be found.

The cathedral chapter consists of a dean, four canons, three archdeacons, forty-two canons non-residential or prebendaries, and four minor canons. The income of the See is £5,000. The diocese comprises the whole of Dorsetshire and Wiltshire, with portions of counties adjacent, and has 487 benefices.

Salmasius, CLAUDIUS, or Claude de Saumaise, was born at Semur, in Burgundy, in 1588; died at Spa, 1653. His mother being a Protestant, he was brought up in that religion. He studied at Paris and Heidelberg. He lived near Paris till 1632, when he was called to an honorary professorship at Leyden. He received many tempting offers from Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin to return to France, but refused them all. He was undoubtedly a man of great learning, though too discursive to be accurate, and his historical and theological writings were of considerable value. Charles II. asked him to write a defence of his father and of monarchy, and accordingly, in 1649, appeared Defensio Regia pro Carolo I., which was answered by Milton's Defensio pro Populo Anglicano. He died while writing a reply to Milton.

Salutation, ANGELICAL.—A form of service in the Church of Rome consisting of the angel's salutation, that of Elizabeth, and some other words added not long since. It runs thus:—"Ave, Maria, gratia plena; Dominus tecum; benedicta tu in mulieribus, et benedictus fructus ventris tui; Sancta Maria, mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus, nunc et in hora mortis nostrae." Amen.

The latter clause Sancta Maria, mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus, was added, as some say, in the fifteenth century; but the last words, nunc et in hora mortis nostrae, were inserted by the order of Pope Pius V., 1568. Macer, in his Hierolexicon, observes that Urban II. ordered a bell to be tolled thrice a day, especially morning and evening, that people might be put in mind of repeating this salutation, and that God might prosper the Christian arms in the recovery of the Holy Land; which custom having continued about 134 years, fell into neglect, till Gregory IX. revived it with the addition of a constant noon-bell. This is called the Angelus bell. The repeating of it at the beginning of the sermon was first enjoined by St. Dominic, or, as some say, by Vincent Ferrer.

Salvation [the translation of the Authorized Version of the Heb. yeshuah, "safety," "ease," and of the Greek soteria, "safety," "health"].—The word occurs in about 120 passages in the Old Testament and about 50 in the New Testament, and in the latter is used generally to denote all the benefits secured to believers through the life, death, and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ. These include deliverance from condemnation on account of sin, from the sinful nature inherited from Adam, and from death, and the final attainment of a state of holiness, happiness, largely increased powers, effectual service for God, and immortality.

Salvation Army, THZ, is a religious organisation which was originated in the East of London in 1865, by Mr. William Booth, the leader and general. He was born at Nottingham in 1829, and in 1843 became a minister of the Methodist New Connexion. He was in 1844 set apart as an evangelist, and when in 1856 he returned to the regular pastorate, he felt himself out of his sphere, and in 1861 requested to be allowed to again become an evangelist. The request was refused, so he left the Society and began an independent career. He worked in Cornwall, Newcastle, and other places, and in 1866 hired a theatre in Whitechapel. The society was developed into its present form and received its name in 1876. With the name army came military phraseology. Prayer was termed kneel-drill, the leader, a general; evangelists, officers; and candidates, cadets. A semi-military attire was assumed, barracks were built instead of separate residences, and when the army went out to take a place by storm, it was with banners displayed and bands of music. The noisiest music (drums, brass, etc.) is also employed in the meetings, and other proceedings of a very sensational character. The object is to attract people who would not enter church or chapel, and for this cause the officers, male and female, visit public-houses, prisons, etc., and open-air meetings are held. Its possession of the streets was not undisputed, and a counter army was formed which was called the Skeleton Army. An account of the doings of the Salvation Army, their expenses, etc., is published in a weekly paper called the War Cry. The number of corps or stations in March, 1885, is said to have been 983, the number of officers, 2,512. Services are held in 562 villages, and the number of them every week is 16,000. Over 5,000,000 people are said to be reached in the streets weekly. The weekly circulation of the War Cry and of The Little Soldier, a paper for children, is over 550,000. The total income from all sources in 1885, apart from trade receipts, was £76,168 17s. 4½d. The trading account in connection with the central trade headquarters showed £12,754 10s. 2d. from sale of books, £24,137 10s. 9d. from the sale of the official journals, £19,636 10s. 7d. from sales effected in the outfit department, and £6,397 1s. 2d. from the sale of tea. The net profit of these transactions was £3,606 11s. 3d. There were 802 corps in the United Kingdom, against 637 in 1884, and 520 abroad against 273. Four specially constructed vans are travelling about the country districts with preachers. Their literature comprises 23,470,860 publications in 13 different languages.

Salvation of Infants.—The salvation of baptised infants is definitely asserted by the Church of England in the Liturgy. "It is certain by God's Word that children which are baptised, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved." So runs the rubric at the end of the Baptismal Service. This rubric is drawn from a declaration published in Cranmer's Institution of a Christian Man in 1537. In the original form the words "and otherwise not" were appended. It was a happy omission when they were struck out. The present rubric was one of the heaviest grievances complained of by the Dissenters. Baxter declared that if every other word to which he objected were taken away, he still could not conform so long as this rubric should remain. There is no opinion expressed in any formulary of the Church of England as to the state of children dying unbaptised. Probably the reason for the insertion of this rubric was to declare that Confirmation was not essential to baptised infants. Bishop Bethell in his treatise on Regeneration says that it was the common opinion of the early Church that unbaptised infants were not saved [resting the view upon John iii. 5], but that this opinion did not involve any cruel idea of pain or suffering for little ones deprived of this Sacrament. It rather supposed them to be as though they had never been, whereas they might, by the care of their parents, have been reckoned among the followers of the Lamb. But this doctrine has found little favour among English divines, and the teaching of the great Hooker is probably an expression of the general opinion of Churchmen: "Grace is not absolutely tied unto Sacraments, and such is the lenity of God that unto things impossible he bindeth no man" [Eccles. Pol., vi. 60]. It was this judgment of charity which induced the compilers of the Service "for Baptism of those of riper years" to qualify the conclusion which they draw from John iii. 5 as to the necessity of baptism, by the words "where it may be had."

Salve Regina.—An antiphon sung in the Roman Church from Trinity to Advent, after Lauds and Compline. It was the earliest antiphon of the Virgin, and was first put into the Breviary by Cardinal Quignon, and transferred to the Roman Breviary by Pius V. It is said to have been composed by Contractus, a Benedictine monk of the eleventh century, while the last clause, O clemens, O pia, O dulcis Virgo Maria, was added by St. Bernard.

Salvianus, a presbyter who lived in Gaul in the fifth century. He wrote numerous works, of which some are still extant, as De Avaritia [440], De Gubernatione Dei, or De Providentia [451]. His works were first collected and published by Pitheux, in Paris, 1580.

Samaritans.—A mixed people, who formed a sect among the Jews, and who inhabited the region between Judæa and Galilee. They were partly the remains of the ten tribes left in Samaria by Shalmaneser, King of Assyria, when he had carried their brethren away captive, and partly Babylonians, Cuthæans, and others, who had come to supply the place of the conquered people. These had been converted from idolatry by the Jews; but on the return of the inhabitants from the Babylonish captivity, the Jews declined to mix with them, though united with them in religion. They attempted to prevent the Jews from rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem, and, failing in this, they built a temple on Mount Gerizim exclusively for their own worship. A few of the race still exist, scattered in Egypt, at Damascus, and at Gaza. They profess great strictness in observing the Mosaic law, but are regarded by the Jews as heretics, as they accept only the Pentateuch. They possess some very valuable manuscripts, among them an ancient copy of the Pentateuch, written in Phœnician characters, or, according to some, the ancient Hebrew characters in use before the Babylonish Captivity. There are some differences between this Pentateuch and that of the Jews, but they are mostly, no doubt, owing to the inaccuracy of transcribers. Their worship is like that of the Jews, but they always take off their shoes before entering the synagogue.

Samosatians. [PAUL OF SAMOSATA.]

San Benito.—The garments worn by the victims of the Inquisition at the Auto da Fé. They had devils and flames painted on them. If the victim was to be burnt alive, the flames pointed upwards; if not, downwards.

Sanchez, THOMAS [b. at Cordova in 1551; d. at Granada, 1610], a Spanish Jesuit. He studied theology and law, and his book De Sacramento Matrimonii became famous, and would have been valuable had it not been for its intolerable coarseness.

Sanchuniathon.—A Phœnician philosopher and historian, who is supposed to have lived at the time of, or before, the Trojan War. Of his works nothing remains but fragments, quoted by Eusebius and Theodoret, the first of whom speaks of him as an accurate historian who wrote a valuable work on the history of the Jews. Sanchuniathon is mentioned by Porphyry, Athenæus, and Suidas, and Eusebius says that one of his works was translated into Greek by Philo. Modern writers have said that the fragments were forgeries, either by Philo or by Porphyry, accepted by Eusebius as genuine, and it is now doubted by many whether he ever existed. If so, it is still probable that he lived at a later period than has been generally assigned to him.

Sancroft, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 1616, at Fressingfield, in Suffolk. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow in 1642, but was ejected for refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant. He spent some years in France and Italy, and on returning to England at the Restoration became successively University Preacher [1660], Master of his College [1662], Dean of York [1663], and of St. Paul's [1664]. The cathedral having received much damage during the Commonwealth, he had set himself to repair it when it was burnt down in 1666, and he had to turn his mind to its entire rebuilding. He also rebuilt the deanery. In 1677 he was made Archbishop of Canterbury. He was committed to the Tower, together with six other bishops, in 1687, for refusing to read the Declaration of Indulgence, but they were all acquitted. Upon James's withdrawing himself in 1688, he concurred with the Lords spiritual and temporal in a declaration to the Prince of Orange for a free Parliament, with due liberty to Protestant Dissenters. But at the accession of William and Mary he refused to swear the oath of allegiance, and was deprived of his archbishopric. He retired to Fressingfield, where he died in 1693. He wrote Modera Politia, Familiar Letters, Prodestimated Thief, and sermons. [NONJURORS.]

Sancta. Sanctis.—An exclamation found in all Eastern Liturgies, following the Consecration Prayer and preceding the Communion. The words in the Liturgy of St. James are as follow:

The Priest says secretly:

Holy Lord, that reatest in the holies, hallow us by the word of Thy grace, and by the visitation of Thy most Holy Spirit; for Thou, Lord, hast said Be ye holy, for I am holy. Lord our God, incomprehensible Word of God, co-substantial, co-eternal, indivisible, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, receive the pure hymn, in Thy holy and spotless sacrifice, with the cherubim and seraphim, and from me a sinner crying and saying [Thou hast elevated the oblation and cries aloud] Holy things for holy persons.

The People say:

One Holy, one Lord, Jesus Christ, in the glory of God the Father, to Whom be glory for ever and ever.

The Deacon says:

For the remission of our sins, and the propitiation of our souls, and for every afflicted and distressed soul that needeth the pity and help of God: and for the conversion of them that have strayed, the healing of them that are sick, the liberation of them that are in captivity, the rest of our fathers and brethren that have fallen asleep before us, let us pray earnestly and say, Lord have mercy.

People:

Lord have mercy.

Sanctification.—The work of the Holy Spirit whereby man is renewed in the image of God, and enabled to die to sin. It is based upon the holiness of God, who is not only absolutely pure in Himself, but communicates His purity to His people through the Spirit. Sanctification is not to be confounded with Justification, which is forgiveness of sin, whereby man stands before God pure in His eyes through an act of God's mercy. Sanctification is a gradual progress towards holiness, following Justification, and changing the heart and life through the power of the Holy Ghost. Justification removes the guilt, and Sanctification the power, of sin; Justification delivers us from the avenging wrath of God, and Sanctification conforms us to His image. Nevertheless, the two are inseparably connected in the promises of God, and in the doctrines and promises of the Gospel.

Sanction, Pragmatic. [PRAGMATIC SANCTION.]

Sanctuary.—The eastern part of the choir of a church, enclosed by a railing, in which the altar is placed. In ancient times a church was divided into two parts—the atrium or court for the laity, and the sanctuary for the clergy. The first mention of the word was in the Council of Braga in 563, which forbids any lay person to enter the sanctuary for the reception of communion.

Sanctuary, RIGHT OF.—By sanctuary is meant the privilege of criminals who fled to certain sacred places to secure freedom from arrest and punishment so long as they remain therein. This custom, which is now almost everywhere done away with, was derived from the Levitical law of refuge, by which, under express appointment, six cities were made cities of refuge for the involuntary man-slayer. From the time of Constantine downwards certain churches were set apart in many countries to be asylums for fugitives from the hand of justice. The right was not granted to all churches, but was conferred on special ones by the Emperors, who also made laws to prevent the abuse of the privilege, which was intended for the weak, innocent, and misunderstood, and not for condemned criminals. Thus we read, "All churches before the time of Charlemagne were asyla, and for all sorts of criminals; but he, by a Capitular, A.D. 779, conformable to one of Carloman and Pepin passed about 744, decreed that churches should not be asyla for criminals who had committed such crimes as the law punished with death;" and if he did not go as far as to make it lawful to force a criminal from his asylum, yet, what came to the same thing, he prohibited people from giving them any nourishment. At first the right of sanctuary was granted only to the altar and nave of a church, but was afterwards extended also to the court, gardens, etc.

It seems that this custom was of very early date in Britain, as the Druids gave certain sacred trees as asyla. There are legends to the effect that sanctuary was granted in 180 to the church at Winchester, and in 604 to Westminster. The first reliable fact is an enactment of Ina, King of Wessex, in 890, that the lives of all who had committed capital offences and had escaped to a church, should be saved, and that those deserving of stripes should be forgiven. In several English churches there was a stone seat beside the altar for those who sought sanctuary. Two of these still remain at Beverley and Hexham. The "Abjuration of the Realm" is an ancient law by which a felon who had taken sanctuary might within forty days go in sack-cloth to the coroner and take an oath to leave the realm, and not return without the King's licence. If he did not fulfil his promise he was condemned to be hanged. During the Middle Ages the custom of sanctuary became much abused, the privilege being often extended to those who had knowingly and wilfully committed the most heinous offences. The Reformation restricted, but did not abolish, the right. In 1534 those who had committed treason were debarred from taking sanctuary, and in 1624 it was forbidden to all but debtors. Sanctuaries were finally done away in England in 1697. There still exists one for debtors in Holyrood.

Sanctus [holy]. Used in abbreviation for the Trisagion [q.v.]. The music to which this is sung is called the Sanctus. The Sancte Bell is rung at this point in the Roman Catholic service.

Sandals form part of the bishop's vestments in the Roman Catholic Church. They are first mentioned by Amalarius of Metz as part of the bishop's dress, and the writer mentions the fact that the bishop's sandals differed from those of the priest, as the former wore them in travelling. At the time of Innocent III. we find that priests no longer wore sandals. They are regarded by Rabanus Maurus as a symbol that the pastors should reveal the truth only to those of their flock, concealing it from infidels; the sandal being made so that only the under part of the foot was covered, and the upper part revealed.

Sandemanians [originally called Glassites, by which name they are still known in Scotland].—A sect founded about 1728 by John Glass, a Scotchman, and originally a minister of the Presbyterian Church. He was suspended by the Synod of Angus and Mearns for holding heretical opinions, which he published in a book called The Testimony of the King of Martyrs. Among other views, he held that national establishments of religion are inconsistent with the teaching of the New Testament, and, that there ought to be no connection between Church and State. His doctrines were further developed by his son-in-law, ROBERT SANDEMAN [b. at Perth, 1718; d. in America, 1771], who maintained the necessity of justification by faith, but at the same time defined faith as a simple belief in the Divine testimony, differing in no way from belief in any ordinary human testimony. Sandeman established the sect in London and America, and it exists to the present day; it never numbered many followers, and now they are probably under two thousand. The Sandemanians have revived several customs of the primitive Church, such as abstinence from blood and from things strangled, the holding of love-feasts, the kiss of charity, washing of each other's feet, community of goods, the use of the lot, and the celebration of the Eucharist weekly. They practise mutual exhortation, and believe in a plurality of elders or pastors, who are set apart from amongst themselves, engagement in trade being no obstacle. The late celebrated Professor Michael Faraday was a Sandemanian.

Sanderson, ROBERT, Bishop of Lincoln [b. in Yorkshire, 1587; d. at Lincoln, in January, 1663]. Educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, and was made Logic Reader of that college in 1608; afterwards became a Fellow and Proctor of the University. Having taken orders, Sanderson was appointed Prebendary of Southwell in 1615 and of Lincoln in 1629; rector of a living in Lincolnshire, and, on the recommendation of Archbishop Laud, Chaplain to Charles I. in 1631. It is said that he was the King's favourite preacher, for Charles was a great admirer of casuistry, in which Sanderson excelled; and being with the Court at Oxford in 1636 he was made a D.D. In 1642 he obtained the Regius Professorship of Divinity at Oxford, but was prevented from entering on the appointment through the outbreak of the Civil Wars, and in 1648 was ejected by the Visitors commissioned by Parliament. He accompanied the King to Hampton Court and the Isle of Wight. In his younger days he had been somewhat of a Puritan and a Calvinist, but his opinions changed later, and in 1661 he wrote a treatise called Episcopacy, as established by Law in England, not prejudicial to Regal Power. After the Restoration he was made Bishop of Lincoln, and assisted at the Savoy Conference; and in the short time which elapsed before his death he did much towards increasing the value of the poorer benefices in his diocese. Sanderson was noted as an antiquary, but was chiefly famed for his casuistry. He wrote De Juramenti Obligatione [1661], Nine Cases of Conscience [1678], Logica Artis Compendium, De Obligatione Conscientiæ, and other works. Bishop Sanderson lives permanently in the Anglican Church, through the Preface prefixed to the Book of Common Prayer: "It hath been the wisdom," etc. This Preface is his work, and is deeply interesting as expressing the position taken by the Church of England at its restoration after the Revolution. It glances at the history of the past, and reviews each of the revisions, asserting that, all through, the essentials have continued the same. One phrase used in this Preface has become celebrated, "the middle way between two extremes." A countless number of preachers and essayists have adduced this as expressing the position of the Church of England between Romanism and Calvinism; but an examination of the context will show that the Bishop is merely expressing the moderation and calmness of the revisions; the retention of fundamental principles, the stiffness which refuses any reform. And the objects of revision which he declares are sought are, the preservation of peace and unity, the procuring of reverence and exciting of piety and devotion, and the cutting off of occasion of cavil. It will probably be considered by those who study the document most carefully, that it places Sanderson in a highly favourable light.

Sandys, EDWIN, Archbishop of York, the son of a gentleman of Lancashire, was born in 1528 and died in 1588. He was educated at Cambridge, and while there was converted to Protestantism. In course of time he was made Master of Catherine Hall. He was Vice-Chancellor of the University when the Duke of Northumberland marched through with his troops, with the intention of setting Lady Jane Grey on the throne. Happening to be at Cambridge on Sunday, the Duke ordered Sandys to preach before him, which he did, taking for his text Joshua i. 16. The Duke was much pleased, and promised him promotion, but within a very few days they were both in the Tower. By the interest of some influential friends he was liberated at the end of four months, crossed to Germany, and stayed there till the accession of Queen Elizabeth. She made him Bishop of Worcester in 1559. He was translated to London in 1570, and thence to York in 1577. His only literary work was a volume of sermons.

Sanhedrim. — The supreme national tribunal of the Jews, instituted in the time of the Maccabees. According to the Talmud, Moses founded it when he chose seventy elders to assist him in the wilderness in judging the children of Israel; but of this there is no satisfactory evidence. There were seventy members of the Sanhedrim, besides the president, who was usually the high priest. They had power over secular as well as spiritual matters, and were elected from among the priests, elders, or heads of families, and scribes or doctors of the law. In council they sat in a semicircle, with the president in the centre; they assembled in the Hall of Squares, or some other building in the immediate vicinity of the Temple; at the trial of our Lord they sat in the high priest's palace. This council became extinct in 425.

Sardica, COUNCIL OF.—According to Socrates and Sozomen, this Council was held in 347, but it probably took place in 344 or at the end of 343. It was called together for the purpose of deciding the disputed questions of the Arian controversy, and of healing the breach they had caused between the Eastern and Western Churches. There were present only seventy-six of the Eastern and more than three hundred of the Western bishops. It was impossible to effect a union, and the meeting served rather to widen than to heal the breach. The bishops of the West having demanded that Athanasius and his friends should be allowed to attend the assembly as regular bishops, and those of the East having refused to grant this, a total rupture took place between the parties. The Western bishops continued to hold their session at Sardica; the Eastern withdrew to Philippopolis, in Thrace, so that the only issue of the Council was to completely sever the bond of fellowship between the two Churches. Being unwilling to add anything to the Council of Nicaea, or to form a new Confession of Faith, they made twenty or twenty-one canons for the general discipline of the Church, the fourth of which, according to the Roman Catholics, was the principal step to the sovereignty of the Pope in the Church, by ruling that an appeal might be made to the Bishop of Rome in quality of supreme judge. It is doubtful, however, whether the Council intended to do more than confer on Julius, who was then Pope, a personal privilege, as an expedient for a time of trouble and division. The Trullan Council adopted the canons of the Council of Sardica for the Eastern as well as the Western Church, though the division prevents it from being considered an œcumenical council.

Sarpi, PAOLO, generally called Fra Paolo, was born in Venice in 1552, died in 1623. He early showed great talents, and the scope of his learning must have been wonderful. He became one of the Order of the Servites, and at the age of twenty-seven was made Provincial. The quarrel between the Commonwealth of Venice and Pope Paul V. was the cause of much anxiety to him. He denied the right of the Pope to interfere in secular matters, and asserted that Papal excommunication was only valid so long as it was perfectly just. He was summoned to appear at Rome, and on his refusal the Pope excommunicated him. But this did not affect him much, for he continued, with his tongue and pen, to assert the rights of the Commonwealth. The Pope's hatred gained him many enemies, and once he was set upon in the street by five men, who wounded him severely, though not mortally. Although not a Protestant, he strongly urged the reformation of the Church, and he was in correspondence with several leaders of the Reformation. In 1607 peace was concluded between the Commonwealth of Venice and Rome, and the ban of excommunication was removed from Fra Paolo. He was always in disfavour notwithstanding, and after his death Urban VIII., hearing that the people looked upon him as a saint and were in the habit of praying at his tomb, sent to forbid it. His writings are many, but the most celebrated is his History of the Council of Trent, which first appeared at Geneva in 1619. It is written from a strong anti-Roman point of view, and might, indeed, be the work of a Protestant. It has been translated into English, French, and German.

Sartorius, ERNST WILHELM CHRISTIAN [b. 1797, d. 1859], having studied at Göttingen, became Professor at Marburg in 1821, and at Dorpat in 1824. He wrote Beiträge zur Evangelischen, Rechtgläubigkeit, Lehre von Christi Person, Die Lehre von der heiligen Liebe, etc.

SARUM USE. [USES.]

Satan is a Hebrew word signifying "hater" or "accuser," and the name is found in Job i. and ii., Zech. iii., Ps. cix. The doctrine of his personality seems undoubtedly more clearly taught in the later than in the earlier books of the Bible, and the gloss which is put upon the New Testament teaching, implying that his personality is merely a Hebrew form of expressing an "impersonation," is one which certainly does considerable violence to the letter of Scripture. The history of the origin of evil and of the fall of Satan from heaven is but dimly revealed to us. More of our popular theology than we are commonly aware of is derived from Milton's magnificent poem. But though we are left greatly in the dark as to the Fall of the Devil, we are in none as to his works. Let it be granted, in the words of Archbishop Trench, that "he is only known to us through his temptations, through the evil suggestions which he causes to rise up out of the deep of our hearts, through the fiery darts with which he seeks to set on fire in us the whole course of nature . . . so that for all practical purposes the words of St. James, 'Resist the devil and he will flee from you,' might be translated into such language as this: Strive manfully against temptations and you have God's promise and pledge that these, instead of overcoming you, shall be overcome by you." But the temptations are real and certain enough. The doctrine of the personality of the Tempter is nowhere asserted in the Church Creeds, and some English divines have declined to affirm it dogmatically. But the language of Scripture and of Christ throws a very serious responsibility upon those who deny it. Kingsley in one of his vigorous sentences roundly declares that the denial is one of the most dangerous of modern heresies, and that the devil's latest device is "shamming dead."

Other names for Satan are DEVIL [Gr. diabolos, "slanderer" or "accuser"]; BERLESEBUB ["master of the house"], a heathen deity who was thus made a synonym for the prince of evil, a later form of BAAL-ZEBUL ["lord of flies," probably in allusion to the fact that he was regarded as the sun-god]; APOLLYON and ARADDON, two names meaning in Greek and Hebrew respectively "destroyer."

The two great poetic creations by Milton and Goethe of Satan and Mephistopheles have had a great effect upon religious thought, yet hardly more so than the horned and cloven-hoofed figure of popular notion. This latter figure was the prescriptive mode of representing the devil in the mediæval miracle-plays, and in consequence has come to be a part of the vulgar notion and language. "To detect the cloven foot" is a phrase which is so common as almost to lead the unthinking to conclude that there must be Scriptural authority for the idea that the devil is so marked.

Meanwhile it should be seriously considered by those who reject the doctrine of the personality of Satan, that such rejection may be but a step to the denial of a great deal more. The New Testament is, from beginning to end, an earnest testimony of a real battle between the kingdoms of light and darkness; and to cast doubt on the reality of that fight is to paralyse effort, to put off the armour of God, and to set aside watchfulness and prayer.

Saturnians.—A sect of Gnostics, the followers of Saturninus, a native of Antioch, who lived in the second century. They held doctrines very similar to those of the BASILIDIANS [q.v.], but very little is known either of them or of their leader.

Saturninus, Sr.—A priest of Abitana, near Carthage, at the time of the Diocletian persecution [304], who, whilst celebrating the Holy Communion, was seized, with four of his children and forty-four other persons, and carried before the magistrate, and then marched in chains to Carthage. Amongst them was Dativus, a senator, and he, being the most considerable personage, was the first to be questioned by Anulinus the Proconsul. He testified boldly to Christianity, and he and the rest of the congregation were one after another put on the rack, and at last it came to Saturninus's turn. The magistrate tried to confuse him and make him contradict himself; but, finding this impossible, he was sent to be tortured like the others, some of whom had died in their agonies. One of the victims at this time was a lady of good birth named Victoria, who for a time was treated with more leniency in the hopes of persuading her to recant. When at her trial she announced that she was a Christian, her brother tried to persuade the magistrates that she was not in possession of her senses. She assured the Governor that she was, and desired nothing better than to lay down her life for her religion, and she gained her desire some days after. Saturninus and his four sons suffered death at different times; some of the rest died in prison from starvation or want of air. The Roman martyrology commemorates them all on Feb. 11th.

Saumaise, CLAUDE DE. [SALMASIUS, CLAUDIUS.]

Saunders, LAWRENCE.—A Protestant martyr in the reign of Queen Mary. He was educated at Eton, and then passed three years at King's College, Cambridge. On leaving the University he was bound apprentice to Sir W. Chester, a wealthy London merchant; but his master, seeing his mind bent to study rather than the life of a merchant, released him before he had served his full time. He was licensed to preach just at the beginning of Edward's reign, and became Reader, first at Fotheringay, and then at the Minster of Lichfield; he was then appointed to the living of Church Langton, in Leicestershire, and afterwards to Allhallows, Bread Street. On the accession of Mary, his friends urged him to fly the country, but he remained firmly at his post. On October 15th, 1553, he preached against the Mass, and by order of Bonner was arrested and committed to the Marshalsea on May 8th, 1554. He, together with Coverdale, Bradford, and others, signed a declaration stating the conditions on which they were prepared to dispute before the University of Cambridge. On Jan. 30th, 1555, after having been kept in prison for fifteen months, he was brought up for examination, and on Feb. 4th was degraded by Bishop Bonner and handed over to the secular power; then taken to a prison called the Compter, in his own parish of Bread Street; whence he was conveyed to Coventry, and there burnt, Feb. 8th. He wrote many interesting letters to his wife and others, encouraging them to constancy in their faith. These will be found at length in Foxe's Book of Martyrs.

Saurin, ELIE, was born at Ussean, in the valley of Pragelas, 1639, but lived most of his life in Utrecht, where he was appointed pastor of the Walloon Church in 1671. When the French took the town in 1672, many of them, though Roman Catholics, used to go and hear him preach. He had throughout his life a great opponent, M. Jurien. A Dutch synod thinking that a book the latter had published was not orthodox, asked Saurin to look it through and remark on it. Jurien denied the justice of the remarks, and in return accused Saurin of heresy. The quarrel was long and violent, and at last the synod forbade either of them to write any more. Saurin, however, thinking that his adversary had not kept his word, wrote a brilliant but bitter essay, entitled An Examination of M. Jurien's Divinity. Besides the books on this quarrel he wrote very little, a tract on the love of God and love of our neighbour being the only one worthy of notice. He died on Easter Sunday, 1703.

Saurin, JACQUES [b. at Nîmes, 1677; d. at the Hague, 1730].—One of the most celebrated preachers of the French Reformed Church. Though making great progress with his studies, he gave them up to join a regiment of volunteers fighting against Louis XIV.; but returned after four years to study theology at Geneva. He travelled through Holland, came to London, where he took charge of the French Reformed Church in 1700; went to the Hague in 1705, and settled there as pastor, attracting numbers of people to his church by his eloquence and earnestness. He was accused of heresy by some of his clerical brethren on the ground of his Dissertation sur le Mensonge officieux—on falsehoods which are expedient—a delicate subject to handle, and in which he is charged with attributing falsehood to God. This censure is said to have shortened his days. He published several volumes of sermons, and others were published by his son after his death. In addition he wrote a series of Discourses on the historical events of the Old and New Testament, and a pamphlet on L'État du Christianisme en France.

Savonarola, GIROLAMO, was born at Ferrara on Sept. 21st, 1452. He seems to have been a quiet, reserved child, but at the same time to have shown signs at an early age of great intellectual powers. His grandfather had been a celebrated physician, and it was decided that Girolamo should follow the same profession. But a distaste for this, combined with a disappointment in love, determined him to devote himself to the retired life of a monastery. He left home secretly in April, 1475, and took monastic vows at the convent of St. Domenico at Bologna. He went to Ferrara in 1485, and preached there several times, but created no stir. He asked at first to be allowed to undertake merely the most humble offices in the monastery, but the superiors very soon recognised his intellectual powers, and employed him to instruct the novices. Suddenly at Bologna he burst out, entrancing all hearts and filling the church with excited crowds, who were spellbound under his magnificent oratory. Thence he was sent to Florence, and it was in this city that he made his name famous in history. Lorenzo de Medici was then at the height of his power and magnificence, and under his influence the whole town was given up to worldly and sensual pleasures. Savonarola set about awakening the citizens to a sense of their danger. He preached his first sermon in Florence in 1483; but, accustomed to the learned, subtle discourses of the Schoolmen, the people at first treated with contempt one who in simple, unpolished words urged them to repent of their sins. Savonarola was not discouraged by this failure. He preached for a year or two in small towns outside the walls of Florence. In 1490 he returned, and in a very few weeks had taken the whole city by storm. He became so powerful, and was supported by so many influential citizens, that Lorenzo became uneasy, and Savonarola was privately urged to be a little less bitter against those in authority; but he refused to listen. In 1491 he was made Prior of the Convent of St. Mark's, but utterly refused to conform to the usage of paying homage to Lorenzo for it. In 1492 the duke was on his death-bed, and although he had been granted absolution by one of the attendant priests, his mind was not at rest. Suddenly he thought of Savonarola, who had never been afraid to speak the truth to him, and caused him to be sent for. Writers differ as to the result of this interview—Politian, a courtier, asserting that Savonarola granted absolution; Burlamacchi, a friend of Savonarola, asserting equally decidedly that it was denied. As the latter account was written at a time when Savonarola was in very bad favour, and there were plenty of people who would have been only too glad to deny it had it been false, it appears the most probable. During the rule of Lorenzo's successor, Piero, Florence lost some of its prestige; but it still had great power, and Savonarola was without question the most influential man in the city. The moral improvement which he effected in Florence was most remarkable; the whole aspect of the city changed for the better; but his work now began to cause uneasiness at Rome. It is said that Pope Alexander VI. offered him a Cardinal's hat, hoping thereby to silence him. Savonarola declined the offer. The Pope then ordered him to appear in Rome; but he refused to obey. In 1497 he was excommunicated. A powerful hostile party was formed against him in Florence, which at the beginning of 1498 handed him over to the Inquisition, and on May 23rd of the same year he was publicly burned. As an author his fame rests on his Treatise on the 51st Psalm, his Compendium Revelationum, and his Trionfo della Croce.

Savoy Conference, held at the Savoy, London, in 1661, between the Church of England Catholic divines and the Puritans. Their object was to endeavour to settle differences, and so arrange the Prayer Book as to make it acceptable to both parties. The conference consisted of twelve bishops, amongst whom were Sanderson, Pearson, and Sparrow; and twelve Puritan divines, amongst whom were Baxter, Calamy, Reynolds, and Lightfoot. The Presbyterian divines desired the restriction of responses to the "Amen;" the abolition of saints' days and of commemoration of the dead; a change with regard to the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, with the introduction of extemporaneous prayers; and the optional use of the ring in matrimony, the sign of the cross in baptism, the surplice, and kneeling at the Holy Communion. After sitting from April 15th to July 24th, they could come to no conclusion, not a single point being yielded to the Puritans or by them, and the Conference finally reported that "The Church's welfare, unity, and peace, and his Majesty's satisfaction, were ends upon which they were all agreed; but as to means they could not come to any harmony." The few alterations made in the Prayer Book immediately afterwards by a committee of bishops, such as the addition to the Lessons of the Story of Bel and the Dragon, made it if anything still more objectionable to the Puritans; and the consequence of the failure of this attempt at compromise, followed as it was by the Act of Uniformity in the following year, was the virtual exclusion of some 2,000 Puritan ministers from the Church, and the loss of many thousands of their adherents.

Sawtre, WILLIAM (the name was originally Chatrya), the first of the Lollard martyrs.

Monkish writers have blackened him as a licentious man and a profligate; but there is no hint of this in the many and minute charges brought against him in Convocation, and we may safely assume that the charge is the commonplace of clerical vituperation against all who were suspected of heresy. By his own confession, we know that he sometimes omitted to say his matins and his hours, in order to hear confessions, and to celebrate the Mass, or to give the time to study and prayer; and that he had often sanctioned the abandonment of vows of pilgrimage, if commuted into sums of money to be distributed amongst the poor. He was parish priest of St. Margaret's, King's Lynn, and was charged before Bishop Spenser, of Norwich, with heresy and "diverse felonies and treasons." He was convicted and condemned to death; but publicly recanted at Lynn, and received a full pardon from the King [Feb. 6th, 1400]. After this he removed to London, where he became chaplain of the parish of St. Sythe, or St. Osyth, Walbrook. Here his conscience would not let him rest; but he taught and preached, openly and secretly, the same or similar opinions to those which he had previously denounced as heresy. He was now called to answer before the Convocation, and on Saturday, February 12th, 1401, was charged with having taught the following eight dangerous propositions:

1. That he would not adore the Cross on which Christ suffered, but only Christ, who suffered on it.
2. That he would rather bow to a temporal king than a wooden Cross.
3. That he would rather honour the bodies of saints than the true Cross, supposing it were before him.
4. That he would rather worship a man confessing and repentant than the Cross of Christ.
5. That he was more bound to worship a man whom he knew to be predestined than an angel of God.
6. That if any one has made a vow to visit the holy places at Rome or Canterbury, or anywhere else, to obtain some temporary benefit [e.g. to be cured of some disease or to secure some property], he is not bound to fulfil his vow literally, but may spend his money on the poor.
7. That any priest or deacon is more bound to preach the Word of God than to say the Hours.
8. That after the words of consecration in the Eucharist the bread remains bread, and nothing more.

He acknowledged that he had so taught, and accordingly sentence of degradation was passed on him, and forthwith carried out. He was then handed over to the secular powers, and by them condemned to be burnt at Smithfield.

Scala Santa.—A flight of steps in the Church of St. John Lateran at Rome, said to be those which Christ ascended when taken before Pilate. The Roman Catholics believe that they were miraculously carried from Jerusalem after the crucifixion. A certain number of indulgences are promised to those who ascend the steps and pray at the top, and thousands of pilgrims flock to them every year. It was while Martin Luther was crawling up these steps on his knees that he received that strong impression concerning justification by faith alone, which thenceforward shaped his whole work and life.

Scaliger, JOSEPH JUSTUS [b. at Agen, in France, 1540; d. at Leyden, 1609].—Studied at Bordeaux and Paris, and became Honorary Professor at the University of Leyden in 1592. He joined himself to the Reformers, and was noted as a remarkable linguist, philosopher, mathematician, and poet. His principal works are philological, but he also published the first system of chronology, Thesaurus Temporum in 1608, and Expositio Numismatis Constantini in 1604.

Scapular [Lat. scapula, "shoulders"].—Originally a garment worn by monks to protect the dress; it practically consisted of a long piece of cloth with a hole in the centre, through which the head was placed, the cloth coming down in front and behind. Devotional scapulars in the Roman Church are miniatures of this, consisting of a small square piece for the chest and another for the back, connected only by two strings, which cross the shoulders. There are five modern scapulars, but that best known is a badge of veneration for the Virgin Mary. The legend concerning it is that it was given by the Virgin Mary to Simon Stock, General of the Carmelite Order at Cambridge, with the words, "This will be the privilege for you and for all Carmelites; no one dying in this scapular will suffer eternal burning." The other four scapulars are:—[1] That given by the Trinitarians; [2] the Servite scapular of the Seven Dolours; [3] that of the Immaculate Conception, propagated by Ursula Benincasa, and given by the Theatines; and [4] the scapular of the Passion, originated by a Sister of Charity at Paris, and given by the Vincentian Fathers.

Scarf.—An ecclesiastical ornament, sometimes worn instead of the stole, which it closely resembles; the difference is that the scarf is folded, and very much broader, covering nearly the entire front of the surplice. [See STOLE.] It is of great antiquity, and seems to have been originally worn only by members of a cathedral chapter, and by Doctors of Divinity of the universities. Its use has now passed to chaplains of prelates and of the nobility, and to parochial clergy in places where the stole is not in use. It is generally of black silk, or of crape on occasions of mourning, and at weddings it is occasionally of white silk.

Sceptic [from the Gr. skeptomai, "to look about"].—One who professes to weigh evidence and to refuse belief in any given statement until he is satisfied of its truth. The name is derived from the old Pyrrhonists, who denied the real existence of phenomena, and it is now applied to Deists and to those who doubt the Creeds of the Church or the truth of the Scriptures.

Scheffer, JEAN, German philologist and antiquary [b. at Strassburg of a noble family, 1621; d. at Upsala, March, 1679]. He was a good linguist and historian, and in 1643 published De Varietate Naviorum apud Veteres. In 1648, anxious to get free from the civil wars raging in Alsace, he went to Sweden, having been encouraged to do so by the good reception given to men of learning at the Court of Queen Christina. He had already become known there by the works he had published, and was appointed by the Queen Professor of Rhetoric at the University of Upsala, where he continued to work with great diligence till his death. He was made King's Law Professor and Librarian of the University, and published several books under the royal direction. The greater number of these were editions of Ælian, Arrian, Phædrus, Justin, and others, and he also wrote Upsalia Antiqua, a History of Lapland, and numerous treatises.

Schelling, FRIEDRICH WILHELM JOSEF VON [b. 1775, d. 1854], an illustrious German philosopher, born at Leonberg, near Stuttgart, educated at Tübingen and Leipzig, and in 1798 began to lecture at Jena, then the headquarters of German speculative activity. The bent of his mind was determined at this time by his colleague, Fichte, but he gradually found his views unsatisfying, and proceeded to develop his own views of Intuitionism. The only true knowledge is that which identifies the real and ideal, nature and spirit. In Christ, God became for the first time objective, and in His person sacrificed the finite, and thus opened the knowledge of the Divine and eternal world to man. Later Schelling became a Professor at Würzburg, and here his teaching became more distinctly Christian. He declared that Christianity had three phases to pass through—the Petrine, or Catholic; the Pauline, or Protestant; and the Johanneine, the philosophical Church of the future—and this teaching has been again and again repeated in modern writers.

Schism [from the Greek schizō, "I cleave, or rend"].—The word is generally held to denote the act of separating from the Church, and so dividing the body which Christ prayed might be one. The Church was originally one, and is so described in the New Testament. [See 1 Cor. i. 9, 10; xii. 25; Eph. iv. 1-6; Rom. xvi. 17, 18.] The Church of Corinth is described as tending towards parties and divisions, and for this St. Paul rebukes it sharply. From time to time some great schism has rent the Church, such as the Novatian and the Donatist, where the seceders separated on questions of discipline; and a quarrel between two rival Popes divided the Western Church for many years. [PAPAL SCHISM.] The Roman Church brings it as a charge against the Reformed Churches that they are in schism; to which these reply that the departure of that Church from Apostolic doctrine is so marked and patent that no choice is left to the lovers of truth but to hold it fast, and to leave the responsibility to the Church which usurps authority at the expense of truth. Except on such grounds all division and separation is held to be a sin; since division, whether necessary or not, is a loss of power, and therefore an evil. Many Nonconformists make virtually the same reply to those in the Anglican Church who bring a similar charge against them, holding as they do that Episcopal methods are a very wide departure from primitive and original Christianity, and that the Church became thus corrupted at a very early age, even in the time of the earlier Fathers. Others, again, take a totally different view of schism itself, insisting that the primitive use of the word describes party spirit or disunion in the body, and that actual separation and formation into a distinct body is not schism; this view was maintained by Dr. Campbell. And others again have maintained that while diverse opinion is likely to lead to separate bodies in practice, there is and can be no schism whilst common Christianity is willingly acknowledged, and common Christian action undertaken on all possible various occasions; but that schism does exist on the part of any who refuse such acknowledgment or common action to others who are willing to give it on their part. There are various modifications of different views concerning this vexed question, but the above are the chief.

Schleiermacher, FRIEDRICH ERNST DANIEL [b. 1768, d. 1834], a great German theologian, was the son of a Lutheran minister at Breslau, and was educated first by his father, then in a Moravian school. Under the influence of the elementary teaching he received he was a pious child and deeply reverential in spirit; but, nevertheless, scepticism took such possession of him that he declares that he doubted the historical truth of any of the ancient Scriptures. But he had no desire to doubt, and he eagerly read the philosophical writings of his countrymen, especially Kant and Spinoza, in the hopes of having his doubts removed, and in his twenty-sixth year was ordained to the ministry. In 1799 he published his Discourses on Religion—a deeply earnest work intended to conciliate unbelievers, and to convince them that faith in an unseen world was compatible not only with reason but with the deepest human instincts. Neander declared that to this work he owed his spiritual life. Meanwhile, Schleiermacher threw himself heartily into politics and social questions, urging Germany, e.g., to resist the insolence of Napoleon.

He was appointed Court Preacher in 1802, and Professor of Theology at the University of Halle in 1804. In 1810 the University of Berlin was founded. Schleiermacher was one of its active promoters, and was the first to occupy the Theological Chair. His translation of Plato [1804-10] placed him among the most famous Greek scholars of his time, and though English scholars regard its criticisms as too subjective, the book holds a very high position. Meanwhile he was indefatigable as a preacher, and his sermons, published in seven volumes, are masterpieces of earnest and penetrating power. He was certainly not what his countrymen would regard as an orthodox divine, for he had declared dogma to be an incrustation on the essential divinity of Christianity; but he was earnest, devout, reverent, of massive understanding and surpassing eloquence. Being seized with a fatal illness he called his friends and disciples together, and solemnly professed his faith in Christ as the Saviour and in the propitiation made by His death. He then himself celebrated and distributed the Holy Communion. His works are many and voluminous; the most important is his Christian Dogmatics, a masterpiece of theology. He regarded Christ as not only perfect and sinless, but as having the fulness of Divinity dwelling within Him, and as dwelling in succession in the hearts of the faithful. His Essay on St. Luke's Gospel, a characteristic specimen of his free historical criticism, was translated and published by the late Bishop Thirlwall, who pronounced it "a specimen of exegetical criticism which has seldom been equalled, and which cannot fail to excite the admiration even of those who do not admit all its conclusions." His conception of divinity was pantheistic, but his heart went deeper than his intellectual conceptions. He was a man of prayer, and a believer even where he found the historical evidence unsatisfying. His speculations are mostly left behind in the progress of thought, but his earnest piety, and the real soundness of his inner theology, his personal faith in God and in Christ, have endeared him to the hearts of his countrymen. They read his sermons, and love them, and reverence his memory. Among his disciples are the great names of Neander, Ullmann, Olshausen, Lücke, and Bleek.

Schmalkald, LEAGUE OF, for the defence of Protestantism, was formed Feb. 27th, 1531, under the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse, and was joined by fourteen German princes and twenty-one imperial cities, comprising nearly all the principal cities of North Germany, and others in the centre and south. The peace of Nürnberg [1532] followed immediately on the formation of the League, and this success was followed up by the raising of a large standing army and the drawing up of the Articles of Schmalkald in 1537. These were drawn up by Luther as a protest against the authority of the Pope, and were signed by all the members of the League. They were principally designed to show how far the Lutherans were disposed to go in order to avoid a final rupture, and in what sense they were willing to adopt the doctrine of Christ's presence in the Eucharist. In a few years' time jealousies began to arise among the various princes, the strength of the League gave way, and its army was routed at Mühlberg, in April, 1547.

Scholastici. — Ecclesiastics connected with a cathedral or collegiate chapter, on whom the duty devolved of superintending the management of its schools. The scholastici, called also capiscolii, capita scholaria, and magistri scholarum, appear to have originated in the time of Charlemagne, and often taught personally in the schools, in addition to their work of superintending other teachers. At the Council of Trent it was decreed that the scholasteria should be held only by a doctor, master, or licentiate in theology or canon law, and that otherwise the appointment should not hold good.

Schoolmen. — The famous teachers so called were the revivers in the Western Church of Theology as a science. In the Greek Church it had become a tradition, but in the West the Schoolmen set themselves the task of reducing the traditional dogmas of the Church to a complete system. This principle, to use the words of Hallam, was "an alliance between faith and reason, an endeavour to arrange the orthodox system of the Church, such as authority had made it [all through the existence of this movement we find them turning to the laws of government, etc., laid down by the various Church Councils, and not to the Bible], according to the rules of the Aristotelian dialectics." The natural result of the constant study of the works of Aristotle was the foundation of a new school of philosophy, and we find the logical system of the famous Greek philosopher and theology treated side by side in the works of the Schoolmen. At first they contented themselves with long arguments on natural and revealed religion, removing by clever reasoning all that they considered liable to objection, treating the whole thing from a purely metaphysical point of view. They were, at the same time, wonderfully united in thought and mode of philosophising; but before very long different parties were formed. Each leading man had his own followers, who supported him and his theories and refused to see reason in the argument of any rival. These at last settled down into two chief sects, the Realists and the Nominalists. [REALISTS; NOMINALISTS.]

The first period of the Scholastic philosophy reaches from Anselm to Alexander Hales [1073-1200]. The principal figures in this period are Abelard (Rationalistic); Anselm and Peter the Lombard (Realistic); St. Bernard and Walter of St. Victor (Mystical; "res divinas non disputatio compendit, sed sanctitas"). Each great theologian dogmatised from his own standpoint on the doctrines of the Trinity, on Sin, the Work of Christ, on the Priesthood and the Sacraments. Thus, while Anselm in his Cur Deus Homo? made the first scientific attempt to construct the doctrine of Redemption on the basis of law, holding that by sin the honour due to God is withheld and punishment is deserved, and that this punishment can only be remitted by satisfaction, Abelard denied any necessary connection between the death of Christ and forgiveness.

Scholasticism was at its best, and exercised the most influence, during the thirteenth century, which may be called the second stage of its existence. The cause may, to a great extent, be traced to the establishment of the Mendicant Friars. A great many men joined this order, and the result was an increased number of students of theological philosophy. The two most famous of all the Schoolmen lived at this time, THOMAS AQUINAS [q.v.] and a Dominican, DUNS SCOTUS [q.v.], a Franciscan, each the founder of a rival sect, named respectively THOMISTS [q.v.] and SCOTISTS [q.v.]. These and the Nominalists—the sect started by ROSCELIN [q.v.] in the twelfth, and revived by WILLIAM OF OCKHAM [q.v.] in the thirteenth—were fierce and bitter rivals for nearly two hundred years, and the books written on all sides advocating their views are innumerable. The leading idea still in their teaching was that of theology treated as a science pure and simple. The decline of this theology began in the fourteenth century, soon after the appearance of Wyclif with his new doctrines. He and his followers tried to teach a more spiritual Christianity, and put the main facts of religion before the people in a more mystical, as opposed to the argumentative way. From this time the Schoolmen steadily declined, but for different reasons their decline was very slow. It might be thought that the new and enlightened ideas started by the revival of learning would have exploded the long and laborious theories of the old Schoolmen in a very short space of time; but habit, and the tenacity with which the chief universities at first adhered to the old lines of thought, made their defeat and extinction very slow. The task of stating fairly the good or bad influence exercised by the Schoolmen is a difficult one. On the one hand, a clear, subtle style of argument was studied and brought to a fair state of perfection; but on the other hand, the minute attention to the smallest detail, the raising of objections for the sake of answering (as it almost appears), make their books frivolous and tedious. Another influence they had, which produced far worse consequences, was that of discouraging by their methods the expansion of the mind. They were content to argue and discuss the rules of philosophy laid down by Aristotle or the old Christian Fathers, but the study of the Scriptures was neglected, and they looked with horror on any one making experiments, or seeking after fresh sources of truth. It was the revival of learning in the fifteenth century which showed to the Church and the world "a more excellent way."

Schultens, ALBERT, a famous Hebrew grammarian and Orientalist [b. at Gröningen, 1686; d. at Leyden, 1750]. He studied at Leyden and Utrecht, made himself master of Greek and Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldee, Syriac, and Rabbinic, and obtained a post as Professor of Oriental Languages at Franeker. He had previously been made Doctor of Theology and minister of Wassenaer in 1711, but had resigned the latter for his professorship. From 1729 until his death he was at the theological seminary at Leyden. His chief works relate to the study of Hebrew, and he was the first to show that Hebrew is only a branch of the Semitic languages, and consequently could not be the original language given by God to man, as was commonly believed. He also held that the study of Arabic is necessary to a correct understanding of Hebrew. He wrote some books on the Old Testament, and various addresses and criticisms.

Schwartz, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, an eminent missionary [b. at Sonnenburg, in the Electorate of Brandenburg, 1726; d. at Tanjore, 1798]. He studied at Halle, where he attended the lectures of Michaelis on theology, and assisted Schultz in editing the Tamil Bible which the latter had translated. Schwartz was thus induced to become a missionary, and was sent by the Danish Missionary Society in Copenhagen to Tranquebar in 1750. He had previously obtained the patronage of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and was removed by this society to Tanjore in 1779. He was employed by the Government of Madras to undertake an embassy to Hyder Ali, which was successful, and the terms of peace were settled. It did not, however, last long, and between 1781 and 1783, while Tanjore was besieged by Hyder, the sufferings of the inhabitants from famine were terrible; but by the intervention of Schwartz with the cultivators, promising to pay them not only for provisions supplied, but for any bullock stolen by the enemy, food was at length procured and the town saved. In 1785 he founded schools at Tanjore for teaching the natives the English language. He was one of the most successful English missionaries in India, and did much to establish confidence among the natives towards the English. His name is revered not only by Christian converts, but by Mohammedans and Hindoos.

Schwenkfelders, the followers of Caspar Schwenkfeld von Ossing, a nobleman of Silesia. At first he adopted the doctrines taught by Luther, and being in a position of importance at the court of the Duke of Lignitz, was able to exercise great influence in spreading the Reformation. He separated from the Lutherans, however, and adopted certain opinions of his own, especially on the efficacy of the Divine Word and on the doctrine of the Eucharist. Instead of the words "This is my body," he suggested "My body is this," meaning, that which nourishes the soul, as the ordinary bread does the body. He maintained that the Sacraments were merely signs and not means of grace. He always declared that he had no desire to make converts, or to start a new sect; but after his death, in 1562, it was found that he had a numerous following in Silesia. The Lutheran clergy persecuted them frequently, but in spite of this they increased in numbers, and some Jesuit missionary priests were sent to convert them if possible to Romanism, the Emperor at the same time issuing an edict that all their children should be brought up in that faith. At last, in 1725, finding no peace at home, the whole party moved from Silesia to Saxony, and eight years later emigrated to Pennsylvania, and settled in Montgomery, where they still flourish. They hold to their own language, and the pastors, who are chosen by lot, are all Germans. They do not observe the Sacrament of Baptism, but as soon as a child is born, a minister is called in to pray for its prosperity, and a similar service takes place in the church when the mother is able to attend with the infant. When Silesia was joined to Prussia some years ago, a few of them returned from Saxony, but the sect is by far the stronger in America. In some respects of doctrine and government they resemble the FRIENDS.

Scot, JOHN. [DUNS SCOTUS.]

Scotists, a sect of religious philosophers, followers of DUNS SCOTUS [q.v.], which arose at the end of the thirteenth and beginning of the fourteenth century. They were in direct opposition to the Thomists, though both started from the same standpoint, professing to be guided by the philosophy of Aristotle. The Scotists held that all knowledge is derived from Divine illumination, and that science is therefore the province of all theologians. They maintained the moral efficacy of the Sacraments in contradistinction to the Thomists, who believed that the grace bestowed in them is physical. The Thomists affirmed and the Scotists denied the loss of power to goodness by the Fall. The Jesuits adopted the views of the Scotists with regard to the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin, while the Dominicans followed the doctrines of the Thomists in denying that dogma.

Scotland, CHURCH OF.—1. The Celtic Church.—Christianity is supposed to have made its way into Scotland during the Roman occupation of Britain, but nothing certain is known of its history. The first Christian teacher whose name has been preserved is St. Ninian, and of him little is known but that he laid the foundation of a church at Whithorn (known as Candida Casa, the White House), on the north coast of Solway Firth, about A.D. 397. He settled there with the intention of converting the Picts of Galloway, and won over most of the inhabitants of southern Scotland to Christianity. A bishop, Palladius, was sent to Scotland by Pope Celestine about 430, by which time St. Ninian was gone. In 563 St. COLUMBA [q.v.] landed in Iona from Ireland, and set himself to Christianise from that point the whole of Scotland. He died in 597, but his work was well carried on by many of his disciples, one of whom, St. AIDAN [q.v.] founded the bishopric of Lindisfarne. About the time of St. Columba's death another church was founded at Glasgow, on the site of one which St. Ninian had built, by Kentigern, more commonly known among the Scottish people as St. Mungo. [KENTIGERN.] St. Kentigern died in 612, and the next great name in the history of the Scottish Church is that of St. CUTHBERT [q.v.], who was born about the same time, and who became Bishop of Lindisfarne, where he died in 687.

A few years later a new class of devotees arose in the Church, who were called CULDEES [q.v.]. They were first trained in the monasteries, and then went forth to end their life in some cave or desolate cell, some at Culross or Lochleven, some in and about St. Andrews. The cathedral of this city was founded by St. Regulus [369], and dedicated to the first-called Apostle, who has been from that time the patron saint of Scotland. St. Regulus is supposed by some to have been Bishop of Patras, where legend says St. Andrew suffered martyrdom; he was entrusted with the charge of finding a grave for the bones of the saint, and, being wrecked on the coast of Scotland, he gained from King Angus a grant of land on which to erect his church. A community sprang up, consisting of St. Regulus as head, his priests and deacons, some hermits, and the Culdees who had already inhabited the district.

2. The Roman Catholic Church.—The Church of St. Columba began to decline about the eleventh century; its property was lost by degrees, and abuses grew up in the customs and services of the Church itself. The reform which was needed was brought about mainly through the instrumentality of St. Margaret, wife of King Malcolm Canmore. With all the wonderful tact and energy which she possessed, she threw herself into the task, assembling councils, and at one time engaging in theological discussions with the clergy, in which she proved her arguments. She endeavoured to bring about conformity with the Roman standard. The chief points in which she effected a change were, the time of keeping Lent, the observance of Sunday, and the manner of receiving the Communion. She died in 1093, and for a few years there was a reaction against the changes she had made. Her three sons reigned in succession, Edgar, Alexander I., and David. During the reign of Malcolm Canmore and his successors, a circumstance took place which greatly changed the aspect of the Scottish Church—namely, the immigration into the south and east of Scotland of settlers whom the oppression of William the Conqueror had driven out of England. These settlers received grants of land, intermarried with the Scottish nobility, and introduced English customs. Parishes were formed, two new dioceses were created by Alexander I., and, as in England, the Church became more Papal. David, who reigned from 1124 to 1153, did much for the Church of Rome in Scotland. In his time the Augustinian and Cistercian Orders were introduced, and fifteen religious houses were founded, among them, Melrose, Holyrood, and Dryburgh. He created bishoprics at Glasgow, Brechin, Dunkeld, Dumblane, Ross, Caithness, and Aberdeen. Lismore or Argyll, created in 1222, was the only one formed after his death. From 1153 to the beginning of the fifteenth century the Church of Rome remained in possession of Scotland. The Scottish Church differed from the English in having no archbishop, though the kings of Scotland had from time to time pressed the Pope to make St. Andrews an archbishopric. The latter preferred to keep the superintendence of the Church in his own hands, and sent a papal legate as his representative to attend the Diocesan Councils, much to the dislike of the Scottish bishops. In 1225 Pope Honorius III. authorised the holding of these Councils without the Legate, and in 1472 St. Andrews (held at that time by Bishop Patrick Graham) was at length erected into an archbishopric; but this having been done without the knowledge of the King or the other bishops, the new Archbishop passed the rest of his life as a prisoner in Lochleven. His successor, Schvez, was made Primate in 1487, and in 1492 the Bishop of Glasgow was also promoted to be an Archbishop, whereupon a strife began between the two dignities, and never ceased till the Reformation. In course of time most of the wealth of Scotland came into the possession of the Church, and for this reason the monasteries relaxed in discipline and lost the esteem of the people. The Mendicant Orders were instituted to remedy this evil, and soon became popular; but their popularity only tended in time to produce the same effect as with the monasteries, for they became proud and overbearing towards the other clergy, disunited and quarrelsome among themselves, and finally objects of scorn and ridicule on account of the immorality of their lives. The spark of religion which the rise of the Mendicants had kindled, declined with them, and from that time the Church of Scotland sank lower than ever. Bishops and clergy were appointed not on account of their piety or learning, but to gain some private ends of the Sovereign, in many cases for the sake of the wealth which rich clergy brought to the Crown in exchange. The state of the Church grew worse as time went on; preaching was almost entirely discontinued except by the friars; and the only bright spots in this dark period were the lives of a few good men who, from time to time, did their utmost to stir up the minds of the people to a sense of their danger. No permanent effect was felt till the beginning of the fifteenth century, when some of Wycliffe's disciples made their way across the border, and began preaching in the south of Scotland, some of them travelling as far north as Perth. They denounced boldly the corrupt customs which prevailed in the Scottish Church, the Roman errors which had crept in at the same time that all the life of religion seemed to have died out. They aimed at reforming the lives and conduct of the clergy; and in spite of the hatred which was everywhere felt towards them, they succeeded in at least preparing the minds of the people for the Reformation which was to follow.

3. The Reformation.—It is not certain whether PATRICK HAMILTON [q.v.], who came to Scotland in 1523 from Paris, was the first to preach the doctrines of the Reformers in Scotland. He was certainly one to whom Scotland owes much for his courage in preaching the Reformed religion. After the death of Archbishop Beaton, who had condemned Hamilton, the persecution of the Reformers was entrusted to his nephew, David Beaton, Abbot of Arbroath, who had been educated in France, and was a staunch Roman Catholic. He extended his imitation of French customs even to the manner of dealing with heretics, and induced the King to take part with him in stamping out the Reformed religion. For some years a continual inquisition went on; numbers were tortured and put to death, and many more were imprisoned or forfeited their possessions.

The name of GEORGE WISHART [q.v.] stands out, in the early part of the sixteenth century, as one of the most learned Reformers that Scotland had yet seen; he was seized and burnt to death in 1546. His place was filled immediately by one who had hitherto been simply one of his disciples, but who was destined to become far more famous than his master — JOHN KNOX [q.v.]. During the Regency of Mary of Guise for her daughter, a constant struggle was going on between the two religions, and led eventually to a civil war, which ended in a victory for the Protestants in 1560, just after the Regent's death. The result was that the Confession of Faith was established by the Scottish Parliament. This Confession was the recognised standard of the Church of Scotland from 1560 to 1647, when it was superseded by the Westminster Confession. After the accession of Mary Queen of Scots, it seemed as though the tide were to turn in favour of the old religion; but the Queen's influence was not sufficiently great to effect this, and after her defeats and humiliations there was no more hope from that quarter.

Amid all the turmoil, John Knox was the man among all others who had most influence with his countrymen, and took the best advantage of it by impressing his doctrines on all sides. It was he who prevailed with the Parliament to accept the Confession of Faith, and he introduced the Genevan Prayer Book into Scotland. He drew up the First Book of Discipline, which treats mainly of the organisation of the Church, and of the disposal of Church revenues. Knox cleared the way for the introduction of Protestantism, but as yet this was only the beginning of the struggle, which lasted throughout the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. After Knox's death its character was altered, and, instead of being a contest between Romanism and Protestantism, it gradually became one between Prelacy and Presbyterianism. To all appearance Papacy had died out, but no doubt many still clung to it secretly, and would have been glad of any opportunity to have the old forms and ceremonies restored. A great difficulty stood in the way also with regard to the disposal of Church revenues, and in order to remove this the Concordat of Leith was drawn up in 1572, by which it was ordained that all bishops, abbots, and priors were to continue to be parts of the spiritual estate, but their power was to be limited, and they were to be under the control of the General Assembly. [TULCHAN BISHOPS.]

4. Presbyterianism Established.—The new attack against Episcopacy began with ANDREW MELVILLE [q.v.], who returned from Geneva in 1576, and who used his learning and power of rhetoric to such purpose that, in 1580, the Assembly passed a decision that Episcopacy was "unlawful, and without warrant in the Word of God." With the view of supplanting Episcopacy by Presbyterianism, Melville and his party compiled a second Book of Discipline, which received the sanction of the Church. It seemed at first that their efforts were to be unsuccessful, through the conduct of the young King, who insisted on having some of the bishops maintained in their dioceses, and chose for his companions young Roman Catholic noblemen. A panic was raised, which was only half allayed by the recantation of d'Aubigny, Duke of Lennox; and so great was the alarm that the King was seized and imprisoned at Huntingtower, near Perth, where he was kept for a year. He eventually made his escape, and his captors were declared guilty of high treason. Melville barely succeeded in making his escape to Berwick, and the rest of the ministers only remained in peril of their lives. The result of the King's imprisonment was the passing of the "Black Acts" in 1584, by which the Sovereign was declared to be supreme in all matters, and ecclesiastical authority was placed in the hands of the bishops. But this violence raised such an outcry that three years later another Act was passed, which put an end to the Scottish Episcopate; all Church revenues became the property of the Crown, and were soon squandered by the King and his associates. From this time till 1592, when the Presbyterian constitution (commonly called the Magna Charta of the Church of Scotland) was established by law, he put no further obstacles in the way of Presbytery.

5. Re-introduction of Episcopacy—Levi's Liturgy—National Covenant.—The King's feelings altered when he found that the ministers would allow him no freedom in dealing with some nobles in the North, who were still inclined to Romanism, and for whom the Presbyterians had no mercy. He sought his revenge by an attempt in 1596 to re-introduce Episcopacy, under the very plausible pretext of admitting some of the wisest ministers into Parliament. Probably he would not have been able to carry out his design as he wished if it had not been for his succession to the English throne in 1603, when, finding himself supported by English bishops, he hoped to bring about a uniformity of religion, and set himself to do so by dissolving assemblies, imprisoning ministers, and otherwise exercising arbitrary power, hoping to prevail on the people before long to accept the bishops whom he should appoint. He endeavoured to bribe Melville with the offer of a bishopric, but, finding him still obdurate, the King sent him to the Tower for three years, and finally banished him to France. Some bishops were consecrated in England, and the Episcopal Church seemed again to be established in Scotland, though the absence of ritual was very noticeable beside that of the English Church. The change was hardly felt among the people: but a deep feeling was excited among them in 1618 by the Five Articles of Perth, which were submitted to the Assembly for its sanction, and which enjoined kneeling at Communion and the observance of Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, Ascension, and Whitsunday, allowed Confirmation of children of eight years old, and permitted Communion of the Sick in private houses. The people were staggered at the idea of such a departure from ancient customs, and in most churches refused to comply. Nothing of great importance took place till the year 1633, when Charles I. came to Scotland to be crowned, and took the opportunity of planning some reforms in Church matters. He made some changes in the revenues; formed Edinburgh into a bishopric, with the Collegiate Church of St. Giles as its cathedral; and, a far more important matter, he ordered the introduction of a Liturgy, to be modelled on that of the English Church. This Service-book was the work of Archbishop Laud; it was completed in 1637, and on July 23rd was to be used for the first time at St. Giles's; but the Dean was not allowed to proceed beyond the first few words before an uproar was raised which obliged him and the Bishop of Edinburgh, who was present with the Archbishop of St. Andrews, to escape for their lives. The innovation resulted in the formation of a National Covenant, signed in the Greyfriars Churchyard at Edinburgh, Feb., 1638, the members of which bound themselves to defend their Church from the encroachments of Popery. In November, the National Assembly met; the Five Articles, the Book of Canons, and the new Prayer Book were condemned, the bishops were tried and deposed from their bishoprics, and Presbyterianism was once more restored in its original form. This proceeding on the part of the Assembly could not but have serious consequences; a petition was presented to the King, but he refused to take any notice of it, and the Scotch army was speedily prepared for war. Peace was made before actual hostilities had begun, for the King began to realise how much in earnest his opponents were. He undertook to call a General Assembly to settle the disturbances, and it met the following year: its work consisted in doing again what had been done by its predecessor, and the Assemblies which had established Episcopacy were declared to have been illegal.

It was soon known that Charles was again making his army ready for an invasion, and the Scotch resolved to be beforehand with him. In August, 1640, an army, headed by the Marquis of Montrose, marched southward and took possession of Newcastle. Frightened by this decisive measure, the King hastened to make concessions, and gave up all the points on which he had before insisted most strongly.

6. Solemn League and Covenant.—With the English rebellion came new hopes to the Presbyterians, who trusted that Presbytery would now extend over the whole kingdom, and in anticipation of such an event they decided to bind themselves, with their English brethren, by a religious covenant, to protect the rights of their Church. The Solemn League and Covenant was drawn up towards the close of 1643, and sanctioned by the Estates, and the oaths were taken by the English Parliament. [COVENANT; CAMERONIANS.] The Scotch army immediately marched again into England to unite their forces to those of the English Parliament.

In 1645 the Directory for the Public Worship of God was accepted by the Assembly, and in 1647 they also accepted the Westminster Confession of Faith, taking exception only to one or two points. On the execution of Charles I., the Scots proclaimed Charles II. king, and induced him to sign the Covenant, for they were resolute in refusing to acknowledge Oliver Cromwell. On the Restoration, King Charles, who hated the Covenant, dismissed the Assembly, and took the government of the Church under his own control. He again introduced Episcopacy, and now began a terrible time of persecution to the Covenanters. The leader in this raid against Presbyterianism was Archbishop Sharp. [SHARP, JAMES.] In 1670 was passed the Conventicle Act, forbidding the meetings of the Covenanters and enforcing compulsory attendance at church, and the next few years exhibit fierce persecution, and a constant struggle between the two parties.

7. Presbyterian Church established by Act of Parliament.—The fall of James II. in 1688 brought down the Episcopal Church also. Scotland had for many years been becoming more Puritanical in its tendencies, and was now most rigorous in the stress laid upon the duty of prayer and fasting, and the sins of frivolity and dissipation. Episcopacy was at an end in many parts of the country, though it was not definitely abolished till 1689, when the Convention of the Estates met and denounced it, and in 1690 an Act of the Parliament of William and Mary confirmed the Presbyterian Confession of Faith, and ordered the use of the Catechism and Directory for Public Worship. The patronage of the Church was conferred on the Elders and Town Councils in the boroughs, and on the landowners in the country.

The General Assembly, which met in 1690, appointed two commissions to visit the clergy in different parts of the country to enforce discipline. In the north the arrangement was a failure, for the commissioners were incapable of acting with the moderation which the Assembly wished, and numbers of the clergy were turned out of their livings, while the people refused to allow the Presbytery to appoint successors. In many places Episcopalians were put in the vacant livings by the parishioners, and in these parishes the Presbyteries lost all control, if indeed they were not left destitute of members. King William became dissatisfied as the confusion increased, delayed the meeting of the Assembly, and finally refused to admit any member who would not take the "Oath of Assurance" that he was King de facto and de jure. Lord Carstairs, the King's confidential adviser, prevailed upon him to countermand the order, and his consent restored in a great measure the confidence of the Scottish clergy, who had begun to regard him with distrust. Liberty was granted to the Episcopalians to remain in possession of their benefices, though they were not allowed to become members of assemblies, synods, and presbyteries; and the consequence was that they gradually diminished in number, though they consider themselves to be the old Church of Scotland. From the time that King William released the Assembly from the Oath of Assurance in 1694, it has continued to meet year by year, and the Established Church has been Presbyterian.

Although the Scottish people had no wish for the union of the English Church with their own, they were generally anxious for the union of the Parliaments, which took place in 1707. The General Assembly lost most of its power by the Act of Union, but men realised that it was for the Church's good that the interests of the two countries should be united. Lord Carstairs was elected president of the Assembly which met after the Act was passed, and an attempt was made to enforce uniformity, but with so little success that the Tory Parliament of Queen Anne passed an Act of Toleration, giving freedom to the Episcopalians to continue their own form of worship. In the same year they revived the old system of patronage, which had been in abeyance for more than sixty years, and to that breach of the Treaty of Union are to be directly ascribed all the schisms that have since rent the Church of Scotland.

8. Moderatism.—From this time till 1720 much work was done in setting up the churches which had long been vacant, and settling the borders of the Church; but in that year a new feeling began to show itself, which developed later into the so-called Moderatism. It was at this time also that the "Marrow movement" began, which took its name from a book by Edward Fisher, entitled the Marrow of Modern Divinity, in which certain doctrines relative to justification by faith were put forward. The book was condemned in 1720 by the General Assembly, whereupon the "Marrow men" raised a protestation, and petitioned against the decision of the Assembly, and a contest began which lasted for many years, and was aggravated in 1732 by an Act which was then passed concerning the right of patronage. Many causes combined to increase the discontent among the clergy, and they were beginning now to wish to shake themselves free from the old groove, and to escape from the strictness of discipline which had been imposed upon them. To this movement was owing the first secession which took place in 1733, and of which Ebenezer Erskine was the leading spirit. [ERSKINE; SECESSIONISTS; UNITED PRESBYTERIANS.] It was the beginning of party spirit in the Church, and from this time the two parties of "popular" and "moderate" Presbyterians continued to develop. Many of the followers of Moderatism laid themselves open to a charge of heresy [WIEHART], but the persecutions which they suffered were the means of promoting their cause, which grew and flourished throughout the eighteenth century. With the development in theological ideas there was development in other directions, and in the latter half of the eighteenth century the literature of Scotland, principally of its clergy, was the richest of the age. The first secession was healed to a great extent by the policy of WILLIAM ROBERTSON [q.v.], who by his influence on the General Assembly succeeded in reducing the Church to order and restoring unity to the Presbyteries, though his policy had the effect of driving many from the Established Church. A second secession took place in 1752, and its consequences were more lasting than those of the first, numbers of people leaving the Church and forming a large dissenting body. In those who still remained faithful to the old connection, Evangelicalism no doubt was strengthened by the schism, but the departure of such numbers from the Church awakened a feeling of alarm in all its members. No events worthy of notice happened during the closing years of the eighteenth century, but the beginning of the nineteenth saw many very important changes, not so much in the doctrines of the Church, as in the manner in which she carried on her work. Hitherto the schools had been utterly inefficient for the number and requirements of the population, but by new rules made at this period, they were subjected to the supervision of the Presbyteries, and better homes and salaries were provided for the teachers. Sunday-schools were established, and livings were better endowed. At the same time the Church began to take part in the work of foreign missions, which had hitherto been left in the hands of men not connected with any religious body in particular. But the most important change effected at this time was that of Church extension, the idea of which originated with DR. CHALMERS [q.v.], of the Tron Church, Glasgow, who was much distressed at the want of accommodation for the people in his own church, and set to work to influence the Scottish people to help him in his scheme of subdividing parishes, so as to bring them more directly under the minister's control, and of connecting poor and rich through the Church's influence.

9. The Great Disruption.—The good which resulted from this movement was accompanied by one evil to the Church, for the Dissenters thought it was a blow aimed at them, and the "Voluntary Controversy" was raised as to the advisability of disestablishing the Church. Seceders and Dissenters united in an attack upon the Established Church, and the struggle became more political than religious, for the Church claimed that her new chapels should be endowed by the State, and the Dissenters contested and eventually overruled that claim. Another controversy was raised after the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832, concerning the right of the people to a share in Church government, and the Veto Act was passed in 1834, to enable the laity to reject the nomination of any minister appointed by the patron, provided that the veto was agreed to by the majority of the congregation. The ministers were forced into accepting the decree against their will, and later many of them had to give way to another change—namely, the admission of the ministers of unendowed chapels into the General Assembly. An opening once made, fresh innovations followed, and in 1839 members of the Associate Synod of Seceders were admitted. Many ministers appealed against vetos brought against them, and trials to decide on the judgment of the Presbyteries were brought before the Assembly. The Court of Session hastened to attempt to repair the evils by impolitic measures, till the confusion reached its height, and the Non-Intrusion party called loudly for separation from the Scottish Church. The separation came in 1843, and caused much surprise to many who did not understand the spirit of the Scottish people, and believed that only a few of the most violent Non-Intrusionists would go so far as to cut themselves off from communion with the Church. In the midst of the general confusion which prevailed about 1842, the Moderates were unfortunate in having no one capable of taking the lead, or deciding on what course it would be well to adopt, while on the other side were Chalmers and Dr. Candlish, who was in reality the leader of the party. In November, 1842, the General Assembly met, and after ten days' discussion they bound themselves to stand by one another, and to unite themselves into a separate body. The FREE CHURCH was formed on May 18th, 1843, when of the 1,200 ministers who had hitherto belonged to the Established Church, 451 seceded. After the first shock which the parent Church felt from the Secession, its work went on with no less earnestness and success than before; and it proceeded to redress one by one the grievances which had been the cause of its troubles. The work of the Maintainers was hard, for the Seceders put in their way all the difficulties they could devise, and public feeling was all against them. But the Church overcame the opposition, and the work of Church extension prospered, mainly under the guidance of Professor James Robertson, who set on foot the endowment scheme, for the carrying on of the Church's work in the chapels already built. Mission work also made great advances in the years which followed the Secession, and in this also Dr. Robertson and Dr. Norman Macleod were the moving spirits. The grievance of patronage was again considered, and the Scotch Benefices Act was brought in; but, though hailed with delight by the people, it was rejected by the Parliament, as giving too much power to the Church. Many efforts were made to bring the question fairly before the Assembly, and finally in 1868 a Committee of Inquiry was instituted, whose report to the Assembly resulted in a victory to the supporters of Anti-Patronage. The Established Church of Scotland has 1,283 parishes, and 1,479 ministers.

Scotland, EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF.—As our previous article will have partly shown, the National Church of Scotland had been made, at least nominally, Episcopalian upon the accession of James I. to the throne of England, Presbyterianism regaining the ascendancy on the accession of Charles I., and Episcopacy being once more restored at the Restoration of Charles II. Thus it remained until the accession of William III. in 1688. Presbyterianism was then finally established, not so much as the Church of the majority, as because the Episcopal Bishops refused to take the oath—were, in other words, Nonjurors. No doubt the same course would have been taken in England if the Church had not yielded to circumstances, and taken the oath of allegiance. The Rebellion of '45 was disastrous to the Episcopal Church in Scotland. The Bishops were, almost without exception, Jacobites, and the Government treated them most rigorously as political offenders and rebels. In 1746 an Act was passed forbidding the Episcopalian form of worship, except in the presence of the clergyman's family, and that only twice a year. The punishment for the first offence was imprisonment for six months; for the second, transportation for life. The grandfather of the late Bishop of Aberdeen, the author of "Tullochgorum," which Burns pronounced the noblest of all Scotch songs, was imprisoned for six months in 1753, for the crime of reading the Liturgy to more than four persons beyond his own family. Many clergy did duty no less than sixteen times on a Sunday in order to keep within the law. The Episcopal Church was reduced to the last extremity, but a few faithful men were left, who worked hard to prevent her entire extinction. It was not until 1792 that these penal laws were rescinded. Meanwhile a serious difficulty had been created among the Episcopalians, which even yet has hardly died out. There were some who preferred the Liturgy to the Presbyterian services, but had no taste for civil disabilities, and these professed Episcopalian views, but without placing themselves under the Scottish bishops. These places of worship were designated "qualified chapels." Hence there was introduced a cause of variance at once. After the penal laws were abolished it was hoped that reunion between these might have been effected, and in 1804 a Convocation of the Scotch Episcopal Clergy met at Laurencekirk, and subscribed to the English Articles and Liturgy as a basis. But a cause of difference remained. The Scottish Episcopal Church had adopted, with the English Nonjurors, a Liturgy resembling the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., and retained the mixed chalice in the Eucharist, and some other matters to which the "English Episcopalians" were opposed. It was agreed to leave to these the free use of the English Liturgy, whilst the Communion between them should not be interrupted thereby. But many of them were not contented with this. They called on the Bishops to abandon the Scotch Liturgy and adopt the English, and on their refusal the reunion was rejected. There are still a few, and only a very few, of these congregations in Scotland; nearly all of them have conformed to the Episcopal Church in consequence of that Church having left the choice of Liturgies to the congregations, and in the majority of the churches the English Office is in use. A memorable chapter in the history of this Church is that of the consecration of Bishop SEABURY [q.v.], the first American Bishop, in 1784. [See also UNITED STATES.]

The leading gentry and nobility of Scotland for the most part belong to the Episcopal Church, but nevertheless the Church is a very poor one. The income of a clergyman is seldom more than £100 a year, though this is the minimum. It is derived mostly from pew rents, and, in consequence, the amount depends largely on the popularity of the clergyman. The new life shown in the Church of England during the last fifty years has influenced Scotland, as is shown by the increasing number of services, and the building of various theological colleges. Of these the principal are: Trinity College, founded in 1841, to which are attached a few scholarships; St. Ninian Cathedral and College, Perth, the first cathedral established in Scotland since the Reformation, consecrated in 1851; Church and College of the Holy Spirit, Isle of Cumbræ, founded in 1849. At present there are seven Episcopal Sees, viz.:—Aberdeen, regarded as the chief; St. Andrews; Ross and Moray; Edinburgh; Brechin; Argyll and the Isles; Glasgow and Galloway. Patronage is chiefly in the hands of the congregation, who have the right of nominating their own pastor after they have heard him preach a sermon. The Episcopal Church has seven dioceses and 238 churches or stations.

Scott, Sir George Gilbert, R.A. [b. 1814, d. 1878], the most celebrated church architect of our time, was the grandson of Thomas Scott, of Aston Sandford. In 1844 he designed the Martyrs' Memorial at Oxford, and in the following year was entrusted with the rebuilding of St. Nicholas' Church, Hamburg, the great height of the steeple of which makes it so striking an object in the eyes of all visitors to the city. With the remarkable Church restoration movement which has characterised the last half-century Scott's name will always be associated, for among his works are the restoration of the cathedrals of Canterbury, Exeter, Ely, Lichfield, Hereford, Ripon, Gloucester, Chester, St. David's, St. Asaph's, Bangor, Salisbury, St. Alban's, and Westminster Abbey. He built also a vast number of new churches, and many public buildings. He was elected an R.A. in 1860. His principal books on architecture are A Plea for the Faithful Restoration of our Ancient Churches, Remarks on Secular and Domestic Architecture, Gleanings from Westminster Abbey, etc.

Scott, Thomas, a very popular Biblical Commentator [b. in Lincolnshire, 1747; d. at Aston Sandford in Buckinghamshire, 1821]. He was apprenticed to a surgeon, but expelled from this situation for misbehaviour, and sent by his father to work at the lowest drudgery of farm work. After nine years spent in this manner, he announced his intention of entering the Church, took orders in 1773, and was appointed to the curacy of Weston Underwood, whence after a few years he removed to the curacy of Olney. He had by this time adopted strong Calvinistic views, through the influence of John Newton, whom he succeeded at Olney; and he published in 1779 a small book, the Force of Truth, containing a statement of his opinions. He became chaplain to the Lock Hospital, in London, 1785, and about 1802 Rector of Aston Sandford. His Family Bible, with notes and commentary, is still popular in the Evangelical school of divinity, but it is less full of thought than that of Matthew Henry.

Scrutiny.—An examination into the faith and disposition of catechumens before their baptism, accompanied by exorcism and religious instruction. In the Ordo Romanus, the Feria Scrutini, the most important day of scrutiny, was the Wednesday of the fourth week in Lent; besides this there were two other days appointed in Lent, and at a later date the number of days of scrutiny increased to seven. When it became the custom to baptise infants at the Easter or Pentecost after their birth, the number again fell to three, and from the twelfth century onwards the ceremony of scrutiny was joined to that of baptism, when the time of baptism was no longer limited to those seasons.

Scudamore, William Edward [b. 1813, d. 1881], a divine of the modern English Church. He was born at Wye, in Kent; educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; took holy orders in 1838, and two years later was presented to the living of Ditchingham, in Norfolk, where he spent the remainder of his life. His parish had been greatly neglected, but he quickly got it into thorough order. The Ditchingham House of Mercy, with its sisterhood and orphanage and hospital, if not originated by him, at least owed much of their success to his energy and care. He was Warden of the House of Mercy till his death. But it is for his writings that his name will be chiefly remembered. In 1846 he published Steps to the Altar, which has passed through numerous editions, and been translated into Hindustani. Another devotional work of his is Words to Take With Us. In 1841 his repugnance to the theology of Rome caused him to publish Letters to a Seceder from the Church of England. In 1855 England and Rome and The Communion of the Laity both attracted considerable notice. But Mr. Scudamore's principal literary work was the Notitia Eucharistica, printed in 1872. In this essay, which is a storehouse of information on all doctrines connected with the Holy Eucharist, he aimed at proving that the practice of the early Church was opposed to the attendance of non-communivating worshippers at the celebration of the Holy Communion; that the elevation and worship of the Host were of late introduction, and plainly condemned by the Anglican Church; and that previous private confession and absolution were not to be required as necessary of recipients of the Lord's Supper. Here, as in all his religious opinions, he closely followed the guidance of the early Fathers, and of the greatest of the Anglican divines—Hooker, Andrewes, Bull, Cosin, and Jeremy Taylor. Mr. Scudamore was a man of deep piety and personal religion, and singularly humble-minded. His devotional works are merely the outward expression of what he inwardly believed and felt and practised.

Sculpture, CHRISTIAN.—Many causes combined during the early centuries of the Christian Era to mark this period as deficient in Christian works of art of any description. For two centuries before the birth of Christ art had been in a state of decline, and when Greece, the mistress of art, came under the Roman yoke, there seemed little prospect of a genuine revival. But sculpture had another disadvantage, namely, the association of images in the mind of the Jews with the idolatry forbidden by the Mosaic Law; and the early Christians regarded images with scarcely less abhorrence. Roman art had degenerated into the representation of the lowest passions of human nature, and the Christian avoided it for this reason, Tertullian going so far as to say that art is the invention of the devil. The earliest deviations from this strict avoidance of image worship are the monumental representations in sculpture of Biblical history; and these are of the crudest and most elementary description. Statues representing objects of worship were very rare until about the tenth century, though it seems that some Christians were found who defended them, and even protested against the destruction of beautiful Pagan images. Sepulchral reliefs gradually found their way more and more into use to adorn monuments, shrines, Church furniture, etc., and crucifixes began to be used, not as objects of worship, but simply as beautiful works of art. In the West, sculpture formed a part of architecture, and instead of setting up solitary statues inside churches, it became customary to adorn the west fronts of the larger churches with images of Christ and the Virgin, angels, saints, and martyrs, and with representations of scenes from the life of Christ. All these figures, without exception, were required to be clothed in long draperies, and this necessarily hampered the artists, who had none of them as yet attained to the highest skill, while it sometimes destroyed the distinctness of a scene in which many figures were grouped together. The first Christian sculptor who can be named as having reached any great degree of excellence was Nicolo Pisano, an Italian of the thirteenth century, who executed a series of bas-reliefs at Pisa and Siena, representing events in the life of Christ and the Last Judgment. His pupils carried on the work, and the west front of the cathedral of Orvieto, the door of its baptistery and other works, show traces of his influence. In the fifteenth century sculpture progressed under Donatello, Brunelleschi, and especially Ghiberti; and these prepared the way for the greatest of all Christian sculptors, Michael Angelo Buonarrotti [1475-1564]. His chef d'œuvre was the figure of Moses, in the Church of San Pietro in Vincoli, at Rome, and his works enrich most of the principal buildings at Rome and Florence.

Sculptetus, ABRAHAM, Divinity Professor at Heidelberg, was born at Grünberg, in Silesia, in 1566; died at Emden in 1624. He studied at Görlitz, Wittenberg, and Heidelberg, was ordained in 1589, and became the pastor of a little village in the Palatinate, afterwards Court Preacher to the Elector Palatine Friedrich V., and in 1598 Pastor of St. Francis' Church at Heidelberg. In 1612 he accompanied the Elector to England, where he became acquainted with many learned men. On his return to Heidelberg in 1618 he was made Divinity Professor. Soon after he was sent as a Commissioner to the Synod of Dort, where he first acted the part of mediator, but finding this was hopeless, became a vigorous champion for the contra-remonstrants. He was accused in 1620 of advising the Elector Palatine to accept the crown of Bohemia, and of raising great disturbances in the Palatinate about the explication of the Sacrament. He lost his professorship at Heidelberg; but two years after became preacher at Emden. He wrote Ethicorum libri duo, Sphæricorum libri tres, and Medulla theologiæ patrum.

Seabury, SAMUEL, first Bishop of the Episcopal Church of America [b. at Groton, Connecticut, 1729; d. at New London, 1796]. He graduated at Yale College in 1748, studied medicine in Scotland, and afterwards took holy orders, being ordained by the Bishop of London in 1754. He was first appointed missionary at New Brunswick, New Jersey, and was afterwards chaplain to the forces at New York; and when the English cause became hopeless, and the colonies were recognised as independent States, Seabury was unanimously elected by the clergy to be their first bishop, on March 25th, 1783. He started at once for England for consecration, and arrived in the summer of that year; but difficulties stood in the way which were not lightly to be got over. The See of Canterbury was vacant, and the Archbishop of York refused to consecrate without a special Act of Parliament, as it was illegal for the subject of a foreign State to take the required oath of allegiance. Seabury accordingly had recourse to the Scottish bishops, who had already manifested an interest in the American Church, and who had not the same fear which the English showed of the consequences of newly-born independence at such a time. He was consecrated at Longacre, Aberdeen, Nov. 14th, 1784, in the chapel of Bishop Skinner's house, as Bishop of Connecticut, by three bishops of the Scottish Church. After the consecration Seabury signed certain articles, which were to serve to maintain the friendly intercourse between the sister Churches, the chief being a decision that in the celebration of Holy Communion the American Church should follow as closely as possible the rites of the Church of Scotland. He returned to America in 1785, and held his first ordination August 3rd. The first Convention was held in September, when Bishop Seabury was not present; alterations were proposed in the Prayer Book, and the question of consecration was discussed. It was agreed that Seabury's consecration was valid, but all desired to perpetuate the union with the Mother Church, and they decided to request the English bishops to consecrate whatever other bishops they might choose. The English bishops consented, and in 1787 America had four bishops, who united to consecrate the Bishop of Maryland. Bishop Seabury was indefatigable in his work for the American Church, and has left a marked influence on its policy and present condition. His constant labours gave little time for literary work, but he has left several unpublished works and some volumes of sermons.

Seal of Confession.—Every confessor in the Roman Church is under the strictest obligation to keep secret all knowledge gained by auricular confession. The priest is supposed to stand in the place of God towards the people under his charge, and therefore to reveal what he has heard privately is sacrilege, punishable by the ecclesiastical law with heavy penalties. No exception is made as to the slightest sins, the revelation of which might do no harm, or to crimes which, if revealed by the priest, would bring the sinner to justice; nor is the priest allowed to remind the penitent of any knowledge he may possess by any sign or change of manner. The only exception is when a confession has been made sufficient to clear another person suspected wrongly of the crime. By the Fourth Lateran Council a priest guilty of breaking the seal of confession was sentenced to deposition and perpetual imprisonment, and another sentence was that his whole life should be passed in ignominious pilgrimage.

Seamen, MISSIONS TO. [SOCIETIES.]

Sebastian, St.—St. Sebastian was born of Christian parents at Narbonne, in France, in the third century, and educated at Milan. He obtained an appointment as captain of the Prætorian Guard, with a view to helping the persecuted Christians at Rome. In his capacity as soldier he gained access to two brothers who were undergoing terrible suffering in prison on account of their religion. [MARCELLINUS AND MARCUS.] When he had succeeded in converting their governor [see TIBURTIUS, St.], and so obtaining their release, he hid himself for a time in a friend's house, though he still worked hard for his suffering brethren. His retreat was discovered through the treachery of a renegade named Torquatus, and all the inhabitants of the house were ordered to be executed by Fabian, Governor of Rome. Feeling, however, that Sebastian was a prisoner of some importance, he did not dare sentence him without first referring the case to the Emperor. Diocletian had a personal interview with Sebastian, and, finding that his faith could not be shaken, ordered that he should be shot to death with arrows. A Christian woman named Ireneæ, on coming to the body, with the intention of giving it decent burial, found to her surprise that life was not extinct. With great difficulty she conveyed him to her house, where he quickly recovered. When he was well enough he presented himself boldly before the Emperor, begging him to be more lenient to the Christians. Diocletian was very angry, and ordered the soldiers around him to beat Sebastian to death. To prevent a second recovery, his body was thrown down a sewer; but a Roman lady, Lucina, found it, and caused it to be buried in the Catacombs. His festival is on Jan. 20th.

Secessionists, SCOTTISH.—The first secession, which took place in 1733, originated in a sermon preached before the Synod of Perth and Sterling by Ebenezer Erskine; an account of this movement will be found in his biography. [ERSKINE, EBENEZER.] In 1747 a new Secession took place on the question of the burghess-oath, which had been introduced by Act of Parliament into Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Perth, which ran as follows: "Here I protest before God and your lordships, that I profess and allow with my heart the true religion presently professed within this realm, and authorised by the laws thereof: I shall abide thereat, and defend the same to my life's end, renouncing the Roman religion called Papistry." Some affirmed that no consistent Seceder could take this oath, as it implied an adherence to the Established Church with all its corruptions; while others looked on it as merely making a profession of Protestantism in opposition to Popery, and in no way involving a compromise of Secession principles. Those who condemned the oath were popularly called Anti-Burghers; those who tolerated it, Burghers. The latter retained the name of Associate Synod; the former adopting the name General Associate Synod. In 1752 came yet another division, owing to the deposition of Thomas Gillespie, of Carnock, for refusing to instal Andrew Richardson in the parish of Inverkeithing, his appointment being very unpopular with the parishioners. In 1761 he, with two others, formed what is called the RELIEF CHURCH or PRESBYTERY, taking the name of "Relief" from its purpose of furnishing relief to churches suffering from the evils of patronage.

In 1820 the Burghers and Anti-Burghers coalesced as the United Secession, and in 1847 the Secession and Relief Churches amalgamated as the UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [q.v.].

The Original Seceders and the Cameronians have joined the FREE CHURCH.

Secker, THOMAS, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, was born of Dissenting parents at Sibthorpe, in Nottinghamshire, in 1693. He was educated at the Chesterfield Grammar School, at the Dissenting academy at Attercliffe, and lastly at Tewkesbury, where he became acquainted with Samuel Chandler and Joseph Butler, afterwards the famous Bishop of Durham. He was intended for a Dissenting minister, but he gave up the idea, and began to study medicine. Some of his friends—as Talbot, son of the Bishop of Durham—were anxious that he should follow the example of Butler and join the Established Church. This he was at length prevailed upon to do; he entered Exeter College, Oxford, and was ordained in 1723.

He advanced rapidly in the Church, being made Chaplain to Bishop Talbot [1723], Rector of Houghton-le-Spring, which he soon exchanged for Ryton, Chaplain to the King [1732], Rector of St. James's, Piccadilly [1733], Bishop of Bristol [1735], of Oxford [1737], Dean of St. Paul's [1750], and finally Archbishop of Canterbury in 1758. He was a famous preacher and a conscientious, liberal, and pious man. He died Aug. 3rd, 1768, and was buried in Lambeth churchyard. His Life was written and his works were edited by his chaplain, Beilby Porteus.

Secreta, or, as they are sometimes called, secretæ oratio, are the prayers said inaudibly by the priest in the service of the Mass. The lawfulness of the practice was questioned at the Reformation and abolished by the Protestants, but they are still in use in the Roman Church. The argument in favour of their being retained is a canon drawn up by the Council of Trent; but as there is some doubt on the subject, the priests are told they may think as they like about the historical question, but must obey the law.

Sect [Lat. seco, "to cut"].—A collective term, originally comprehending all such as follow the doctrines and opinions of some divine and philosopher; i.e., amongst the Jews we have the sect of the Pharisees and that of the Sadducees, and the early history of the Christian Church tells of many sects, which have all been noticed under their different heads. The term is often used now to characterise those who form separate communions, and do not associate practically with others in religious worship, as Romanists, Lutherans, Methodists, etc.; but would not be rightly applied to the divisions of High and Low Church, because they are only parties in the Church, with great and important differences in opinion indeed, but having made no external breach in the Church, nor separated from each other's communion. [See SCHISM.]

Secular Clergy [Lat. seculum, "the world," "an age"].—Clergy who lived comparatively in the world, in contradistinction to those confined in a monastery, and bound by vows and rules of life. The term "secular," which had formerly been used to denote all things outside the pale of the Church, came into use as applied to the clergy in the above sense at the beginning of the twelfth century, when Honorius II. allowed the monks of Cluny to receive into their order any secular priests who wished to join them.

Secularism.—A modern form of atheism, the fundamental principle of which is that men should concern themselves solely with the duties and affairs of the present life. The National Secular Society says that "Secularism relates to the present existence of man, and to actions the issue of which can be tested by experience. It declares that the promotion of human improvement and happiness is the highest duty, and that morality is to be tested by utility; that in order to promote effectually the improvement and happiness of mankind, every individual of the human family ought to be well placed and well instructed, and that all who are of a suitable age ought to be usefully employed for their own and the general good." The Secularists deny the existence of a personal God, or at most leave it as an open question on which there is no sufficient proof; and they say that the only God whose existence is evident is "Nature." They object to Christianity both morally and intellectually, but in nine cases out of ten the objections brought against it are wide of the mark, and take for granted beliefs which have no existence: a caricature of some Christian doctrine being set up, there is small difficulty in proving its ugliness. They deny any spiritual needs in humanity, and urge that the desire for the good of mankind is sufficient to move men to self-sacrifice. Secularism is largely made up of the chief principles of Rationalism and Positivism. We have not met with any summary better than the following, which is by the Archbishop of York, Dr. Thomson:—

"Secularism, whether system or not, aims at the overthrow of all belief in God and in a future state, and at such a modification of all political and social arrangements as may be required for the production of an era of general enjoyment, called, I perceive, by one writer 'universal beatitude.' It adopts in some measure the doctrine of evolution, which promises, after many ages, if the sun shall keep hot so long, such natural development of wisdom and self-restraint, that the children born shall just balance in number the adults that depart; these being exactly the number that can be pleasantly nurtured, without undue pressure on the means of subsistence. But the mills of evolution grind slowly, if they grind small; and the Hedonists or secularists of this moment have no notion of waiting in the interests of generations so far off. This is a form of entail, they think, in which the tenant for life is denied the usufruct, for the sake of heirs that may not be born for a million or two of years;—not born at all, indeed, if the sun should happen to get cool. So the march must be a good deal hastened, and as a beginning the human race is to be asked to desist from all belief in God; indeed, it is assumed that the belief in Christianity has already been refuted and made impossible. This accomplished, the way is paved for social changes, which shall confer on all classes, especially the labouring class, immense benefits, not even stopping short of that 'universal beatitude,' at which all good and modest reformers do not hesitate to aim."

Secunda. [RUFINA AND SECUNDA.]

Secundians.—A Gnostic sect of the second century, agreeing in some points with the VALENTINIANS [q.v.], but not in all. The founder, Secundus, was a pupil of Valentinus, but he appears to have struck out an original line of thought in going to the philosophy of the East for instruction. He maintained that everything was attributable to one of two main causes—Light and Darkness, or to a Prince of good or of evil.

Sedes Vacans.—A term used in ecclesiastical law to denote the vacancy of the office of any high dignitary of the Church, though it is strictly applicable only to that of the Pope or of a bishop. The interval is that between the death, resignation, or translation of the occupant, and the legal instalment of his successor. It was formerly the custom to provide a substitute called the interventor, during the interval, or to entrust the duties of the office to the cathedral chapter. This is still done in the case of a sedes impedita, when the vacancy is owing to the unavoidable absence or illness of the occupant.

Sedilia [Latin sedilia, "seats"].—Seats within the chancel (generally on the south side) for the use of the clergy. There are usually three of these combined in one structure, but sometimes there are two or only one, and in a few rare instances four or five. They are often richly carved.

Sedulius, CAIUS CÆLIUS, author of the Carmen Paschale, an heroic poem on the life of our Lord and events of Scripture history. Nothing is known of the author, except that he lived in the fifth century, during the reigns of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III.

See [Lat. sedes, "seat, throne"].—A word used for the throne of a bishop in his cathedral, in distinction from his diocese, which means the area over which he exercises spiritual power.

Seekers.—A Puritan denomination which arose in 1645. They derived the name from their maintaining that the true Church ministry, Scripture, and ordinances were lost, and that they were seeking for them. They taught that the Scriptures were uncertain; that present miracles were necessary to faith; that our ministry was without authority; and that our worship and ordinances are unnecessary or vain.

Selden, JOHN, lawyer and antiquarian [b. at Salvington, Sussex, 1584; d. at Whitefriars, 1654]. He studied at Chichester, graduated at Oxford, and entered Clifford's Inn, and afterwards the Inner Temple, for the study of law. In the early years of his career he published England's Epinomis, Jeni Anglorum Facies Altera, the Analecton Anglo-Britannicon, and De Diis Syris, an important work, which was published in 1617, and established his fame on the Continent as well as in England. The History of Tithes [1618] so roused the anger of the King that Selden was obliged to rewrite it, and to acknowledge his errors before the Court of High Commission. Selden seldom appeared at the Bar, but was looked up to as an authority on political matters, and was imprisoned in 1621 for advising the Commons to hold their ground against the encroachments of the King. He represented Lancaster in several Parliaments, and was zealous in the popular cause. He supported the Petition of Right, but appeased the King's anger by the Mare Clausum, published in 1636. In 1643 he sat in the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and was made Keeper of the Tower Records. He was very intimate with Ben Jonson. Selden was a man of great learning in legal matters, and during his imprisonment he wrote his chief works: De Successione in Pontificatum Hebræorum and De Jure Naturali et Gentium juxta Disciplinam Hebræorum. Probably his most popular work is Table-Talk, published about 1690.

Selwyn, GEORGE AUGUSTUS, the first Anglican Bishop of New Zealand, was born in 1809, and was appointed to his bishopric in 1841. By his wonderful energy, zeal, and ability, he won himself a splendid name in the history of missionary enterprise. He landed in May, 1842, and spent the first five months exploring the Northern and part of the Middle Island. The Southern Island was first visited in 1844. The diocese at first contained many of the Pacific Islands, and these Bishop Selwyn visited first in 1847. It was at last found necessary to divide the diocese [NEW ZEALAND], and in 1854 the Bishop revisited England to confer with the heads of the Church. His sermons at this time were very forcible, and four which he preached during Advent at Cambridge determined Mackenzie, afterwards Bishop of Central Africa, and Patteson, to devote themselves to a missionary life. Selwyn returned to New Zealand in 1856, and worked there unceasingly till 1868, when he was prevailed upon, but much against his will, to return and take the Bishopric of Lichfield. He died there April 11th, 1878.

Semi-Arians.—Those who, whilst categorically denying the Arian doctrines, held them secretly in a somewhat modified form. They refused to accept the word "consubstantial," but said that the Son was of like substance with the Father, thereby in reality denying the Divinity of Christ, for there can be but One God. The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia were composed for the most part of Semi-Arians. In modern times the term is used to denote those who believe that the Son was not from the beginning, but was begotten by the will of the Father. Such doctrines were held by some of the Rationalist divines of the last century, such as Drs. S. Clarke and Hoadley.

Seminaries.—Schools or colleges appointed for the education of young persons destined for the priesthood. There are a great many of these in Roman Catholic countries, the first of which is said to have been founded by St. Augustine. In the sixteenth century many of the universities had fallen into the hands of the Protestants, and at the Council of Trent it was decreed that "the metropolitan of every province and the bishop of every diocese, should establish at some suitable place (if there were no institution of the kind already) a college or seminary, in which a certain number of boys exceeding twelve years shall be brought up and instructed in common, to qualify them for the ecclesiastical estate." For the maintenance of these seminaries certain benefices were allotted, or the clergy were obliged to maintain them. The most famous of these was the seminary of St. Sulpicius, founded at Paris by M. Olier about 1650. Almost all the seminaries were destroyed at the Revolution, but many have since been restored. There are also Evangelical seminaries in the kingdom of Württemberg, where youths are trained till they are ready for the University at Tübingen. In 1817, Frederick William III. of Prussia founded a seminary at Wittenberg, in honour of Luther.

In the reign of Queen Elizabeth the Roman Catholics formed the project of founding English seminaries abroad, that from thence they might be furnished with missionaries to perpetuate and increase their communion. Accordingly, the College of Douay was founded in 1569, that of Rome in 1579, Valladolid in 1589, Seville in 1593, and St. Omer in Artois in 1596. In the next century more seminaries were established at Madrid, Louvain, Liège, and Ghent.

By a statute of Queen Elizabeth it was made a præmunire to contribute towards the maintenance of a Popish seminary, and by one of James I. no persons are to be sent for instruction to Popish seminaries under divers pains and penalties. At present there are seminaries in England, at Westminster, Birmingham, and Liverpool; one in Scotland, at Glasgow; and eight in Ireland, as well as that at Maynooth.

In the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States there are nine theological seminaries.

Semler, JOHANN SALOMO, the founder of historical criticism of the Bible, was born at Saalfeld, in 1725. He was, in 1743, sent to the University of Halle, where he made the acquaintance of Baumgarten, who exercised a great influence over him. He took his degree in 1750, and in 1751 became Historical Professor at Altdorf, and Theological Professor at Halle. On Baumgarten's death in 1757 Semler succeeded him.

The new departure taken by Semler was this:—The Lutheran teaching had not ascribed the Bible as the means of God's revelation to man, but had denied the authority of the Church. It became necessary to find a new basis of belief; and Rationalism professed human reason as being in harmony with the sacred oracles. From this lower ground, another step was easy, and it was taken by Semler, under whose system the last trace of dogmatic Christianity fell to the ground. Christ, he said, did not come to make an authoritative revelation, but to teach virtue. The Sermon on the Mount was His best manifesto; the deep discourses found in St. John were later accretions of theology, not authentic utterances of Christ.

As he put forward his views, the invectives hurled against him by the orthodox grew fiercer, and he was called a "homo impius et Judæis pejor;" and Pident, formerly Professor in Cassel, laid a complaint against him at the Regensburg Corpus Evangelicorum. In 1779, when he published his Beantwortung der Fragmente eines Ungenannten und die Antwort auf das Bährdtische Glaubensbekenntniß, his friends accused him of duplicity, as they said this zeal for ecclesiastical knowledge was incompatible with his former criticisms. He died in 1791.

Semler's criticism is directed towards a twofold object—the ruling principle of the Biblical canon and the treatment of Church history. The opinion which Semler found as the ruling one was that the books of the Bible formed an identical and inspired whole, a "totum homogeneum," as he expressed it. This opinion was shaken by his own studies, as also by the former works of R. Simon, of Clericus, and of Wetstein, and he endeavoured to show that the books had been placed in their present order by chance, and not according to any set rule. This view is treated of in Abhandlung vom freien Gebrauch des Kanons. Semler did not effect so much in this branch of Church history, except that by searching out the details and making many doubtful points clear, he founded the history of Christian doctrine, especially treating of the early centuries. On this subject he wrote Selecta Capita Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ et Commentarii Historiæ de Antiquo Christianorum Statu. An account of his views may be found in his edition of Wetstein's Prolegomena and in his Lebensbeschreibung von ihm selbst verfasst. He wrote 171 works, only two of which have passed through a second edition.

Seneca, LUCIUS ANNÆUS, a celebrated Roman philosopher, was born at Cordova a few years before Christ. His father, Marcus Seneca, was a rhetorician, rich, and high in Court favour, and from him his son inherited a great aptitude for rhetorical studies. But he became a Stoic, preferring philosophy to the study of words and the assemblies of men. He proposed to himself the acquisition of inward contentment and self-satisfaction. He rose high in the favour of the Emperor Claudius, when he was accused of adultery with a sister of Caligula, and was exiled to Corsica for eight years. He was at length recalled to Rome, and appointed tutor to Nero, the son of Agrippina, Claudius's wife. During this period he wrote his treatise on Anger, and it is characteristic of him. "It exhibits," says Mr. Maurice, "an ideal of character which he set before himself habitually, and which it cannot be denied that in a great measure he realised. The miseries and oppressions of the earth did not disturb his peace. The crimes of the palace never led him to dream, as an old Athenian might have dreamt, of Harmodius; or to pray, as an old Roman might have prayed, for a Divine avenger; or to mix, like his kinsman Lucan, reverence for Pompey and Cato with adulation of Nero. He was not inspired, as Juvenal was at a somewhat later time, by mere indignation, to pour out verses. He did not brood, like Tacitus, over the inevitable fall of his country's glory when its virtue had departed, nor anticipate the possible greatness of the untamed tribes in the forests of Germany because traces of old Roman virtue were to be seen in them. . . . He disposed rapidly and decisively of the objection that moral evil ought to excite the displeasure of a philosopher, by urging that the philosopher in Rome who began to act upon that maxim must be displeased all day long. Whatever subject Seneca handled is treated in this spirit."

When Nero became Emperor, his military tutor, Burrhus, exercised a beneficial influence upon the opening of his reign. Seneca addressed to him a treatise on Clemency, recommending to him gentleness and forgiveness of injuries, and congratulating him upon exhibiting so many noble qualities. Burrhus died, and then the worth of Seneca's fair prognostications was seen. The young Emperor plunged into such vices and crimes as have made his name a byword of terror and disgust to all generations. How far Seneca is responsible for his bringing up may be regarded as a doubtful question. There are some writers, like Dion Cassius, who hold that the treatise on Clemency was mischievous in its results, and that Seneca's influence is distinctly to be traced in what followed. Others assert, and not without probability, that Nero's murder of his mother was suggested by Seneca. Whether or not this be so, there is no doubt that he wrote the apology for the matricide. It had become part of his philosophy to endure not only personal injuries, but the sight of moral evil, without anger. It was part of his calm philosophy to look calmly upon oppression and wrong. He was not inconsistent in this. He had accumulated immense wealth—no less than two million and a half pounds of our money. Nero coveted it, and endeavoured to have Seneca poisoned, but the attempt failed. Then he was accused of conspiracy, and on this charge was commanded to kill himself.

With the same calmness which marked his contemplation of sin in others he met his own death; opened his veins in a warm bath, and bled to death, A.D. 65. Gallio of Acts xviii. was his brother. In the Apocryphal New Testament is a correspondence comprising thirteen letters between Paul and Seneca, but they are certainly spurious.

Sentences.—The texts from Holy Scripture, one or more of which are read at the beginning of Morning and Evening Prayer. They were placed there by the compilers of the Prayer Book of 1552, who followed the example of some of the old Latin breviaries. Most of them dwelt upon the duty of confession of sins, thus forming a fit introduction to the service which follows immediately after. They are partly taken from the Psalms, partly from the Prophetical Books, while three are extracts from the New Testament.

Separatists.—This term has been used in many ways, and in many countries at different periods of ecclesiastical history. It may be taken to mean all those who dissent, or separate themselves, from the national Church of their country. In Mary's reign it was applied to those who refused to attend Mass, and in Elizabeth's to all who did not conform to the Reformed doctrines. In Germany we find the term in frequent use, especially during the last century, when a sect sprang into existence at Württemberg, holding for the most part the same views as the PIETISTS [q.v.]. They were much persecuted, and at last, in 1803, emigrated to America, where they became known under the name of the Harmony Society. Frederick William III. of Prussia tried to effect a union between the Lutheran and Reformed Churches, and those who refused to join were sometimes called Separatists [see also KORNTHAL]. In Ireland at the present day there are three sects known as Separatists. The founder of the first, John Walker, belonged to the SANDEMANIANS [q.v.], and his followers practically hold the same doctrines; but he announced that it was his intention to acknowledge communion with no other sect whatever, and hence the name Separatist. As a distinguishing name they are sometimes called Walkerites. Another sect, also agreeing in all essential points with the Sandemanians, was started by a Mr. Kelly, formerly a clergyman in the Established Church of Ireland, and lastly, the division of the Plymouth Brethren which adhere to Mr. Darby [see PLYMOUTH BRETHREN], and which are rather numerous in Ireland, are often also there termed Separatists, the word more often used in England being Exclusives.

Septuagesima. [QUINQUAGESIMA.]

Septuagint.—The Greek version of the Old Testament, used by the Hellenist Jews and by the early Christians. The story of the Septuagint, as given by Aristæus, is as follows:—Ptolemy Philadelphus, the son of Lagus, King of Egypt, wished to add a copy of the books of the Jewish Law to his library at Alexandria, and sent to the high priest, Eleazar, to ask for a copy, and for competent persons to translate it into Greek. Seventy-two men, six from each tribe, were sent to Egypt, and after seventy-two days spent in translation, the five books of the Pentateuch were completed, the translators having assisted each other. Later accounts introduce miraculous elements into the story, and Justin Martyr tells that each man was shut up alone in a cell to translate the Old Testament unaided, and that when the results were compared they were found to agree in every point. This was one of the stories current at the time of Justin Martyr, but it is of course mere fable. [BIBLE.]

Sepulchre, THE HOLY, at Jerusalem, the alleged place of our Lord's burial. According to the traditional account, the Romans, who possessed Palestine, upon the destruction of the Holy City declared themselves professed enemies of the glory of Jesus Christ in that place, and in order to eclipse, and if possible extinguish it, they filled the sepulchre with earth, and built an idolatrous temple on the spot: they erected the statue of Jupiter on the place of our Lord's resurrection, and that of Venus where He was crucified. All this was done by the order of Hadrian in 137, when, leaving the old city buried in its own ruins, he built a new one north of Jerusalem, and called it Ælia, and Mount Calvary thus profaned was enclosed in the walls of the new city. The same tradition goes on to state that Constantine the Great, having defeated Licinius, and established the peace of the Church and provided for the security of its faith by the Council of Nice, turned his thoughts to the places consecrated by the life and death of Jesus Christ, which he resolved to rescue from the profanation to which they had long been exposed. The Holy Sepulchre was his first care, and he directed that a magnificent church should be built there in honour of our Lord's resurrection. Eusebius tells us that the Emperor's mother undertook to execute this commission, and in 335 the stately edifice was consecrated by a number of bishops, who came thither from the Council of Tyre. [HELENA, ST. ; CROSS.] From that time the veneration of the Holy Sepulchre daily increased, and the church maintained its grandeur till the beginning of the seventh century, when the Persians, coming into Palestine, demolished part of the building, carried off the cross, and made Zachary, Patriarch of Jerusalem, their prisoner. His successor, Modestus, is said to have recovered the cross and to have restored the church in 636, with the help of the Emperor Heraclius. But in the seventh century it fell into the hands of the Saracens, was restored to the Christians towards the close of the eighth century in the hope of gaining the friendship of Charlemagne, but on his death relapsed to the Infidels. They kept it till the end of the eleventh century, when Godfrey of Bouillon became King of Jerusalem in 1099; but in 1187 it reverted to the Infidels under Saladin, Sultan of Egypt.

Such is the tradition current concerning the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the most sacred of all the holy places, "in comparison of which," as Dean Stanley remarks, "all the rest sink into insignificance if it is genuine, the interest of which, even if not genuine, stands absolutely alone in the world." It is no wonder, therefore, that, as its genuineness has been altogether called in question, it has been also strenuously maintained. The case against the genuineness is most fully stated by Robinson in his Biblical Researches; everything which can be said in favour will be found in The Holy City of Mr. Williams. The opponents urge that Hadrian's wish was to insult the Jews, not the Christians, and, therefore, that the story of his setting up the statues is improbable, and further, that there is no allusion to the sacred sites in Justin or Origen, though they lived on the spot. Another point urged against the genuineness is that the Holy Sepulchre is within the walls, whereas Christ suffered "without the gate;" but, as Dean Stanley points out, there are other sepulchres in the immediate neighbourhood which would not have been suffered within the city, and, therefore, the boundary-wall has clearly been altered. And he adds, "Granting to the full the doubts which must always hang over the highest claims of the Church of the Sepulchre, no thoughtful man can look unmoved on what has, from the time of Constantine, been revered by the larger part of the Christian world as the scene of the greatest events of the world's history, and has itself in time become for that reason the centre of a second cycle of events of incomparably less magnitude indeed, but yet of an interest in the highest degree romantic."

In this remarkable church may be seen all the diversities and forms of the older Churches of the world: the barbaric splendour of the Greek Church, which holds possession of Constantine's basilica and of the rock of Calvary; the deep poverty of the Coptic and Syrian Churches, each confined to one paltry chapel; the Latin Church, which has contrived to assert its position among its rivals by establishing an altar for "the exaltation of the Cross" [Cross], and has secured possession of the Holy Tomb itself for its altar. Between them all is a standing conflict, the two great Churches of the East and the West being brought side by side within the same narrow territory. It was a quarrel between these which was the immediate cause of the Crimean War of 1853-4: the Russian Government demanding from Turkey to be entrusted with the care of the Holy Places. There is a splendid description of the Easter ceremonial of the Holy Sepulchre in Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, pp. 464-469.

Sequence.—The name given to the rhythm which followed [Lat. sequor, "I follow"] the Epistle, and preceded the Gospel. In former times the Epistle was read at the altar as at present, but the Gospel was read from the rood-loft, and therefore something was necessary to be sung during the transit of the deacon. At first the last note of the Alleluia sung after the Epistle was prolonged, but this was found too tedious, and in the ninth century special antiphons were introduced. The first writer of sequences is generally supposed to have been Notker, a monk of St. Gall, who is said to have seen some at the Benedictine abbey of Jumièges, near Rouen. In some of the mediæval Missals there are sequences for each Sunday and festival, but in the Roman Missal of the sixteenth century there were but four—for Easter, Whitsuntide, Corpus Christi, and the masses of the dead. A fifth for the two feasts of the Seven Dolours [the Stabat Mater] has been added since. Sequences were discontinued in England in the seventeenth century, when the disuse of rood-lofts rendered them unnecessary. The name is sometimes used as synonymous with hymn, but this is obviously wrong, as a sequence is rhythmical without regular metre, and has no rhymes.

Sequestration.—The separation of anything in course of dispute from the possession of both the contending parties, in order to collect and preserve the profits of a living for the benefit of the next incumbent. If the value of a benefice is inadequate for the support of a clergyman, it is sometimes left under sequestration for some years, in charge of the curate and churchwardens. Sequestration is sometimes employed to satisfy the debts of an incumbent if he has no private income, and he is obliged to pay them out of the profits of his benefice, the bishop of the diocese being entrusted with directing the confiscation. In the time of the Civil War the estates of delinquents were often seized for the use of the Commonwealth by sequestration.

Seraphic Hymn. [TERIANCTUS.]

Sermon [Lat. sermo, "discourse," "talk," which is from servo, "to sow," "disseminate"] means, theologically, a discourse delivered in public for instruction and improvement. Other names in the ancient Church were "homily" (which is from a root signifying "a multitude") and tractatus ("a treatise"). The high dignity of the office of preaching was shown by the fact that in the African Churches no presbyter was suffered to preach before his bishop until the time of St. Augustine. In the Eastern Church this was not so, though after a presbyter had finished, the bishop used to preach. It would seem that the deacons for many years were not allowed to preach. When this rule was relaxed, the right to preach was also conceded to laymen, but under careful restrictions. They acted as catechists (as in the catechetical school at Alexandria), but not in the churches. Even monks, who were often laymen, were not allowed to preach in church as a rule. But in some cases a special lecture was given, as in the case of Origen, who was licensed by the bishop to preach and expound the Scriptures before he took orders. It was usual when more than one bishop was present in a church for all in turn to take up the word of exhortation. Frequency of sermons depended on the place and the season. Thus Chrysostom's Lenten Sermons were delivered on successive days, and Augustine makes reference to previous sermons as delivered "yesterday." But probably this was only in the case of large parishes and towns. The English Liturgy only actually prescribes one sermon each Sunday, directing in the rubric that it shall follow the Nicene Creed in the Communion Service. But almost universal custom gives a sermon also at the evening service, where it is generally placed at the end, though in some cathedrals and other churches it is put after the third collect. The Act of Uniformity Amendment Act provides that a sermon may also be preached in church without other service.

Sermons have been classed thus: [1] expositions of Scripture; [2] panegyrics on saints; [3] sermons for special seasons; [4] sermons on special duties. It is impossible to lay down fixed rules concerning the structure of a sermon, but we may say that generally it should begin with an exordium, in which the preacher should state his subject in broad outline, avoiding such minuteness as belongs to the separate divisions, seeing that this tends to take off the attention from what follows. Then come the divisions, the more distinct the better, and they should not be too many; and then the application, addressed both to the judgment and to the affections. The minister here should reason, expostulate, warn, exhort, win.

The order of the seasons is useful to the preacher as furnishing him with a variation of topics, and ensuring, if he be painstaking, that he shall have each doctrine of the Gospel in succession before his eyes. "I make a rule," says one well-known preacher, "to take one of my sermons every Sunday from some passage which has occurred in the Services, and the other from something which has not so occurred, and so I force myself to search the Scriptures for new material, and so avoid beaten tracks."

One of the most eminent of living preachers, Dr. Phillips Brooks, in his admirable Lectures on Preaching, lays down the principle that there are two elements to be considered in a sermon, and he calls them Truth and Personality. Preaching is the communication of Truth to man. Nothing can make up for the lack of it. It is truth that binds one preacher to another, and causes the message which they deliver to be received. But the truth is delivered from man to men. It is not written in the sky, it is not merely written in the Bible, it is to be conveyed from man to his fellows, and to be recommended by the vivid personality of the speaker, who delivers what he has received and has felt to be true. Consequently the preacher should know what his preparation ought to be. Not the mere acquisition of knowledge but "the kneading and tempering of a man's whole nature till it becomes of such a consistency and quality as to be capable of transmission. . . . Other works which the sermon writer will find very useful are Claude's Essay on the Composition of a Sermon, Mr. Spurgeon's Lectures on Preaching, delivered to his students, and Mr. D. Moore's Thoughts on Preaching.

Serpentinians. [OPHITES.]

Servetus, MICHAEL, was born in 1509 at Villanueva in Aragon. His parents held a good position there, his father being a notary of some standing. Like his great contemporary Calvin, Servetus passed his young days in a Dominican convent, and like him, too, his first patron was an ecclesiastic, Quintana by name. This priest was father confessor of the Emperor Charles V., and Servetus went with him into Italy, and was much impressed there by the adoration given by the people to the Pope. Even at that time Servetus evidently held the novel opinions of the times, for he compared the Pope to a harlot. The natural ability and great versatility of intellectual powers with which Servetus was endowed, ought to have secured him a brilliant career, if not as a Reformer yet as a man of letters. At Paris in 1534 he gave and received lessons in medicine, mathematics, and astronomy. He conjectured and almost described the circulation of the blood. Large audiences were attracted to hear him, but owing to his exacting, arrogant character, he was soon embroiled with the whole University of Paris, which distrusted his views. Servetus openly characterised all who differed in opinion with himself as "fools and public pests." When he met at Basle such Reformers as Zwingli, Ecolampadius and Bucer, Servetus was written of by Ecolampadius as "That rash, hot-headed Spaniard." Later on Zwingli warned his friend, Ecolampadius, that "the views of the Spaniard will be the ruin of the whole Christian religion." It is remarkable what a different impression Calvin made on these same men. They saw danger to the Reformed religion in one, hope and strength in the other. In 1531 and 1532 Servetus wandered between Basle and Germany, and it was at Basle that he brought out his first work on The Errors of the Trinity, affixing boldly his own name to the work. This book violently attacked the doctrine of the Trinity, and met with disapproval by Catholics and Protestants alike. Even the most gentle Reformers were almost violent in their denunciation of Servetus and his views. The Government seized the book. Servetus, it is said, was imprisoned for a short time; but almost immediately he published a second work, which, however, was barely noticed. Becoming distrusted and disliked at Paris, where he was forbidden to teach astrology or to predict from the stars, Servetus left that city and settled at Lyons, where he was corrector of the press to a firm of printers. His great want of stability of purpose caused him to change his name and residence constantly; in 1540 he settled at Vienne, in Dauphiné, where he was twelve years under the protection of the Archbishop, Mgr. Palmier, adopting the name of Villanueva, his native city. He published there many works, and brought out a translation of the Bible. He was in high repute as a physician, and conformed to the Roman Catholic religion. One of the latest of Calvin's biographers, Stühelin, and M. Emile Saisset, another distinguished philosopher of the contemporary French school, agree in their opinion of the doctrine of Servetus, the fundamental principle being, they say, the assertion of the one absolute and indivisible God. "That doctrine is Pantheism, with the chaos of logic, mysticism, and mere words which Pantheism offers as rational explanation." In the year 1534 Calvin and Servetus had met in Paris, and appointed a meeting to carry on their controversy in public. Calvin kept the appointment, but Servetus never appeared, and it is evident, from subsequent events, that Calvin ever after retained a contempt for the man who thus escaped from a contest. Servetus was obliged to acknowledge the wonderful power his opposer had over the minds of most people, and wishing to renew his acquaintance with Calvin he even wrote asking his advice, and sending him a copy of his new book, on The Restoration of Christianity. These letters were numerous between 1540 and 1546, Calvin replying coldly. He gave Servetus wise and earnest advice, evading his cavilling questions, and showing a strong wish not to enter into regular correspondence with him. Servetus, however, continued writing to Calvin, who, at last, was wearied into replying: "Neither now, nor at any future time, will I mix myself up in any way with your wild dreams. Forgive me for speaking thus, but truth compels me." From this time the correspondence ended on Calvin's part. Servetus thereupon made fierce attacks on Calvin's book, Christian Institutes, and eventually he published his own work on the Restoration of Christianity, but anonymously. The book awoke a storm of indignation, especially in Lyons and Geneva, representative places of Catholicism and Protestantism. Servetus was suspected of being the author through the initials M. S. V. (Michael Servetus Villanueva) being put at the end of the book, and he was summoned to appear before M. de Montgiron, Lieutenant-Général du Roi in Dauphiné, to whom Servetus was physician. He was acquitted, on the alleged ground that there was not sufficient evidence that he held heretical opinions. But neither falsehoods nor evasions could shield him in any strict inquiry, when the Cardinal de Tournon and the inquisitor Ory took up the matter, making use of information they obtained through a zealous Protestant—De Tric by name—and they at last induced Calvin to give up to them many papers in Servetus' own handwriting, containing some of his heresies. Amongst these papers was a copy of Calvin's Christian Institutes, on the margin of which Servetus had written notes quite opposed to the Christian dogmas recognised both by Protestants and Catholics. Some have blamed Calvin for the part he took in this matter, and have accused him of duplicity and hypocrisy in showing some hesitation in giving up the papers, and eventually doing so unreservedly. Servetus was confounded by the mass of evidence brought to bear against him, and made all sorts of useless and contradictory statements. He was arrested and imprisoned on April 5th, 1553, but was shown so much leniency that he escaped after a few days, and wandered about between France and Switzerland for some months. At the end of July, Servetus actually returned to Geneva, where he spent twenty-seven days, and excited some curiosity at the little inn—the Auberge de la Rose—where he stayed. He even went to hear Calvin preach. Sentence had been passed upon Servetus while he was wandering about after his escape from prison, that "he should be burnt alive over a slow fire at the place of public execution, so that his body should be reduced to cinders as well as his book," so that when Calvin heard that this "pantheistic visionary" was at Geneva, he at once requested one of the syndics to arrest Servetus, which was done on Aug. 13th, 1553. At this time Calvin was engaged in a fierce contest with the Libertines, yet he did not hesitate to openly proclaim the fact that it was he who had instigated the re-arrest of Servetus, and also that in accordance with the laws of Geneva, he had procured the assistance of his friend and secretary, Nicolas de la Fontaine, to act as prosecutor, and to submit to the necessary imprisonment during the trial, which lasted two months and thirteen days. After the first few days the trial became a theological controversy, and Calvin himself took part in it. Servetus incautiously admitted his pantheistic doctrines, which shocked and embarrassed the council, amongst whom were the principal Libertine leaders—Ami Perrin and Berthelier—who were desirous to protect Servetus. But his vanity, frivolity, and untruthfulness led him to disclaim any connection whatever with the Libertines of Geneva, so that their confidence was shaken in him. The majority of the Genevese magistrates wished to modify the character of the trial, which had brought to light so much personal animosity, and they therefore granted Servetus's request that the Churches of Berne, Zurich, Schaffhausen, and Basle should be consulted on his case. They also adjourned the trial several times, thus deferring the final decision. On Sept. 22nd, Servetus, after abusing Calvin in the strongest terms, publicly went so far as to demand that his adversary should be committed for trial, which should only end by the condemnation to death of one of the two. This attack on Calvin was not even noticed; and, deserted by the Libertines, who now saw the final crisis was at hand, Servetus sank down into dejection and despair, and he at last appealed in the most abject way that relief might be sent to him in prison, where he was lying ill and forsaken. Necessary comforts were supplied to him, but the "important things" which he declared he had to communicate were merely a pretext to gain a hearing, and so perhaps an influence over the minds of those who were sent to him. In October the four Cantons sent in their answers, which were unanimous in condemning Servetus, recommending severity, yet the advice was couched in the most cautious terms. On Oct. 26th, after several adjournments of the trial, the majority of the council decreed that, considering the great errors and blasphemies of Michael Servetus, he should be led to Champel and there burnt alive, and that his books should be burnt with him. Calvin made every effort to change the manner of Servetus's death, although he openly admitted that burning at the stake was what he considered the sentence should be. Servetus implored mercy, and Farel went to him, urging him to recant, which might lead to a mitigation of the sentence. He also arranged a meeting between Calvin and Servetus, which, however, was of no avail, for Calvin's stern exhortation to repentance only wounded Servetus, who kept silence after asking Calvin's forgiveness at the beginning of the interview. Even in the depths of his despair Servetus refused to give up his convictions, and he died even heroically and calmly at the stake, attended by Farel, on Oct. 27th, 1553.

Serving Tables.—This was a term used in the administration of the Holy Communion in the Church of Scotland. This Sacrament formerly was often only administered twice in the year, and during the preceding week frequent preparatory services were held. The communion Sunday services were commenced by what was called the action sermon, and this was followed by a prayer and the singing of a psalm; then the minister proceeded to fence the table—that is, to give a brief address warning the ignorant and profane from coming to the holy table, and at the same time setting forth the characteristics of worthy communicants. This introductory address was followed by the singing of an appropriate psalm, such as the cxxxii., during which the elders brought in the elements, and intending communicants took their places round the communion table, which was arranged so as to preserve the idea of a supper. Then the minister descended from the pulpit, and read from 1 Cor. xi. the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper, and then offered a prayer, popularly called the "consecration prayer." This was followed by an appropriate address to those occupying the table, and was called "serving the table." Then, while repeating the words of institution, the minister gave the elements with his own hands to those who were seated on each side of him, and the elders distributed to the rest of the communicants. During a solemn silence each communicant passed to his neighbour the bread and wine after partaking of them, then the minister added a few words of advice, and dismissed them from the table with a blessing. The table was then again filled, and was addressed by one of the assisting ministers, the minister of the parish taking his seat as a communicant. The service was closed by a psalm of thanksgiving, and a final address to all the communicants. Communion is now generally more frequent, and the practice somewhat modified.

Servites, or "Servants of the Virgin Mary," an Order founded on the festival of the Assumption [1233], at Florence, by seven merchants, one of whom was the uncle of Juliana Falconieri, the foundress of the female Servites in 1306. They previously joined a confraternity to sing the praises of the Virgin, and now withdrew to the Villa Camartia, in a secluded spot outside the city, and devoted themselves entirely to her worship. In 1236 they removed to the Monte Senario, and built a convent, and in 1239 adopted the Augustinian rule, adding several particular constitutions. Their habit was black with a leathern girdle, a scapulary and a cope. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX. and Alexander IV., and in 1487, under Innocent VIII., they gained equal privileges with the other four Mendicant Orders. The Order spread very rapidly, and at the death of the last of its founders, Alexis Falconieri, it numbered over 10,000 monks. It did not appear in England before the Reformation, but at present there is a community in the Fulham Road, London, with a branch at Bognor. There are two convents of Servite nuns near London, and one at Arundel. The great theologian and councillor of Venice, Paolo Sarpi, belonged to the Servite Order.

Servus Servorum Dei ["servant of the servants of God"].—A name used by the Pope when signing his name. St. Gregory the Great is said to be the first who adopted it as a distinctive title, and he did so as a rebuke to John, Patriarch of Constantinople, who styled himself Universal Bishop or Œcumenical Patriarch.

Session, KIRK. [KIRK SESSION.]

Sethians.—An Egyptian sect of the second century, who belonged to the Gnostic heresy. Their distinguishing doctrine was that they looked upon Seth, Noah's son, as the most holy man of the Old Testament, and firmly believed that the Messiah, when He came, would be descended from him. Some writers class them with the OPHITES [q.v.]. Irenæus says that they allowed that the Christ descended upon Jesus at His baptism, but left Him at the Crucifixion. Another of their theories was that the angels, and not God, were the creators of the world.

Sevenfold Gifts.—The gifts of the Holy Spirit which were to rest on the Messiah, as enumerated by the Prophet Isaiah [Is. xi. 2]. In the Confirmation Service they are given thus:—The spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and ghostly strength, the spirit of knowledge and true godliness, and the spirit of God's holy fear. The Authorised Version only gives six gifts, but some writers explain this by saying, "The Spirit of the Lord" is a distinct gift in itself, and is synonymous with "the spirit of prophecy."

Seventh Day Baptists. [SABBATARIANS.]

Severinus, St., Abbot, Apostle of Noricum.—Of his early days we know absolutely nothing. He came from the East about the year 452 to Pannonia, a district where no sort of order was kept, and moved about from town to town, helping with his advice and prayers the wretched people, then exposed to the ravages of the barbarians. At length he settled in Noricum, a Roman province occupying the present Austria and parts of Bavaria. Severinus built a monastery near Vienna, and from there he and his followers made excursions through the neighbouring towns, trying to organise some kind of government, and preaching the Gospel at the same time. His success was great, and in time he was consulted by all the chiefs of the country before they took a step of any importance, and his advice was always followed. One great secret of his power was the kindness and cordiality with which he greeted all who came to him, whether they were of his own creed or not. His influence over barbarian chiefs was marvellous. The most famous of these chiefs was Odowacer, who came to Severinus for advice before attempting to gain the kingdom of Italy, on which he had set his heart. After labouring faithfully for thirty years he died on New Year's Day, 482, at Faviana, a city on the Danube.

Severus, SULPICIUS, an eminent historian, was born in Gaul, 363; died at Marseilles, 410. He was a lawyer, but on the death of his wife adopted a retired life, living in Aquitaine with a few chosen companions. He was an intimate friend of Paulinus, Bishop of Nola. He wrote an abridgment of sacred history from the creation to the end of the third century, a life of St. Martin of Tours, and a dialogue on the Egyptian hermits.

Sewell, WILLIAM, D.D., born in 1805, died in 1874, ordained in 1831. He was Senior Fellow of Exeter College, and one of the most distinguished members of the University during the Oxford Movement; and was the founder of Radley and of St. Columba's. Among his numerous works may be mentioned:—Hora Philologica, or Conjectures on the Structure of the Greek Language; Christian Morals; an Introduction to the Dialogues of Plato; The Nation, the Church, and the University of Oxford; The Character of Pilate and the Spirit of the Age; The Servant of Christ; and numbers of sermons, addresses, and letters.

Sexagesima. [QUINQUAGESIMA.]

Shaftesbury, ANTHONY COOPER, 3RD EARL OF [b. 1671, d. 1713].—A Deist. He says of himself that John Locke had the entire direction of his education. He was sent to Winchester; in 1693 he began his Parliamentary career, in which he had some success; but after Anne's accession, he devoted himself to literary pursuits. In 1708 he published his Letter on Enthusiasm; in 1709 Moralists, a Philosophical Rhapsody, and Sensus Communis, or Essays on Wit and Humour; in 1710 Soliloquy, or Advice to an Author. His writings, in spite of their sceptical tendency, were admired, and he still has a great name in the history of English philosophy and literature. In 1711 appeared Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times; in this work he covertly attacks Christianity, saying that its only purpose was to advance morality.

Shaftesbury, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, 7TH EARL OF, the descendant of a long line of famous men, was born in Dorsetshire in 1801; died, 1885. He was educated at Harrow, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he gained a first-class in the classical schools, and graduated in 1822. In 1826 he was elected member for Woodstock, and in Parliament specially devoted himself to the question of Indian administration. But soon the state of the lower classes at home came under his notice, and he began that work to which he afterwards devoted his life, and which has made his name so universally famous—that of improving the condition of the poor. His first effort in this direction was the passing of the Factory Act, which he effected after much trouble and opposition on the part of the Commons. But the chief of all his good works, and the one with which his name was most nearly associated, was the institution of the Ragged Schools. He was led to this work by discovering the state of utter ignorance which existed amongst the lower classes. He was untiring in his efforts, and brought several measures before the Lower House; but in 1852, on the death of his father, he succeeded to the peerage, and was able to draw the attention of the House of Lords to some of his schemes. He went on working to the end of his life, and saw many of his plans approach conclusion some time before his death, and so was able to spend the last years of his life in comparative retirement. His sympathies were entirely with the "Evangelical party" in the Church, and he was President of the Protestant Alliance, the Bible Society, the Pastoral Aid Society, and the Society for the Conversion of the Jews. He took a warm interest in the employment of youths as shoe-blacks. In 1884 he was presented with the freedom of the City of London, and in May of the following year received an address from the members of the Ragged Schools as a token of their gratitude. It was proposed that he should be interred in Westminster Abbey, but he had expressed the wish before he died to be buried near his wife at his native home in Dorsetshire.

Shakers.—By having some similarity with the Quakers the Shakers are supposed to be a branch of that sect. Their founder was Anne Lee, who left England on account of persecution, and went to New York in 1774, where she soon attracted a good following. She rose to importance from her receiving a supposed revelation in 1770 testifying against the carnal nature of the flesh as the root of human depravity. She was called the "Elect Lady" or "Mother Anne," and her followers asserted that she was the mother of all the Elect, and that no blessing could descend to any person but by and through her. She died in 1874, but the society still continued to exist. The name "Shakers" was given them on account of the extraordinary contortions into which they threw their bodies all through the performance of their services. These exercises consist of jumping, dancing, and singing, clapping of hands, whirling round and round, which resulted in fits of shaking similar to ague. They lay claim to extraordinary spiritual gifts, besides the gift of tongues and of prophecy. They discard marriage, and declare that all external ordinances of religion ceased with the Apostles. Even now they exist in great numbers in the United States of America. Their chief settlement is in New Lebanon, but there are seventeen more in different parts of America. Some years ago a branch of these Shakers established themselves at Hordle in the New Forest, where they led a camp life under the guidance of their mother, Elizabeth Girling. She professed to be immortal, but in the year 1886 she died, to the dismay of her adherents. These have gradually dwindled down to an insignificant number; they suffered great privation, and would have been starved had not the neighbouring clergy and other charitable people ministered to their necessities. On the death of Mrs. Girling the society was broken up.

Shamrock.—The national badge of Ireland. Tradition says that it was adopted as such after the coming of St. Patrick to convert the Irish, A.D. 433: for in order to explain the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, he showed them a shamrock-leaf, saying, "Is it not as possible for the Godhead to comprise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as for these three leaves to grow upon a single stalk and to be three in one?" The Irish were at once convinced by his argument, and were converted to Christianity, in memory of which they have always regarded the shamrock as their national emblem.

Sharp, GRANVILLE, a great opponent of negro slavery, was born at Durham, where his father was prebendary, in 1734; died in London, 1813. He was educated for the bar, but never practised, and entered the Ordnance Office, which he left on account of the measures taken by the British Government at the outbreak of the American War. In 1769 he published a work on the Injustice and Dangerous Tendency of Tolerating Slavery in England, and soon after came forward on behalf of a negro named Somerset who had been brought to London, and on falling ill had been turned out of doors by his master. Sharp took care of him till he was cured, and then procured him a situation: but the master two years after captured and imprisoned him as a runaway slave. The case was tried, and referred to twelve judges, who finally declared, in May, 1772, that all slaves should be free on touching English soil. Sharp continued to write against slavery, and in 1787 was made chairman of the first meeting for the abolition of negro slavery.

Sharp, JAMES, Archbishop of St. Andrews, was born at Banff, 1618. He was educated at the University of Aberdeen, and in 1640 became Regent or Professor of Philosophy in St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews, which post he soon exchanged for that of minister of Crail. In 1656 he was sent to London with some of the Resolutions to plead their cause before the Protector. He had ingratiated himself with Cromwell, but seems also to have maintained a correspondence with Charles II., and was chosen to go to Breda, in May, 1660, to look after the interests of the Scotch Church. He returned to Scotland with a letter from the King declaring his resolution "to protect and preserve the government of the Church of Scotland, as it is settled by law, without violation." This was understood in the Presbyterian sense, but on the 1st of January, 1661, the Scottish Parliament passed an Act annulling all Acts passed since 1633, thus abolishing Presbyterianism, and restoring the Episcopal Church, which had been overthrown in 1638. In December of that year, Sharp was made Archbishop of St. Andrews. He became very unpopular on account of his unjust and tyrannical acts. He persecuted many of his former allies, and ill-treated all those who were opposed to Episcopacy. In 1664 he restored the Court of High Commission. He was assassinated on Magus Moor, near St. Andrews, May 3rd, 1679, by some fanatical Covenanters, who were watching for Carmichael, one of his inferiors.

Shastra or Shastras.—The name given to the sacred books of the Hindus, which contain their law both on civil and religious subjects. It consists of four parts, all of which were written at different times, in the Sanskrit language, and are said to have been collected by Manu, the son of Brahma.

Sheldon, GILBERT, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Staunton, in Staffordshire, in 1598; died at Lambeth, 1677. In 1613 he entered Trinity College, Oxford; in 1622 was admitted Fellow of All Souls', and at the same time ordained and appointed Chaplain to Lord Coventry, who recommended him to Charles I., and from that time he received numerous preferments. In 1633 he was presented by the King to the livings of Hackney, and of Ickford in Buckinghamshire, while Laud gave him the rectory of Newington, in Oxfordshire. He became a D.D. in 1634, and the next year Warden of All Souls' College, Chaplain to the King, and Clerk of the Closet. The appointments of Master of the Savoy Hospital and Dean of Westminster would also have fallen to him had not the Civil War broken out. He adhered to the King throughout, and was witness of the vow which he made to the effect that if he were restored to his throne he would give back to the Church all the appropriations held by the Crown. By his zeal for the King, Sheldon gave great offence to the Parliamentarians, who ejected him from his fellowship and imprisoned him for six months, only releasing him on a promise that he would never come within five miles of Oxford, that he would not join the King in the Isle of Wight, and that he would appear before them within fourteen days whenever cited. He retired to Derbyshire, and there lived till the Restoration. He then became again Warden of All Souls', and also Dean of the Chapel Royal and Bishop of London, and Master of the Savoy, so that he presided over the Savoy Conference of 1661, concerning which he is much blamed for his unnecessary hostility towards the Puritans. In 1663 he succeeded Juxon as Archbishop of Canterbury. During the Great Plague he remained at Lambeth, and did much good by his charity. He became Chancellor of Oxford University in 1667, but resigned the post eighteen months after. During his later years he lived chiefly at Croydon, and was buried in Croydon Church.

Various opinions are held as to Dr. Sheldon's character. Bishop Parker of Oxford describes him as a man of undoubted piety, with a great aversion to all pretences in others. Bishop Burnet, on the other hand, says that "he seemed not to have a deep sense of religion, if any at all; and spoke of it most commonly as of an engine of government or a matter of policy." The truth of this judgment seems to be shown by a curious passage in Pepys's Diary, which tells that one day visiting Lambeth, he was invited to hear a sermon, and went, expecting to listen to serious matter, instead of which the doors were closed, and a colonel imitated a Presbyterian in a most ludicrous manner, turning up his eyes and talking through his nose, and using Puritan phrases in abundance, till the room echoed with shrieks of laughter. Sheldon himself was one of the audience. The story is almost incredible, but Pepys was not given to invention of this sort, and we have proof herein that the prevailing irreligion of the times had infected Sheldon himself. He is said to have spent over sixty thousand pounds on public benefactions to learning and other pious uses. Thus he built the theatre at Oxford which bears his name, and cost him about £16,000, besides £2,000 to buy lands to keep it in repair. He also created the library at Lambeth, gave £2,000 towards the rebuilding of St. Paul's Cathedral, and considerable sums of money to several colleges both at Oxford and Cambridge.

The only publication left by the Archbishop was a sermon on Ps. xviii. 49, preached before the King at Whitehall on June 25th, 1660, being the day of solemn thanksgiving for the Restoration.

Sherborne, BISHOPRIC OF.—About the year 705, Sherborne in Dorsetshire was made into a bishopric, the diocese being taken out of that of Winchester. It comprised Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, and a great part of Wiltshire (sometimes called the Diocese of Wilton, or Wiltunensis); but in 1060 the two bishoprics were re-united, and their seat removed in 1076 to Old Sarum, and in 1220, by Bishop Richard Poore, to Salisbury.

An abbey was built here in 998 by Bishop Wulfstan on the site of an earlier cathedral.

church raised on the formation of the See by Ina, King of the West Saxons. This was burnt by Sweyn, and the present minster was commenced about 1060. In 1436 the nave, choir, and east end were destroyed by fire, and rebuilt in the Perpendicular style by Abbots Bradford and Saunders [1436-1475]. Between 1830 and 1858 it has undergone complete restoration. It is dedicated to St. Mary. Its first bishop, St. ALDHELM [q.v.] was by far the most noted. There were ten bishops of Ramsbury or Wilton, the last one, Herman, being consecrated in 1045, who in 1058 became Bishop also of Sherborne. Edward VI. founded a King's School at Sherborne in 1550, which has an endowment of £1,000 a year, and several exhibitions at Oxford and Cambridge.

Sherlock, RICHARD, born at Oxtou, Cheshire, 1613, studied first at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and afterwards at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took his M.A. degree in 1633. Having taken orders, he became minister of several adjacent parishes in Ireland, the united stipend of which did not exceed eighty pounds; and when the rebellion broke out he came to England, and became chaplain to a regiment of the King's forces at Nantwich, Cheshire. Subsequently he held chaplaincies at Oxford, first with the governor and then at New College, where he received the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in 1646. At the Restoration he was promoted to the rectory of Winwick, in Lancashire, and at the same time the University of Dublin made him a Doctor of Divinity. He died at Winwick, 1689. The greater number of his literary works were directed against the Quakers, who caused him much annoyance at some of the places under his charge. He wrote also books of devotion: The Practical Christian, and a paraphrase of the Church Catechism, called The Principles of the Holy Christian Religion.

Sherlock, THOMAS, Bishop of London, the son of Dr. William Sherlock, was born in London in 1678. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he graduated in 1701. Six years later his father, who was Master of the Temple, was appointed Dean of St. Paul's, and his son Thomas was given the Mastership. He was afterwards successively Bishop of Bangor, Salisbury, and London. He died in 1761. In politics he was a firm Tory and a strong upholder of the policy of Church and State. He was Hoadly's most formidable opponent in the BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY [q.v.]. He was much esteemed as a preacher in his day, and published a volume of sermons, some of which are very fine. Among his other literary works we may mention Use and Intent of Prophecy, and Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus.

Sherlock, WILLIAM, D.D., born in Southwark about 1641; died, 1707. He was educated at Cambridge, and, having held several London livings, was made Master of the Temple; this he held, with the exception of a few months at the time of the Revolution in 1689, till his death. His conduct at the time of the Revolution has been the subject of much criticism. At first, there is no doubt, he, with several other eminent Churchmen, refused to take the oath of allegiance to the new Government; but later, when he saw the new system working well and William apparently firmly settled, he changed his mind, took the oath, and was allowed to resume his duties at the Temple. Some writers say that he changed his mind on conscientious grounds, others that he did it solely with an eye to the main chance. There is this to be said for him, that he received nothing whatever at the hands of the new Government, but remained what he had been before—the Master of the Temple. He vindicated his conduct in a pamphlet entitled The Case of Allegiance to Sovereign Princes Stated. His fame as a writer was great, other works being: Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity and the Incarnation of the Son of God, and several treatises on Providence and Future Judgment.

Shiites.—One of the two chief divisions of Mahomedanism. Their religion has been the established one of Persia for the last four hundred years. After Mahommed they revere the memory of Ali, the fourth of the Caliphs who succeeded Mahommed. For this reason they are regarded as unorthodox by their rivals, the SONNITES [q.v.], who recognise the rights of the first three Caliphs. The Shiites hold Fatima, Mahommed's daughter and Ali's wife, in the greatest veneration, which is the only known instance of Mahommedans giving homage to a woman. When the Shiites are called to the mosques for prayer, they add to the usual declaration, "There is no God but God, and Mahomet is His prophet," the words, "and Ali is His vicar." They occasionally make pilgrimages to Mecca in common with other Moslems, though Bagdad is sanctioned for this purpose, and is often chosen as being a shorter and less laborious journey.

Shin-Shiu [or REFORMED BUDDHISM], literally the "True Sect," is said by its followers to have been established in China, A.D. 381, by Hwui-zuen, who introduced the worship of the fourth of the five Buddhas. This religion was founded on a Sanscrit writing, brought to China from India in the second century, which has lately been found in Japan. The members of the sect believe in salvation by faith in Buddha, and in ultimate bliss in the Paradise of the West. The Jōdō-shinshiu, or "True Sect of the Pure Land," derived from the above, was not established till 1173, by a priest named Hōnen; it was afterwards developed by his pupil. The sect is a curious mixture of doctrines, partly resembling Protestantism and partly Romanism; its chief temple and "archbishop" are at Kioto, and it numbers about ten million followers in Japan alone. Other Buddhists do not acknowledge Shin-Shiu, and in many Buddhist countries it is unknown. [See BUDDHISM.]

Shinto, or Sintoism.—The most ancient form of religion held by the Japanese, which chiefly consisted in the worship of the Kamis or honoured dead. From these after many evolutions sprang Izanagi and Izanami, two of their chief gods, who created the earth. Another important object of their worship is the goddess Tensio-Dai-Dsin, from whom were descended the Dairi, the spiritual head of the Shintoists, and also their temporal head until the middle of the twelfth century. This dignitary was supposed to be invested with almost superhuman attributes, and to be visited by the gods once in every year. The temples were called Mias, and were perfectly plain, with neither images nor pictures. Their worship consisted of prayers and prostrations. They had frequent lustrations, and twice a year a general purification took place. In the ninth century a priest, Kukai, showed that Shintoism was very similar to Buddhism, which caused several divisions, as "Riobu," a mixture of Shinto and Buddhism; Yuiitsu, Buddhism with a Shinto basis; Deguchi, Shinto explained by the Chinese Book of Changes; and Suiga, a mixture of Deguchi and the tenets of Chiu-hi. Divided into these different religions, Shinto gradually disappeared. In the eighteenth century, a school of writers deciphered and edited the Shinto scriptures, which caused the revival of Sintoism for a short time; but, after the restoration of the monarchy in Tokio, it was abolished. It is still, however, a living power among millions of the Japanese.

Shortened Form of Service.—Under the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, 1872, it is allowable in Church of England services to substitute a shortened form for that prescribed for morning and evening service, except on Sundays, Christmas Day, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, and Ascension Day. Such shortened form omits the exhortation, and all the prayers between the third Collect and the Prayer of St. Chrysostom, uses the Lord's Prayer once instead of twice, one or two lessons at the discretion of the minister, and one Canticle and Psalm only.

Shrine.—A term derived from the Latin scrinium, applied either to a tomb or to a movable repository of relics. We sometimes find the tomb of a man, much held in honour after his death, called a shrine, although he may not have been regularly canonised. It was the custom for pilgrims to come long distances to visit the shrine of some popular saint, and to make offerings of all sorts of valuable jewellery, etc.—as, for example, the shrine of St. Thomas at Canterbury. The shrines in England were nearly all despoiled and destroyed at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII.

Shroud, FESTIVAL OF THE HOLY, held by the Roman Catholics on the Friday after the second Sunday in Lent, in memory of the shroud in which our Lord was wrapped for His burial. There are several churches on the Continent dedicated to it, and at the shrines erected to its memory many wonderful miracles are said to be wrought. Indulgences were formerly offered to those that visited the shrine of the shroud at Besançon on certain days of the year, and crowds of pilgrims used to flock thither.

Shrove Tuesday [SHRIVE].—The day before Ash Wednesday, so called from the Anglo-Saxon shrive or shrove. This word, Anglo-Saxon in form [scrifan], is really a Latin word Anglicised, scribere, "to write," "to draw up a law," and hence "to impose a penance." It was in ancient times the custom to confess on the day before Lent, so as to qualify to begin the Fast by receiving the Communion.

Shuckford, SAMUEL [d. 1754], Curate of Shelton, in Norfolk, Prebendary of Canterbury, and Rector of All Hallows, Lombard Street, London, was the author of The Sacred and Profane History of the World connected from the Creation of the World to the Dissolution of the Assyrian Empire at the Death of Sardanapalus, and to the Declension of the Kingdoms of Judah and Israel under the Reigns of Ahas and Pekah. This was intended as a continuation of Prideaux's work, but was never completed.

Sibylline Books.—In the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, so goes the legend, a certain Sibyl came to Rome, bringing with her nine books, which she avowed to be of priceless value, but which she nevertheless offered to the king for a large sum of money. He carelessly refused, whereupon she burned three of them, and offered him the remaining six for the same sum. On his again refusing she burned three more, and by this time her strange conduct had caused so much stir in the city that the king, more out of curiosity than anything else, bought the three that were left. The original owner immediately vanished, telling the king before she left that the books contained many prophecies concerning the future history of Rome. He ordered that they should be safely put away, and appointed two men of patrician families as custodians. These men had no other office, and were at the same time exempt from all civil authority. The books were destroyed in 82 B.C., when the Capitol was burned, but messengers were sent some years after to all parts of the known world to make a collection of oracles which could take their place. These were destroyed by Honorius in 399 A.D.

Sidesmen.—In ancient episcopal synods the bishops were wont to summon laymen, two or more, according to the size of the parishes, who should appear at the synod and give an account of their respective parishes, of the conduct of both clergy and people, and of any needs or any wrongs which they had observed. These were called testes synodales, or popularly synodmen, and this became softened into sidesmen. In their origin, therefore, they are the same as churchwardens. They were also sometimes called "questioners," as making quest or inquiry concerning offences. They became in time standing officers in many places, especially in large parishes, and are chosen, in accordance with Canon 90, at the Easter Vestry.

Siena, COUNCIL OF.—At the dissolution of the Council of Constance it was resolved that as the question of the reformation of the Church had been so slightly dealt with, another Council should meet in Pavia in five years' time. When the time came [1452], the plague was raging there so fiercely that the Pope ordered the members to remove to Siena. By this means, as Siena was near Rome, he was able to exercise more influence over the arrangements of the Council. The teaching of Wiclif and Huss was condemned, but after that, the various members began to quarrel, and the Papal party objected to the proposals of the representatives of the nations. Then came the question of fixing the place for the next Council, and after many disputes and intrigues Basle was decided upon, and on Feb. 14th, 1454, the Council was dissolved, having effected absolutely nothing.

Simeon, CHARLES.—One of the chief party leaders of this century in the Church of England [1754-1836]. He was Incumbent of Trinity Church, Cambridge, for more than fifty years, and by the great influence of his personal piety, and his zeal and vigour as a preacher, he became the chief representative of the Low Church party, into the teaching of which he infused a larger element of Calvinism than it had hitherto possessed. His power with the undergraduates of the University was very great. "Charles Simeon's preaching," writes Dr. Stoughton, from his own pleasant recollections, "was not penetrating like dew, but coming down like hailstones and coals of fire. He spoke as one who had a burden from the Lord to deliver—as one who, like Paul, felt 'Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel.'" Simeon's Horæ Homileticæ is a work containing 2,536 sermon outlines upon the entire Scriptures, and of real value, though critical ability is not to be looked for. In his zeal for Calvinising the Church he founded a scheme for buying up advowsons, and the Clergy List gives eighty livings as in the gift of the Simeon Trustees.

Simeon Stylites [from stylos, "a pillar"], the originator of the custom of doing penance by living on a pillar, was born probably about 390 at Sisan, between Antioch and Cilicia. He was brought up by Christian parents, and when fifteen years old was induced to enter a monastery near his home, where he stayed two years, and then went to one at the foot of Mount Coryphus, where he spent ten years. But the austerities were not great enough for him, and he then lived as a hermit in a little house under the peak of the mountain Telanassus. Here he used to fast forty days at a time, in imitation of Moses and Elias. After three years he took possession of the peak, had a wall built round him, and fastened one end of a chain twenty cubits long to a great stone, and the other to his right foot, so that he could not if he wished leave his bounds. His fame spread over all the country, and the sick and palsied came from far and wide—even, it is said—from Spain, Britain, and Gaul, to be healed. At last, wishing to escape from them, he ordered a pillar six cubits high to be built, which was afterwards increased to twelve, twenty-two, and thirty-six. Here he lived for forty or fifty years, spending his time, as is related by his disciple Anthony, in working miracles, teaching the people, meditating, and praying. He died in 460. He was buried with great pomp at Antioch.

There were two other pillar saints of the name of Simeon, one being called Fulminatus from having been killed by lightning; he lived in the twelfth century, and seems to have been one of the last to adopt the practice.

Simon Magus.—In the second century the Christian Church was assailed by what proved a long and lasting trouble—viz. the appearance of heresy respecting the Person and Nature of Christ. That it had begun when St. John wrote, may be seen by his denunciations of those who dispute the doctrine of Christ [2 John 10]. Simon Magus has been by some declared to be the first of the Gnostics, and to have asserted that he was an Æon, or emanation from God. He was by birth a Samaritan, and tradition identifies him with the man mentioned in Acts viii. 9. If we may trust the somewhat uncertain traditions of him, he went to Egypt, and there learned all sorts of heathen philosophy and magic. On his return he practised his acquired arts, announcing that they were the sure signs of his Divine authority. He seems to have had many followers, among whom may be mentioned Menander and Dositheus, and a small sect declared themselves his followers for some years. Tradition says that he attempted to fly from the top of the Capitol, intending to represent the return of our Lord in glory, and died from the effect of the fall.

Simon's, St., AND ST. JUDE'S DAY.—Kept by the Church on Oct. 28th. Very little is said of these saints in the Gospels, but where they are mentioned they are always together, and were most likely brothers. It is not quite easy to identify them. With regard to St. Simon, some writers have contested that there were two Apostles with the name Simon, because in St. Matthew he is called Canaanite and in St. Luke, Zelotes. But when it is realised that Zelotes is nothing but the Greek equivalent of Canaanite, which was the name given to the strictest sect of the Pharisees, it is easy to identify them as the same. He was some relation to our Lord—most likely His half-brother. St. Jude has also two surnames, Thaddeus and Lebbeus. Thaddeus is generally supposed to be a name of endearment for Judas, and Lebbeus is a Hebrew word meaning heart; but the derivation of both the words, and the reason they were applied to St. Jude, is quite uncertain. The collect for the day does not speak of them and their work in particular, but of "the blessed saints" in general.

Simonians, St. [SOCIALISM.]

Simony originally meant the sin of buying and selling spiritual gifts, which was so called from Simon Magus, who attempted to buy the gift of the Holy Spirit. In the early Church the practice of buying ordination was severely censured; both ordained and ordainer were subject to total excommunication from the Church. Under this head were also considered the sins of exacting a reward for administering baptism or the Holy Communion, Confirmation, or any other similar rite. Afterwards two other kinds of simony were recognised, viz. [1] purchasing spiritual preferments, and [2] usurpation of holy offices. In the first three centuries there was no law against the former, as the stipends for offices were small, and to hold them was attended by great danger of persecution; but afterwards a bishopric was much sought after, and some tried to gain one by bribing the stewards, etc. This was condemned by the Council of Chalcedon; and by the laws of Justinian every elector had to take an oath that he chose the elected, not from any gift or promise, but because he believed he was fit for the position. Under usurpation of holy offices is included the investing of any man in an office or preferment to which he had no legal title, or the intruding into any place which was already filled. Thus several heretical bishops who took possession of sees already occupied by orthodox men were accused of simony. Also it was forbidden for bishops to move arbitrarily from one see to another without the consent of the Provincial Council.

Sin.—The commonest word for sin in the Greek Testament is hamartia, and it has the same meaning as the commonest word in the Old Testament. [See Gesenius's Heb. Lex., s.v. chata.] That meaning is strictly "a missing of the mark," and so "a failure," "a sin." The other New Testament word, paraploima, "transgression," is derived from a word signifying, "to fall down beside." Scripture gives no definition of sin, but the whole tenor of it indicates that this consists in failure to regard and do the will of God. It is selfishness, which is the setting up of the individual will against that of the Divine Creator and King. That heavenly will is righteous dealing, and love, and forbearance, and hope. "This is the will of God, even your sanctification," writes the inspired Apostle [1 Thess. iv. 3]. Every act of self-sacrifice and kindness, being in unison with that will, is blessed—it is part of a higher life, of a more perfect existence: it is a striving after the true aim of life, after the ideal of perfect existence—after God. And it follows that the contrary to this, that which thwarts the will of God, is evil, and accursed. For it is not only harmful in itself, but it is sinful, guilty, because it bears moral responsibility. Man, we are told, was made in the image of God. He is not senseless and stupid. He is conscious of a free-will; knowing good and evil, he has the choice between them. Hence he is distinguished from the brutes, that he is not limited in existence by a monotonous law, like the growth of a plant; he can choose for himself. And sin is the rebellious choice, the choice of that which the Creator forbids, the choice of an atmosphere tainted and impure when the free air of heaven is offered, the choice of sloth and impotence in place of life and strength and energy. The origin of sin is confessedly a mystery, but so is the origin of everything which exists. "There is nothing," writes Coleridge, "of which the ultimate ground is not mystery." Mystery as it is, it is no less confessedly a fact. That all opposition to God's will is evil must be clear at once, but the heinousness of the guilt will vary according to circumstances. The conscience of mankind, and the voice of Scripture both bear witness to this. Thus man is, according to Scripture, infected with ORIGINAL SIN [q.v.]. The Scripture also declares that all men commit actual sin, and the conscience bears witness to the fact. [For the distinction made by the Roman Catholic Church between Mortal and Venial Sin see MORTAL SIN.]

Singing.—An ordinance of Divine Worship, used to show forth the praise of God. In all times this has been a branch of worship, among heathens as well as Christians. It was practised by God's people before the giving of the law, and is enjoined both by ceremonial law and by the Apostles under the Christian dispensation. The public worship of the primitive Christians consisted mainly in Psalm-singing, which developed to a great extent when the persecutions ceased. The people met before dawn for the purpose of singing hymns; and St. Basil says that it was also customary to sing hymns in private houses. St. Augustine considered that the music used in his time for Church services was too secular, and recommended the practice of having the Psalms recited with very slight intonations, consisting only of a few notes.

In the Anglican rubric reference is made to "Quires and places where they sing," and the rubric before the Canticles, Psalms, Creeds and Litany, directs them to be "sung or said." At the present time in most churches where there is a regular choir, the Canticles and Psalms are sung, and in many the Cathedral plan is followed of "Choral Service." This proceeds on the interpretation of the two words, that "sung" means with musical inflections and "said" either in the manner of reading or in monotone.

Sion College was founded with some money left for the purpose by Dr. Thomas White, in 1630. There had previously been, in the street known as "London Wall," a religious house founded in the fourteenth century, a priory for the reception of the blind. The ground was, therefore, sacred to charity, and White, who was rector of St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, sought to restore it to a religious use. His plan was to make a college of which all vicars and incumbents in the City should be Fellows. There is an excellent library attached, containing more than 50,000 volumes, founded by one of Dr. White's executors, Dr. John Simpson, Rector of St. Olave's, Hart Street, and containing among other scarce works the Jesuit library seized in 1679. All the clergy of London are privileged to use this library, and they may borrow books on the payment of an annual subscription which for incumbents is one guinea, for curates half. Under the copyright of Queen Anne a copy of all books entered at Stationers' Hall was sent to the library; but this was put a stop to in 1836 by an Act of Parliament, the sum of £363 15s. 2d. being ordered to be paid annually as compensation, the money being applied exclusively to the purchase of books. The Bishop of London has been the Visitor of the College ever since its foundation, and the government of the whole body is carried on by the president, two deans, and four assistants, all of whom are elected by the Fellows to hold office for a year. In Defoe's time the College included almshouses for ten men and ten women. In 1884 the house in London Wall was sold, and the ground built over, and in 1886 a handsome building was erected on the Thames Embankment.

Sion, NOTRE DAME DE.—This is an Order which specially devotes itself to the bringing up of Jewish children in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church. The founder was M. Alphonse Ratisbonne, a Jew, who declares that he had always felt a strong antipathy to the teaching of Christianity until one day in 1842, while standing in a church at Rome, he saw a vision of the Virgin. He was so much impressed, that he was induced to study the question closely, and very soon after was baptised. His brother had previously been converted, and the two together determined to found an Order for the conversion of the Jews. This they did in Paris, and branches were soon established not only in France, but in England and the East, one standing in the Via Dolorosa at Jerusalem.

Si quis.—A name given to the notice appointed to be read in a parish church when any parishioner intends entering holy orders. The form of the notice, after the name and degree of the candidate have been given, is as follows:—"If any person (si quis) knows any just cause or impediment, for which the said M. N. should not be admitted into holy orders, he is now to declare the same, or to signify the same by letter forthwith to the Lord Bishop of——"

Sirmond, JACQUES, was born at Riom in Auvergne, in 1559; died at Paris, 1651. He studied at the Jesuit College at Billom, and in 1567 joined the Order. He was Professor of Rhetoric at Paris in 1590, then went to Rome to become Secretary to Acquaviva, General of the Jesuits. He remained there, studying the manuscripts in the Vatican library, until 1608, when he returned to Paris, and became Rector of the College there in 1617, and Confessor to Louis XIII. in 1637.

Sirmond visited the libraries and archives of the convents, and saved many valuable manuscripts, which he published. He edited the Opusculæ of Geoffrey, Abbot of Vendôme, and the works of Enodius, Bishop of Pavia; of Apollonius Sidonius; of Eugenius, Bishop of Toledo; the chronicles of Solatius and Marcellinus; the collections of Anastasius the Librarian; the Capitularies of Charles the Bald and his successors; the works of Theodulph, Bishop of Orleans; also Flodoard's Histoire de Rheims, the Letters of Peter de Celles, and the works of Paschasius Radbertus, of Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, and of Theodoret. He published also an account of the Councils of France.

Sisterhoods.—These Orders, which of late years have been revived in the English Church, are of very early origin. Sisters must not be confused with DEACONESSSES [q.v.], the difference being that sisters were always members of a body, each being responsible to their superior; whereas deaconesses were generally free, devoting their lives to the care of the poor and the sick entirely in their own way, not under vows. St. Jerome, in his writings, speaks of a girl and her mother who lived in a convent with a few other women, spending their time in good works; and we find references to them in both St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine. All through the history of these Orders we find again and again their apparent dislike to solitude. The first female hermit, Syncletica, was followed into the desert by several of her former companions, and together they made a small colony. At first the history of the female Orders is identical with that of the male, and it seemed as though one would be but an imitation of the other. But in the eleventh century female monachism made a great advance. This was caused to a great extent by the Crusades, which united all Christian nations in one cause against the Mahomedan. Several of the highborn ladies, who had lost their fathers, brothers, or husbands in the wars, wished to retire from the world till quieter times. They did not feel inclined to take the vows necessary for the cloister life, and so we find them establishing themselves together in communities, not bound by any vows, nor promising to renounce intercourse with the world, but simply living together a life of meditation and prayer, and helping their poorer neighbours in such ways as they could. These were called Beguines [from the Teutonic word beg, "to pray"]. These communities were quickly established in different countries, notably in Germany, Belgium, and Italy; two still survive in the towns of Ghent and Bruges. In course of time the Beguinages extended their sphere of work, and founded hospitals, penitentiaries, and schools. For the last four centuries the education of girls of all classes has been largely connected with sisterhoods. In the eleventh century these sisters were by far the best educated of any of their sex, many of them being able to read Virgil and Terence in the original. Large bodies of sisters were organised in connection with the Franciscan and Dominican Orders, who were known by the name of the "Grey Sisters;" an attempt was also made to establish an Order of Jesuitesses, but without success. All this time female education had been their first care, but at the beginning of the seventeenth century a movement was made in France to provide for the relief of the suffering poor, and in course of time the Sisters of Charity were organised. They had no property, but were maintained and provided for by the community. They passed through a period of probation, and were then called upon to take certain vows, which had to be renewed every year, they being at liberty to leave the institution when they liked. The movement found great favour both in France and the Netherlands, and several public institutions in Paris were given into their charge. A similar society, called the Congregation of St. Joseph, was founded some years later. Since that time sisterhoods have increased wonderfully, nearly all having for their object the reformation of fallen women, of which the Daughters of the Good Shepherd may be given as an example. From the time of the Reformation, for many years, no thought appears to have been taken of sisterhoods in the Church of England, and when, in the Church Revival of the present century, the establishment of sisterhoods was first taken in hand, the movement was regarded with much suspicion and dislike. The first sisterhood in connection with the Church of England was founded by Miss Sellon in 1848, for the benefit of the poor of Plymouth. A great opposition was raised, but Bishop Philpotts of Exeter bravely stood by her, and her success among the rough sailors was so wonderful and unmistakable, that she may be said to have secured the success of the movement, and to have disarmed opposition. In the following year the Sisterhood of St. John, at Clewer [MONSELL, HARRIST], was established, the members of which devote themselves entirely to fallen women, and since then several others have arisen in different parts of England, such as the Good Samaritans, of which Sister Dora was, for a time, a member. The sisters generally wear a distinguishing dress, but this is not a universal rule; and they are not obliged to take vows, though it is understood that they mean to devote themselves heart and soul to the work. [NUNS.]

Six Articles, THE, passed June 28th. 1539, by the English Parliament; a movement on the part of Henry VIII. and the Roman Catholics to restore Romanism in place of the doctrines of the Reformation. The Six Articles were popularly known as the "Bloody Statute," or "The Whip with Six Strings." They required the people's acquiescence in [1] the doctrine of Transubstantiation; [2] the use of private masses; [3] auricular confession; [4] the celibacy of the clergy; [5] vows of chastity; and [6] communion in one kind only.

Six Points. [RITUALISM.]

Sixtus, Sr.—St. Sixtus was a pupil of Pope Stephen, who was the first to suffer under the persecution of the Emperor Valerian, in the year 257. Three weeks after Stephen's death Sixtus was chosen Pope in his place, and held that dignity for about a year. His parents were Grecian, but he had been brought up in Rome, and was greatly attached to the Church in that city, where he had served the office of deacon. He carried on with great ability the controversy on the question of the validity of Baptism [See STEPHEN, POPE AND MARTYR], which had begun under the rule of his master. In the year 258 Valerian was engaged in wars with Persia, and left the government of Rome entirely in the hands of Marcian, a bitter enemy to the Church. He obtained from the Emperor an order for the execution of the whole clergy of Rome, and, as was natural, the Pope was the first to suffer. He was accompanied to the place of execution by Lawrence, his favourite pupil, whom he had recently ordained deacon. [LAWRENCE, Sr.]. St. Ambrose relates the following conversation as having taken place just before the execution. "Father," said Lawrence, "whither are you going without your son? You did not use to sacrifice without your deacon, why then am I now neglected? what have I done to deserve this hard treatment? Oh, take me with you, and see whether you have committed the Blood of Our Lord to a person unworthy of that honour. Allow me a share in your death, whom you have admitted to a share in the holy ministry." And St. Sixtus assured him that he did not leave him, for he would follow in three days. He was martyred Aug. 6th, 258. St. Cyprian also mentions this execution in a letter written to a bishop about that time, and adds that a man named Quartus, who was evidently famous among the Christians of that period, was beheaded with him.

Sixtus, POPES. [POPES.]

Skeleton Army.—A name given to the rough element of the population who made it their business to attack the Salvation Army by throwing missiles and otherwise interfering with them. They were more active in the earlier career of the latter, and more than once came into desperate collision with them, notably at Worthing, where damage was done both to persons and property.

Slavery.—It has been a matter of cavil by unbelievers that Christ gave no commands on the subject of slavery, that neither He nor His immediate successors, the Apostles, should have prohibited it, and that St. Paul, by sending back Onesimus to Philemon, and by exhorting slaves to obedience, appears to countenance it. But at the time in which the Apostles lived, slavery was an organised system, and never worse in its conditions than at that time, and it was clear that its abolition could only be a matter of progressive growth or change, to be wrought by the mutual love which would spring up in the followers of Christ. His Kingdom was not of this world, and He did not use the world's weapons, but aimed to establish His Kingdom in each individual heart. Within the Church there was no distinction between the bond and free; all alike partook of its services, and it was felt that Christ's doctrines would ultimately produce freedom and equality outside the Church. St. Paul, while he preached equality in the sight of God, yet commanded the slaves to be obedient to their masters; he taught that the only true slavery was the slavery of sin. The Church in very early times included in her liturgy a prayer for them "that suffer in bitter bondage." As the Gospel spread, we hear of many masters, who on their conversion brought their slaves to be baptised, by which act they became free men. Mr. C. L. Brace, in his Gesta Christi (page 227), tells us of the many acts which were passed in early Christian times favourable to slaves, and mentions the fact that thirty-seven Church Councils passed laws concerning them. In the fourth century, in the reign of Constantine, the Christian Church was joined to the State, and laws were passed to facilitate the manumission of slaves. Under Justinian the great moral power of Christianity is most felt in the Roman laws on slavery. In the ninth century we meet with the first formal mention of a command from the Church against slavery in the words of St. Theodore of Stude. All who study the various laws about slavery from the time of Constantine to the tenth century must see that they sprang from Christian principle. The work was indeed a very gradual one, and slavery existed in the East up to the fourteenth, and in Greece to the fifteenth century. In the Middle Ages slavery was changed into the milder form of serfage. After slavery disappeared in Europe, it was largely introduced into America by the importation of the heathen negroes from Africa, and it was not till the close of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century that a steady opposition was made to it, which resulted in its complete abolition in America and our colonies. [CLARKSON; WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM.]

Smith, GEORGE [b. 1828, d. 1876].—An eminent Biblical explorer. He first earned his livelihood by steel engraving, but having taught himself the Eastern languages, and studied the Ninevite sculptures in the British Museum, he became known as a great Assyrian scholar, and was in 1873-4-5 sent out to Nineveh, where he gained much valuable knowledge as to cuneiform inscriptions, and made many most important discoveries of ancient documents, including the well-known Creation and Deluge narratives. He has written Assyrian Discoveries, History of Assyria from the Monuments, Chaldean Account of Genesis, and History of Sennacherib.

Smith, JOHN PYE, D.D., LL.D. [b. at Sheffield, 1774; d. at Guildford, 1851], Congregational minister, studied theology at Rotherham College, and became theological professor at Homerton College, which post he held from 1805 to 1850. He was the first Dissenter to study and propound German theology, and was looked upon by his brethren as unorthodox, because he followed the discoveries of modern science, and showed how they might be reconciled to Divine revelation. He wrote the Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, Four Discourses on the Sacrifice and Priesthood of Jesus Christ (a defence of Evangelicalism); Scripture and Geology, and the First Lines of Christian Theology.

Smith, SYDNEY, the famous English wit, was born at Woodford, in Essex, in 1771; died in London, 1845. He was educated at Winchester on the Wykeham foundation, and rose to be captain of the school; then at New College, Oxford; was ordained in 1794, and two years after became Curate of Nether Avon, near Amesbury, where he remained till 1798, and then accepted the office of tutor to the son of his squire, Mr. Hicks-Beach. In 1800 he became Incumbent of the Charlotte Episcopal church in Edinburgh. Here, together with Francis, afterwards Lord Jeffrey, and others, he started the Edinburgh Review, the first number of which was published in October, 1802. In 1804 he removed to London, where he became popular as a preacher, and also as a wit. In 1806 he was made Rector of Foston-le-Clay, in Yorkshire, and eighteen years later the Duke of Devonshire presented him to the living of Londresborough. In 1828 Lord Lyndhurst made him a Prebendary of Bristol, and enabled him to exchange Foston for Combe Florey, in Somersetshire. In 1831 he became a Canon of St. Paul's.

His chief works were: Peter Plymley's Letters, written in 1807, to promote Catholic Emancipation; Speeches on the Catholic Claims and Reform Bill; The Ballot; several sermons and letters; and numerous contributions to the Edinburgh Review.

Socialism.—English Socialism is defined by its founder, Robert Owen [1771-1858], as the Science of Happiness. Its object is to promote the well-being of man in society first of all, his well-being as an individual necessarily following. Socialism is undeveloped Positivism or Comtism [Positivism], and in this it is now for the most part merged.

On its religious side, Socialism is a form of Pantheism, and God or Nature is resolved into a "mysterious power which permeates every particle of the elements which compose the universe, and these elements possess qualities which are unchangeable, and operate according to fixed laws, which are called the laws of Nature."

By this power man has been made what he is, and he must be, in the future, what that power shall make him to become. Man is, therefore, entirely dependent on this power for all his faculties, and all that he possesses. Man is thus non-responsible, except in so far as he is necessarily amenable to the natural consequences of his actions. To reward and punish him by artificial means is irrational. Such being man, to ensure the happiness of the human race permanently, all that is required is that society shall create new conditions for the purpose of forming from birth a good, useful, and superior character for all, according to their natural qualities or organisations. To bring about these desirable ends, it is necessary first of all to abandon the irrational conditions of society, "all past religious governments, men-made laws, artificial marriages, modes of producing and distributing wealth, of buying cheap and selling dear, and all other past and existing institutions," and to enter upon a new life, surrounded by new conditions, in which the spirit of universal charity and love will govern the population of the earth, as one enlightened and affectionate family, upon a system of perfect equality, according to age, of education and condition [condensed from "Socialism," by Robert Owen, in Religions of the World]. Distinctions of rank and possession of wealth by an individual would thus come to an end in the Socialist system. Owen tried to propagate Socialism, or, as he called it, "The Rational System of Society," by establishing co-operative workshops for the various industries in this country and in America, labour being regarded as a high duty for all. His followers were, as we have seen, practically Atheists, and they permitted as much freedom in the relations of the sexes as the laws of the country would not actually punish.

Communism is Socialism put into practice on its political side. The necessity for some strong, central, despotic power, capable of keeping order, is recognised, primogeniture is necessarily abolished, and all property and the earnings of industry are thrown into a common fund, from which distribution is made to each person according to merit. We have an example of Socialism carried on into Communism in the Commune of Paris after the Franco-German War in 1871. French Socialism or Communism was founded by Count St. Simon [1760-1825], a contemporary of Robert Owen, from whom the latter probably borrowed his ideas to a large extent. St. Simon regarded labour as the one sacred duty of life, the best labourer as the most religious man, and the highest in rank in the social scale. He also devised a system of worship, if so it can be called, in which social happiness and joy were to be put before the mind by means of poetry, music, painting, etc. Like Owen, he resolved God into Nature, and defined Him as "all that is."

Putting its practical Atheism aside, there is a vein of truth in Socialism. It is the clear duty of those who have the power to promote in every possible manner the welfare of the vast numbers of their fellow men whose lot is daily labour. Property not only confers rights upon those who possess it, but it also implies duties to be fulfilled by them. Each man, rich or poor, is, whether he likes it or not, in some way his brother's keeper. But these truths are after all but the constant teaching of Christianity. Christianity is the most perfect form of Socialism; the latter says that "if man is ever to be made rational and happy, he must enter upon a new life, in which the spirit of universal charity and love will govern," whilst the former teaches that "love is the fulfilling of the law," and what is more, gives men the power to practise it.

Societies.—The various religious societies may be thus classified:—[1] Bible Societies; [2] Foreign Missionary Societies; [3] Home Missions; [4] Societies for the spread of Christian Knowledge; [5] Charitable Societies; [6] Societies for Promoting Special Objects; [7] Church Societies; [8] Roman Catholic Societies.

BIBLE SOCIETIES.

The principal of these is the British and Foreign; an account of all of them will be found under the above head.

FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETIES.

Anglo-Continental Society.—Instituted in 1853. Its object is to deal with Christians outside of England by making the principles of the Church of England better known in European countries. This it does by means of circulating religious publications in various foreign languages.

Baptist Missionary Society.—Founded 1792. Income, £67,828. Office: 19, Castle Street, Holborn.

China Inland Missions.—Office: 6, Rysland Road, Mildmay Park.

Christian Vernacular Education Society for India.—Founded 1858. Unsectarian. Income, £10,917. Office: Borough Road, London.

Church Missionary Society.—Founded 1799. Offices at Salisbury Square, Fleet Street. Income, £231,541. [An account of the formation and work of this Society is given under MISSIONS.] In connection with it was formed in 1880 the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society by a branch of the Indian Female Normal School and Instruction Society, who thought the work might be better done by an exclusively Church society. The object of the society is to make known the Gospel of Christ to the women of the East in accordance with the Protestant and Evangelical teachings of the Articles and formularies of the Church of England. They have thirty-eight stations in the dioceses of Calcutta, Madras, Lahore, Travancore, and the missionary districts of Tinnevely. The work is carried out by ladies, Bible-women, and greatly helped by medical missions. Its income exceeds £20,000.

Colonial Missionary Society.—Founded 1836, to promote Christianity amongst settlers in British colonies and dependencies. Congregationalist. Income in 1885, £3,054. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street.

Evangelical Continental Society.—Founded in 1845. Income, £2,557. Unsectarian. Office: 13, Bloomfield Street, London Wall. Its object is the spread of the Gospel among Roman Catholics and others in Europe by the agency of native pastors, evangelists, etc.

Freedmen's Missions Aid Society, for the Christian education of the African race everywhere. Unsectarian. Office: 18, Adam Street, Strand.

General Baptist Missionary Society.—Founded in 1816. Income, £7,695. Office: 60, Wilson Street, Derby.

Indian Female Normal School and Instruction Society, or Zenana Bible and Medical Mission.—Founded in 1852. Unsectarian. Office: 2, Adelphi Terrace, Strand. Income, £10,228.

London Missionary Society.—Founded in 1795. Unsectarian, but supported chiefly by the Congregationalists. Income, £101,104. Office: 14, Bloomfield Street, London Wall, E.C.

Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.—This is the oldest missionary society, founded in 1701. Offices at 19, Delahay Street, Westminster. The objects of this Society are:—[1] to receive, manage, and dispose of funds contributed for the religious instruction of our fellow-countrymen beyond the seas; [2] to provide a sufficient maintenance for an orthodox clergy to live among them; [3] to make other provision for the propagation of the Gospel in those parts. Sufficient account of this Society has already been given. [BIBLE SOCIETIES; MISSIONS; PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL, SOCIETY FOR.] In connection with the missions of this Society is the Ladies' Association for the Promotion of Female Education in India and other heathen Countries. The objects of this Association are to provide female teachers for the instruction of native women and children in the missions of the Society, to provide suitable clothing for the female mission schools, and a maintenance for boarders. Funds for this are raised in England by branch associations throughout the country. The first teacher was sent to Madagascar in 1867, and in 1868 two ladies joined the Delhi Zenana Mission, and one went to Burmah. In 1869 the work was extended to South Africa. Many Zenana missions have since been formed in India, and at present there are about 2,000 pupils under instruction in their schools, besides about 1,250 in other schools connected with the Ladies' Association.

The Colonial and Continental Church Society was established in 1835, for the purpose of sending clergymen, catechists, and schoolmasters, to the colonies of Great Britain, and to minister to British residents elsewhere. It was united in 1851 to the Newfoundland School Society, which had been formed in 1823. Its labours are carried on in thirty colonial dioceses of North America, India, Australia, and other parts of the world. Its income is £40,132. Office: 9, Serjeant's Inn, E.C.

The South American Missionary Society began as the "Patagonian Mission" in 1844, and was designated by its present title twenty years later. Its objects are [1] Missionary, among the Indian tribes of South America; [2] Ministerial, among the English-speaking sailors in the many harbours, and [3] Evangelistic, among the Spanish and Portuguese, by making known the principles of the Church of England, and distributing copies of the Scriptures in the native languages. Its offices are at 11, Serjeant's Inn, Fleet Street. Income, £15,000.

The Universities Missions.—A very successful mission is carried on in Central Africa by the Universities.

Oxford founded a Mission to Calcutta in 1880, on the principle of a community bound by no vows, but living together as a brotherhood, to work among the educated natives of Calcutta.

Cambridge in 1876 commenced a mission to Delhi, with the direct object of carrying on Evangelistic work.

Haileybury in 1873 started a fund for a mission in India, and supports the Haileybury Lecturer at St. John's College, Agra.

Turkish Mission Aid Society.—Founded in 1854, for evangelistic work in the East. Unsectarian. Office: 7, Adam Street, Adelphi, Strand.

United Methodists Free Churches Home and Foreign Missionary Society.—Founded in 1857. Income, £20,493. Office: 443, Glossop Street, Sheffield.

Wesleyan Missionary Society.—Founded in 1816. Income, £146,308. Office: Wesleyan Centenary Hall.

HOME MISSIONS.

Army Missionary Association.—Founded in 1883 for the purpose of aiding the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and promoting the interests of foreign missions generally in the army.

Church Pastoral Aid Society.—Founded 1836. For the evangelisation of the home population, by means of the parochial organisation of the Church of England; this is done by money grants for the support of additional clergy and lay agents in parishes where local means for the purpose are inadequate. Income, £54,335. Office: Temple Chambers, Falcon Court, Fleet Street.

Church Penitentiary Association.—Founded in 1851. This society helps in the foundation and maintenance of Houses of Mercy and Refuges throughout the kingdom; these houses are mostly managed by self-devoted women, who give their services to the work. Income, £13,000. Office: 14, York Buildings, Adelphi.

Congregational Church Aid and Home Missionary Society.—Founded in 1819. Income, £36,707. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street.

Country Towns Mission.—Established 1837. To promote evangelical religion without reference to denominational distinctions among the working population and poor. Unsectarian. Income in 1885, £2,882. Office: 18, New Bridge Street, London, E.C.

Diocesan London Home Mission.—Founded in 1857, to send the Gospel to the multitudes of London whom the existing parochial machinery could not reach. This society's work is carried on in parishes where subdivision is desirable, and the missionary clergy are appointed by the bishop to take entire charge of new districts, to initiate and develop work in them, to preach in temporary buildings, dwelling-houses, or the open air, and thus to meet the spiritual destitution until the districts become organised parishes with permanent churches. Income, £4,977. Office: 121, Pall Mall, S.W.

English Congregational Chapel - Building Society.—Founded 1853, to aid in building suitable churches and residences. Income in 1884, £10,144. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street. Congregational Chapel-Building Societies are in operation for the districts of Lancashire and Cheshire, Liverpool, Scotland, etc.

Girls' Friendly Society.—Founded in 1875. Its objects are to bind together in one society ladies as associates, and working girls and young women as members, for mutual help, sympathy, and prayer; to encourage purity of life, dutifulness to parents, faithfulness to employers, and thrift; to provide the privileges of the society for its members, wherever they may be, by giving them an introduction from one branch to another. Office: 3, Victoria Mansions, Westminster, S.W.

Guild of the Holy Standard.—A society formed in 1873. It aims at promoting a higher tone of life as regards courage, temperance, purity, and manliness, and at exercising an influence for good among young soldiers.

Church of England Book Society.—Established 1881, to promote the circulation of Christian literature. It assists the poorer clergy and candidates for ordination by making free grants of theological books. Office: 11, Adam Street, Strand.

Church of England Sunday School Institute.—Founded in 1843, for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of Sunday Schools in the Church of England, on a similar plan to that of the SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION [q.v.] The society gives free grants of Sunday school books and materials both at home and abroad, where necessary. Income, £14,853. Office: 13, Serjeant's Inn, Fleet Street.

Home and Colonial School Society.—Founded in 1836. Income, £10,400. Office: 348, Gray's Inn Road, W.C.

Monthly Tract Society.—Founded in 1837. Unsectarian. Income, £2,074. Office: 8, New Bridge Street, E.C.

National Society for the Education of the Poor.—Founded in 1811. The main object of the Society [as expressed in the words of its charter] is to secure that "the poorer members of the Church shall have their children daily instructed in suitable learning, works of industry, and the principles of the Christian religion according to the Established Church." Its operations have been mainly directed to two purposes: [1st] it has sought to increase the means of education by multiplying the number of properly-constructed school buildings; [2nd] it has constantly been engaged in promoting the most approved system of instruction by the establishment of institutions for training teachers, both male and female [St. Mark's College, Battersea College, and Whitelands], by the occasional inspection and organisation of schools, by supplying from its central depository reading sheets and lesson books, maps, apparatus, etc., and by collecting and diffusing the most reliable information with regard to any temporary or permanent assistance that may be obtained in the way of grants for educational objects. Office: Depository, Sanctuary, Westminster.

Pure Literature Society.—Founded in 1854 on non-sectarian principles. It is actively engaged in promoting the circulation of pure and interesting literature. Office: 11, Buckingham Street, Strand.

Ragged Church and Chapel Union.—Founded in 1853. Income, £500. Office: 4, Trafalgar Square.

Ragged School Union.—Founded in 1803. Unsectarian. Income, £6,081. Office: 13, Exeter Hall, Strand.

Religious Tract Society.—Founded in 1799 on the basis of united action on the part of Churchmen and Nonconformists in the production and circulation of Evangelical literature. The Committee has always been composed of an equal number of each body: both are represented on its editorial staff; one of its Honorary Secretaries is always a clergyman of the Church of England, the other a Nonconformist minister. It helps largely in missions to India, China, Japan, etc. Income, £30,000. Office: 56, Paternoster Row.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.—Founded in March, 1698, by four laymen (Lord Guildford, Sir H. Mackworth, Justice Hook, and Col. Colchester) and one clergyman, Dr. Thomas Bray, the great founder of parochial and clerical libraries, and the Commissary in Maryland of Compton, Bishop of London. These were soon joined by others—Bishop Burnet, Strype the antiquary, White of Selborne, John Evelyn, Samuel Wesley (father of John and Charles), Bishop Wilson of Sodor and Man, and Robert Nelson. Their objects were: [1] The education of the poor. The first year they founded two schools (St. Botolph, Aldgate, and St. Giles, Cripplegate), next year four more. In 1811 the National Society sprang from the midst of this Society, and the two have worked most harmoniously. That the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has not abandoned its educational work is shown in the fact that last year £527 were granted as prizes in Training Colleges, and in 1880 the Society founded St. Katherine's Training College at Tottenham. [2] Hospital work was also taken in hand, and is still carried on abroad. Three grants for medicines and surgical appliances were in 1885 sent to the Medical Mission established by the Bishop of Victoria in China. [3] Bibles and prayer books, defensive and practical theological treatises, works of Christian history, are all issued regularly in great abundance, and given gratuitously to many poor parishes. [4] Grants of books to sailors, soldiers, emigrants, are regularly made, and an Emigration Committee aims at giving help by introductions and advice; and [5] foreign missions are helped each month of the year. The total amount of the grants in money and books in the year ending March 31st, 1885, was £47,180. Office: Northumberland Avenue, W.C.

Sunday School Union.—Founded 1803, for the promotion and raising of the standard in Sunday-school work. This is very largely done by the drawing up for three months in advance of a series of simultaneous "International Lessons," so that all schools joining the Union may study the same lessons. For these careful expository lessons are published a week or two in advance by writers of acknowledged ability, separate and special expositions being provided for young and for infant classes. Other helps are published and supplied at the lowest possible prices, and public training lessons, lectures, and examinations are also carried on. Unsectarian, but chiefly Nonconformist. Partly trading as publishers; benevolent income, £4,776. Offices: 56, Old Bailey, E.C.

Wesleyan Education Committee.—Founded in 1840. Income, £8,000. Office: 130, Horseferry Road, Westminster.

CHARITABLE SOCIETIES.

Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society.—Founded 1807, for the relief in pensions or asylums of the aged Christian poor of any Protestant denomination. Income, £6,810. Office: 83, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

Asylum for Fatherless Children at Reedham.—Founded 1844. Undenominational. Income, £7,842. Office: 35, Finsbury Circus, E.C.

Asylum for Idiots, Earlswood.—Income, £30,000. Office: 36, King William Street, E.C.

Blind Pension Society of the United Kingdom.—Income, £2,936. Office: 235, Southwark Bridge Road.

Charity Organisation Society.—Object: To improve the poor, by propagating sound principles and views in regard to the administration of charity, by promoting the co-operation of charitable institutions for the furtherance of their common work; by finding work for the unemployed, by giving assistance where really needed, by repressing mendicity, and endeavouring to prevent abuse of charity, etc. etc. Office: 15, Buckingham Street, Strand.

Church of England Central Society for Providing Homes for Waifs and Strays.—The object of this society is to enable the clergy and laity of the Church of England to co-operate in rescuing from vicious surroundings the orphan and destitute children met with in every parish, and especially in large towns. The means adopted are:—[1] Boarding out in families; [2] establishing small homes; [3] emigration. Income, £7,650. Office: 32, Charing Cross.

Church of England Incumbents' Sustentation Fund.—Founded in 1873. Office: 4, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

Clergy Orphan Corporation.—Founded in 1749. For clothing, maintaining, and educating poor orphans of clergymen of the Established Church. There are schools for boys at Canterbury, and exhibitions at Keble College, Oxford, and schools for girls at St. John's Wood. Office: 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

Congregational Fund Board.—Established 1895, for the relief of poor ministers, of poor members of contributing churches, and the support of poor students. Income about £2,000. Office: 117, Camberwell Road, S.E.

Congregational Pastors' Retiring Fund, for aiding by pensions the retirement of ministers when aged or infirm. Capital invested, £120,000. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.

Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy.—Founded in 1678. During the time of the Great Rebellion—in the year 1650 or thereabouts—a body of gentlemen, sons of clergymen, associated themselves together for the relief of the numerous distressed ministers, who had been ejected from their preferments, and, with their families, were in sad straits. In the year 1655 the first festival was held at St. Paul's Cathedral, when the Rev. George Hall, afterwards Bishop of Chester, preached on behalf of the charity. The annual festival and sermon have continued from that day to this to be its most characteristic and profitable feature. The society received a Royal charter of incorporation in the year 1678, "His Majesty King Charles II. being moved thereto by the numerous cases of distress which existed among the clergy, their widows and children, the result of loyalty and fidelity during the trying periods of the Rebellion and Commonwealth." Its present objects are:—[1] To afford continuous or occasional assistance to clergymen of the Church of England when incapable of duty from mental or bodily infirmity, or burthened with large families, or in unavoidable necessity. [2] To grant pensions to widows of clergymen and their unmarried daughters. [3] To grant donations to clergy widows in temporary difficulty, and [4] to apprentice clergy-men's sons and daughters whether orphans or not, to schools, professions, and trades, or to help them in other ways on being placed out in the world. Office: 2, Bloomsbury Place, Bloomsbury Square, W.C.

Curates' Augmentation Fund.—Founded in 1866, to provide increased stipends for curates who have served without reproach for not less than fifteen years. Office: 2, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

Homes for Little Boys, at Farningham and Swanley. Undenominational. Income, £14,366. Office: Ludgate Circus, E.C.

Ministers' Associate Fund, for affording aid to Congregational ministers whose incomes are inadequate. Income for 1894, £1,200. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.

Ordination Candidates' Exhibition Fund.—Founded in 1873 towards assisting to procure a university training for those seeking holy orders. It is managed by a committee of the Additional Curates' Society. Office: Arundel House, Thames Embankment.

Orphan Working School.—Founded 1758, for orphans of both sexes and any denomination. Income about £16,000. Office: 73, Cheapside, E.C.

Poor Clergy Relief Corporation.—This society was established in 1856, and was originally founded to enable clergymen with limited means to make provision for themselves and their families. But the "committee soon discovered that the clergy, as a body, were much too poor to assure their lives, and that their incomes were often even too limited to provide the decent comforts of life." They accordingly devoted their entire attention to the immediate relief of temporary distress amongst the clergy, and have "now entirely abandoned the original plan of assisting them in the assurance of their lives." The clothing department is a prominent feature in the work of the Corporation, which sends out parcels of clothing [new and old], sheeting, blankets, mourning apparel, under-linen, flannel, boots, shoes, etc., to the value of £1,500 annually. As the "clergy, as well as their wives, make constant application for wearing apparel," some twenty-five working parties and an annual sale of work have been successfully organised. Pecuniary grants ranging from £5 to £25 are made to necessitous clergy, their widows, or orphans. It was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1867. The income is about £9,000 a year. Office: 36, Southampton Street, Strand.

St. Andrew's Home for Working Boys.—This society provides a comfortable dwelling for boys who may be friendless in London. Office: 43, Charing Cross.

St. John's Foundation School was instituted in 1852, for the free education of the sons of the poorer clergy in England and Wales. The School is at Leatherhead. Office: 14, St. Helen's Place, Bishopsgate Street.

SOCIETIES FOR PROMOTING SPECIAL OBJECTS.

Association for Promoting the Unity of Christendom. Office: 32, Charing Cross.

Evangelical Alliance.

Home Reunion Society.—Founded 1878. Office: 7, Whitehall.

[A notice of the objects of these three societies will be found in the article REUNION.]

Band of Hope Union.—Founded 1855, to promote total abstinence amongst the young. Income, £1,775. Office: 4, Ludgate Hill, E.C. The main work and expenditure of this society is done in the branches, of which there is one in the majority of Sunday schools throughout the country.

British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.—Founded for the total extinction of slavery and the enfranchisement of all captured or born as slaves. Income about £1,200. Office: 55, New Broad Street.

Church of England Purity Society.—Its objects are to promote [1] Purity among men. [2] A chivalrous respect for womanhood. [3] Preservation of the young from contamination. [4] Rescue work. [5] A higher tone of public opinion. The Society insists on the equal obligation of purity on both sexes. Office: Palace Chambers, 9, Bridge Street, Westminster. The White Cross Society has similar objects.

Church of England Temperance Society.—Founded in 1873 with the following objects:—[1] The promotion of habits of temperance. [2] The reformation of the intemperate. [3] To deal with the causes which lead to intemperance. Its spheres of work are very numerous. Office: Palace Chambers, Bridge Street, Westminster.

There are numerous other denominational Temperance Societies, but the above is believed to stand alone in having a department which only pledges the members to "Temperance" as distinct from "Total Abstinence."

Evangelical Protestant Deaconesses' Institution and Training Hospital.—For associating Christian women in nursing, training, etc. Income, £2,874. Office: The Green, Tottenham.

Funeral Reform Society.—Founded in 1879 to promote the decent interment of the dead, in a manner more in accordance with our belief in "the resurrection of the body" than the meaningless, extravagant, and unchristian-like customs which have latterly prevailed. Secretary: Rev. F. Lawrence, Westow Vicarage, York.

National Temperance League, founded for the universal promotion of total abstinence from all intoxicating beverages. Office: 337, Strand, W.C. There are almost countless minor societies.

Palestine Exploration Fund.—This society was formed in 1865 for the purpose of verifying the sites of the events in our Lord's life. Office: 1, Adam Street, Adelphi.

Peace Society [Society for Promoting Permanent and Universal Peace].—Founded 1816. Income, £3,475. Office: 47, New Broad Street, E.C.

Protestant Alliance.—Income, £1,138. Office: 9, Strand, W.C.

Society for Promoting the Due Observance of the Lord's Day.—Founded 1831. Income, £1,510. Office: 20, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

Society for the Suppression of the Opium Traffic.—Founded 1874. Office: Queen Anne's Mansions, St. James's Park, S.W.

Working-Men's Lord's Day Rest Association.—Founded 1857. Income, £1,329. Office: 13, Bedford Row, W.C.

CHURCH SOCIETIES.

Church Association.—This society was founded in 1865 [1] to maintain the principles and doctrines established at the English Reformation, and to preserve the purity of Protestant Worship in the Church of England; [2] to resist all innovations in the order of the service as prescribed by the joint authority of Church and State—and specially to prevent the idolatrous Adoration of the Elements in the Lord's Supper, contrary to the order of our Communion Service and the terms both of the Liturgy and Articles; [3] to resist all attempts to restore the use of the Confessional, and every exercise of priestly authority which was put down at the Reformation; [4] To effect these objects by means of lectures, and the use of the press, by appeals to the courts of law, in order to obtain a clear decision what the law is, and by appeals to Parliament to pass such measures as may be needed to restrain clergymen from violating the order of their Church and obtruding on their parishioners practice and doctrines repugnant to all formularies and Articles of our Reformed Church." Office: 14, Buckingham Street, Strand.

Church Defence Association.—Founded in 1860, to combat the Disestablishment controversy, to remove the ignorance which exists with regard to the history and status of the Church, to prove her claim to her endowments, and to show the use she has made of them for the welfare of the nation. The institution has a staff of lecturers thoroughly acquainted with the various aspects of the Disestablishment question, who systematically visit throughout the country, placing their services at the disposal of the clergy for meetings, discussions, etc. Income, £13,000. Office: 9, Bridge Street, Westminster.

Liberation Society [Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control].—Founded with the purpose of effecting:—" [1] The abrogation of all laws and usages which inflict disability, or confer privilege, on ecclesiastical grounds. [2] The discontinuance of all payments from public funds, and of all compulsory exactions, for religious purposes. [3] After an equitable satisfaction of existing interests, the application of the national property now held in trust by the Established Churches of England and Scotland to other and strictly national purposes; and, concurrently therewith, the liberation of those Churches from State control." Income, £8,541. Office: 2, Serjeant's Inn.

The English Church Union was formed in the year 1860 for the purpose of uniting clergy and laity in defence of the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and of the rights and liberties of her faithful children. The maintenance of such an organised body to undertake, under God, this work of defence, has been rendered necessary, in the opinion of its promoters, by the circumstances of the times: "by the laxity of professing Churchmen; by the desire for sweeping changes in the Prayer Book, and in the old-established order of the Church, as evidenced by the passing of the Public Worship Regulation Acts; and the introduction of the Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill; by the attacks on Eucharistic Doctrine, the Athanasian Creed, and the use of Confession; and by the attempts to alter the standard of ritual laid down in the Ornaments Rubric, and meanwhile to "put down" by penal proceedings, deprivation, imprisonment, confiscation of property, and even by mob violence those who conform to that rubric; and lastly, by the tendency among statesmen to apply the test of expediency or popularity to the rights and claims of the Church, and to the most sacred subjects of religious truth." Those only who are Communicants of the Church of England, or of Churches in communion with her, may be elected and enrolled in the English Church Union. Office: 35, Wellington Street, Strand.

ROMAN CATHOLIC SOCIETIES.

Aged Poor Society.—Founded in 1708 for granting pensions to the poor. Office: 31, Queen Square, W.C.

Apostolical College of the Society of African Missions.—This is for the education of missionaries for Africa.

Associated Catholic Charities.—Foreducatng and apprenticing the children of poor Catholics. Treasurer: Geo. Blount, Esq., 28, Old Burlington Street.

Association for the Propagation of the Faith.—The object of this society is to assist by prayers and alms the Catholic missionaries in foreign nations. Treasurer: A. G. Fullerton, Esq., 27, Chapel Street, Park Lane.

Benevolent Society for the Relief of the Aged Poor.—Founded in 1761. Office: 35, King Street, Cheapside.

Society of St. Vincent de Paul.—Founded in 1844, for performing works of mercy among the poor, and promoting the education and welfare of orphan and destitute boys. Office: 33, Chancery Lane, E.C.

Society of the Holy Childhood.—Its objects are [1] to procure baptism of all infants in danger of death in China and other Pagan countries, where infanticide is practised; [2] to bring up in religious establishments those who survive; [3] to provide for their future in life, either in the religious or married state.

St. Anselm's Society.—Founded in 1860, for the diffusion of good books. Office: 5, Agar Street, Strand.

St. Joseph's College of the Sacred Heart for Foreign Missions.—Mill Hill, Hendon, N.W.

Socinus, FAUSTUS, the founder of the Socinians, was born of one of the most noble families of Sienna in 1539. He received very little education, but followed the profession of his family, who were lawyers. In 1559 he went to Lyons, where he remained till the death of his uncle, Laelius Socinus, in 1562. Laelius Socinus (b. 1525) had left Italy on the breaking up, in 1546, of a club which had met at Vincenza to discuss the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. He had formed a sect at Cracow, and finally settled at Zurich, where he died. He left many manuscripts containing an account of his views, which his nephew studied for three years. He returned to Italy in 1562, and lived in the court of the Duke of Florence till 1574, when he went to Basle. Meanwhile the Anti-trinitarians at Cracow had greatly increased in numbers, but in 1565 a division took place, some (the Farnovians) becoming almost Arians, others (the Budneians) holding the opinion that Christ was merely a man, whence they belonged to the Psilanthropists (Gr. psilos, "merely," and anthropos, "a man") while others kept a medium course. In 1579 Socinus was called upon to reconcile the parties, which at last with some difficulty he managed to do; they became one community, and received the name of Socinians. Socinus wished to be admitted into the Unitarian Society at Cracow, but was refused, his views not being quite identical with theirs. His opinion was accepted at the Synod of Racow in 1693, and he immediately began to draw up a confession of faith, called the Racovian Confession, from his uncle's papers, but died in 1604, before it was completed. The confession was published in 1605 in Polish, in German in 1608, and in Latin in 1609. The sect continued to flourish under Jacobus a Sienna, the founder of the Racow Academy, Schmalz, Völkel, Ostrodt, Moscorovius, and others, till 1638, when some of the Racovian students broke a cross on the highway, and in consequence a decree was made at Warsaw ordering the church and college to be closed, the press to be stopped, and the professors exiled. This decree was followed by several others, till in 1658 they were forbidden, under pain of death, publicly to solemnise their worship or profess their sentiments. If they had not joined the Catholic, Lutheran, or Calvinistic communion within two years they were to be exiled. The day fixed for their departure was Aug. 10th, 1660, when the law was carried out with the utmost severity, and the Socinians disappeared from Poland. Socinian views were taught in Germany by Ernst Söner (d. 1612), and some of the Polish exiles came and settled here, but the heresy soon died out. It took a firm hold in Transylvania, through Blandrata, one of the chief advocates of the Anti-trinitarian doctrines. It did not prosper in England, the only purely Socinian congregation being formed by John Biddle in Gloucester during the Commonwealth. He died in prison for heresy in 1662, and was succeeded by Thomas Firmin, but the congregation soon disappeared.

The doctrines of the Socinians are to be found in the Racovian Catechism and in the writings of Socinus and other great leaders of the society. The chief are:—that Christ did not exist before His birth; that He and the Holy Ghost are not God; that Christ's death was for Himself, not for His sins, but for the mortality and infirmities of our nature, which He had assumed; that God could justly pardon our sins without satisfaction; that Christ did not become our High Priest, nor immortal till He had ascended; that the soul of man becomes insensible at death and will be raised again with the body at the general resurrection; and that the good will be established in eternal felicity, while the wicked will be consigned only to a limited punishment.

Socrates was born at Athens in 469 B.C. He was the son of a sculptor, and followed the profession of his father till he was nearly forty years old, when he gave it up for that of a philosopher. He came to Athens about the time of the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. His career differed considerably from that of his contemporaries, inasmuch as he instituted no school, resented the title of teacher, and therefore had no followers in the accepted sense of the word. His plan of work was to walk about the streets of Athens, talking with his fellow-citizens on all sorts of subjects, leading them to express their views, and then proceeding to show them where their argument was faulty; for he believed firmly that he was designed by the gods to fulfil a religious mission, and that a divine teacher, a demon [divinity] was with him at all times, and was his teacher. Such was his conviction. But the same conviction led him to believe that his fellows had all their inward teachers, and therefore he questioned his companions in order to be instructed. Accordingly, he was no solitary thinker, but loved to draw a circle around him. And the young men of Athens loved to be drawn; for he was a humourist; he was genial, brave, patriotic. One young man there was whom Socrates regarded with intense affection, Alcibiades. He was skilful, handsome, fascinating in manner—all the qualities of the brilliant Greek were exhibited in him in their perfection. Had he also but learned that there is a right and a wrong, the whole history of Athens might have been different. Socrates would fain have taught him. But whilst he joyously listened to the bright teaching of the philosopher, he did not train himself to walk in the light which he found; he became selfish and wilful, and turned his best gifts into means of mischief.

The Socratic dialogue consisted of cleverly contrived questions of the philosopher, intended to draw out his companion, to lead him to think to reconsider his subject, to view it on all sides. His aim was to draw out the faculties; not to make them the supreme arbiter, but to bow them before a divine power. It was the very object of his life to do this, and it cost him his life. For he made virtue the foundation of all teaching and the aim of all intellectual exercise, and virtue was the pursuit of good and the rejection of evil. The Athenians would have cared nothing for his word-splittings; they were the most tolerant people in the world of abstract opinions. But he declared that he was not a promulgator of opinions; that they were bound to know and to distinguish truth, that it was no matter of indifference. He was upon this accused of not worshipping the gods which the city worshipped, and of introducing divinities of his own. Alcibiades, too, who had proved a traitor to the State, was known to have been a learner from Socrates, and upon this fact was founded the charge that he was a corrupter of the youth of the State. He was brought before the judges of Athens, and his trial was the most momentous which up to that time the world had ever seen. By a majority of six, 282 against 276, he was pronounced guilty. There was a chance of escape for him. The penalty was death, but the smallness of the majority would probably have induced the judges to inflict some lighter punishment. He was asked to speak for himself, and he boldly answered as follows: "And what shall I propose on my part, O men of Athens? Clearly that which is my due. And what is that which I ought to pay or to receive? What shall be done to the man who has never had the wit to be idle during his whole life; but has been careless of what the many care about—wealth, and family interests, and military offices, and speaking in the assembly, and magistracies, and plots, and parties? Reflecting that I was really too honest a man to follow in this way and live, I did not go where I could do no good to you or to myself; but where I could do the greatest good, privately, to every one of you. Thither I went, and sought to persuade every man among you that he must look to himself, and seek virtue and wisdom before he looks to his private interests, and not think of the triumph of Athens before he thinks of Athens herself; and that this should be the order which he observes in all his actions. What shall be done to such a one? Doubtless some good thing, O men of Athens, if he has his reward; and the good should be of a kind suitable to him. What would be a reward suitable to a poor man who is your benefactor who desires leisure that he may instruct you? There can be no more fitting reward than maintenance at the expense of the State in the Prytaneum."

This bold answer was received by the judges as a direct insult, a fresh proof of audacity, and they condemned him. Plato has told the story of his death with immortal power. Thirty days ensued before execution. Then the solemn evening came. The fatal draught of poison was brought, and amid the frantic lamentations of his friends and disciples he drained it to the dregs with his habitual ease and cheerfulness. He spoke to the last of his opinions of immortality, and of what he hoped to do in the world to come. Thus died the greatest of heathen philosophers, the greatest of heathen martyrs. "It is instructive to observe," writes Dean Stanley, "that here, almost alone, outside of the Jewish race, is to be found the career which, at however remote a distance, suggests whether to friends or enemies, a solid illustration of the One Life, which is the turning-point of the religion of the whole world. We do not forget the marvellous purity of the life of Buddha; nor the singular likenesses and contrasts between the rise of Islam and the rise of Christianity. But there are points of comparison where these fail, and where the story of Socrates is full of suggestions. When we contemplate the contented poverty, the self-devotion, the constant publicity, the miscellaneous followers of Socrates, we feel that we can understand better than before the outward aspect, at least, of that Sacred Presence which moved on the busy shores of the Sea of Galilee, and in the streets and courts of Jerusalem. When we read of the dogged obstinacy of the court by which he was judged—the religious or superstitious prejudices invoked against him—the expression of his friend when all was finished—'Such was the end of the wisest and justest and best of all the men I have ever known'—another Trial and another Parting inevitably rush to the memory. When we read of the last conversation of the prisoner in the Athenian dungeon, our thoughts almost insensibly rise to the farewell discourses in the upper chamber at Jerusalem with gratitude and reverential awe. The differences are immense. But there is a likeness of moral atmosphere, even of external incident, that cannot fail to strike the attention. Or (to turn to another side), when we are perplexed by the difficulty of reconciling the narrative of the first three Evangelists with the altered tone of the fourth, it is at least a step towards the solution of that difficulty, to remember that there is a parallel diversity between the Socrates of Xenophon and the Socrates of Plato. No one has been tempted by that diversity to doubt the substantial identity, the true character, much less the historical existence, of the master whom they both profess to describe. The divergences of Plato from Xenophon are incontestable; the introduction of his own colouring and thought undeniable; and yet not the less is his representation indispensable to the complete idea which mankind now reveres as the picture of Socrates. Nor, when we think of the total silence of Josephus, or of other contemporary writers, respecting the events which we now regard as greatest in the history of mankind, is it altogether irrelevant to reflect that for the whole thirty years comprised in the most serious of ancient histories, Socrates was not only living but acting a more public part, and, for all the future ages of Greece, an incomparably more important part, than any other Athenian citizen; and yet that so able and so thoughtful an observer as Thucydides has never once noticed him, directly or indirectly. There is no stronger proof of the weakness of the argument from omission, especially in the case of ancient history, which, unlike our own, contained within its range of vision no more than was immediately before it for the moment."

Socrates, an ecclesiastical historian, was born at Constantinople about 380. He studied the law, and pleaded at the bar, whence he obtained the name of Scholasticus or Advocate. His history dates from 309, where Eusebius ended, down to 445, and is written with great simplicity and comparative accuracy.

Sodor and Man, BISHOPRIC OF.—St. Patrick was the Apostle of the Isle of Man. Returning to Ireland in 447, he left St. Germanus, whom he had consecrated bishop, to carry on the work. Sodor is the name of a small village in Iona, where it is said a see was established in the ninth century by Pope Gregory IV. In 1098, Magnus, King of Norway, having conquered the Sudor Eya, or Scottish Hebrides, and the Isle of Man, united them under one bishop, under whose jurisdiction they continued till the year 1333, when the English possessed themselves of the Isle of Man, and since then, though the bishop has exercised no jurisdiction in Sodor, he has retained the ancient title, being still styled Bishop of Sodor and Man. He enjoys all the rights of other bishops, with the exception of having no vote in the House of Lords. The see of Man was annexed to the province of York by Henry VIII. in 1546.

There is no complete list of the bishops. The first named in Bishop Stubbs's register is Robser; the first with a date, Wilmund Mac Aulay, a monk of Furness Abbey, to which abbey the election of the bishops belonged; he was consecrated in 1109. There is mention of a bishop named John about 1154, and Bishop Simon about 1226, Bishop Mark 1303, and Huan Heaketh 1510.

Under the bishop, the see is governed by an archdeacon and a vicar-general. The income of the diocese is £2,000 per annum. According to ancient custom an annual convocation of the Manx Church is held on the Thursday in Whitsunweek. The island contains thirty-three parishes. There was in 1883 a great discussion about the building of a cathedral and whether it should be at Douglas or at Peel. Nothing has yet been done in the matter. Peel contains the ruins of two cathedrals—those of St. Patrick and St. German—both on a small island in the harbour; churches were erected in those situations in olden times for safety, as at Holy Island and Iona. The whole of the ancient traditions of episcopacy are associated with Peel. Besides the cathedral dedicated to St. German, other bishops of Sodor, in like manner, have given their names to Manx localities, as St. Brandon to Turk Braddan, St. Michael, Machutus or Manghold, etc. It is impossible to fix the date of the original structure of St. German's; the choir, the oldest part of the present building, is generally acknowledged to have been rebuilt by Bishop Simon [1226-47], while the nave and transepts belong to a later period. The church is cruciform, and the architecture a mixture of Early English and Decorated. Until the close of the last century the bishops were enthroned here, but its roofless condition now renders the ceremony impossible. Several bishops are buried here; the tomb of most interest is that of Bishop Rutter, the friend of Charlotte de la Tremouille, who assisted her in the defence of Lathom House from Fairfax. A child of Bishop Wilson's is also buried here. Under the chair is a crypt, which till 1780 was used as a dungeon for ecclesiastical, and sometimes civil, offenders. In it Eleanor Cobham, wife of Humphry Duke of Gloucester, was confined for witchcraft during fourteen years.

Solidians (from Latin solus alone and fides faith), the name that was frequently given to those who first adopted the doctrine of justification by faith alone and not by works.

Somascha, THE REGULAR CLERKS OF, an order formed at the beginning of the sixteenth century by St. Jerome Emiliani, a Venetian, born in 1481. He was of noble birth, and had served in the campaigns against Charles VIII. and Louis XII., but was taken prisoner whilst defending the town of Castelnovo, and on his deliverance devoted himself to the service of God. He first took charge of some orphan nephews, but in 1528 founded an orphan asylum at Venice, and afterwards others at Milan, Bergamo, Pavia, and other towns. The central point from which all the institutions were managed was fixed at Somascha, between Milan and Bergamo. It was first worked by laymen, but Emiliani was afterwards joined by some priests, and they were gradually formed into an order. The founder died in 1533, was beatified by Benedict XIV., and canonised by Clement XIII. The order was confirmed in 1568 under the rule of St. Augustine, and received the name of Regular Clerks of St. Mayeul, or of Somascha. It was for a time united with the Theatines, and in the seventeenth century with Fathers of the Christian Doctrine. It extended rapidly, and has the charge of several orphanages and colleges. The principal house is at Rome.

Sonnites or Sunnis are a sect of Mahomedans who are strongly opposed in every way to the Shiites [q.v.] They are very numerous, the Shiites being confined for the most part to Persia. The Sonnites are sometimes called Traditionists, on account of their looking upon the sonnah or traditions as of equal authority with the Koran. They recognise the rights of all four Caliphs who immediately succeeded Mahomet, and this is one of the great points of difference between them and the Shiites, who reject all but Ali, the fourth. They are subdivided into four parties, but the difference consists chiefly in ceremonials and ritual—all uniting in fundamental doctrine and in hatred of the Shiites.

Sorbonne, a celebrated college founded at Paris in 1252 by Robert Sorbon, chaplain to Louis IX., within the University of Paris. It was originally intended for sixteen poor theological students, four of whom were to be French, four Norman, four Picard, and four English. The congregation was confirmed by Clement IV. in 1268. A teacher of theology was appointed, the college became formed, most of the Paris doctors of the theology were trained there, and when the lectures of the faculty began to be held there, the college and the faculty became identified. During the first three centuries after its foundation it thrived wonderfully, and is noted for having established the printing-press in Paris in 1470. In every doctrinal, liturgical, or ecclesiastical controversy which arose in the Gallican Church the Sorbonne has taken the most prominent place. Its acts are among the most characteristic passages of mediæval Church History, all manner of subjects being discussed by the sharpest wits, sometimes numbering as many as sixty. Its fall began when it became the property of the Guises; and, though Richelieu attempted to reconstruct it, it gradually decreased in importance till the Revolution, when it was destroyed along with the other ecclesiastical establishments. In 1808 a faculty of Catholic theology was re-established at the Sorbonne, but owing to the influence of the Government in appointing the professors, it is regarded with much distrust, and holds a position very different to that of former days.

Soteriology. — From Greek, soteria, "salvation," and logos, "knowledge." The science or doctrine of the salvation of man, and the means by which God accomplishes it. See JUSTIFICATION, WORK OF CHRIST, etc.

Soul.—This word is used as the English version of the Hebrew word nephesh, and the Greek psyché, and signifies primarily "animal life." But it is used more widely to express the whole region of mind as contrasted with visible substance. The deep conviction of mankind that there is in man a nature which differentiates him from the brutes, led to a belief in a threefold nature, and this view finds confirmation in Scripture, which speaks of the body (soma) or flesh (sarr), the soul or life (psyché), and the spirit (pneuma) (1 Thess. v. 23.) Speculations as to the origin of the soul, its essence and seat, were afloat from the earliest times, and are by no means at an end in our own day, but form one of the questions of some biologists. The Epicureans thought that the soul was a subtle air, composed of primitive atoms; the Stoics, that it was a flame, a portion of heavenly light; while the Cartesians made thinking the essence of the soul. The Ego was the living personality which the body covered, but was independent of it. Both Pythagoras and Plato held the brain to be the central dwelling-place of the soul. The Materialist carries that view to the length of attributing all consciousness and thought to the vibrations of the brain-fibre—and holds the soul to be, in fact, a product or property of the bodily organisation, and in no sense independent of it. Consequently, as the body is not immortal, so neither can the soul be. [This subject has been discussed in the article on MATERIALISM.] Such a view is contradicted by the innermost consciousness of us all. Non omnis moriar, said the heathen poet, "Not all of me will die." Even now I am not bound to this body, for there is within me a principle which can travel into far-off scenes, while I remain at home. I can think of scenes of my childhood which I may never see again. Therefore, there is nothing improbable in the belief that, whilst chemical agencies dissolve the body, they have no power over the Ego; over my innermost self. The doctrine of TRANSMIGRATION [q.v.] was plainly one form of assertion of the responsibility of the individual soul, and so far seems to be a step above the theory of absorption which has found favour with many rationalising philosophers—the theory that souls are swallowed up in the great ocean of a Divine Life. Such a theory is a denial of moral responsibility, destroying the faith in a conscious continuance of intellectual life and affection. It is one of the many evidences of the obscurity of Spinoza's philosophy on some points, that he has been claimed, both by those who preach the immortality of the soul, and by those who deny it, as being, respectively, on their side. Dr. Martineau, who has not a high idea of Spinoza, believes that he had no conviction of such immortality.

As we review the arguments adduced in favour of this all-important doctrine of the Christian faith, the vast capacities of the thinking part of man, the universal consent of all nations, the conscience of sin and the conviction of God's justice, we still hold that beyond them all, mighty as they are, is the fact of the Resurrection of Christ and the evidence thereof. Death could not hold Him, and when He came forth from the grave it was not only as the image of the Invisible God, but as "the first-born of every creature."

South, ROBERT, the son of a London merchant, was born at Hackney in 1633; died at Ilislip, 1716. He was educated at Westminster School under Dr. Busby, and in 1651 went to Christ Church, Oxford; was ordained in 1658, and in 1660 became University Orator. He was appointed domestic chaplain to the Lord Chancellor Clarendon on account of a speech which he had delivered on Clarendon being installed in his office at Oxford. In 1663 he took his D.D. degree, and became a Prebendary of Westminster, and in 1670 a Canon of Christ Church. In 1677, Laurence Hyde, son of the Lord Chancellor, and afterwards Earl of Rochester, was sent as ambassador to Poland; and South, who had been his tutor, accompanied him. On his return to England he became Rector of Ilislip, in Oxfordshire, and Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the King. He refused all further preferment, being strongly opposed to James II.'s attempts to restore Roman Catholicism. However, he believed in the duty of submission to the rightful Sovereign, and it was with difficulty that he was persuaded to swear allegiance to William and Mary; and he utterly refused to take the See of either of those who were ejected for refusing to take the oath.

He remained at Islip writing and preaching against Puritanism till his death. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. The most famous of his works are his sermons, which are characterised by vigorous sense and sound English.

Southcott, JOANNA.—A fanatical woman, born in Devonshire about the middle of the last century, who gave herself out as the bride of the Lamb, and announced, when she was over sixty years old, that she was about to give birth to the Messiah. She published a collection of her "prophecies" in shilling parts: they consist of wild rhodomontade, interspersed with doggerel verse, and form two large 8vo volumes. It speaks very badly for the state of intelligence and education, that at the time of her death she had thousands of followers, and after her death [Dec. 27th, 1814] many of them continued to observe the ceremonies she had prescribed, so that till a very few years since there were congregations who still called themselves after her name.

Southwell, BISHOPRIC OF.—This See was constituted in 1884, its first bishop being Dr. George Ridding. It is taken from the dioceses of Lincoln and Lichfield, and comprises the whole counties of Nottingham and Derby, including 471 parishes besides chapelries, with an area of 1,182,419 acres, and a population of 699,152. The endowment of the See is £3,000 a year. There are two archdeaconries, but as yet no cathedral body. The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, or Southwell Minster, is in every way worthy to be advanced to the rank of a cathedral. No other of the newly-constituted cathedrals of the last half century can approach it in dignity of design and beauty of architecture, with its massive Norman nave and western and central towers, Early English choir, and Decorated chapter-house. Southwell Minster, though never formally recognised as a cathedral church, was regarded by the Archbishops of the Northern Province, until the severance of the county of Nottingham from the province and diocese of York in 1839, almost as a secondary cathedral for that remote part of their wide-stretching spiritual domain. Possibly the site of a Romano-British church; most probably, according to early and consistent tradition accepted by some of our most careful historians, one of the centres of Paulinus's missionary labours, c. 630, after the conversion of the men of Lindsey, and the erection of the first Christian church in the Roman city of "Lindum Colonia," the modern Lincoln; rebuilt and endowed by the ubiquitous Wilfrid, in the five last years of his life, 705-9; augmented by Edwy's grant of his royal demesnes in the soke of Southwell to Archbishop Oskytel in 958, and re-founded or re-modelled (according to the statement of Henry VIII.'s Commissioners) by Edwy's brother Edgar, after the middle of the tenth century, when the first three prebends were probably founded, and the church, endowed with the great tithes of the soke, became collegiate; furnished with large and sonorous bells by Archbishop Kinsy [1051-60], at the same time that he bestowed like gifts on the ministers of Beverley and Stow; constituted by Kinsy's successor Ealdred [1061-69] a college of secular canons, for whose use, according to the reformed rule of Chrodegang, he erected a common refectory, as he had done at York; established as the Mother Church of the county of Nottingham by Archbishop Thomas II., freed by him from all episcopal customs and dues, placed on the same standing as St. Peter's at York, St. John's at Beverley, and St. Wilfrid's at Ripon, and enriched with royal privileges and immunities; the seat of a yearly synod for the county, at which the consecrated chrism, brought solemnly from York, was distributed to the rural deans, to be by them dispensed to the parish priests; at Whitsuntide the object of yearly processions by the clergy and laity of the whole county of Notts, released from the ancient duty of repairing to York to pay their Pentecostals, to which came the mayor and corporation of Nottingham with the justices of the peace, on horseback, in their most magnificent array, to lay down their Whitsun farthings under the wide Norman archway of the great north porch, where the treasurer of the Chapter stood to receive them—a time-honoured custom, only abolished little more than a century ago by Archbishop Drummond, "proprio motu," as a meaningless survival from the past—it is evident that Southwell Minster has always occupied a place of peculiar dignity and importance in the organisation of the vast diocese of York. In later times it more than once narrowly escaped destruction. In 1540 it surrendered its possessions to Henry VIII., and was re-founded by him in 1543; in 1547 it was seized by the Crown, but re-founded by Queen Mary in 1558; in 1604 still further established by James I., to be once more suppressed in our own days, and by a melancholy but just Nemesis on luxury and inefficiency under the guise of religion, reduced to the level of an ordinary parish church, it is now happily raised to more than its pristine dignity as the cathedral of the newly-formed diocese.

It must be confessed that the history of the collegiate church is not an edifying one before its final extinction on the death of the last prebendary in 1873. The number of prebendaries was sixteen. It was an acephalous body without a dean, or even any permanent president, such as the precentor was at St. David's, and the archdeacon at Llandaff, both of whose chapters were dean-less. Few professedly religious foundations could show smaller grounds for exemption from the axe of our ecclesiastical reformers. Of the sixteen prebendaries, each came into residence for three months once in four years, his only duties being to attend the daily choral services—and even these it was at one time in the last century seriously proposed to suppress—to preach statutable sermons, and to “exercise hospitality.” That is to say, to quote the Bishop of Lincoln: “In a church having sixteen canons, only one was resident at a time for a quarter of a year in four years, and the other fifteen were non-resident for three years and three quarters.”

Southwell, ROBERT, a Roman Catholic poet, was one of the least known writers of Queen Elizabeth's age. His thoughts are often very beautiful, although not powerful. He was born in 1580, in Norfolk, and was educated at the English College at Douay. In 1584 he returned as a Jesuit missionary to England, where the Countess of Arundel made him her chaplain. His most admirable poems are The Triumphs over Death, St. Peter's Complaint, The Epistle of Comfort. In July, 1592, Southwell was apprehended on a charge of sedition, and imprisoned for three years, during which time he affirms that he underwent the torture ten times. Some few books were allowed him, and he chose the Bible and the works of St. Bernard. After three years he wrote to Lord Cecil, begging for a day to be appointed for his trial, to which Cecil is said to have replied, “That if he were in haste to be hanged he should have his desire.” On Feb. 20th Southwell was removed from Newgate and taken to Westminster, where he was tried and condemned. On the following day, Feb. 21st, 1595, he was hanged at Tyburn.

Sozomen, HERMIAS, a Church historian, called Scholasticus, was born about the end of the fourth century at Salamina, in the island of Cyprus, and for a long time pleaded at the bar of Constantinople. He compiled an Ecclesiastical History in nine books, from the third consulship of Crispus and young Constantine to the seventeenth consulship of Theodosius the Younger, that is, from 323-439. This book is still extant, except the part which describes the events of the last twenty years. He seems to have known and made use of Socrates' history. His book is useful as giving a good idea of discipline of the Church. He died some time after 443, probably towards 450.

Spanheim, FRIEDRICH, was born at Amberg, in the Upper Palatinate, January, 1600. After having studied in the College of Amberg, he went to Heidelberg, and in 1620 to Geneva to study divinity. His father's circumstances becoming somewhat straitened by the Palatinate disturbances, he lived for three years as a tutor. In 1625 he travelled in England and France, and finally settled down at Geneva as professor of philosophy. He was ordained, and in 1631 became divinity professor. He showed such learning and understanding that he was sought after by several universities, and in 1642 moved to Leyden, where he remained till his death in 1648. He wrote many works, among which are Dubia Evangelica, Chamierus Contractus, Exercitationes de Gratia Universali, Epistola ad Matthæum Cottierium de Conciliatione Græciæ Universalis, Epistolam ad Buchananum de Controversiis Anglicanis, and Vindiciæ exercitationum.

Spanheim, FRIEDRICH, son of the preceding [b. 1632, d. 1701], was professor of theology at Heidelberg and Leyden, and one of the champions of Calvin against Descartes and Cocceius.

Spanish Reformed Church.—This religious body took its origin in Mexico. The Spanish yoke was thrown off and Mexico proclaimed a republic in 1824. In 1861 came the ill-omened attempt of Napoleon III. to subject the country to French domination, and the Archduke Maximilian of Austria was proclaimed Emperor, to the satisfaction of the Roman priesthood of the country. But the nation resented the interference, rejected the Empire, and put Maximilian to death in 1867. This was followed by a declaration of toleration, which had been refused during Spanish rule. Up to this time the country had been in the very depths of superstition and ignorance; but now the Bible began to be introduced. In 1866 Miss Rankin started a systematised Protestant Mission, which gradually made way. Not only so, but a reform movement was begun within the Roman Church itself; a priest named Aquelar opened a hall for preaching which he named the “Church of Jesus.” On his death his congregation besought assistance from the Episcopal Church of America; it was given, and Dr. H. C. Riley was consecrated Bishop of the Mexican Reformed Church, a remarkably grand sermon being preached on the occasion by the Bishop of Western New York, affirming the distinctive principles of Episcopacy as distinguished from Romanism. Since then two other bishops have been consecrated. In 1871 a Dominican friar was chosen for his eloquence to oppose Bishop Riley, and himself became one of his proselytes.

Meanwhile a corresponding movement was going on in Spain. In 1881 an appeal from the Bishop of Meath, Lord Plunket [afterwards Archbishop of Dublin], was sent forth calling attention to this movement, and asking for “the sympathy of Protestant Europe.” This appeal was contained in a magazine entitled Light and Truth, which still continues as the organ for the communication of information respecting this Reform movement. The first number contains a letter from the Rev. Juan B. Cabrera, Bishop-Elect of Madrid, who states that he has a congregation of 456 and a school of 100 children. This congregation was visited by Bishop Riley in February, 1880, on which occasion Reformed congregations from Seville and Malaga attended with that of Madrid, and the Spanish Reformed Church was solemnly constituted. In Portugal also Reformed congregations were established, whom Bishop Riley also visited. Several of these were ministered to by men who had been Roman Catholic priests. In the course of the year a Liturgy was drawn up, partly from that of the Church of England, partly from the old Mozarabic Liturgy. The last report gives 13 ordained ministers of the Reformed Church in Spain, eight of whom are ex-Roman priests, the others have received American orders. They have besought the English Church to consecrate their bishops-elect; but a difficulty was felt by the English Bishops on the ground that the Roman Bishops, though held to be in grievous error, are yet in possession; and the English Church, following the universal precedent from the beginning, has refused to be a party to what many ecclesiastical authorities hold to be a schism. Those who argue thus, whilst they look hopefully on the Reform movement, are desirous that the Reform shall be carried on from within. Nevertheless, there are others who strenuously declare that the Reformed Episcopal Churches ought to stand aloof no longer, but fill the gap and consecrate the bishops. The following passage from a recent address by Archbishop Plunket puts the case very earnestly:—

“A remarkable movement in the direction of Church Reform has taken place during late years in Spain and Portugal. Five-and-twenty years ago there were not a score of native Protestants in these countries. There are now some ten thousand. The faithfulness and courage with which these brave-hearted men, in the face of tremendous odds, have battled their way out of error into light and truth, is beyond all praise, and towards all who have so done, even though they follow not after us, we should be ready to extend a helping hand. But among these Reformers there are some with whom English and Irish Churchmen should especially sympathise. I speak of those who, after the example of our own forefathers, have organised themselves on an Episcopal basis, and have adopted a fixed Liturgy, purged, like our own, from Roman error, but wisely shaped, as in our own case, upon the model of an ancient national ritual. The number of these Reformers is not as yet large. About two thousand in Spain, and about one thousand in Portugal, may be counted as belonging to their ranks. But the congregations into which they are gathered occupy important centres in these two countries. In Spain they are to be found in Madrid, Seville, Malaga, Salamanca, Valladolid, and in the neighbourhood of Barcelona. In Portugal we meet them in Lisbon, Rio de Mouro, and Oporto. Moreover, though thus widely separated from one another, these scattered flocks are bound together even already by a sense of corporate unity, which adds not a little to their power for good. Each congregation has its vestry, and both in Spain and Portugal there is a central Synod attended by delegates from these vestries, where in each case the foundation of a Reformed Episcopal Church has been solemnly and prayerfully laid. In Spain the Synod has chosen a Bishop-Elect. In Portugal it is purposed to do likewise when the right opportunity presents itself. So far, therefore, as an outward organisation goes, the elements of cohesion and continuity are duly provided. But there are, thank God, closer and more sacred bonds than these. Speaking as one who has twice visited the Peninsula for the special purpose of testing the reality of this movement, I can certify without reserve to the fact that these Reformers are becoming daily more and more knit one to another by love and devotion to a common Master—the great Shepherd and Bishop of their souls—and by a profound conviction that they have a work of evangelisation to do for Him in their native land! Such are some of the hopeful features of this movement. Did time permit, I could point to many more. I could show from its history that it is a movement from within, and that, though foreign agencies, especially in the way of Bible circulation, have done much to help the work, their function has been not so much to create a desire for reform as to meet an already existing want. I could also show that this want is not due to merely political aspirations, or to any ephemeral burst of enthusiasm, but that it is in very truth a craving for somewhat more satisfying in the way of spiritual food than Rome can supply. But I must pass from the hopes of the movement to its needs—for it is because of these needs that I have felt constrained to take up my pen. These Reformers, like the early Christians, are few, and poor, and weak. None of the wealthy or the mighty ones of this earth have, up to this, joined their little band, and hence they find it impossible as yet to stand alone. They do not ask us to undertake the work of Reformation in their land. They are already engaged in that work, and all they ask of us is to help them in accomplishing it themselves. Nor do they ask us to help them thus for ever. Ere long they hope to be self-supporting. But just at present, though, as I can vouch, they are contributing according to their ability, they find it hopeless, without aid, to meet their own spiritual needs. And for this aid they have appealed to us. We have not gone out of our path to look for this duty. We have found the wounded traveller on the very highway by which we have been journeying. Can we, with a clear conscience, pass him by on the other side? The next few years will be to these Reformers a season of terrible suspense. In adopting for their churches an Episcopal constitution, they staked all upon the prospect of finding some Sister-Church in Christendom willing to consecrate the Bishops-Elect of their choice. Had they been satisfied with a Presbyterian form of government they would have run no such risk. But they chose rather to follow the example of our own Reformers, trusting that we—who must approve of their resolve—would not deny them the means of carrying it into practice. They have accordingly asked for this privilege at the hands of the Irish Bishops, and a final decision will be come to by that body after an opportunity for consultation with their brethren of the Anglican Communion at large has been given them at the Conference which it is expected will be held at Lambeth about three years hence. I earnestly trust that the bishops of my church will see their way to grant the request of our brethren in Spain and Portugal who have so far trusted us."

Sparrow, ANTHONY, D.D., Bishop of Norwich [b. at Depden, Suffolk], was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, of which he was fellow, till ejected in 1643 for refusing the Covenant. At the Restoration he was appointed one of the preachers at St. Edmondsbury; thence he was promoted to the Archdeaconry of Sudbury, and to the mastership of his college. In 1667 he was consecrated Bishop of Exeter; and on the death of Bishop Reynolds [1676] he was translated to the See of Norwich, where he died in 1685. He wrote Rationale of the Book of Common Prayer, a Collection of Articles, Injunctions, Canons, Ordinances, Orders, etc., and several sermons.

Spener, PHILIPP JAKOB.—Founder of the Pietists [q.v.] in Germany [b. at Rappoltstein in 1635; d. at Berlin, 1705]. His father was Counsellor to the Count of Rappoltstein, and the Countess, who was godmother to Philipp Jakob Spener, took a great interest in him, and had him educated by the Court Chaplain, Joachim Stoll. At the age of fifteen he went to Colmar, and a year later to Strasbourg University; here he pursued his theological studies under Sebastian and Johann Schmidt and Dannhauer, all of whom were zealous Lutherans. Here also he studied Hebrew and Arabic. In 1659 he went to Basle, where he took lessons in Hebrew from Buxtorf; he also visited the universities of Tübingen, Freiburg, and Württemberg. In 1662 he was chosen public preacher at Strasbourg, and also gave lectures at the University on history and philosophy. In 1664 he took his D.D., and the Senate of Frankfort-on-the-Maine invited him to become chief preacher of that city. His early training had given him strong religious impressions, and his preaching was characterised by great earnestness and sincerity, and his life by its singular purity; but his zeal against the Calvinists, who were an influential body in Frankfort, made him many enemies. However he soon ceased to contend with them, and turned his mind to the great object of his life, which was to enforce purity of doctrine and to make his hearers acquainted with the contents of the whole Scriptures, instead of only just the portions appointed to be read during church service. To encourage the study of the Bible he in 1670 instituted his Collegia Pietatis, where he explained passages of the New Testament, and invited discussion and further inquiry from his hearers of both sexes. He thus unintentionally founded the sect of Pietists. In 1675 he published his Pia Desideria, urging the need of a general reform in the mode of preaching and teaching Christian doctrines. In 1686, at the request of the Elector of Saxony, he accepted the post of Court Preacher at Dresden, and he soon became involved in a religious dispute with the theological teachers of Leipzig (Carpanov, Alberti, etc.). Spener had founded in Leipzig a Collegium Philobiblicum for studying the Bible in its original languages, and this was looked on as a censure on the University for its neglect of exegetical teaching. Jealousy, moreover, at Spener's having been appointed to one of the most coveted Church preferments had much to do with causing opposition to his views, and his enemies succeeded in prejudicing the Elector against him and getting his religious meetings forbidden. [It was at Leipzig that the nickname of Pietists was given to Spener's followers.] Spener, therefore, removed to Berlin in 1690, and here again he commenced his catechetical instructions, and enjoyed universal respect. His adherents at Leipzig (Francke, Anton, and Breithaupt) were in 1692 made Professors of Theology at the new University of Halle, which henceforth became the home of Pietism. The theologians of Wittenberg next attacked Spener, accusing him of founding various fanatical sects, and of holding no less than 283 heretical opinions. To them Spener replied in 1695 by his True Agreement with the Confession of Augsburg. Soon after this he was mixed up in a very serious dispute concerning the necessity of confession before receiving the Sacrament, and Spener gave it as his opinion that Christians might be allowed to use their own judgment in this matter. In 1694 the new Elector, Frederick Augustus, urged Spener to return to Dresden, but he refused the offer. His last work was On the Eternal Godhead of Christ, which he finished shortly before his death in 1705.

Spinoza, BARUCH DE, the greatest of rationalistic philosophers, was born at Amsterdam on Nov. 24th, 1632, of Jewish parents, who had settled there on escaping the persecution of Jews in Spain. He afterwards Latinised his name Baruch into Benedict. He was destined to commerce, but his love of study and great intellect made his parents alter their resolution in favour of a rabbinical education. Let it be remembered that the youth thus linked to men of various lands—for his father was a Portuguese Jew—was bound to one nation only by spiritual affinity, and that a nation without a home, and the course of the earnest young Jew's mental life will be more easily followed. The education of the Jews was almost exclusively religious, the Old Testament and the Talmud forming their principal studies. Spinoza entered into them with almost fanatical zeal, which, backed by remarkable penetration and subtlety, won the admiration of his instructor, the Chief Rabbi, Saul Levi Morteira. At fourteen Spinoza rivalled almost all the doctors in the exactitude and extent of his biblical knowledge. But he pursued his inquiries further than they could follow him, and put questions which they could not solve. Thus, because he found no mention of the doctrine of Immortality in the Old Testament, and because he was dissatisfied with some of the interpretations of the Law which his Rabbis gave, and those the interpretations which Christ Himself had rebuked, he was accused of heresy, and excommunicated from the Synagogue. [See the terrible curse quoted at length in Mr. Martineau's Types of Ethical Theory, i. 258.] His friends and relations were forbidden to hold intercourse with him, but he made some new friends, particularly Franz Van den Ende, who had a great influence on his life; he was a physician in Amsterdam who kept a philosophical seminary, and is said to have been a political plotter and an atheist. Some years later he was hanged in Normandy for conspiracy. He taught Spinoza Latin, which he learnt with great ease, and which was very valuable to him. At this time the works of Descartes fell into his hands, and he studied them eagerly. He left Amsterdam in 1660, and retired to Rhynsburg, near Leyden, where he carried on a trade, as all Jews were taught to do. His was that of a maker of telescopes, microscopes, etc., but he devoted all his spare time to philosophy. In the next year he moved to Woorburg, a small village near the Hague, and finally to the Hague itself. Here he frequently attended the Calvinistic worship, and expressed the deepest admiration for the character of Christ and the writings of St. Paul; but he was never baptised, nor called himself a Christian. He was offered the professorship of philosophy at Heidelberg, but refused, conscious that the philosophy he would teach was too closely allied to theology not to trench on its dogmas. He resigned the heritage which fell to him on his father's death to his sisters, refused to accept the property which his friend, Simon de Vries, had intended to leave to him, and also the pension offered to him by Louis XIV., and continued his labours in the greatest poverty, sometimes, it is said, expending on his food only 24d. a day. He died Feb.

22nd, 1677, of phthisis, from which he had suffered for twenty years.

Spinoza's system is the logical development of the system of Descartes, though the two philosophers differed on many points. Spinoza's first published work was an Abridgment of the Meditations of Descartes, with an appendix containing the germs of the Ethica, and Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. This work contains a rationalistic criticism of the Bible, and an attack on the institution of the priesthood as injurious to the general welfare. He also explained in it that philosophy and theology have nothing in common. This book was at once condemned and forbidden in every country, and many artifices were used to introduce it into the various countries under different names. But Spinoza is chiefly known by Ethica More Geometrico Demonstrata, which contains a statement of his doctrines drawn up in a mathematical form, and which has gained for him the name of "The Euclid of Metaphysicians." He gives eight definitions, and seven axioms. The eight definitions are:—

1. By a thing which is its own cause, I understand a thing, the essence of which involves existence, or the nature of which can only be considered as existent.

2. A thing finite is that which can be limited (terminari potest) by another thing of the same nature; e.g. body is said to be finite because it can always be conceived as larger. So thought is limited by other thoughts. But body does not limit thought, nor thought limit body.

3. By substance I understand that which exists in itself, and is conceived per se; in other words, the conception of which does not require the conception of anything else antecedent to it.

4. By attribute I understand that which the mind perceives as constituting the very essence of substance.

5. By modes I understand the accidents (affectiones) of substance; or that which is in something else, through which also it is conceived.

6. By God I understand the Being absolutely infinite, i.e. the substance consisting of infinite attributes, each of which expresses an infinite and eternal essence.

7. That thing is said to be free which exists by the sole necessity of its nature, and by itself alone is determined to action. But that thing is necessary, or, rather, constrained, which owes its existence to another, and acts according to certain and determinate causes.

8. By eternity I understand existence itself, in as far as it is conceived necessary to follow from the sole definition of an eternal thing.

The seven axioms are:—

1. Everything which is, is in itself or in some other thing.

2. That which cannot be conceived through another (per aliud) must be conceived through itself (per se).

3. From a given determinate cause the effect necessarily follows; and, vice versa, if no determinate cause be given, no effect can follow.

4. The knowledge of an effect depends on the knowledge of the cause, and implies it.

5. Things which have nothing in common with each other cannot be understood by means of each other, i.e. the conception of one does not involve the conception of the other.

6. A true idea must agree with its object (idea vera debet cum suo ideato convenire).

7. Whatever can be clearly conceived as non-existent, does not, in its essence, involve existence.

By these definitions and axioms Spinoza demonstrated the following propositions:—

Prop. 1. Substance is prior to its accidents.

Prop. 2. Two substances having different attributes have nothing in common with each other.

Prop. 3. Of things which have nothing in common, one cannot be the cause of the other.

Prop. 4. Two or more distinct things are distinguished among themselves either through the diversity of their attributes, or through the diversity of their modes.

Prop. 5. It is impossible that there should be two or more substances of the same nature and of the same attributes.

Prop. 6. One substance cannot be created by another substance.

Prop. 7. It pertains to the nature of substance to exist.

Prop. 8. All substance is necessarily finite.

The Ethics was not published until after his death; it was, however, left by him complete and ready for publication. It is a work comparatively small in bulk [264 small quarto pages], but it has had a profound effect upon the philosophy of modern times. For a while his system was regarded with horror; then a strong reaction set in, which has lasted to our own time. "His system," says Dr. Martineau, "rightly understood, responds to no enthusiasm, pretends to no beauty but that of cold consistency, and maintains no higher attitude than that of serene neutrality towards all that is and happens in heaven and earth. It is a strange but unquestionable fact that in the fervour of young doubt and mental need the precise and passionless propositions of the Ethica—the severest of all books—have often been seized with an intense eagerness. It is, perhaps, that the hottest fever loves the coldest drink." The best account that we have met with of the practical bearing of the ethics of Spinoza is Mr. Maurice's. He shows how near the ardent Jew came to the doctrine of the Incarnation, how his confusions arose from not arriving at that doctrine, how he realised that the love of God towards His own perfectness involves a love to mankind, yet stopped short of the Christian deduction of the Love of the Father towards the Son, and of men in Him. Spinoza closes his treatise with the grand words: "If now the way that I have shown leads to these rewards seemeth to be very difficult, nevertheless it may be found. Difficult, indeed, it must be, because it is so rarely discovered. For how can it happen, if safety were near and could be found without great labour, that nearly all should neglect it? But all noble things are difficult, all noble things are rare." On which Mr. Maurice comments thus: "A grand conclusion, we say; yet one in which nothing would be concluded if a voice which proclaimed, 'Strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth to life,' had not also proclaimed, 'I am the way; I am the door through which every man may enter in and find safety.'"

The late Mr. Blunt thus constructs the Spinozistic Creed from passages in the philosopher's writings:—"I believe in One Infinite and Undivided God, Eternal and Unchangeable, existing and acting by the sole necessity of His nature; of infinite attributes, whereof two only are capable of being conceived by man—Extension and Thought, whereof He Himself is the Identity; of all things the Free Cause; immanent, not transient; in Whom all things consist, and without Whom nothing can exist or be conceived. By Whom all things were made, not by design or for the sake of any end but, predetermined, and following necessarily from the absolute nature or infinite power of God. Of which world is Man, whose consciousness is the basis of all certitude, in which whatsoever is clearly perceived is true, and exists objectively in nature; whose will is not free, but necessary or constrained; whose acts and desires are good so far as they are defined by reason, and whose salvation, liberty, and beatitude consists, not in the reward of virtue, but in the virtue itself, whereby affections are restrained, and in the constant and eternal knowledge and love of God; whose worship by man consists in the exercise of obedience, charity, and justice. And I believe in the communion and fellowship of all men in so far as they are led by reason and in the eternity of the mind."

Spinoza taught that God is the only infinite substance, and that nothing can be conceived without Him. He is not corporeal, but body is a mode of God, and, therefore, uncreated. He is the same as Nature; as Spinoza expressed it, "God is the identity of the natura naturans and the natura naturata. He is the idea immanens, that is, the One and All, the only eternity. Spinoza has been accused of Pantheism from a misconception of his word "substance," and also of Atheism from his doctrine that the universe is a manifestation of the Deity, not as the Deity Himself, but as "the Deity passing into activity, but not exhausted by the act." A spirit so subtle and eager to see all sides of truth has thus paid the penalty to be expected, namely, that of being made the subject of disputes and misunderstandings innumerable. Considering that he arrived independently at ideas which are found in St. Augustine, and that modern German philosophers, from Kant downwards, have revered him as a master, it cannot be doubted that his teaching must contain many elements of value. One of those who knew him best, describes him as "a God-intoxicated man." But the deepest and subtlest analysts not unfrequently find themselves baffled. Thus Dr. Martineau, in a close and exhaustive examination of his works [Types of Ethical Theory, i. 247-393], declares that there are passages which are so ambiguous that controversialists on opposite sides may fairly claim him on their side. He shows that Spinoza's belief in the immortality of the soul, as expressed in the treatise on God, was real and strong, not, as has been alleged, "a mere accommodation to a discarded philosophy" [p. 374]. But in the Ethics he becomes vague, and a mystic cloud seems to have gathered over the future, the belief in immortality seeming to change into that of absorption into God, and the loss of individual consciousness.

Spiritual Works of Mercy. [MERCY, SPIRITUAL AND CORPORAL WORKS OF.]

Spiritualism, Spiritualists. — Spiritualism had its origin in America in 1848, when certain rappings in the house of Mr. Fox, at Hydeville, New York, were heard, which could not be accounted for, and by which it was said communications could be held with the spirits of the departed. These raps were arranged into a sort of alphabetical order for the purpose of the supposed communications, and were supplemented by the motion of articles of furniture about the room, the disembodied spirits being said to have discovered the means of discoursing by electric detonation; then musical instruments were said to sail about the room and utter unearthly melodies; sentences were written by unseen hands; shadowy forms were descried in the darkness; light touches felt; and lastly, the complete embodiment of a spirit so far as to be recognised by relatives. The spirits were also said to give their names. The believers in these manifestations increased very rapidly, and many converts were made in England, while in the United States it is said that at one time no fewer than 30,000 "spirit mediums" were practising. The doctrines of Spiritualists are much as follows: "God is a Spirit, and the visible universe is an expression to man of His Infinite Life. Man is a spiritual being: each individual spirit is a part of the great oversoul, or anima mundi. The spirit is enthralled in a body during this life; when released it at once enters upon the possession of higher powers and more extended knowledge, and its condition is one of regularly progressive advancement. Disembodied spirits are able to hold converse with those in the body; not with all immediately, but through the instrumentality of privileged or specially gifted persons called Mediums, who are on occasion influenced, or, as they term it, controlled by the spirits. Spirits can also apply force to physical objects, perform certain actions, such as writing, and produce sounds; they can sometimes show themselves in materialised forms, some of the material being borrowed from the medium. A new era is now dawning on us. The old religions, Christianity included, have played their part, and must pass away in face of clearer light. By intercourse with the spirit world, man will advance as he never has advanced before in knowledge, purity, and brotherly love" [Paper read at Durham Church Congress, by Rev. R. Thornton, D.D.]. Among the Spiritualists who have attracted most notice have been Douglas Home, who gave sittings before Napoleon III. and Alexander II. of Russia, and Robert Dale Owen [b. at Glasgow, 1801; d. 1877], who emigrated to the United States, and became the most prominent of the Spiritualists. His publications on this subject are Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World [1860] and The Debatable Land between this World and the Next [1872]. Spiritualism has been claimed by some as an adjunct to the Christian religion, by others as a substitute for it. As an adjunct, it is rejected by almost all the leaders of the Christian Communion; as a substitute, it involves the virtual setting aside, more or less completely, of the authority of Holy Scripture and of the teaching of the Church Universal. Some have not inaptly called it a "ghastly caricature of religion." The author from whom we have already quoted, Dr. Thornton, thus admirably sums up what may be said in its favour:—

"Now, there is much of the Spiritualist teaching with which the Church can most cordially agree.

"[1] It is a system of belief, not of mere negation of all that is not logically demonstrated. Its adherents are not ashamed to avow that they hold as true, propositions which are incapable of mathematical proof. They are at least theists, if no more; certainly not atheists.

"[2] It is in its very nature antagonistic to all Sadduceeism and Materialism. It flatly contradicts the assertions of the miserable philosophy that makes the soul but a function of the brain and death an eternal sleep. It proclaims that man is responsible for his actions, against those who would persuade us that each deed is but the resultant of a set of forces, an effect first and then a cause in an eternal and immutable series of causes and effects, and that sin and holiness are therefore words without meaning. It tells of angels, of an immortal spirit, of a future state of personal and conscious existence.

"[3] It inculcates the duties of purity, charity, and justice, setting forth as well the loving Fatherhood of God as the brotherhood of men, to be continued, with personal recognition, in the future life.

"[4] It declares that there can be, and is, communion between spirit and spirit; and so by implication acknowledges the possibility, at least, of intercourse between man and the Supreme Spirit; in other words, of revelation, inspiration, and grace.

"From the statement of these points of agreement I pass on to those in which I think Spiritualism warns the Church that her trumpet sometimes gives but an uncertain sound.

"[1] We habitually remind those we teach that 'they have an immortal soul;' we too seldom convert the phrase, and tell them that they are really spirits, and have a body, which contains an immortal part, to be prepared for immortality. We make them look on the body as the true being, the soul as a sort of appendage to it—an error against which Socrates could caution his disciples. [Phædo, p. 115, sec. 64.] No doubt bodily existence is [in appearance] more of a reality to us in this life than spiritual being; and thus—if I may venture on the allusion—nine out of ten people, when they hear the words 'Real Presence,' understand bodily presence; they have not grasped the truth that to the spiritual only can the epithet 'real' be justly applied here below. Minds thus disciplined are easily led away to believe that the soul is only a certain phase of the bodily organism, and is dissolved with its dissolution. Those who have learnt with Socrates that the soul—or, more properly speaking, spirit—is the essence of the man, could never suppose that the existence of the reality depended upon the existence of its instrument. We should have taught more carefully than we have done, not that men are bodies and have souls, but that they are souls, and have bodies; which bodies, changed from the glory of the terrestrial to the glory of the celestial, will be theirs to do God's work hereafter.

"[2] Again, we are terribly afraid of saying a word about the intermediate state. We draw a hard and fast line between the seen and the unseen world. In vain does the Creed express the belief in the communion of saints; for if we hint that one who prays for his beloved on earth may not forget them when, his earthly frame dissolved, he is removed nearer to the presence of his Lord, popular religion confuses such intercession with the fragments of the Meditation and Invocation of Saints. Once again the bodily life, not that of the spirit, is made the true life.

"[3] Further, there is a widespread reluctance, even in the Church, to accept the superhuman as such. I do not say this is universal far from it; but it is very general. There are some, for instance, who abhor all spiritual exposition of Scripture. The four rivers of Paradise [to use a Rabbinical illustration] have no meaning for them; they may accept two, but the other two, 'searching' and 'mystery,' they cannot away with. Others do not like to hear of the work of the Eternal Spirit in His Church, or of things done in God's wisdom, otherwise than earthly wisdom would direct or conjecture. They acknowledge, indeed, some Divine guidance, but shrink from spiritual influence or spiritual illumination, the ministry of angels or the snares of the Evil One."

Not less wise is his statement of the points in which he is obliged to condemn the Spiritualist's teaching. First the failure of the phenomena to carry conviction:—

"Strange knockings, we are told, are heard, which on demand are made to represent the letters of the alphabet, and frame mysterious words; musical instruments sail about the room and utter unearthly melodies; sentences are written by unseen hands; shadowy forms are described in the darkness; light touches are felt; indeed, one spirit has permitted herself to be kissed. . . . Now, supposing for a moment that these are real spiritual beings, one would see a great danger in the practice of conferring with them. How can we know their character? It is curious that they are considered to shrink from daylight in general. 'Your light hurts us,' they are represented as saying, though we read, 'God saw the light that it was good.' One Spiritualist (Mr. Brittan) declares that in thirty-five years he has never met with a spirit who has told him a wilful falsehood; but it is confessed that there is a danger of becoming associated with low spirits. Indeed, we are told that on some occasions stones have been thrown by spirits; so there would appear to be roughs or Fenians among the shades. But we need not, I think, be under any apprehension. There is no sufficient evidence that spirits are at work at all. . . . The strange things witnessed at some of the sances by unimpeachable witnesses suggest that all are manifestations of a simple human force, which we may call as we choose psychic, biological, odylic, ectenic; whose conditions are as yet unknown (as those of chemistry were a century ago), but may before many years be as well known as those of heat, electricity, magnetism, and light, with which it is no doubt correlated; and may perhaps be represented, as Biot proposed to represent the conditions of life, by an equation.

"But, farther, we cannot accept that degrading view of the body which seems to be an element in the highest Spiritualist teaching. It is represented, not as an instrument for the acquisition of knowledge, and as being, no less than the spirit, the work of God, and consecrated to His service, but as a foul obstructive. Vegetarianism, and, of course, teetotalism, are essential to one who would reach the higher knowledge; his very residence must be a place where no blood is or has been shed. We find ourselves at once in the presence of the Gnostics, Bardesanes, and Tatian, and remember with horror how short and easy was the step from their stern asceticism to Carpocrates and the Ophites.

"But, still worse, we find in Spiritualists' teaching a terrible degradation not of our human body only, but of the great Master of bodies, souls, and spirits. And here it is that I call it specially antagonistic to the Church; Jesus in their system is but an adept—an early Jacob Böhme, who gained his adeptship by an ascetic diet, for 'there is no evidence that He partook of any animal food except the flesh of the paschal lamb.' Or He is a Psychic, a remarkable medium, gifted with an exceptional amount of spirit-force, and a peculiar power of communicating with and controlling spirits. Or He is an Essena, a leader of a Buddhist sect, of high rank indeed, but inferior to the great Gautama who preceded Him. His life is nothing more to us than a grand example of purity and charity, His death only a noble piece of self sacrifice. With such views it is hardly necessary to say that the personality of evil is almost contemptuously denied, and the Scriptures displaced from the post of honour due to the written Word of God."

Spiritualities.—That part of the ministry which relates to its official functions and duties, as distinguished from temporalities, or matters of ordinary and worldly character.

Spirituality.—In ecclesiastical parlance, the whole body of the clergy, whose office is the charge of the spiritual affairs of mankind.

Sponsors [Lat. spondeo, "I promise"]. called also godparents and sureties. There seem to have been sponsors in very early Christian times, and it is said they were first appointed by Hyginus, Bishop of Rome, in 154. There was at first only one sponsor for each catechumen, and they were chosen from the deacons and deaconesses. All catechumens, heretics, and penitents, and in some cases those who had not been confirmed, were forbidden to act as sponsors. At the Council of Auxerre, in 578, monks and nuns were also excluded. At first it was common for parents to stand as sponsors to their children, but this was forbidden in the ninth century. It was proposed in 1689 that they should be allowed the privilege. It was not carried at the time, but has been since. The number of sponsors in the English Church is now three, according to the ancient custom in this country—two godfathers and one godmother for a male, two godmothers and a godfather for a female. In the Roman Church it is only necessary to have one god-parent, though there are sometimes more; and in this church no person is allowed to marry his or her sponsor. It was formerly the law in the English Church that the sponsor might not marry the parent of his or her godchild, but this is now repealed.

The office of sponsors for infants is twofold: 1st, that of acting in their name in making the requisite renunciation of the devil and all his works, confession of faith in Christ, and promises of a holy life; 2nd, that of providing and securing for the child by their faithful endeavours, not only a bare knowledge of the principles of the Gospel, but, as far as may be, a practical acquaintance with the important vows made for them in baptism, and the solemn consecration of heart and life which they involve.

The rubric at the end of the Catechism says: "Every one shall have a Godfather or a Godmother as a witness of their Confirmation," and this sponsor is to be distinguished from the Baptismal Sponsor.

This provision of the Prayer Book is a continuance of still more ancient usage. Thus Archbishop Walter in the Council of Oxford, 1322 [Lyndwood, L. 1, tit. De Sac. Unc. cap. Sacerdotis], ordered that parents should not be sponsors to their children at Confirmation: "Item ad Confirmationem nullus puer teneatur a patre vel matre." Lyndwood glossing the word teneatur says that the candidate is held [i.e. taken by the right hand] by another, to signify that he has not yet received his full strength. The same idea is very beautifully brought out by St. Thomas Aquinas, who says that at Confirmation we are given the full armour of Christ for the spiritual conflict, and so the confirmer, being not yet girded with all his weapons, is upheld by his sponsor to show that as yet he is weak and an immature soldier: "quasi adhuc imbecillus et puer." In fact, just as in old times the candidate for knighthood was presented by a sponsor, so is the candidate for the spiritual knighthood. This custom of appointing a Confirmation Sponsor is still observed on the Continent.

"It may be allowed to regret that this custom has been allowed to fall into desuetude, for it surely would be exceedingly helpful to our young people both at and subsequently to Confirmation that they should have an elder friend who should remind them of the solemn renewal of the vows they had made and of the due use they are to make of their full privileges as members of the Church. If the old custom were to be followed of the candidate being led up to the bishop by his sponsor, this would give the sanction of an outward solemnity to a very real spiritual bond. It may well be thought that a revival of this ancient custom so clearly indicated in the Prayer Book might result, by God's blessing, in a far larger percentage of our candidates becoming communicants, and, of what is of more importance, persevering in the better thoughts and purposes God gave them at Confirmation. For this sponsorial relationship would be no temporary one, but would involve the ties of a permanent spiritual friendship. There can be little doubt that in this would be found a real spiritual work for our lay communicants which would be of true interest to them and of real advantage to their own souls. It would, in fact, to a great extent do what is good and useful in John Wesley's idea of class-leadership while, like everything on old Church lines, avoiding its many dangers." [E. G. W. in Ely Diocesan Remembrancer.]

Sports, Book of—or, as it is sometimes called, Declaration of Sports—was issued by James I. in 1618. In the earlier days of the Reformation no difference had been made in the observance of Sunday from what it had been in the Middle Ages, when, after Morning Service, all sorts of games and sports were indulged in on the village green. The Puritans, however, set up a far more severe standard of discipline, taking as their model the old Jewish Sabbath, and following the rules laid down in the Old Testament. [SABBATH]. The first action taken by the Puritans was in Lancashire, where they endeavoured to enforce the strict observance, and the magistrates took their side. King James happened to pass through on his way from Scotland to London, and on being appealed to decided against the Puritans. After he had left, news was brought that the villagers, not content with the permission to indulge in their sports after Morning Service, had, in several instances, met together for amusement at the very door of the Church with the intention of disturbing the worshippers. The result was the Declaration of Sports, first published for use in the diocese of Lancashire, but afterwards extended to the whole kingdom. The King announced in this declaration that "no lawful recreation should be barred to his good people which should not tend to the breach of the laws of his kingdom and the Canons of the Church." The lawful games were archery, dancing, leaping, vaulting, and the setting-up of May-poles. It was stipulated, however, that no one should be allowed to take part in the sports who had not first been present at Divine Service. He did not issue this declaration in the usual way as an Order of Council, but commanded that it should be read by the clergyman of every parish from the pulpit. The opposition of the clergy, including Abbot, the Archbishop of Canterbury, was so great, that James prudently withdrew it. In the reign of his son, Charles I., the question was again revived, this time in consequence of the attempt to put a stop to the village wakes in Somersetshire. In former times these wakes had been held on the day kept in honour of the saint to whom the parish church was dedicated, but gradually had come to be held either the previous or following Sunday, and were often the cause of so much rioting and drunkenness, that attempts had been made to put a stop to them. In 1633 Judge Richardson commanded that henceforth wakes should be discontinued, thereby incurring the wrath of Archbishop Laud, who considered that in so doing he had encroached on the rights of the Bishop. The opinion of the clergy in that part of the country was asked, and the majority were in favour of allowing the wakes to be continued; though it is alleged that care was taken in the first instance to consult only those who were known to be of the High Church party. The Bishop of the diocese makes his report to Laud in these words: "I find also that the people generally would by no means have these sports taken away; for when the constables of some parishes came from the assizes about two years ago, and told their neighbours that the judges would put down these feasts, they answered that it was very hard if they could not entertain their kindred and friends once a year to praise God for His blessings, and to pray for the King's Majesty, under whose happy government they enjoyed peace and quietness, and they said that they would endure the judges' penalties rather than they would break off their feast days. It is found also true by experience that many suits have been ended at these feasts by mediation of friends, which could not have been so soon ended in Westminster Hall," and he adds, "If the people should not have their honest and lawful recreations upon Sundays after Evening Prayer, they would go either into tippling houses, and there, upon their alebenches, talk of matters of the Church and State, or else into conventicles." In October of the same year, therefore, Charles I. republished the Book of Sports, adding that any minister refusing to read it in church was to be severely punished. The outcry was even fiercer than it had been before, and the indignation caused was one of the strongest elements in the destruction of the monarchy. The declaration was publicly burnt by order of the Long Parliament in 1644.

Spotswood, JOHN, Archbishop of St. Andrews, was born at Mid Calder, near Edinburgh, in 1565; died in 1639. He was educated at Glasgow University, where he took his degree when only sixteen. He soon after succeeded his father in the patronage of Calder, and subsequently officiated as chaplain to the Duke of Lennox, when he went as ambassador to Henry IV. of France. James I. having heard of Spotswood's learning and piety, took him to England when he succeeded to the throne; and the See of Glasgow falling vacant he was presented to it, and became also one of the Scotch Privy Council. In 1615 he was promoted to the Archbishopric of St. Andrews. He was strongly opposed to the Puritans, and thus when the Covenant was signed he was ejected from his See and came to London, where he died.

He wrote a History of the Church and State of Scotland from the third century to his own times.

Stabat Mater.—The opening words of a hymn composed about the end of the thirteenth century by Jacopone da Todi. It is one of the most beautiful of Latin hymns, and describes the Virgin at the foot of the cross, as depicted in St. John's Gospel. The beauty of the hymn, and the adoration paid to the Virgin, have made it a great favourite in the Roman Church, and it has been set to music by Nanini, Palestrina, Pergolese, Haydn, and Rossini, whose version is the best known in England. It has been many times translated into English, German, and Dutch. Another Stabat Mater, supposed to be by the same author, describes the joy of the Virgin at Christ's birth; but it is little known, and far inferior to the Stabat Mater Dolorosa.

Stackhouse, THOMAS [b. 1680, d. 1752]. Vicar of Beenham, in Berkshire, is the author of The New History of the Holy Bible A Letter to a Right Reverend Prelate, being an account of the hardships of the inferior clergy; Memoirs of Bishop Atterbury, Complete Body of Divinity, and an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed.

Stalls.—The seats in cathedrals and collegiate churches which, situated in the choir, are reserved exclusively for the use of the clergy. The word is sometimes given to a benefice, the incumbent of which is entitled to be a member of the cathedral body.

Stancarists.—A sect founded in Poland in the sixteenth century by FRANCESCO STANCARO, who was born at Mantua in 1501, died at Stobnitz in 1574. He was ejected from the University of Mantua on account of his leaning to Protestantism. He published a Hebrew grammar at Basle in 1546, and two years later became Hebrew professor at Königsberg, and in 1550 was called on to fill a similar post at Cracow. He was, however, soon dismissed for propagating Protestant principles in his lectures, and was imprisoned, but released in a little time through the interest of some noblemen. In 1561 he went to Prussia, and settled at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. Here he began his controversy with OSLANDER [q.v.] concerning the Atonement of Christ; Stancaro held that Christ is our Mediator only with respect to His humanity; for that if He were mediator with respect to His Divinity, He was inferior to the Father in His Divine Nature, and could not be co-essential with God the Father. Thus, he asserted, those who maintained that Christ was a Mediator in His Godhead revived the Arian heresy. He returned to Poland in 1558, where he excited no small commotions, and he wrote Apologia contra Osiandrum de Trinitate, and was strongly opposed by Blandrata, Lismanini, etc. The Stancarists did not long survive their founder, but soon became absorbed in the Socinians.

Stanislas Kostka, Sr., a Polish saint, born Oct. 28th, 1550, was the younger son of John Kostka, senator of Poland. He and his brother Paul were educated together by a tutor, John Bilinski, who afterwards accompanied them to the large Jesuit college of Vienna. Stanislas was of a more serious disposition than his brother, and was very particular in the choice of his companions; Paul and Bilinski were fond of excitement and pleasure, and were perpetually taunting him and trying to tempt him to share their pleasures. He was seized with a dangerous illness, and on his recovery vowed that he would henceforth give up the world altogether and lead the life of a monk. He took his vows in Rome, on SS. Simon and Jude's Day, 1567, and thereby incurred the violent wrath of his father. He had not been long in Rome before he was seized with a violent fever, of which he died, Aug. 15th, 1568, before he had completed his eighteenth year. He was beatified in 1604, and canonised by Benedict XIII. in 1727. His festival is kept on Nov. 13th, the day of the translation of his relics. He is generally regarded by the Poles as one of their chief saints, and is the patron saint of most of their principal towns.

Stanley, ARTHUR PENRHYN, Dean of Westminster [b. at Alderley, Cheshire, where his father was rector, Dec. 13th, 1815; d. in London, July 18th, 1881]. In January, 1829, he entered as a scholar at Rugby, where he showed a remarkable talent for history, and a very retentive memory, but an incapacity for the study of mathematics, which was a serious drawback to his progress. He was entered at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1833, where he gained the Newdigate prize for a poem on The Gipsies; and in 1840-1 he travelled in Greece for the purpose of pursuing his classical studies. His father had been appointed to the bishopric of Norwich in 1837. On his return to England, Stanley began his career as a college tutor, and met with good success. His lectures showed more than ordinary ability, and he became known by two works which he published, a Life of Arnold, which appeared in 1844, and Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age [1846], which took an entirely new line in dealing with the lives of the Apostles. He was made secretary to the first Oxford Commission; and in 1850, in writing in the Edinburgh Review on the Gorham judgment, he began a series of criticisms on ecclesiastical questions. In 1851 he was appointed Canon of Canterbury, and during the years in which he held that office he wrote a Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians; Memorials of Canterbury; and Sinai and Palestine, a delightful volume, in which he brought the observation of his travels to bear upon the Sacred History. It was in consequence of this volume that he was appointed by the Queen to accompany the Prince of Wales in his tour in the East in 1862. He had previously made a tour in Russia, which led him to deliver lectures on its history, published in 1861. He became Dean of Westminster in 1863, and soon afterwards married Lady Augusta Bruce, who was equally in earnest with himself in the labours which he undertook among the people of Westminster, while neither lost sight of the duties which they owed to society. Dean Stanley devoted himself to beautifying the Abbey, and making it popular, and to cultivating the friendship and religious feeling of the poor of the neighbourhood, and he spent much time in lecturing and preaching in all causes for the good of the people. His tenure of the office of Dean was an epoch which will never be forgotten in the history of Westminster and of the religious life of England. He was a Broad Churchman, always eager to promote union with other denominations. His wife died in 1875; this was felt by him as a lifelong sorrow. He was never the same man again; but he was brave in his endurance, and did not neglect his good and holy work, and in 1878 he visited America, where he was cordially received, and delivered numerous addresses and sermons. His other works, are:—Lectures on the Jewish Church, three series [1863-79]; Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey [1868]; Essays on Church and State [1870]; a History of the Church of Scotland [1872]; Christian Institutes [1881]; Memoirs of his Father and Mother, Edward and Catherine Stanley; and numerous articles in reviews.

Stanley's courageous endeavours to promote union with Nonconformists, and also to protect the freethinking divines of the Church of England, notably, the writers of ESSAYS AND REVIEWS [q.v.] and BISHOP COLENSO [q.v.], exposed him to many hard words. But his courage made him popular even with those who opposed him, and his conspicuous piety and philanthropy were admitted on all hands. His funeral in Westminster Abbey was a marvellous spectacle, from the crowds which gathered to it representing every phase of religious belief and of intellectual greatness.

States of the Church.—The position of the Papal See as a temporal Power in Europe was acquired gradually. [See PAPAL POWER, GROWTH OF.] We have seen in that article how within the walls of Rome the Pope became the greatest potentate, in consequence of the fall of the Empire. It was by the gift of Pepin, King of the Franks, in 751, of the Exarchate of Ravenna and the Pentapolis (Ancona, Sinigaglia, Fano, Pesaro, Rimini), with Bologna and Ferrara, to the Pope, that the Papal States were founded. It is noticeable, however, that Pepin named himself, and not the Pope, as supreme ruler of Rome itself. By the bequest of the Countess Matilda of Tuscany, that State was added to the Papal possessions in the eleventh century. Under Innocent III. in the thirteenth century the Papal States became absolutely independent of the Empire. Elsewhere we have shown how, after Innocent's time, Papal power declined. After the Reformation the Papal Chair was filled exclusively by Italians, members of noble families, and in the Papal States prosperity, industry, and intellectual life steadily went down. By the successes of Bonaparte in Lombardy he was enabled to force the Pope to cede the Romagna, Bologna, and Ferrara to France in 1797, and in 1808 the great usurper went further, and as Pope Pius VII. steadfastly refused to enter into an offensive and defensive alliance with France, and, to close his ports against England, Napoleon proclaimed the Papal States incorporated with France. For this he was excommunicated by the Pope, who was therefore imprisoned for three years, and treated with cruelty and violence. In 1814 the Papal States were restored to their owner. They would again have been lost amid the Revolution, which took place in Europe in 1848-9, but for the intervention of Louis Napoleon, the President of the French Republic, who sent a French army of occupation to Rome to protect the Pope; which remained until 1866, when the Emperor withdrew it. Meanwhile Garibaldi, with an army of volunteers, having made successful war on Naples, the result was the unity of Italy into a monarchy under King Victor Emanuel [1859]. All the country, except the State of Venice and the province known as the "Patrimony of St. Peter," became part of the new monarchy. This province also was attacked by Garibaldi, but he was defeated and wounded, and thereupon retired into private life. The withdrawal of the French army removed the last obstacle to the absorption of the Papal States, and on Sept. 20th, 1870, the Italian army took possession of the "Patrimonium Petri," and the secular authority of the Pope was at an end. He now only possesses the Palace of the Vatican, and Rome is the capital of the Italian Kingdom. Up to the present moment the protest of Pope Pius IX. has not been withdrawn, that the annexation is an unlawful usurpation, and the Pope has refused to take part in any ceremonial outside his own residence; but the opinion is held by many that Leo XIII. will yield to circumstances, and enter into amicable relations with the secular Government.

Stationary Days.—Wednesdays and Fridays are so called as being the days for week-day services of greater length than on other week-days; Wednesday because it was the day on which the Jews took counsel to kill our Lord, Friday because it was the day of the Crucifixion. In the Western Church the fast was obligatory on Friday, while that on Wednesday, always voluntary, gradually died out. In the Eastern Church both days are still kept. The fast lasted always till three o'clock in the afternoon.

Stations of the Cross.—A series of pictures to be found in every Roman Catholic Church, sometimes on the Continent in the open air on the road to the church. They represent the events of the Passion in order, the first being on the right side of the altar, and the rest going round the walls of the church, until the last is to be found on the left side. The custom of prayer and meditation before the representation of each event is a very favourite one with Roman Catholics, and was instituted by the Franciscan Orders in the seventeenth century. There are usually fourteen pictures. The following are the scenes depicted:—The sentence passed on Christ by Pilate; Christ receiving the Cross; His first fall; His meeting with the Virgin; Simon of Cyrene bearing the Cross; St. Veronica wiping His face with her handkerchief; His second fall; His words to the women of Jerusalem; His third fall; the parting of His garments; His crucifixion; His death; the descent from the Cross; His burial.

Staupitz, JOHANN VON, a great friend of Martin Luther, died at Salzburg. 1524. The date and place of his birth are not known. He joined the Augustinian Order, and entered heart and soul into its doctrine of faith and election. In 1500 he became Prior of the Augustinian Convent in Tübingen, and Doctor of Theology at the university; but two years after, at the invitation of the Elector of Saxony, moved to Wittenberg. In 1503 he was chosen Vicar-General of his Order in Germany. It was he who first kindled in Luther a love for the Gospel, when they met at Erfurt in 1505. Staupitz saw that the young monk was capable of great things but was too much given to asceticism and feared God more than he loved him; so gained his confidence and cheered him. In 1508, at his recommendation, Luther was called to Wittenberg. In 1519 he wrote and offered Luther a refuge at Salzburg, whither he had removed; but the latter was displeased that his friend had drawn back from the Reformation, and again submitted to the Roman Church by becoming Vicar to the Archbishop of Salzburg. The severance of their friendship, however, did not take place till 1521, when Staupitz finally withdrew himself from Luther, alarmed at the storm raised around the Reformer. Staupitz about this time joined the Order of the Benedictines, and became their Abbot, at Salzburg, in 1522. Though he drew back from the Reformers, he did not oppose them; he saw the abuses of the Roman Church, but was not sufficiently heroic to withstand them. He was described by Luther as being cold and pusillanimous.

Stennett, JOSEPH [b. at Abingdon, Berks, 1663; d. at Knaphill, Bucks, 1713].—He lived for the greater part of his life in London, where he had charge of a Baptist chapel in Devonshire Square. He was the author of several hymns, of which the best known is Another six days' work is done. He also wrote a pamphlet, Fundamentals Without a Foundation; or, a True Picture of the Anabaptists.

Stephen, Sr., patron saint and apostle of Hungary, was the son of Geysa, fourth Duke of Hungary. Geysa was a heathen, but from the beginning of his reign always treated the Christians with toleration, allowing them free admission into his duchy, and in the end he, his wife, and household were baptised. Their son Stephen was born about 977, and at the age of twelve was baptised by Adalbert, Bishop of Prague. Geysa died in 997, and Stephen became duke. He set himself first to improve the morals of his subjects, which by long indifference had fallen into a very low state. In order to have more time to devote to the internal affairs of his dukedom, he made peace with all the neighbouring powers. The Pagan party, however, rose in rebellion, and as he considered it his duty to extend the Christian religion, rather than to attend to reasons of state, he refused to listen to the compromise which the opposition proposed—that they should be allowed the free exercise of their idolatrous worship. They then took up arms, but Stephen and his troops completely defeated them, and, as a thanksgiving, founded a monastery, which was dedicated to St. Martin of Tours. He built colleges and churches all over the duchy, and for the better organisation of ecclesiastical matters, he divided his territory into ten bishoprics. He sent Astric, a Benedictine abbot, to Rome, to obtain the consent of the Pope, Sylvester II., to assume the title and dignity of king, thinking that thereby his influence for good would be increased. Some of the neighbouring dukes declared that he had taken this title from ambition, and they were resolved to humble his pride. Stephen defeated them, and took the leader, the Prince of Transylvania, prisoner; but soon released him, on condition that he would cause all the idols in his country to be demolished, and allow Christianity to be freely taught in his dominions. He drew up a code of laws, which form the groundwork of the Constitution of Hungary to this day. Stephen died Aug. 15th, 1038. Innocent XI. canonised him in 1687.

Stephen, Sr., Pope and martyr.—St. Stephen was a deacon, a native of Rome, and on the death of Lucius, in 253, was made Pope. When he had been Pope three years, he had a long and learned dispute with St. Cyprian on the question of baptism—whether it could be administered by heretics or not. They could not agree, so St. Cyprian called together two councils, both of which agreed that there could be no valid baptism, except that which is administered by the Church. St. Cyprian was supported by other African bishops, but Stephen refused to yield, and proceeded to excommunicate them. He did not live to see the contest end, as it afterwards did, in his favour, as the majority of the Eastern and African bishops retracted their decrees. He was martyred in the year 275, under the Emperor Valerian. August 2nd is kept in his memory.

Stephen's (St.) Day.—The death of the first Christian martyr is commemorated on Dec. 26th. Very little is known of his history and life, a few words in the Acts of the Apostles preceding the account of his martyrdom being all that is recorded of him. It says there that he was one of the first deacons, and excited the wrath of the Jews by telling the people that the law and the old dispensation had passed away, and that a new one was beginning. Tradition says that he had been brought up in the Jewish faith in Greece, and his name, Stephen, which means a "crown," is evidently Greek. The custom of keeping this day and those of St. John the Baptist and the Holy Innocents on the three days immediately after Christmas Day is very ancient, and many explanations have been given to account for the arrangement. Most commentators agree now that it was so arranged without any special design; others say that it was to draw attention to the three special graces of self-sacrifice, love, and purity.

Stephen the Sabaite.—One of the earliest hymn-writers of the Greek Church [b. 725, d. 794]. He was the nephew of St. John Damascene, who placed him in the Monastery of St. Sabas, where he remained for fifty-nine years. He is the author of the hymn translated, Art thou weary, etc.

Sternhold and Hopkins, authors of the old Metrical Versions of the Psalms.—

Sternhold was Groom of the Chambers to Henry VIII., and afterwards to Edward VI., and it is said he owed that position to his poetical talents. Certain it is that although many Psalms had been translated into verse by different scholars, Sternhold's version was the first introduced into England. Of his fellow-labourer, Hopkins, little is known, save that he was a clergyman and schoolmaster in Suffolk, and by some considered even a better poet than Sternhold. There was published also a collection of Psalms in verse by different poets, to which William Whyttingham, a friend of Calvin and Knox, was a contributor. Sternhold died in 1549, and in the same year fifty-one Psalms, versified by him, were printed. A more complete version was published in 1562.

Stendel, JOHANN CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH [b. 1779, d. 1837], a German Evangelical theologian, who, having studied at Tübingen, was pastor at Oberesslingen, Canstatt, and Tübingen, and in 1815 became professor of theology in the last-named town. He wrote Lectures on the Theology of the Old Testament, and an attack on Strauss's Life of Christ.

Stier, RUDOLF EWALD [b. at Fraustadt, 1800; d. at Eisleben, 1862].—He studied law at Jena, but in 1816 he became a student of theology, and was for a while a disciple of Richter, but his deep religious earnestness led him to yield obedience to the faith and doctrine of the Gospel. He went to Halle in 1818, and was made head of the Burschenschaft there, and he subsequently studied and taught at Berlin, Wittenberg, Karalene, and Basle. He became pastor at Frankleben in 1829, and at Wichlinghausen in 1838; after eight years he retired, and became superintendent, first at Schkenditz, and afterwards at Eisleben. His writings are numerous, and of deep value for their piety and suggestiveness for homiletical purposes; the most important is Words of the Lord Jesus, written in 1843, in which he insists strongly on the doctrine of inspiration. He wrote also The Words of the Apostles and The Words of the Angels; Alles und Neues in deutscher Bibel; Auslegung von 70 ausgewählten Psalmen. The most important of his works are translated in Clark's Theological Library.

Stigmata.—The miraculous wounds which are said to have appeared in the hands, feet, and side of persons, resembling those of our Lord. In the primitive Church it was believed that these marks appeared on those who were specially favoured by God. The first authentic account of the stigmata being received was by St. Francis [d. 1226], of whom it is said that, after seeing a vision of the Crucifixion two years before his death, his feet and hands were marked with nails, and there was a wound in his side. These wounds were seen by many of his friars, though St. Francis strove to keep them hidden. An exhaustive discussion of this miracle may be found in Mrs. Oliphant's

Life of St. Francis of Assisi. St. Catharine of Siena [d. 1380] is also said to have received the stigmata, also Ursula Aguirre, Mary Magdalen di Pazzi, and Mechtildis von Stans. Some received not only the marks of the Crucifixion, but also of the crown of thorns; others had no visible marks, but suffered excruciating pains. The most recent case is said to be that of Estatica of Calda, about forty-five years ago. There are said to have been altogether 145 persons who have received the stigmata, of whom eighty lived before the seventeenth century.

Stillingfleet, EDWARD, Bishop of Worcester, was born at Cranbourn in Dorsetshire in 1635, died at Westminster, 1699. He was educated at the Grammar-schools of Cranbourn and Ringwood, and then passed on in 1648 to St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow in 1653. He was presented to the Rectory of Sutton in Bedfordshire in 1657, by Sir Roger Burgoin, in whose family he had been private tutor. In 1665 Lord Southampton gave him the living of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and he became preacher at the Rolls Chapel, Doctor of Divinity, Lecturer to the Temple, Chaplain in Ordinary to Charles II., Prebendary of Canterbury, Canon of St. Paul's [1670], and on the promotion of Sancroft to the Archbishopric of Canterbury [1678] Dean of St. Paul's. He refused to be a member of the ecclesiastical commission revived by James II., and was rewarded at the Revolution with the bishopric of Worcester.

Bishop Stillingfleet, though a great controversialist, was gentle and amiable, and of unquestionable piety. His views at first were inclined to latitudinarianism, but in his later life they became modified. His first work was Irenicum, or the Divine Right of Particular Forms of Church Government Examined [1659], a second edition of which appeared in 1662 with an appendix on the Power of Excommunication in a Christian Church. This was thought by the High Church party to savour of Presbyterianism, and contained opinions which he afterwards retracted. His next work was Origines Sacre; or Rational Account of the Christian Faith, as to the Truth and Divine Authority of the Scriptures, which made his reputation, and is still considered one of the best treatises on the subject. In 1665 appeared A Rational Account of the Grounds of the Protestant Religion, which was a refutation of the charge of schism brought against the Church of England for separating from Rome. His other works were:—A Discourse Concerning the Idolatry Practised in the Church of Rome, and the Hazard of Salvation in its Communion [1671]; The Unreasonableness of Separation, being an answer to Baxter, Owen, Howe, and other Nonconformists, who had attacked him for a sermon which he had preached against them, entitled, The Mischief of Separation; Origines Britannicae, or the Antiquities of the British Churches [1685]; A Discourse concerning the Illegality of the Ecclesiastical Commission, in answer to the Vindication and Defence of it [1689]; a Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, etc.

Stipendiary Curate. [PERPETUAL CURATE.]

Stoics.—A sect of Greek philosophers, who derived their name from the Stoa, or colonnade, in which their leader, Zeno, lectured at Athens, about 308 B.C. The doctrines of Zeno, it is thought, may have been derived partly from the Jewish Scriptures, but it is certain that Socrates and Plato had taught much of them before, and Stoicism came nearest in morality to Christianity, for which it prepared the way. The Stoics maintained that nature (which in reality they identified with God) impels man to do that which is good; and that conformity to the laws of nature constitutes virtue. Every one who has a right discernment of what is good, desires to follow the will of Nature in all his desires and pursuits; and beyond this he must have no desires, but be independent of all surrounding circumstances. All external things are indifferent, and incapable of affecting the happiness of man; pain, which has nothing to do with the mind, is not evil; and a wise man will be happy in the midst of torture, because virtue itself is happiness. Stoicism gained a firm hold on the mind of the Romans, chiefly through its fundamental principle that action is far superior to meditation or to enjoyment; and it was expounded in Rome by Seneca, and by the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, and Epictetus the slave. Such was Stoicism in theory, and such were the best of its teachers; but practically the Stoics lived pretty much as they felt inclined to live, without any very strict reference to their philosophy about virtue; and their theory about endurance of suffering often led them to suicide as the easiest way of escaping it: of which Zeno himself, as well as Cato, are notable examples.

Stole [Gr. stolē, "a robe"].—A scarf, said to represent the yoke of Christ, which is worn behind the neck and hanging down in front, with two ends. It is either black or coloured — when the latter, the colours of the different seasons are worn, according to the use of the Church. In the case of a deacon it is sometimes worn across the breast and tied under the right arm. It is one of the oldest Christian vestments used by the clergy.

Strauss, DAVID FRIEDRICH, the leader in our century of the extreme rationalists on the subject of the Life of Christ [b. at Ludwigsburg, in Würtemberg, 1808; d. there, 1874], studied theology at Blaubeuren, and afterwards at Tübingen. He went to the seminary at Maulbronn as professor's assistant in 1830, and was at first a follower of Schelling and Boehme, but at Berlin, where he next went to study, his early opinions were exchanged for the philosophy of Hegel and the theology of Schleiermacher. He became under-teacher at the seminary at Tübingen, but forfeited this post through the publication of Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet, in which he maintained that the Gospel history is a collection of myths, written in the first and second centuries of the Christian era, and founded on the Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah. Strauss was next appointed teacher in the Lyceum at Ludwigsburg, and in 1839 was chosen by the Council of Education to fill the office of Professor of Divinity and Church History at Zürich; but the appointment met with so much opposition from the people that he was dismissed with a small pension. He published Zwei Friedliche Blätter, Charakteristiken und Kritiken, and Die Christliche Glaubenslehre, in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und im Kampf mit der modernen Wissenschaft, between 1838 and 1841, and raised thereby a controversy in which Neander, Tholuck, and others wrote in refutation of his doctrines. In 1847 he published Der Romantiker auf dem Throne der Cäsaren, oder Julian der Abtrünnige, a political satire, in which he gave great offence by comparing the Roman Emperor to Friedrich Wilhelm IV. of Prussia. In 1848 he was elected a member of the Würtemberg Diet for Ludwigsburg, but disappointed his constituents by taking the side of the Conservatives, and soon after resigned. Strauss's later works were Die Halben und die Ganzen, Der Christus des Glaubens und der Jesus der Geschichte, and Der alte und der neue Glaube; in these he retracted his former reverence for Christianity, denied the possibility of personal religion or belief in any god but the universe, which is "the development from a blind force or law, without any foreseen end," and expressed the opinion that there is no life hereafter. The hopelessness of such a creed made itself evident, and even rationalists recoiled from it. The theories of Strauss find but little acceptance, and have been successfully rebutted by both English and German critics. One of the finest works in antagonism is Professor Milligan's Treatise on the Resurrection.

Strigolniks.—A sect of Judaist Christians which sprang up in Russia in the fourteenth century and spread with some rapidity. A few even of the bishops favoured them for a while. At a later period they were severely repressed, but still exist under the name of Selesnevtchins. These observe circumcision and the Seventh-day Sabbath, and portions of the Mosaic Law.

Styrye, REV. JOHN, Church historian, was born in London, 1643; died, 1737. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and afterwards at Jesus College, Cambridge. He removed to Catherine Hall, where he took his B.A. in 1665. In 1669 he was made M.A., and ordained to the curacy of Theydon Bois in Essex. A few months after he removed to Low Leyton, and there he stayed till within a few years of his death; he also held the lectureship of Hackney and the sinecure of Tarring, given him by Archbishop Tenison. He spent his later years at Hackney with a married granddaughter, and died at her house at the age of ninety-four. Styrye published nothing till after he was fifty; it is therefore probable that he spent his life up to that time in collecting the immense amount of information and curious detail which we find in his books. He was by no means a brilliant writer—in fact, his books at times are tedious to the last degree. They consist for the most part of transcriptions of curious and valuable papers, which he brought to light for the first time; but he makes no attempt at commenting on them, and does not seem to have had the gift of knowing what was worth preserving and what not. The chief of them are: Memorials of the most Renowned Father in God, Thomas Cranmer, sometime Archbishop of Canterbury; The Life of the Learned Sir Thomas Smith, principal Secretary of State to Edward VI. and Elizabeth, wherein are discovered many singular matters relating to the state of learning, the reformation of religion, and the transactions of the kingdom during this time. His most important work, published in 1721, was Ecclesiastical Memorials, relating chiefly to religion and the reformation of it, and the emergencies of the Church of England under Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Queen Mary. He wrote the lives of all the most celebrated divines of the Reformation time, and published several sermons as well.

Stuart, MOSES [b. at Wilton, Connecticut, 1780; d. at Andover, Massachusetts, 1852].—He showed marvellous precocity as a child, and at nineteen, while a student at Yale College, was appointed to deliver the salutatory oration, this being the highest honour that he could receive. He became a schoolmaster for a short time; studied law, and was called to the Bar in 1802; and after applying himself to the study of theology, was ordained in 1806, and made pastor of the first Congregational Church at Newhaven. In 1810 he was appointed Professor of Sacred Literature at the Theological Seminary at Andover; and though it was said that he had mistaken his vocation, and should have devoted himself to preaching, he proved as successful in his professorship as elsewhere. He composed a Hebrew grammar for the use of the students, and introduced the study of German literature into America. He held this post for thirty-eight years, during which time he published several Greek and Hebrew grammars; commentaries on some of St. Paul's Epistles, and on the Apocalypse; Hints on the Prophecies, a Critical History and Defence of the Old Testament Canon, translations of Elementary Principles of Interpretation, and of Roediger's Genesis, and other works.

Sturm, Str.—Among the many disciples made by Boniface during his labours in Germany, Sturm was one of the most zealous. He was born in Bavaria in 710, and his parents took the opportunity of a visit paid by Archbishop Boniface to their part of the country to ask him to undertake the education and bringing up of their boy. Boniface placed him in a monastery at Fritzlar, and left him there until such time as he should be ready and willing for ordination, which was in 733. He then assisted his master for three years; but at the end of that time had an intense craving to found a monastery in some lonely place far away from any human habitation. Boniface hoped that by this means a desert waste might be turned into a cultivated and flourishing district, and readily gave his consent. After many unsuccessful attempts Sturm found a suitable spot on the banks of the Fulda, and at once returned to report his success to Boniface. The Archbishop received from the King a grant of this land, and the monastery was begun under the direction of Sturm. It was soon ready for the reception of members, and Sturm was appointed abbot, but before settling to his work he went to Italy to inspect the discipline and regulations of the religious houses there, in order that he might the better govern his own. From its foundation Boniface made this monastery exempt from any interference of reigning bishops, and ordered that the abbot should be considered responsible to the Pope alone. On the accession of Lullus to the archbishopric, however, he persuaded Pepin to disgrace Sturm, and deprive him, hoping thereby to get the government into his own hands. Sturm was soon restored, and lived peaceably at Fulda till his death in 779.

Stylites. [SIMÉON STYLITES.]

Suarez, FRANCIS.—A Spaniard and famous Jesuit [b. at Grenada in 1447; d. at Lisbon, 1517]. He entered the society at the age of seventeen, and became famous for his great knowledge of divinity. He was professor successively at the colleges of Alcalá, Henares, Salamanca, and Rome. As he grew older he determined to live a quiet, retired life, in order to devote himself entirely to his literary works, of which, at his death, he left twenty-four volumes. His writings were mostly concerned with the questions of scholastic theology, and the philosophy of Aristotle.

Sub-Deacons.—The principal of the minor orders of the clergy in the early Church. They were ordained without imposition of hands. Their chief duties were to prepare the sacred vessels for the Eucharistic Service, and deliver them to the deacon at the proper time, and to attend at the doors of the church during the celebration of the Communion. They were also the bishop's messengers, employed by him to convey letters to foreign churches.

Sub-Delegate.—The assistant of a Judge-Delegate. The Sub-Delegate has the power of trying minor cases, though he cannot by law judge those of any importance; because, although he may be qualified, he is supposed not to have the experience necessary for such a responsibility.

Sublapsarians. [INFRA LAPSARIANISM.]

Subscription, CLERICAL.—By Canon 36 of 1603, "No person was to be received into the ministry except he shall first subscribe to these articles following:—

"[1] That the King's majesty, under God, is the only supreme governor of the realm, and of all other his highness's dominions and countries, as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal; and that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within his majesty's said realms, dominions, and countries.

"[2] That the Book of Common Prayer, and of ordering of bishops, priests, and deacons, containeth in it nothing contrary to the Word of God, and that it may lawfully be used, and that he himself will use the form in the said book prescribed in public prayer and administration of the Sacraments, and none other.

"[3] That he alloweth the book of Articles of Religion agreed upon by the archbishops and bishops of both provinces, and the whole clergy, in the convocation holden at London, in the year of our Lord God 1562, and that he acknowledgeth all and every the Articles therein contained, being in number nine-and-thirty, besides the ratification, to be agreeable to the Word of God."

Which subscription, as it seems by the same and the following Canon, must be before the bishop himself: "And, for the avoiding of all ambiguities, such person shall subscribe in the form and order of words, setting down both his Christian and surname, viz.:—

"I, N. N., do willingly and ex animo subscribe to these three Articles above-mentioned, and to all things that are contained in them."

"And if any bishop shall ordain any, except he shall first have so subscribed, he shall be suspended from giving of orders for the space of twelve months."

But by 28 and 29 Vict., c. 122, ss. 4, 9, and 31 and 32 Vict., c. 72, the only oath now required to be taken is that of allegiance, which is as follows:—

"I, —, do swear that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to her Majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to law. So help me God."

Between the passing of 28 and 29 Vict., c. 122, and 31 and 32 Vict., c. 72, the oath to be taken was one of allegiance and supremacy contained in 21 and 22 Vict., c. 48, s. 1.

By s. 11 of 28 and 29 Vict., c. 122, no oath is to be taken in the Ordination Service. In 1866 the Convocation of Canterbury passed a new Canon in conformity with this Act, and repealing the former Canon 36. The new Canon has, however, mutatis mutandis, the same provisions and penalties as the old one.

By 14 Car. II., c. 4, s. 13, "Every governor or head of every college and hall in the universities, and of the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eton, within one month next after his election, or collation, and admission into the same government or headship, shall openly and publicly, in the church, chapel, or other public place, of the same college or hall, and in the presence of the Fellows and scholars of the same, or the greater part of them then resident, subscribe unto the Nine-and-thirty Articles of Religion mentioned in the statute of Eliz., c. 12, and unto the Book of Common Prayer, and declare his unfeigned assent and consent unto and approbation of the said Articles and of the same book, and to the use of all the prayers, rites and ceremonies, forms and orders in the said book prescribed and contained, according to this form following:—

"I, A. B., do declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in and by the book intitled The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the Use of the Church of England; together with the Psalters or Psalms of David, pointed as they are to be sung or said in churches; and the Form and Manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons."

And all such governors or heads of the said colleges and halls, or any of them, as shall be in holy orders, shall once at least in every quarter of the year (not having a lawful impediment) openly and publicly read the Morning Prayer and Service in and by the book appointed to be read, in the church, chapel, or other public place of the same college or hall, upon pain to lose and be suspended of and from all the benefits and profits belonging to the same government or headship, by the space of six months, by the Visitor or Visitors of the same college or hall; and if any governor or head of any college or hall suspended for not subscribing unto the said Articles and book, or for not reading of the Morning Prayer and Service as aforesaid, shall not at or before the end of six months next after such suspension subscribe unto the said Articles and book, and declare his consent thereunto as aforesaid, then such government or headship shall be ipso facto void."

This Act has been repealed as to the universities and the colleges named therein, but not as to the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eton, as to which it is still in force.

It is provided by 10 Geo. IV., c. 7, commonly called the Roman Catholic Relief Act, s. 16, as follows:—

"Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to enable any persons otherwise than as they are now by law enabled to hold, enjoy, or exercise any office or place whatever, and by whatever name the same may be called, of, in, or belonging to the colleges of Eton, Westminster, or Winchester, or any college or school within this realm."

Substance.—This word signifies in theological language the essence, that which constitutes a thing what it is. Thus the word is applied in the Athanasian and Nicene Creeds to God, and signifies the Divine Nature—that which distinguishes God from His creatures, and in which all His Divine attributes inhere. [HYPOSTASIS.] In the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation it is held that the substance of the Sacrament is changed, while the accidents of bread remain. The word has no connection whatever with material form or solidity, as used in ordinary language.

Substrati. [GENUFLECTENTES.]

Succession. [APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION.]

Suffragan Bishops.—This title expresses [1] the relation of all provincial bishops to their Metropolitans. Thus the Bishops of Durham, Newcastle, Carlisle, Liverpool, Manchester, Chester, Ripon, Sodor and Man, are Suffragans of York, and the other English bishops of Canterbury. [2] All bishops having foreign titles, who have from time to time been employed on occasional duties in England. Such were Danish bishops brought over by Canute, and foreign refugee bishops. [3] Those who have at different times been consecrated for the special relief of aged bishops and overgrown dioceses. Sometimes these were consecrated with, sometimes without, right of succession. Among the latter, in Saxon times, were the Bishops of St. Martin's, who are said to have been the predecessors of the Archdeacons of Canterbury. One or two of these, however, did actually succeed to the primacy. [4] Suffragan bishops appointed under the Act 26 Hen. VIII., c. 14. In that reign there were consecrated Suffragan Bishops of Dover, Bedford, Bristol, Taunton, Hull, Shaftesbury, and Westminster. In the American Church the suffragans are known as assistant bishops, and are consecrated with promise of succession.

Suffrage.—The original meaning of this word was that of unanimous assent. It is used in the Prayer Book to designate short petitions which are uttered by the congregation with one voice; as, for example, the versicles after the Creed in the morning and evening services, and those at the end of the Litany. The word itself is found in the Order for the Consecration of Bishops, where the rubric orders the use of the proper Suffrage.

Sufis.—A class of Mahomedans found for the most part in Persia. They fully acknowledge the authority of the Koran, but in some respects differ from the pure Moslems. The derivation of the name is disputed, some saying that it comes from an Arabic word meaning "pure," others that it is derived from the word soof, meaning "wool," referring to the woollen garments worn by the priests. Their chief doctrine is that man being made in the image of God, must possess to a certain degree the qualities of God, and is for that reason His representative. A Sufi therefore tries to forget the world and to live in a state of abstraction, quite ignoring the use of any outward signs or ceremonies. [MYSTICISM.]

Suger, Abbot of St. Denis [b. near St. Omer, about 1081; d. at St. Denis, 1151], was educated at St. Denis with Louis VI., whose councillor he became on Louis's accession. He was made abbot in 1122, but did not assume the charge of the monastery till 1127, when, influenced by the religious revival of the time, he changed from a courtier to an ascetic. He continued to be a politician and statesman, and after the death of Louis VI. was made regent during the minority of Louis VII., and again during the Crusade of 1149. Suger's aim was to consolidate the French monarchy as a Divinely appointed institution, and he never abandoned the scheme, though strongly opposed by feudal lords and others. Throughout his life he was the leading spirit of the French Government.

Suicerus, JOHN CASPAR [b. at Zürich in 1620, d. 1684].—He went through a course of study at home, and then travelled through France, where in 1640 he made the acquaintance of Admiral Capellus and several other eminent French Protestants at Montauban. On his return to Zürich he devoted himself entirely to the study of the works of the early Christian Fathers. He became famous both as a philologist and a divine. His chief work was Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus Græco-Latinus, and he made very full annotations on the Nicene Creed.

Sumner, JOHN BIRD, Archbishop of Canterbury [b. at Kenilworth, 1780; d. at Addington, 1862].—He was educated at Cambridge, became successively an assistant master at Eton, Rector of Mapledurham, and Canon of Durham. His brother, Charles Richard, had meanwhile, through the almost unlimited power of Lady Conyngham over George IV., been made King's Chaplain, Bishop of Llandaff, and Dean of St. Paul's in 1826, and Bishop of Winchester in 1828. The same year John Bird Sumner was made Bishop of Chester. When the controversy arose out of the Tracts for the Times the two brothers threw themselves strongly to the opposite side, and the Bishop of Chester was regarded as the leader of the "Evangelical" party. In 1848, on the death of Archbishop Howley, Dr. Sumner was translated from Chester to Canterbury. He was not a learned man nor a powerful thinker, but he was everywhere recognised as a man of deep personal piety, and those who knew him best loved him. Probably the greatest flaw in his public life, as in that of his brother, was nepotism. The relations of both prelates were all provided with rich Church preferments, and both bishops died wealthy. Archbishop Sumner's acquiescence in the GORHAM JUDGMENT [q.v.] drew upon him a bitter attack from the then Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Philpotts, who declared that he had betrayed the doctrines which he was sworn to defend, and that he would never again hold communion with him: Both brothers set their faces against the revival of Convocation, but when at length the obstacles were removed, and Convocation resumed its sittings after more than a century of silence, they both joined very heartily and usefully in its deliberations. Both bishops in their time were reckoned good preachers, but only occasional sermons of theirs have been published. Archbishop Sumner's best published work was Apostolic Preaching considered in an Examination of St. Paul's Epistles [1815], which went through many editions. His Practical Exposition of the New Testament [9 vols.], though marked by much piety and gentleness of spirit, is of little value to the student. His brother, the Bishop of Winchester, held the See till 1869, when he resigned it, but lived till 1873—"the last prince bishop," as he was styled, the incomes of the bishops being thenceforth much less than had been the case before the appointment of the Ecclesiastical Commission.

Sunday. [SABRATH.]

Sunday Schools, as a properly organised system, were founded in 1781 by ROBERT RAIKES [q.v.], a printer of Gloucester, who formed the plan of collecting a few children from the streets on Sundays, and with the aid of teachers instructing them in religious knowledge. The improvement in the conduct and morals of the children was so marked that in 1783 Raikes published an account of his success in the Gloucester Journal, of which he was the editor; it was reprinted in the London papers, and the subject attracted much attention. The example of Raikes was followed in several towns, and in 1785 a society was formed for the establishment and maintenance of Sunday-schools in all parts of the kingdom, a large sum being expended in the payment of teachers. So great was the expense, that after Raikes's death many schools were closed for lack of funds, and hence originated the system of gratuitous instruction by teachers of a higher class than those who had been employed for the first schools. In 1803 the Sunday School Union [q.v. under SOCIETIES] was formed, to secure continuous instruction by unpaid teachers, and to publish books and tracts for the benefit of the cause. The first Sunday-schools united secular with religious instruction; but in later years the establishment of an organised system of week-day schools has removed the necessity of teaching reading and writing on Sundays. The Society of Friends have, however, retained the practice in their large Sunday morning schools, with great benefit as regards influence over the working classes above the age of childhood. [FRIENDS.] Sunday-schools were introduced into Scotland, Ireland, and America in the years immediately following their establishment in England; the Scottish Society for Promoting Religious Instruction among the Poor was formed in 1796, and the Irish Sunday School Society was founded in 1809, though a system of Sunday teaching had prevailed for some years previously. In later times they have become general in connection with all Protestant Churches on the Continent, and in England the Roman Catholics have established numerous Sunday-schools. In the year 1883 it was ascertained that since the census of 1851 the children in the Sunday-schools of the Church of England had increased about 138 per cent., of the Methodists 136 per cent., of the Baptists 129 per cent. (and Congregationalists probably about the same, but no returns were made up); of the Presbyterians 313 per cent. (owing to previous neglect in Scotland), and of the Society of Friends 720 per cent. It is believed that in the schools of the United Kingdom there were in 1885 about 650,000 teachers and 6,000,000 scholars.

Superaltar [called also in the Roman Church Antimensium].—A portable altar which, having been consecrated, is put into a wooden frame. This name is wrongly applied to the re-table, a shelf put upon or behind the altar for the vases and cross.

Supererogation, WORKS OF.—In the Roman Church, good works done beyond those which God absolutely requires for eternal salvation. The merit of all such works is gathered up, and may be given to those who have not done enough. This doctrine is defended by Matt. xix. 21, where, it is alleged, our Lord distinguishes between works necessary to eternal life, and works which make perfect. The Greek Church rejects this doctrine, and it is not mentioned in the Council of Trent, but is held by all Romanists. [INDULGENCES.]

Superstition.—The error of those who, in their opinions of the causes on which the fate of man depends, believe or disbelieve without judgment or knowledge, and found upon their ideas the observance of unnecessary rites and observances. The word is derived from the Lat. superstes, "one who stands by," "a witness," and therefore signifies "standing beside any person or fact in stupid and helpless amazement." The well-known passage in the Authorised Version in which St. Paul addresses the Athenians as too superstitious (Acts xvii. 22) signifies literally "more fearful of the gods than others." The word was applied to those who consulted soothsayers or believed in omens, or were terrified at eclipses. Probably the Apostle used the word with the intention of showing the philosophers on Mars Hill that the religion which he preached was not one of blindness and ignorance like that of the unreasoning multitude, but was founded on reason. "Superstition" was a word applied by three heathen writers of the Apostolic times—Tacitus, Suetonius, and Pliny—to Christianity; and as Cardinal Newman shows, they meant by it a belief in an unseen Lord who takes strict account of sinful deeds [Essay on Development, p. 223.]

Supplication.—The Litany is sometimes known by the name of the General Supplication. In the days of the early Christian Church it was appointed to be used at times of great persecution and distress. These immediate dangers no longer threaten us, but it was deemed appropriate, at the time of the compilation of the Prayer Book, to retain this ancient service on account of the many dangers and evils to which we must always be exposed in this life.

Supralapsarians [Lat. supra lapsum, "before the fall"].—The name given to those Calvinists who hold that God, independently of the good or evil works of man, pre-ordained the fall by an absolute decree. This doctrine was held by Calvin and Beza, to whom the name Supralapsarians was given at the Synod of Dort by the Arminians, or INFRA-LAPSARIANS. [q.v.]. It was excluded from all Reformed confessions, as implying that God is the author of sin.

Dr. Gill gives us the following account of Supralapsarians:—"Of these, some are of opinion that man was considered as to be created or creatable, and others as created not fallen. The former seems best, that, of the vast number of individuals which came up in the Divine mind whom His power could create, those whom He meant to bring into being He designed to glorify Himself by them in some way or other. The decree of election respecting any part of them may be distinguished into the decree of the end and the decree of the means. The decree of the end respecting some is either subordinate to their eternal happiness, or ultimate, which is more properly the end, the glory of God: and if both are put together, it is a state of everlasting communion with God, for the glorifying of the riches of His grace. The decree of the means includes the decree to create men, to permit them to fall, to recover them out of it through redemption by Christ, to sanctify them by the grace of the Spirit, and completely save them; and which are not to be reckoned as materially many decrees, but as making one formal decree; or they are not to be considered as subordinate, but as co-ordinate means, and as making up one entire medium: for it is not supposed that God decreed to create man, that He might permit him to fall, in order to redeem, sanctify, and save him; but He decreed all this that He might glorify His grace, mercy, and justice. And in this way of considering the decrees of God, they think that they sufficiently obviate and remove the alandorous calumny cast upon them with respect to the other branch of Predestination, which leaves men in the same state when others are chosen, and that for the glory of God. Which calumny is that, according to them, God made man to damn him; whereas, according to their real sentiments, God decreed to make man, and make man neither to damn him nor save him, but for His own glory, which end is answered in them some way or other. Again, they argue that the end is first in view before the means, and the decree of the end is, in order of nature, before the decree of the means: and what is first in intention is last in execution. Now, as the glory of God is last in execution, it must be first in intention, wherefore men must be considered in the decree of the end as not yet created and fallen; since the creation and permission of sin belong to the decree of the means, which, in order of nature, is after the decree of the end. And they add to this, that if God first decreed to create man, and to suffer him to fall, and then out of the fall chose some to grace and glory, He must decree to create man without an end, which is to make God to do what no wise man would; for when a man is about to do anything, he proposes an end, and then contrives and fixes on ways and means to bring about that end. They think also that this way of conceiving and speaking of these things best expresses the sovereignty of God in them, as declared in the 9th of Romans, where He is said to will such and such things, for no other reason but because He wills them.

"The opponents of this doctrine consider, however, that it is attended with insuperable difficulties. We demand, say they, an explanation of what they mean by this principle, 'God hath made all things for His glory.' If they mean that justice requires a creature to devote himself to the worship and glorifying of his Creator, we grant it; if they mean that the attributes of God are displayed in all His works, we grant this too: but if the proposition be intended to affirm that God had no other view in creating men, so to speak, than His own interests, we deny the proposition, and affirm that God created men for their own happiness, and in order to have subjects upon whom to bestow favours.

"We desire to be informed, in the next place, say they, how it can be conceived that a determination to damn millions of men can contribute to the glory of God. We easily conceive that it is for the glory of Divine justice to punish guilty men; but to resolve to damn men without the consideration of sin, to create them that they might sin, to determine that they should sin in order to their destruction, is what seems to us more likely to tarnish the glory of God than to display it.

"Again; we demand how, according to this hypothesis, it can be conceived that God is not the author of sin? In the general scheme of our Churches, God only permits men to sin, and it is the abuse of liberty that plunges man into misery; even this principle, all lenified as it seems, is yet subject to a great number of difficulties; but in this scheme, God wills sin to produce the end He proposed in creating the world, and it was necessary that men should sin: God created them for that. If this be not to make God the author of sin, we must renounce the most distinct and clear ideas.

"Again; we require them to reconcile this system with many express declarations of Scripture, which inform us that God would have all men to be saved. How doth it agree with such pressing entreaties, such cutting reproofs, such tender expostulations, as God discovers in regard to the unconverted? [Matt. xxiii. 37].

"Lastly, we desire to know how is it possible to conceive a God who, being in the enjoyment of perfect happiness, incomprehensible and supreme, could determine to add this decree, though useless to His felicity, to create men without number for the purpose of confining them for ever in the chains of darkness, and burning them for ever in unquenchable flames?" [Gill's Body of Divinity, vol. i., p. 299.]

Supremacy, PAPAL. [PAPAL POWER, GROWTH OF.]

Surcingle. — A belt worn by some English clergy to fasten the cassock round the waist.

Sureties. — A name used for SPONSORS [q. v.]. We find it in the Prayer Book, both in the Baptismal Service, "Forasmuch as this child hath promised by you, his sureties, to renounce the devil and all his works," etc.; and in the Catechism, "Because they promise them both by their sureties." They are so called because they assure to the child baptised the benefit of that spiritual instruction required by the Church, preparatory to the ratification of his baptismal vows at confirmation.

Surplice [derived from the Latin word superpellicium, "over-garment"]. — It is a white garment worn by the clergy since the twelfth century at all services of the Church; and later it has been used by any actually engaged in that service. The white garment is supposed to be the emblem of the light and purity of the Gospel. In the churches of Denmark and Sweden it is worn only for the celebration of the Communion.

Sursum Corda ["Lift up your hearts"]. — The exhortation of the priest to the people in the Eucharistic office, which is followed by the response, "We lift them up unto the Lord." It is the opening sentence of what is called "The Preface," a portion of the office which is found almost word for word in all the Liturgies which have come down to us.

Susanna, Sr. — St. Susanna is said to have been the niece of Pope Caius. The Emperor Diocletian wished her to marry his son, but she had made a vow of virginity, and refused to marry; so he ordered that she should be immediately executed. She is supposed to have suffered in the year 295. Her festival is August 11th. A famous church in Rome has borne her name since the fifth century, and gives a title to a cardinal-priest.

Suspension. — A clergyman, being judged guilty of any crime, is liable to suspension either of office or salary, according to the decision of the bishop. We find notices of the practice in the history of early Christian times, and it has lasted with various modifications to our own day.

Sutton, CHRISTOPHER [b. in Hampshire in 1565, d. in 1629]. — He was educated first at Hart Hall, Oxford, and afterwards at Lincoln College, where he graduated in 1589. After holding several livings he was made Prebendary of Westminster, and afterwards of Lincoln. His chief works were: Disce Mori, Disce Vivere, and Godly Meditations upon the most Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Swabia, HOUSE OF. [HOHENSTAUFEN.]

Sweden, CHURCH OF. — The date of the conversion of the Swedes to Christianity is uncertain, but probably it was about the year 830, through the preaching of Ansgar, a monk of Westphalia. At first his labours, and those of his followers, were attended with little success; but in the reign of Olaf Skotkonung, the Anglo-Saxon Siegfried and some monks came from England and converted the people, and Sweden became a Christian State in 1026. In the reign of Eric the Saint the first monasteries were founded [1150-60]. In 1163 the Archbishopric of Upsala was established. Still Paganism lingered in Sweden; in fact, the greater part of the country remained Pagan till the middle of the thirteenth century. The Roman Catholic religion took firm root in Sweden, but in 1524 the King, Gustavus I., was very desirous of setting on foot the Reformation teaching in his dominions, though possibly induced by a political rather than a religious motive. He sent to Germany for missionaries, and several returned with the embassy, the most energetic being Olaf Petri, who soon translated the Bible into the Swedish language. As soon as the new doctrines had gained firm hold on the affections of the people, the King set to work to despoil the Roman Church, and seize the revenues for himself. All the Roman Catholic clergy, who naturally objected to these proceedings, were ejected from their livings, and Lutherans put in their place. In the course of two years the whole country became Lutheran, taking as their groundwork of faith the Confession of Augsburg. [REFORMATION, page 878.] But it was not to be expected that the people would be willing to give up all their rites and ceremonies in an instant at the command of the King, and many Roman customs prevailed in the Lutheran service long after their disappearance in other Protestant countries. Even at the present day the clergy wear coloured vestments, and wafer bread is used at the Communion, which is commonly called Heug Maessa ["high mass"]. After the Peace of Westphalia the whole country seemed to sink into a state of total indifference to religion, and when an attempt was made by the Pietists of Germany to rouse the people, the movement was not only treated with contempt, but laws were actually passed [1713 and 1726] forbidding them to hold services—the clergy of Sweden, too, upholding this course adopted by the Government. There is such an intimate connection between the Church and the secular power, that Church discipline is completely overborne by civil statutes. For instance, every person who has been confirmed is obliged by law to go to the Communion once a year; every child must be baptised within eight days after its birth, without any reference to the wishes of the parents on the subject. The government differs from that of the Lutheran Church of Germany in that it is Episcopal. They have one Archbishop and eleven Bishops, but the King is always called, and looked upon, as the head of the Church. There is a bishop's court which manages everything both with regard to patronage and ritual. In some cases this court has absolute power in the appointment of benefices, in others the parishioners nominally have a voice, but the court is so arbitrary, and restricts their choice so much, that the privilege is virtually of no use. The rules concerning the ritual of the Church are also very strict. The minister may utter no extemporary prayer, and may not preach on any other text than those provided either in the Epistle or Gospel for the day, as is also the case in some parts of Germany. Religious feeling is almost dead, though of late years there has been an attempt made at a revival, and in the north especially thousands have separated themselves from the Established Church. They have set up pastors, and carry on services as well as they can in face of the bitter persecution to which they are subjected. The theological students at the two Universities of Upsala and Lund have consequently greatly decreased.

Swedenborg.—Emanuel Swedenborg, the founder of the body of Christians called after his name, was born at Stockholm, 1688; died in London, 1772. His father was Bishop of Skara, in West Gothland, and much esteemed by Charles XII. Emanuel was sent to the University of Upsala, where he distinguished himself in physics and mathematics. For some years he held the office of Assessor of the Metallic College, which he retained under Charles's successor, Ulrica Eleonora, who, in recognition of his great talents, gave him a patent of nobility in 1719. He still spent much time at his favourite studies, and in 1733 completed his Opera Philosophica et Mineralia, 3 vols. The first volume treats of the elementary world, and the two latter of the mineral kingdom. His next work was Philosophy of the Infinite. In 1745 he gave up secular pursuits and his official duties, believing himself called in a miraculous manner to a holy office, which he thus himself describes:—"I have been called to a holy office by the Lord Himself, who most graciously manifested Himself before me, His servant, in the year 1745, and then opened my sight into the spiritual world, and gave me to speak with spirits and angels, as I do even to this day. From that time I began to publish the many arcana which I have either seen, or which have been revealed to me, concerning heaven and hell, concerning the state of man after death, concerning true Divine worship, and concerning the spiritual sense of the Word, besides other things of the highest importance, conducive to salvation and wisdom." He says he was permitted several times to enter heaven, and describes the abodes of bliss as "arranged in streets and squares like earthly cities, but with fields and gardens interposed." Of the angels he writes:—"From all my experience, which has now continued for several years, I can say and affirm that angels, as to their form, are altogether men;" and elsewhere he affirms that they marry as mankind do. He also gives an account of a Council of Angels:—"There was shown to me a magnificent palace, with a temple in its inmost part, and in the midst of the temple was a table of gold, on which lay the Word, and two angels stood beside it. About the table were three rows of seats; the seats of the first row were covered with silk damask of a purple colour; the seats of the second row with silk damask of a blue colour; and the seats of the third row with white cloth. Below the roof, high above the table, there was seen a spreading curtain, which shone with precious stones, from whose lustre there issued forth a bright appearance as of a rainbow when the firmament is clear and serene after a shower. Then suddenly there appeared a number of clergy sitting on the seats, all clothed in the garments of their sacerdotal office. On one side was a wardrobe, where stood an angel who had the care of it, and within lay splendid vestments in beautiful order. It was a Council convened by the Lord, and I heard a voice from heaven saying, 'Deliberate;' but they said, 'On what?' It was said, 'Concerning the Lord the Saviour, and concerning the Holy Spirit.' But when they began to think on these subjects they were without illustration; wherefore they made supplication, and immediately light issued down out of heaven, which first illuminated the hinder part of their heads, and afterwards their temples, and last of all their faces; and then they began their deliberations."

Of Swedenborg's capacity, knowledge, and perfect honesty, there can be no doubt: but his diary of the year 1744, which was discovered so late as the year 1858 by Herr Klemming, royal librarian at Stockholm, leaves no doubt in the minds of ordinary readers that in that year he suffered a deplorable mental derangement, from which he never recovered. This may account for his strange moral judgments; for Swedenborg classes David and St. Paul amongst the lost, while Louis XIV. and George II. are amongst the distinguished angels! It is also noteworthy, that while he narrates visits of angels from all the known planets, there are none from Uranus and Neptune, then undiscovered.

Swedenborg explained his peculiar views in a work of eight vols. 4to., Arcana Cælestia, in which he presses his doctrine of CORRESPONDENCES, a science which he says had been lost since the time of Job till now restored to him by a special revelation from the Lord. He says that there are certain links of harmony and correspondence existing between the natural and spiritual worlds, so that matter and spirit are connected by an eternal law, and wherever an analogy exists, it must be a predetermined "correspondence." By this test he tries the authenticity of Scripture, and rejects as uncanonical all those books in which he fails to discern a spiritual sense. In the Old Testament he only accepts twenty-nine books, and rejects the whole of the New Testament but the four Gospels and the Apocalypse. When once the spiritual sense of a word is ascertained by the spiritual key, its application is uniform wherever it may occur. Thus water is said to be the representative of truth; blood of Divine truth, etc.

The writings of Swedenborg are held by his followers to contain the true exposition of Scripture as revealed to him by a special illumination from the Lord.

Amongst his chief doctrines are that the Last Judgment has already taken place (in 1757), that the "New Jerusalem" has come in the form of the "New Church," and that the power and glory of Christ as shown in this New Church is spiritually His second coming. Of the Trinity he held and expressed views resembling those of Sabellius. He rejects the doctrine of justification by faith alone, and says, "To fear God and to work righteousness is to have charity; and whoever has charity, whatever his religious sentiments may be, will be saved." The resurrection is to be that of a spiritual body only, which will pass at first into a state of purgatory, where the good will be fitted for heaven, and the bad, having rejected all truth, will be utterly lost. His system is remarkable further for the prominence and permanence which it assigns to the relation of the sexes.

The last twenty-seven years of Swedenborg's life were spent in writing and publishing his books, which were mostly printed in Amsterdam. He does not seem to have anticipated the immediate formation of a separate Church, and therefore did not disavow himself from the Lutherans. He died in Great Bath Street, Coldbath Fields, on March 29th, 1772, and was buried in the Swedish Church in Ratcliffe Highway.

For the history of the sect of Swedenborgians after their founder's death see NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH.

Swithun, St., Bishop and patron saint of Winchester.—Very little is known of the early days of this saint, but that he was educated and brought up in the city of Winchester, of which See he afterwards became bishop. He was the chief adviser of King Egbert (the first King of all England), who so respected him for his learning and piety that he entrusted him with the education of his eldest son, Ethelwulf. On the death of Helmstan, Bishop of Winchester, in 852, Ethelwulf appointed Swithun, who was now prior of his monastery, to be his successor, and he was consecrated by Ceolnoth, Archbishop of Canterbury. He worked day and night for the good of his diocese, affecting great simplicity of life, even journeying about from place to place on foot. In 854, at a council held at Winchester, Swithun persuaded the King, in consequence of the increasing number of the clergy, the formation of new parishes and the building of new churches, to grant the tithes, or tenth part of his land throughout the country, to the Church, free from all taxation, and Ethelwulf took this charter himself to Rome for the approval and confirmation of the Pope.

Swithun died July 2nd, 862, and was buried in the churchyard of the cathedral, according to his wish, "where the rain of heaven might fall on him." It is said that in 971 the monks of Winchester, thinking it more honour to their master that he should be buried within the walls of the building, resolved to move his body, but that when they began, July 15th (St. Swithun's Day), the rain came down in such torrents that they were obliged to wait, and that it continued raining for forty days. Hence the common saying amongst us that if rain falls on St. Swithun's Day we may expect it to continue for forty days. In 1093, when the cathedral restoration was finished by Bishop Walkelin, the relics of St. Swithun were translated with great pomp from their former resting-place to the new church.

Syllabus, THE PAPAL.—A list of heresies condemned by Pope Pius IX. in 1864, the number of which amounts to eighty, probably in imitation of the eighty heresies mentioned by Epiphanius as existing in the first three centuries. Its name in full is A Syllabus containing the Principal Errors of our Times, which are noted in the Consistorial Allocutions, in the Encyclicals, and in other Apostolical Letters of our most Holy Lord, Pope Pius IX. Many of the errors condemned are those rejected also by the Church of England and all orthodox Protestants, while other points attacked are some of the chief tenets of Anglican divinity. The syllabus is divided into ten sections, and attacks Rationalism, Pantheism, Latitudinarianism, Socialism, errors concerning the Church, society, natural and Christian ethics, marriage, the power of the Pope, and modern Liberalism. At the same time all the doctrines of Romanism are upheld, the infallibility of the Pope and of the Roman Church, and a protest is made against progress, and against any departure from established customs. The Syllabus, like all other documents put forth by the Pope, claims to be infallible, and as such has been firmly opposed by all members of Protestant communions.

Sylvester, POPE. [POPEs.]

Symbol [Gr. symbolon, "that which is thrown together with"].—This word is used to denote a sign or emblem. Thus in the Christian Church, Baptism and the Lord's Supper are symbols, or visible signs of an invisible salvation. In a stricter sense of the word, the sign of the cross is a symbol. There are also symbolic attributes, by which artists distinguish the various evangelists, etc. The name "symbol" was also formerly given in the Church to creeds and confessions of faith, and particularly to the Apostles' Creed, probably because it was used in times of persecution as a watchword or mark by which Christians were distinguished from all others.

Symphorosa, St.—Her husband, Getulius, having suffered under Hadrian's persecution, she determined to live in retirement, and devote herself to the education of her seven sons. But before long she was disturbed. The Emperor had built a magnificent palace on the banks of the Tiber, and resolved to dedicate it solemnly to the gods, so he demanded by an oracle what was the will of the gods, and the answer was that nothing could please them so long as Symphorosa and her sons were allowed to remain Christians. He ordered that they should be brought before him, and commanded them to offer sacrifice. On their refusal, his order was that the mother should be severely beaten in the Temple of Hercules, and then hung up by her hair till she died; but as these torments failed to shake her constancy, a stone was tied to her neck, and she was drowned in the Tiber. Seven posts were then erected in the same temple, to which her sons were tied, and on which their limbs were stretched and dislocated, and they were despatched in various manners. The date of their martyrdom is uncertain, but it was about the year 120.

Synagogue [derived from the Greek word synagō, "to assemble"] is the name of an ordinary Jewish place of worship. Synagogues do not seem to have existed before the Captivity; till then the Tabernacle and Temple had been the only sacred buildings recognised by the Jews. This may be accounted for in various ways, but notably because in those days copies of the Law were very scarce, and it is a common saying that where there is no Law there cannot possibly be a synagogue. But after the return of the Jews these places of worship increased rapidly—in fact, in the time of the Maccabees there were as many as 480 in Jerusalem. The services held in them then, as now, consisted almost entirely of the reading of the Law, read first in Hebrew and then translated to the people by an interpreter standing near, interspersed with forms of prayers, also in Hebrew. Services are generally held on Monday evening, Friday evening, and Saturday; in some places on Thursday as well. The interior arrangements of the Synagogue are very simple. The walls are whitewashed and covered with texts of Scripture. The desk stands in the middle, and is enclosed by a rail in a space large enough to hold three or four persons, and beyond it stands the ark of the covenant, which contains the copies of the Law. All the congregation sit so as to face the ark. The Law may be read and expounded by any one, females alone excepted.

Synaxarion.—The name of an ecclesiastical book of the Greeks, which contains a brief collection of the lives of the saints, and a short explanation of each festival and holy day. It is printed both in the language of the learned, and also in the so-called vulgar Greek for the use of the common people.

Syncellus.—In the course of the history of the Church, this term has had several significations. At first it was the name given to any monk who shared a cell with another. Later on it became the custom for the bishop of a province, or the abbot of a monastery, to have one of the lower orders in constant attendance on him day and night, and this attendant was generally called the Syncellus. It is not easy to trace how the term got its next application—that of designating an ecclesiastical dignitary. Most probably at first the Syncelli were merely what we should call chaplains; but when it became the custom for them to succeed their masters, they kept their former names, and thus the highest dignitaries, especially of the Greek Church, were generally called Syncelli. At one time there were a great many attached to the Church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, but these were afterwards reduced to two. The rank of these, however, was one of the highest in the Church, for they stood immediately below the Patriarch, taking precedence of the Metropolitan Archbishops.

Syncretism.—The attempt to reconcile discordant views, particularly those relating to religion. It is supposed to take its name from the island of Crete, the inhabitants of which, says Plutarch, endeavoured to protect themselves from attacks from without by compacts between themselves—though these compacts were never respected in times of peace. At the time of the Reformation the Protestant parties of all countries were called upon to unite in opposing the Roman See, and so the name became applied to those who strove to sink all minor differences in this cause. In the sixteenth century, when the study of ancient literature was revived in Italy, the philosophy of Plato was more favoured by some than that of Aristotle; but other scholars, such as Francis Pico and Besaron, although they admired Plato, were unwilling to give up entirely the study of Aristotle. These received the name of Syncretists—probably in this case derived from a Greek word meaning “to mix.” The word again came into general use, particularly in Germany, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, when George Calixtus, professor of theology at Helmstadt, advocated the union of all religious parties; but as the two great parties in that country, the Lutherans and the Reformed, have been separated since the time of Luther, and union between the two is regarded with horror by the deepest thinkers on both sides, it may be understood that Calixtus's scheme, which united not only these two, but all religious parties, was treated with contempt. From that time the name Syncretist has been one of odium.

Synergists [Gr. synergia, “co-operation”].—A name given to some German divines of the sixteenth century, who held that the co-operation of man was needed in the work of renovation in addition to the grace of God. This was first stated by Melancthon in opposition to Luther, who in his De Servo Arbitrio [1524] strongly maintained justification by faith alone. But before his death his views became modified, and he had partially adopted the doctrine of free-will and of good works. These views were explained by Pfeffinger, Professor of Leipzig, who, with his followers, received the name of Synergists from Amsdorf and others, who opposed them. In 1560 the “Synergistic controversy” was at its height, the leaders being Victorin Strigel, a pupil of Melancthon, and Matthias Flacius Illyricus, both of whom were professors at Jena. The discussion took place at Weimar. The Duke of Saxony favoured Strigel, but the latter refused to sign a paper drawn up by Flacius's party, and fled to Leipzig, refusing to return to Jena in spite of all overtures of friendship. Three disciples of Melancthon were called to Jena, but on the accession of a new duke in 1567 these were turned out, and Flacians took their place. Gradually the Synergists became absorbed in the Majorists. [MAJOR, GEORGE.]

Synesius, Bishop of Ptolemais, or Cyrene, born about 375, formerly a disciple of the celebrated Hypatia of Alexandria, and a believer in the Platonic philosophy. He became a convert to Christianity and was baptised. In 398 he was sent to Constantinople, and was ordained priest, and in 410 chosen Bishop of Ptolemais, and consecrated by Theophilus of Alexandria. He was very unwilling to accept the post, urging that he held some views which were not orthodox, and that he was married and did not wish to be separated from his wife; but his arguments were overruled, and his wife was allowed to live with him. The date of his death is not known, but it was probably about 414. His works were edited by Dionysius Petavius, at Paris, and contain 155 epistles, a treatise De Regno, etc.

Synod.—A synod is generally understood as being the same as a COUNCIL [q.v.], but Brande gives the following distinction, that a Council is a general assembly of the episcopal, provincial, or national order, while a synod is a convention of the inferior clergy of a diocese under its bishop or archdeacon.

Synodals.—This word is used in two senses:—[1] For the constitutions made in diocesan synods, which were formerly read in the churches on Sundays; [2] for a small payment reserved by the Bishop when he settled the revenues of a church upon the incumbent. This word must be derived from synod, and it is supposed that the custom of synodals originated in a duty paid by the clergy when attending synods.

Syrian Catholics.—The name given to converts to the Roman Church from the sect of the Syrian Jacobites, the followers of Jacob, a Eutychian. The conversions began about two centuries and a half ago, when Jesuits went to Aleppo, and persuaded the Jacobite clergy to seek reunion with Rome. They secured for themselves the right to retain certain ancient characteristic observances of their own, which the Roman Church is generally ready to grant so long as submission to the Pope is unreservedly given. Their ecclesiastical chief, who was present at the Vatican Council, is the Patriarch of Antioch, who also administers the affairs of the See of Jerusalem. Under him are eleven dioceses. In 1840 the number of Catholics belonging to the Syrian rite was reckoned at 30,000, and it is said to have recently considerably increased.

Syrian Christians. [MENDÉANS.]

Tabernacle.—Another name for BALDACCHINO [q.v.].

Taborites. [BOHEMIA.]

Tai-ping.—A recent sect among the Chinese, founded by Hung-saw-tseuen, a man of humble birth, who had unsuccessfully sought Government employment. Some Christian tracts which came into his hands caused him to renounce idolatry, and then he pretended to have visions from a man whom he chose to identify with Christ, who commanded him to root out the Tartars and establish a new kingdom of Tai-ping, or Universal Peace. In 1840 he gathered together a number of followers and proceeded to uproot idolatry. He took on himself the name of Heavenly Prince, and declared himself to be equal with Christ in power on the earth. His followers he called "God-worshippers," and he made five of them princes with himself. In 1850 they fought against the Government, and succeeded in taking Nankin, and made further conquests, but they were repulsed at Shanghai, in 1860, by the English and French, and though they afterwards rebelled many times, they were finally suppressed by General Gordon. Their religion was a mixture of Chinese and Christian; polygamy was allowed, and while they adopted baptism, they rejected the Lord's Supper.

Tait, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury [b. 1811, d. 1882], was the first Scotchman who ever attained that position. He was born in Clackmannanshire, educated at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Oxford, became tutor of his college (Balliol), and did much to raise that college to the high place in the University which it has ever since occupied.

He made a great mark when, in 1841, he drew up a remonstrance, in which three other tutors joined him, against the Tracts for the Times, which led to the series being stopped. In 1842 he became head-master of Rugby School, and in 1849 Dean of Carlisle. During his tenure of the last-named office he was the most active member of the Oxford University Commission, appointed by the Government of Lord J. Russell. In 1856 he was made Bishop of London, when he threw himself with his usual energy and organising power into the work of his diocese, and established the Bishop of London's Fund for the evangelisation of the vast masses of population which had hitherto been untouched by religious influence. He preached indefatigably, and in 1866, on an outbreak of cholera, visited the infected districts with his wife, carried away the orphaned children, and established them in an orphanage. In 1868 he was made Archbishop of Canterbury, and by common consent was the most powerful holder of the Primatial See for many generations. It is also agreed that he did work of incalculable value, and which probably no other man could have done, in preserving peace in the Church amidst controversies and movements of unusual heat and fervour. The act of his Primacy which called forth the most criticism was the Public Worship Regulation Act, the opposition to which, and the difficulties which it caused, led him to move for a Royal Commission to consider the working of the Ecclesiastical Courts. Unhappily his death occurred before the Commission could make its report. He was greatly beloved by all who personally knew him, those who disagreed with his opinions included. He was the author of many reviews and sermons, and of six Charges, as well as of a volume, Dangers and Safeguards of Modern Theology. His great logical power made him an acute and powerful controversialist, especially against scepticism and unbelief. For theology, in the strict sense of the word, his training was not suited; "he was made for governing rather than teaching," said his most intimate companion. His views may be termed Broad Evangelical; in politics he was a Whig, becoming more Conservative as he grew older. His only son died in 1878; he left three daughters.

Talmud [from the Hebrew, lamed, "he has learned;" "doctrine"].—It signifies among the modern Jews an enormous collection of traditions, illustrative of their laws and usages, forming twelve folio volumes. There are two works which bear this name—the Talmud of Jerusalem and the Talmud of Babylon. Each of these consists of two parts—the Mishna, which is the text, and the Gemara, or commentary. The Mishna, or Second Law, is a collection of Rabbinical rules and precepts, made in the second century of the Christian era. The whole civil constitution and mode of thinking, as well as language of the Jews, had gradually undergone a complete revolution, and were entirely different in the time of our Saviour from what they had been originally. The Mosaic books contained rules no longer adapted to the situation of the nation; and its new political relations, connected with the change that had taken place in the religious views of the people, led to many difficult questions, for which no satisfactory solution could be found in their law. The Rabbis undertook to supply this defect, partly by commentaries on the Mosaic precepts, and partly by the composition of new rules, which were looked upon as almost equally binding with the former. These comments were called the oral traditions, in contradistinction to the old law or written code. This was the work of the Rabbi Jehuda (or Juda) Hakkadosh, surnamed the "holy," who was the ornament of the school of Tiberias, and is said to have occupied him forty years. The commentaries and additions which succeeding Rabbis made were collected by the Rabbi Jochanan ben Eliezer about 230 A.D., under the name Gemara, the Chaldaic word for completion.

The Mishna is divided into six parts:—

[1] Seeds or fruits; [2] Feasts; [3] Women; [4] Damages; [5] Sacrifices and holy things; [6] Purifications. These are divided into sixty-three treatises, and these again into chapters. It contains traditions said to have been delivered to Moses during the time of his abode in the mount, which he afterwards communicated to Aaron, Eleazar, and his servant Joshua; by these they were transmitted to the seventy elders; by them to the prophets, who communicated them to the men of the great Sanhedrim, from whom the wise men of Jerusalem and Babylon received them. According to Dr. Prideaux, they passed from Jeremiah to Baruch, from him to Ezra, and from Ezra to the men of the Great Synagogue, the last of whom was Simon the Just, who delivered them to Antigonus of Socho, and from him they came down in regular succession to that Simeon who took our Saviour in his arms; to Gamaliel, at whose feet Paul was educated; and last of all to Rabbi Judah, who committed them to writing in the Mishna. This Mishna and Gemara together formed the Jerusalem Talmud, relating chiefly to the Jews of Palestine; but after most of the Jews had removed to Babylon, and the synagogues of Palestine had well-nigh disappeared, the Babylonian Rabbis, Ase and Abina, gradually composed new commentaries on the Mishna, which were completed about 500 A.D., and thus formed the Babylonian Talmud. This Talmud is the one most valued by the Jews; an abridgment of it was made in the twelfth century by Maimonides, in which he rejects some of the greater absurdities with which the Gemara abounds. The latter is written in a somewhat coarse style, but the Mishna is much purer. The language of the Talmud is Aramaic or Chaldee, and is without vowel-points, and abounds in abbreviations. The Mishna was first printed at Naples, 1492; the Talmud of Jerusalem at Venice about 1523; the Babylonian Talmud, which is four times as large, at Venice about 1520. It has been translated into Latin, and is also published in most of the European languages.

Tanquelin or Tanchelm.—A native of the Netherlands who, in 1115, excited great commotion in Antwerp and drew after him a numerous sect. He is said to have proclaimed that he was God, and, though a layman, celebrated the Mass and held a public celebration in honour of his espousals with the Virgin Mary. He had imbibed the opinions and spirit of the Mystics; he treated with contempt the external worship of God, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper and the rite of baptism, and held clandestine assemblies to propagate more effectually his visionary notions. But besides this, he inveighed against the clergy, and declaimed against their vices with vehemence and intrepidity, and it is quite possible that the blasphemies attributed to him were false charges by a vindictive priesthood. He stayed some time in Utrecht, and then went to Antwerp, where he was slain by a priest in 1124 or 1125. His followers maintained his doctrines for some time after his death, but were brought back to the Church by St. Norbert. Mosheim seems to consider him rather as a mystic, and it is very possible that the other charges against him may have been grossly exaggerated by the Roman clergy, as in other cases.

Taoism or Taonism.—One of the three religions of China. Its founder, Lao-tse, lived, according to tradition, six hundred years before Christ. Tao is a word meaning "way," and so far as the mystical teaching can now be understood, it would seem that Tao represented the course which Lao-tse thought a man should pursue in order to overcome evil. The whole teaching was vague and unsatisfactory; but its followers made an advance on those that had preceded them, by believing firmly that ultimately good would gain the victory over evil. The head of the body was a sort of patriarch, who had the power of transmitting his dignity and office to a member of his own family, and the descendants of the first are said to have held the office for centuries. They attributed to their Tao, whom they regarded as the first being of the universe, various qualities, such as eternity and invisibility; but they do not seem to have regarded him as being in any way able to assist or comfort his followers. All they had to do was to contemplate him and his virtues—and to strive to keep in the Way. When BUDDHISM [q.v.] appeared, which offered something more tangible, both Taoism and FOISM [q.v.] to a great extent disappeared, though some traces of the teaching of both are still to be found in Chinese theological books.

Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople [b. about the middle of the eighth century; d. 806].—He was of patrician birth, and was made Secretary of State during the reign of Constantine and Irene; the Empress favoured him because he practised image-worship, and upon the resignation of the Patriarch Paul in 784 she appointed Tarasius his successor. He was a layman, but a general council was called which agreed to recognise him as Patriarch, and to settle at the same time the disputes which had led to the resignation of his predecessor. A synodal letter was sent to Pope Adrian to urge him to accept Tarasius, and his consent being gained, a council was held, first at Constantinople in 785, and afterwards at Nicæa in 787, by which it was decreed that image-worship should be restored in the Greek Church.

Targum.—A name given to the Chaldee paraphrases of the books of the Old Testament. They are called paraphrases because they are rather comments than literal translations. During the Babylonish exile, Chaldee became more familiar to the Jews than Hebrew, so that when the Hebrew text was read in the synagogue, it was often followed by an exposition in Chaldee. It is probable that this was the case even in the time of Ezra, since, in reading the Law to the people in the Temple, he explained it to make it understood by the people [Neh. viii. 7-9]. Though the custom of making these explanations was a very ancient one with the Jews, they had no written Targums before the era of Onkelos and Jonathan, who lived about the time of our Saviour. Onkelos is said to have been the friend of the elder Gamaliel; his Targum is the most esteemed of all, and copies are to be found in which it is inserted verse for verse with the Hebrew; it is short and simple, and in style approaches nearly to the purity of the Chaldee as it is found in Ezra and in Daniel. It is a paraphrase of the Pentateuch only. There are two other Targums on the Pentateuch, one by Jonathan ben Uzziel, and the Targum Jerushalmi; but they are both recensions of that by Onkelos. Another Jonathan wrote a Targum on the greater and lesser prophets, and he is much more diffuse than Onkelos, running often into an allegorical style. The Targum of the Rabbi Joseph the Blind is upon the HAGIOGRAPHIA [q.v.]. He has written on the Psalms, Job, the Prophets, the Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther; his style is a corrupt Chaldee, with a mixture of words from foreign languages, and therefore his Targum is the least esteemed. The Targum Jerushalmi seems to be merely a fragment of some ancient paraphrase now lost; even the Pentateuch is not complete. The only Targum on Daniel is a Persian version supposed to belong to the twelfth century. These Targums were first printed at the close of the fifteenth century. They were published in Buxtorf's Hebrew Bible at Basle in 1610.

Tate, NAHUM [b. in Dublin, 1652; d. in London, 1715], a poet and dramatist. He became Poet-Laureate in 1690. He was improvident and intemperate, and took sanctuary as a debtor in the precincts of the Mint, at Southwark, where he died. We mention him here as the joint composer, with Dr. Nicholas Brady, of the Metrical Version of the Psalms, which till recently was bound up with the Common Prayer Book in place of the older version by Sternhold and Hopkins. The first twenty Psalms were published in 1695, and followed by a New Version of the Psalms of David, Fitted to the Tunes used in the Churches, by N. Tate and N. Brady [London, 1698].

Tatian.—A heresiarch of the second century, a Syrian and disciple of Justin Martyr. He was at first looked on as a man of eminent piety and great learning, which he used in the service of Christianity. But after the death of Justin he left Rome and returned to the East, where he opened a school in Mesopotamia; here he fell into the errors of the MARCIONITES and VALENTINIANS. He afterwards became the leader of the ENCRATITES. He wrote an apology for Christianity, entitled an Address to the Greeks, which is usually printed with Justin's works; and besides this he composed a harmony of the four Gospels, called DIATESSARON [q.v.], from which he omitted the proofs of Christ's humanity.

Tauler, JOHN [b. 1290, d. 1361], a famous German mystical divine, was born and died at Strasburg. He entered the Dominican Order about 1308, and distinguished himself in the study of scholastic philosophy, and especially of mystical divinity; he was called the "Illuminated Divine." He studied for a time in Paris, and on his return to Strasburg took to preaching. He was possessed of great eloquence, and was esteemed one of the best preachers of his age; his sermons were written in Latin, but delivered in German. He harangued against the vices of the time with plainness and zeal, and thus incurred the displeasure of the monks. He did not spare the Pope, and though he had done good work amongst the sufferers whilst the Black Death was raging, his bishop forbade his preaching, and he had to remove to Cologne. Little more is known of his life; he returned to his native city to die. He was a man of great integrity and purity of life. The most celebrated of his devotional works is Nachfolge des armen Lebens Christi. His sermons have been translated into modern German, and some editions of them were printed in 1498 and 1580. His early sermons are more metaphysical, the later ones simple and popular. Arndt wrote his life in 1689, and an account of his life and times was published in 1857 by Susannah Winkworth, with an interesting preface by Charles Kingsley.

Taylor, ISAAC [b. at Lavenham, Suffolk, 1787; d. at Stamford Rivers, Essex, 1865].—An eminent lay religious essayist and controversialist, the son of an Independent minister of the same name, brother of Charles Taylor, who edited Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, and of Jane Taylor, the authoress of Hymns for Infant Minds and Contributions of Q.Q.

For a time Isaac Taylor followed his father's profession of engraver and artist, and he invented a machine for engraving illustrations and for printing patterns on calico from rollers. But he soon adopted a literary career, his first publication being a translation of Herodotus. Among his works are Natural History of Enthusiasm, Natural History of Fanaticism, and Spiritual Despotism, three popular and original works; History of the Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times; The Process of Historical Proof; The Physical Theory of Another Life; The Restoration of Belief, etc. When the Tractarian Movement began at Oxford, he wrote a book to warn the unlearned against trusting too much to the practices and authority of the early Church; this he called Ancient Christianity and the Doctrines of the Oxford Tracts for the Times; it shows considerable learning and power of argument. In his later years he joined the Church of England, and at this period wrote a reply to Colenso, called Considerations on the Pentateuch; also Wesley and Methodism, Loyola and Jesuitism, many essays, reviews, etc., etc.

Taylor, JEREMY.—One of the greatest prelates in the Anglican Church, and perhaps its greatest preacher [b. at Cambridge, 1613; d. 1667]. He was the son of a barber. His education was commenced at Perse's Grammar School at Cambridge; in his fourteenth year he entered Caius College as a sizar, and when little more than twenty years of age took his M.A., and was admitted to holy orders. He attracted the notice of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, before whom he preached at Lambeth, and by whose influence he obtained a Fellowship at All Souls', Oxford, in 1636. About the same time he was made Chaplain in Ordinary to the King, and in 1638 Juxon, Bishop of London, presented him to the rectory of Uppingham. Soon after he formed, together with Laud, the acquaintance of Francis à Sancta Clara, a learned Franciscan friar, and this exposed him to the accusation of being at heart attached to the Roman Church, a charge to which his love of splendid ceremonial and ascetic turn of mind lent plausibility; he, however, at a later period solemnly denied the truth of the assertion. Taylor's first notable publication, Episcopacy Asserted, gained for him a D.D. in 1642: during the next three years he accompanied the Royal army in the Civil Wars, but his living being sequestered by the Parliament after the defeat of the Royalists, he retired to Newton in Carmarthenshire, where, with Wyatt of St. John's College (afterwards Prebendary of Lincoln) and Nicholson (afterwards Bishop of Gloucester), he opened a school. The Earl of Carbery, who lived in the same county, appointed Taylor his domestic chaplain. During the next thirteen years his greatest works appeared; in 1647 he published his Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying, with its just Limits and Temper; showing the unreasonableness of prescribing to other men's faith, and the iniquity of persecuting differing opinions; in 1650 the Life of Christ and The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living; in 1651 The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying, some sermons, and the Discourse of the Divine Institution, Necessity and Sacredness of the Office Ministerial; in 1652 a Discourse on Baptism, its Institution and Efficacy upon all Believers; in 1653 some additional sermons; in 1654 The Real Presence and Spiritual of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament; in 1655 the Guide of Infant Devotion, or the Golden Grove, and the Unum Necessarium, or the Doctrine and Practices of Repentance; in 1657 a Collection of Polemical and Moral Discourses, etc.; and in 1660 his famous Ductor Dubitantium, or the Rule of Conscience in all her General Measures. He went to London for the purpose of publishing this last, and there signed the declaration of the Royalists on April 24th, and was thus brought under the favourable notice of Charles II., who at the close of the year made him Bishop of Down and Connor. He was consecrated in January, 1661, and a month later made a member of the Irish Privy Council; the following month the small See of Dromore was also entrusted to him, and before the end of the year he was elected Vice-Chancellor of the University of Dublin. Taylor was not happy in his preferences, which were attended by great and peculiar difficulties, owing to the revolution through which religion had passed. The Protestant or Episcopal religion was very unpopular in Ireland: the services were in English, which the native population could not understand, and though the bishop laboured zealously he met with little success. He was attacked by fever at Lisburn, and died on Aug. 13th, 1667, at the age of fifty-five. Jeremy Taylor has sometimes been called the modern Chrysostom, on account of his golden eloquence. The character of his mind fitted him to write with the greatest success on devotional subjects, and of this power Bishop Heber thus speaks:—"Whether he describes the duties, or dangers, or hopes of man, or the mercy, power, and justice of the Most High; whether he exhorts or instructs his brethren, or offers up his supplications in their behalf to the common Father of all, his conceptions and his expressions belong to the loftiest and most sacred description of poetry, of which they only want what they cannot be said to need—the name and the metrical arrangement.”

Taylor, ROWLAND.—One of the martyrs of the Reformation in Queen Mary's reign. He was Chaplain to Archbishop Cranmer, who made him Vicar of Hadleigh in Suffolk; in the reign of Edward VI. he introduced the use of the new Prayer Book and abolished the Mass. He was commanded by Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, to restore the performance of Mass, and on his refusal was in 1553 summoned to appear in London before him. He was kept in the King's Bench prison for nearly two years, and then called to answer certain other charges that were brought against him, particularly that of having married. He defended the right of priests to marry so well, and brought so many convincing passages from the Bible to support his argument, that the judge was unable to give sentence of divorce, but deprived him of his living, and a few weeks later he was sentenced to death. He was taken back to Suffolk, and burnt at the stake at Aldham Common, near Hadleigh, Feb. 8th, 1555. He is said to have been an ancestor of Jeremy Taylor.

“Teaching of the Twelve Apostles;” or, “THE TEACHING OF THE LORD BY THE TWELVE APOSTLES TO THE GENTILES,”—for the work has a double title—is the name of part of a Greek MS., containing also other Christian writings, discovered in the year 1877 by Philotheus Bryennius, Metropolitan of Nicomedia, in the Library of the Most Holy Sepulchre, belonging to the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. This volume is dated 1056. Bryennius edited and published the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles in 1883.

It has been supposed, with much probability, that the writer or compiler of this work—who is quite unknown—lived in Egypt, and from internal evidence a date must be assigned to the original, of which this MS. is a copy, not later than the first quarter of the second century [80–110 A.D.]. It may thus possibly be the oldest Christian writing after the books of the New Testament—perhaps even earlier than some of them. The subject-matter of this short treatise is the simplest of practical teaching, such as may well have been current in similar forms; and being taught orally and then committed to memory by those who had to teach others, was written down by some teacher in the form which we have in the Teaching. The work contains moral precepts, some rules as to Prayer, Fasting, Baptism, and the Eucharist, and the teachers of the Church, and ends with a solemn reference to the coming of the Lord and the Resurrection.

There is no sign of any Canon of the New Testament; only the “Gospel” or the “Commandment of the Lord” is referred to, most often according to St. Matthew, sometimes St. Luke, seldom quite word for word; sometimes there is a text agreeing with neither. There are no clear references to the writings of St. Paul, nor any signs of the influence of some special points of his teaching. The mention of the Twelve Apostles in the second title points to a time when, as in the body of the writing, the title Apostle was not confined to those subsequently called “The Twelve.”

One of the precepts for Sunday will give an idea of the style of the Teaching:—“And on the Day of the Lord come together and break bread, and give thanks after confessing your transgressions, that your sacrifice may be pure.”

To Deum Laudamus.—This hymn of the Church has always been sung at least once a week throughout the Western Church, and has always held a prominent place at coronations, enthronements, and public thanksgivings. Its authorship is unknown. It is called in the old Roman Catholic Breviaries Hymnus SS. Ambrosii et Augustini, and the tradition is that it was composed by these Fathers on the conversion of the latter. But there is no trustworthy evidence to support this tradition, and it now finds little acceptance. Another tradition is that St. Hilary of Poitiers is the author of the hymn. The oldest notice of the hymn in existence is in the “rules of Cæsarius of Arles,” who was consecrated bishop in 502, and is said to have drawn up these rules before his elevation. In these the hymn is named with other hymns which are to be sung at the morning service, and its mention there along with the Psalms of David implies that it had a recognised position, and was well known. We therefore have proof that it cannot be later than the middle of the fifth century. A learned writer in the Church Quarterly Review having subjected the hymn to a minute analysis, shows that of its twenty-nine verses a quarter are directly taken from Holy Scripture, the rest are traceable to liturgies and hymns of the Western Church. And as the Scriptural quotations are from the Vulgate version, which is the work of St. Jerome, this writer is enabled to fix the date between the life of this father and the year 450.

There seems no doubt that one of the verses with which we are so familiar is an incorrect form, owing to the mistake of a copyist. Nearly all the ancient copies read verse 16 thus, Thū ad liberandum mundum suscipisti hominem; non horruisti virginis uterum, i.e., “Thou for the deliverance of the world didst take manhood; thou didst not abhor,” etc. The copyist inadvertently left out mundum, and the suscepisti being afterwards found harsh was altered to concepiturus, and so the sonce became as we have it, “When thou tookest,” etc. Another variation is sedens for sedes in verse 18, which will make the meaning of the two verses, “Thou who sittest at the right hand of God, we believe that thou shalt," etc. And once more, all ancient MSS. have munerari, and not numerari, in verse 21, "Make them to be rewarded," etc. "The hymn contains," says Dean Comber, "first, an act of praise offered to God by us, and by all creatures, as well in earth as in heaven; secondly, a confession of faith; declaring [1] the general consent unto it, [2] the particulars of it, concerning every Person in the Trinity, and more largely concerning the Son, as to His divinity, His humanity, and particularly His incarnation, His death, His present glory, and His return to judgment; thirdly, a supplication grounded upon it: [1] for all His people, that they may be preserved here and hereafter; [2] for ourselves, who daily praise Him, that we may be kept from future sin, and be pardoned for what is past, because we trust in Him."

Teetotalism.—A teetotaler is a total abstainer from alcoholic drinks. The word tee-total is an emphasised form of total. It originated with Richard Turner, of Preston, who, at a temperance meeting in 1833, asserted that "nothing but the te-ta-total will do."

Abstinence from strong drink, though with other objects than the promotion of temperance, dates from very early times. The Nazarite took a vow, either for a certain number of days or for life (as Samson and St. John the Baptist), to take no strong drink, and we have the Rechabites [Jer. xxxv. 6], as a tribe of hereditary teetotallers. But the Nazarite vow was essentially a sacrifice of the person to the Lord [Num. vi. 2], and in the case of the Rechabites was a sign of filial obedience. It was doubtless a protection, as well as a silent protest, against drunkenness, but these were not its primary objects, as they are with the various modern temperance societies. The Jewish sect of the Essenes also enjoined strict temperance in matters of drink. The Manichæan heretics of the third century rejected the use of wine, calling it "the gall of the Prince of Darkness," and earlier still the Ebionites and the Gnostic sect of the Encratites refused wine, and even communicated with water. In these cases wine was refused as a form of matter over which evil demons had special power. Later still, Mahomet absolutely forbade all intoxicating liquors to his followers.

Teetotalism originated at Preston, in Lancashire, chiefly—to their great honour—with a few working men. Seven persons signed the first total abstinence pledge, the name of Joseph Livesey being one of them, on Sept. 1st, 1832. Earlier pledges had allowed the use, in moderation, of wine and beer, spirits being always excluded, but from this time forwards teetotalism became the mark of all temperance societies.

The teetotal movement spread from Preston, and numerous other societies were formed, and in 1834 the British Temperance Association or League was founded. At the present time there are several large temperance societies based on total abstinence. One of the most important, the Church of England Temperance Society, had its origin in various parochial associations, and was formally originated in 1862, being accepted by Convocation, and sanctioned by the two Archbishops in 1873. It has the praiseworthy feature of a double platform, its "General" members, who only pledge themselves to promote temperance in all ways open to them, and its "Abstaining" members, who are pledged to total abstinence. The former section includes those who feel strongly on the subject of intemperance, but do not see their way to professing abstinence, whilst the latter section includes those who need the support of a solemn promise, and those who desire especially to influence others by their example. The pledge in this society is discharged on surrender of the card of membership.

It has been objected to teetotalers that they despise a good gift of God, and impose a needless vow, since every baptised person is pledged already to fight against "the world, the flesh, and the devil," in all forms, intemperance included. But it may be replied that to use the strong force of mutual association for the purpose of resisting this special temptation, is quite in accordance with the spirit of the Christian promise, and for the strong to deny themselves for the sake of the weak, is but to obey the spirit of St. Paul's injunction, "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves" [Rom. xiv. 21, xv. 1]. Those who know most of the horrors of drunkenness will be the first to overlook the teetotalers' errors of expression, and will be the readiest to give all the help they can to temperance associations until a great change has been brought about in the drinking habits of the working class, similar to that which has taken place in the habits of the classes above them—a change from widespread drunkenness to comparative sobriety.

One extreme into which many teetotalers have run is so serious as to require notice; the insistence upon some unfermented juice or syrup instead of wine at the Holy Communion. Although it may be conceded that the name wine was sometimes given anciently to a kind of unfermented grape jelly, or grape syrup, there is not the slightest reason for supposing that our Lord used anything but wine, i.e. the fermented juice of the grape, at the institution of the Eucharist, and such has been the practice of the Church ever since. It is therefore deplorable to bring discredit on the good cause of temperance by importing into it an error like that of the Manichæan sect of the Aquarians or Hydroparastate, who pretended to celebrate the Eucharist with water. The plea for this practice is that there are some reclaimed drunkards in whom the mere taste of wine rouses an uncontrollable desire for strong drink. It is surely possible, however, to select some natural wine which, diluted with water, will not recall the forbidden taste.

Telemachus.—A monk of the fifth century, who lived in the reign of Honorius and Arcadius. He left his convent to come to Rome, where one day, seeing some gladiators in the arena, he interfered to part them, and was stoned to death by the spectators, who took pleasure in that pastime. But his "works followed him," for in consequence of his murder the Emperor Honorius put a stop to the barbarous gladiatorial exhibitions.

Teleology [from the Gr. telos, "an end"] is the doctrine of ends, or the reasoning concerning the Divine purpose of all the created universe, and is applied to the argument from design in proof of the existence of God. Aristotle was the first to bring the word into philosophical discussion.

Tellier, MICHEL LE [1643-1719], a distinguished Jesuit, confessor to Louis XIV., and a bitter enemy of the Jansenists, was the chief promoter of the demolition of the celebrated house of Port Royal. He then forced upon the nation the bull UNIGENITUS [q.v.]. His violence was the cause of much of the odium which the Jesuits afterwards experienced, and paved the way for the abolition of their society.

Templars.—The first ecclesiastical order of knighthood; formed under Hugh de Payens at Jerusalem in 1119. They afterwards moved westwards, and lived chiefly in Paris. [MILITARY ORDERS.]

Temporalities.—In the office of institution to a parish it is said, "We authorise you to claim and enjoy all the accustomed temporalities appertaining to your cure," by which is meant the emoluments and property belonging to the church.

Ten Commandments.—The eighty-second Canon of the Church of England orders that "the Ten Commandments be set up on the east end of every church and chapel, where the people may best see and read the same." Queen Elizabeth in 1560 and 1561 ordered the displaying of the Commandments "at the east end of the chancel," and they should be fixed "on the wall over the Communion board." In 1564, in the Book of Advertisements, it is ordered "to set the Tenne Commandments upon the east walle over the said Table." At the present time there is a great variety of practice in this respect. Many churches are without them, the argument being used that, as every one possesses a Prayer Book and Bible, there is no longer the need which there was when these books were scarce to set them up publicly. But the defenders of the old practice reply that there is a true symbolism in the retention—namely, the declaration of Christian morals and Christian faith as the basis of the Church.

Tenison, THOMAS, Archbishop of Canterbury [b. at Cottenham in Cambridgeshire, 1636; d. at Lambeth, 1715].—He was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and after taking his degree in 1657, he for a time studied medicine, but took orders in 1659, and after several other preferments, Charles II. presented him to the living of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. In 1689 William III. made him Archdeacon of London, and in 1691 Bishop of Lincoln, and on the death of Tillotson, in 1694, Archbishop of Canterbury. He did much for the diocese of Lincoln, which had been greatly neglected. While at St. Martin's he endowed a free school, and built and furnished a library. He is also regarded as the founder of the library in St. Paul's Cathedral. He bequeathed large sums for charitable objects, and is said to have been a pious and most exemplary man in every station that he filled.

Tenth. [TITHES.]

Terminism.—A doctrine which occasioned a controversy at Leipzig in the seventeenth century, the chief movers in which were Reichenberg, who upheld the doctrine; and Ittig, who denied it. It is the belief that there is a terminus in each man's life, which only occurs once, after which he is no longer capable of receiving grace or pardon for his sins.

Terrier [from the Latin terra, the list and particulars of all real property belonging to a benefice].—It is ordered by the eighty-seventh Canon that a written survey of all lands, houses, etc., belonging to any benefice, shall be taken and lodged in the bishop's registry, where it may be referred to at any time; it is, however, usual to keep a copy of this document in the parish chest also.

Tersanctus, Trisagion, or Seraphic Hymn.—The hymn in the Communion Service which begins "Therefore with angels and archangels," etc., where the word Sanctus or holy is thrice repeated. This anthem is of very early origin in the Church, Chrysostom and Cyril of Jerusalem mention it as used in the liturgy in the fourth century, but it was probably even earlier.* The translation of the original Greek form of the Trisagion is, "O Holy God, O Holy Mighty One, O Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us." The preface to the hymn is recited by the priest alone, and then the choir and people join in the Sanctus. Originally it ended with the words, "Hosanna in the highest, blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord, Hosanna in the highest," but in 1552 this was altered to its present form, "Glory be to Thee, O God."

* Tertullian names its use in Africa in the second century.

Tersteegen, GERHARD, a German Pietist, with some tendency towards Mysticism, well known as the author of many German hymns, some of which are favourites in English. He was born Nov. 25, 1697, his parents being tradespeople, and made such progress in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, that his father was advised to devote him to study; but being unable to afford this, he was apprenticed to his brother-in-law, a merchant in Mulheim. Here, at sixteen years of age, he received his first religious impressions, which awakened so strong a desire for private meditation that at the close of his apprenticeship he learnt the more solitary business of ribbon-weaving, supporting himself thus with the greatest self-denial, until the pressing demand for his religious services induced him to accept the pecuniary assistance of a few select friends. All his life he suffered extremely from pain, illness, and extreme weakness, and his public exhortations and preaching were almost literally forced upon him. The spiritual power of his preaching was very great, the predominating doctrines of his teaching being the free grace of God in Christ, the experimental knowledge of Divine love in the soul, and practical union with the will of God. He translated the works of Madame Guyon, and other French mystics, and published several original works. Many of his letters and some of his discourses (from notes taken down) have been preserved, and he wrote many hymns; of these the one beginning:

"Lo, God is here! let us adore, And own how awful is this place;"

and that commencing

"Thou hidden love of God, whose height And depth unfathomed no man knows," are translations by Wesley. He died in 1769. His life and various remains have been published in English.

Tertiaries.—The name given to those who observed the third rule of St. Francis, which was less rigorous than the others; it was for such as, without abandoning their worldly affairs, or resigning their possessions, were nevertheless disposed to enter with certain restrictions into the Franciscan Order, and desirous of enjoying the privileges that were annexed to it. This rule prescribed fasting, continence, hours of devotion and prayer, mean and dirty apparel, gravity of manners, but it neither prohibited contracting marriage, accumulating wealth, filling civil employments, nor attending to worldly affairs. They were sometimes called Friars of the penance of Christ, and also Brethren of the Sack. Many other Orders besides the Franciscans had afterwards their Tertiaries, as the Fraticelli, the Dominicans, the Carmelites, and the Augustinians. In France and Italy the Tertiaries are mentioned by ecclesiastical writers under the names of Beghards and Beguins, also Bizochi and Bocasoti.

Tertullian, QUINTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENS, was the first of the ecclesiastical writers who wrote in Latin, and is therefore called by Milman "the father of Latin Christianity." He lived at the end of the second and beginning of the third century, under the Emperors Severus and Caracalla. The son of a centurion, he was born at Carthage, and brought up in the religion of his heathen parents, but was afterwards converted to Christianity, and became a priest at Carthage or Rome. It is known that he was married, from the fact that he addressed certain books to his wife; and it is hence inferred that the celibacy of the clergy was not yet customary. In middle age he joined the sect of Montanus, the asceticism and rigorous discipline of the Montanists being probably peculiarly attractive to a man of his austere character and vehement temper. Of his after life nothing certain is known, but it is said that he lived to a venerable age.

Tertullian was a voluminous author. His style is harsh, but vigorous and powerful. He seems to have been educated for the law (though he is not to be confounded with a namesake who was a jurisconsult about this time), and the effect of his training is apparent in his works. He treats Christianity, it has been said, as a client for whose defence he is retained, and does not scruple to make use of any argument. Some of his chief works are:—

1. His Apology, addressed to the governors of Proconsular Africa, under Severus. It contains a complaint that the mere name of Christian was made a test by judges; that Christians were not allowed to state their opinions; that they were frequently confounded with the Jews; and that ignorance and prejudice were the cause of the feeling against them. It also shows that Christians could not be suspected of disaffection, as they never attempted to avenge their wrongs, but offered supplications for the Emperors, and readily paid their taxes.

2. On the Prescription of Heretics. Prescription is a legal term, signifying the exception taken by a man when an attempt was made to dispossess him of his property, that the case should not be heard, on the ground that he has been in undisturbed possession for a number of years. Tertullian's book is an application of this principle, maintaining that it is unnecessary to argue with heretics on the merits of the case, for they are excluded from a hearing on account of their novelty.

3. Five books against the heresy of Marcion.

4. On Baptism, showing the necessity of the sacrament, and refuting the opinion that faith alone is sufficient for salvation.

Tertullian also wrote on Penitence, on Patience, on Martyrdom, on the Soul; besides books against Praxeas and Valentinus, and numerous other works. The work on the Trinity, sometimes ascribed to him, is not now considered genuine.

Test Act.—An Act passed in 1673, in the reign of Charles II., designed to protect the Established Church from the dangers it might be exposed to from Romanists and from Nonconformists of every denomination. It required all officers, whether military or civil, to take the oaths, and make the declaration against transubstantiation to the proper authorities within six months after their appointment.

Tetrapla.—A celebrated work of Origen [q.v.], comprising the four versions of the Old Testament in Greek, namely, those of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion, in parallel columns, to which he added two more, the original Hebrew in its own characters and in Greek type. It is sometimes also called the Hexapla.

Tetzel, JOHN [circa 1450–1519], a notorious vendor of indulgences, was born at Leipzig, where he studied theology, and in 1489 entered the Order of Dominicans and received permission to go into the world and preach. In 1502 he was chosen by the Teutonic Knights to preach the indulgences which they had gained in the Muscovite War, and he carried on for fifteen years a lucrative trade in them, practising shameful delusions upon the people. His life was so corrupt that at Innsbruck he was condemned to be drowned in a sack for the breach of the seventh commandment; in consequence of powerful intercession, the sentence was mitigated to perpetual imprisonment. Being also released from this, he travelled to Rome, was absolved by Pope Leo X. in 1516, and even appointed apostolic commissary, and the Archbishop of Mainz made him an Inquisitor. He now carried on the sale of indulgences with still greater effrontery, and travelled through Saxony in a waggon, provided with two large boxes, one of which contained the letters of indulgence, while the other was destined for the money obtained for them, a great part of which was for building St. Peter's at Rome. The latter chest had the inscription:—

Sobald das Geld im Kasten klingt, Sobald die Seel' gen Himmel springt.

"Soon as in chest the money rings,
So soon the soul to heaven springs."

He is said to have received ninety gold guilders a month, besides his expenses. He offered absolution for every sort of crime, not excepting murder, adultery, and perjury. It was in opposition to Tetzel's teaching that Luther, in 1517, nailed to the church door of Wittenberg his celebrated theses, being ninety-five propositions, whereof many were against the power of the Pope, the treasure of the Church, and the worth of indulgences. These were answered by Tetzel, and the students of Wittenberg burned the answers in the market place. Tetzel received a severe rebuke for having exceeded his authority from the Papal Chamberlain, Karl von Miltitz, who was sent to settle the dispute. This caused him so much chagrin that he retired to the Dominican convent in Leipzig, where he died of the plague.

Thanksgiving, THE GENERAL, so called to distinguish it from the special ones which follow it. It was compiled by Bishop Rainolds or REYNOLDS [q.v.] in 1661, and, says Canon Daniel, "appears to have been adapted from a thanksgiving composed by Queen Elizabeth after one of her progresses, which commenced as follows:—'I render unto Thee, O merciful and heavenly Father, most humble and hearty thanks for Thy manifold mercies so abundantly bestowed upon me, as well for my creation, preservation, regeneration, and all other of Thy benefits and great mercies exhibited in Christ Jesus.'" It is half thanksgiving and half prayer; a prayer for the spirit of thankfulness, and for grace to express that spirit both in word and deed. There is no authority for the repeating of it by the whole congregation, and the custom which exists of doing so in some churches probably arises from a mistaken idea of the word "general."

Theatines.—A religious order of regular priests, founded in 1524 by St. Cajetan, cf Thiene, and the Bishop of Chiety (anciently Theate), afterwards Pope Paul IV. They bound themselves, besides the usual monastic vows, to preach against heretics, to take upon themselves the cure of souls, to attend the sick and criminals, and to trust entirely to Providence, owning no property, and not even collecting alms, but waiting for the voluntary gifts of the charitable. In Italy, specially in Naples, the Order was numerous and influential; it spread into Germany, Spain, and Poland, but never in great numbers.

Theism.—Theists are those who believe in the existence of God, as distinguished from Atheists, but the name includes various degrees and phases of that belief. Theism is really the same as Deism (the former coming from the Greek, the latter from the Latin, word for God), and was first used by some writers in the seventeenth century instead of it. Deism—the chief form of anti-Christian thought in the last century—was a theory which implied the existence of a Personal God as a conclusion of the natural reason, but denied the need for, and the possibility of, any revelation besides the work of Nature. God had made the world once for all, and interfered no further in its concerns. This name fell into discredit, and similar opinions are now held under the term Theism. But as infidelity has, in the present day, become more open in its opposition to God, Theists have come to be ranged on the side of Belief, and the term now includes not only those holding the old Deistic opinions, but all who believe in a Personal God who is possessed of power, wisdom, and goodness; all, in short, who confess the God of Abraham. Indeed, Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans—as against Atheists of all kinds, as well Materialists as Pantheists—are properly called Theists. It follows from this that in using the word some further explanation is required as to the manner in which belief in God is held, since the man who believes in a special revelation and in miracles, and the man who believes in them, may both be Theists.

The title has been adopted by the Rev. Charles Voysey, once a clergyman of the Church of England, who, having published in sermons and other works opinions which were held to deny the doctrine of the Trinity and other Articles of the Faith of the Church, was prosecuted by his diocesan in the Court of Arches, and sentenced to deprivation in 1871. He then began to hold religious services in London, and gathered a congregation around him who call themselves “the Theistic Church.” Mr. Voysey, in his account of the movement, contends that the principles which he holds are found in the Hebrew Psalms and Prophets, and in less abundance in the devout words of Brahmins, Parsees, Greeks, Romans, in the Rig Vedas and Zendavesta. He declares that it was necessary to take a distinctive title, since he desired not to be confounded with Materialists, Agnostics, Pantheists, Socialists. Why not, then, be classed with Unitarians? “Because,” replied Mr. Voysey, “the majority of Unitarians, by their preaching and by their worship, put both the Bible and Jesus into what Theists regard as a false position, going so far as to use only the Bible for reading the Lessons, and naming the name of Christ very much, if not quite in the light of a mediator, and not unfrequently calling him “Master,” “Lord,” and “Saviour.” It is a special feature of his Theism to hold no man, however distinguished, as good, and no book, however venerable, is valuable in the light of an authority or in the position of a unique supremacy. His adherents say that the practice which they condemn has been the most fruitful of evil and error, of superstition and idolatry, among all the mistakes made in matters of religion. The leading principles of Theism he states as follows:—

1. That it is the right and duty of every man to think for himself in matters of religion.
2. That there is no finality in religious beliefs; that higher and higher views of God and of His dealings are always possible; and therefore it is to be expected and wished that future generations will improve upon the creed now held by Theists.

3. That it is our duty to obtain the highest and purest truth discoverable; and when it is discovered to proclaim it honestly and courageously. In like manner to denounce all detected error.

4. That personal excellence of character is necessary to a right knowledge of the goodness of God. Religion is thus based upon morality, and not morality upon religion.

5. That Theism is not aggressive against persons, but only against erroneous opinions.

6. That Theism recognises the value of all moral and religious truth, wheresoever it may be found.

The beliefs of Theism may be thus briefly expressed:—

1. That there is one living and true God, and there is no other God beside Him.

2. That He is perfect in power, wisdom, and goodness, and therefore every one is safe in His everlasting care.

3. Therefore that none can ever perish, or remain eternally in suffering or in sin; but all shall reach at last a home of goodness and blessedness in Him.

4. That, as we have been created for this goodness, it is our wisdom and duty to be as good as we can, and to shun and to forsake all evil.

The Theistic Liturgy is taken from that of the Church of England, all which clashes with Theism being omitted. Thus, the maledictions in the Psalms are all left out. There is a service for “The Dedication and Benediction of Children,” and new Services for Matrimony, and for Burial or Cremation. There are also Family Prayers appended, besides a collection of ninety-eight hymns. The Theists advocate the retention of the Establishment of the Church of England. Mr. Voysey estimates their numbers at about half a million, but this is very doubtful.

Theodicea [from Theos, “God;” and dikaioō, “I acknowledge as right,” or “vindicate”].—A vindication of the Deity in respect of the organisation of the world, and the freedom of human will. The term theodicea is applied to a defence of Theism against Atheism, which Leibnitz first undertook on a broad scale, by publishing in French, in 1710, his Essai de Théodicée, respecting the goodness of God, the liberty of man, and the origin of the Bible. In this work he maintains the notion that God had chosen, among all possible worlds, the most perfect. This was called optimism, and gave rise to much discussion until the latter part of the eighteenth century. Voltaire attacks it in his Candide.

Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury from 668 to 690.—He was a Cilician monk, born at Tarsus, and made Archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Vitalianus. His first concern was to improve the state of religion, and to make the government and discipline of the Church more regular and uniform; and his next business was to revive and encourage learning, and for this purpose he got together a considerable library of Greek and Latin authors. He was the first to enjoin the acquirement of Greek from candidates for the ministry. The churches in England at this time were engaged in the controversy regarding the keeping of Easter, and Theodore succeeded in getting them to agree to the Roman custom. He held a synod at Hertford in 673, where the duties of bishops, clergy, and laity were defined, and the Canons of the Roman Church were ordered to be observed in the English. In 680 he convened a Council at Heathfield in Kent. At this assembly the Eutychian and Monothelite heresies were considered, and the Church warned against them; and the English Church, as a proof of orthodoxy, accepted the five General Councils. At this council was present a celebrated singer, named John, who taught the Gregorian mode of chanting. Theodore restored the discipline of penance, and published a Penitential, hitherto unknown to the Latin world, by which the clergy were taught to distinguish sins into various classes, according as they were more or less heinous, private or public; and to determine the degrees of their guilt by their nature and consequences, the intention of the offender, the time and place in which they were committed, and the circumstances with which they were attended. This book also contained the mode of proceeding with respect to offenders; pointed out what penalties were suitable to the various classes of transgressions; prescribed the forms of consolation, exhortation, and absolution; and described fully the duties and obligations of those who were to receive the confessions of the penitent. This new discipline passed shortly from Britain to other countries, and became the model of all other penitentials; but in the eighth century its influence began to fail, and was at length supplanted by the new canon of Indulgences. Theodore subdivided the bishoprics of East Anglia and Mercia, forming new dioceses for Worcester and Leicester, and a difference arose between him and Wilfrid, Archbishop of York, about the division of that See. He died in his eighty-eighth year, a period which he declared a dream had told him that he should reach, but not exceed. He was buried at St. Augustine's, Canterbury.

Theodore of Mopsuestia.—So called from a city in Cilicia, of which he was made bishop in 394. He was educated in a monastery, and ordained priest. The famous Nestorius, Theodore, and John of Antioch were amongst his pupils. Though accused after his death of great errors, he was one of the most learned men of his time, and wrote many works, of which the only ones extant are a commentary on the Psalms, one on the twelve minor prophets, and some fragments which are to be found in Photius. He wrote a book against Origen, concerning allegory and history, censuring his fanciful interpretations of Scripture, and did not hesitate to apply most of his predictions to various events in ancient history. His orthodoxy was challenged at the fifth General Council in 553, in the dispute known as the THREE CHAPTERS [q.v.]. He is said to put forth in his writings the heresies concerning the doctrines of the nature and person of Christ which afterwards were developed by Nestorius; but during his lifetime he was much valued.

Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus or Cyricus, a town of Syria, lived in the fifth century, and was a disciple of St. John Chrysostom, and of Theodore of Mopsuestia. He was made Bishop of Cyrus about 420, and was so munificent to his city in building aqueducts and public baths, and in such favour with the Empress Pulcheria, that his diocese was left unburdened by new taxes. He sided with his Primate, John of Antioch, in the belief that the Council of Ephesus had been too hasty in condemning and deposing Nestorius, and they held a separate synod, in which they deposed St. Cyril. Theodoret also attacked St. Cyril's twelve anathemas, published in a Synod of Alexandria against Nestorius, but afterwards he was reconciled to Cyril, and sided with him against Nestorius. The Eutychians deposed him at the Robber Council of Ephesus, but he was re-established at the General Council of Chalcedon in 451. There is no mention made of him after this time, and some say that he died in 457, while others say ten years later. He was concerned with Theodore of Mopsuestia in the business of the Three Chapters. His works show that he was a man of great learning. He wrote an Exposition on the Epistles of St. Paul; and five books of Ecclesiastical History, beginning with the heresy of Arius [323], and ending with the time of Theodosius the Younger [428]; also a work on the philosophy and divinity of the ancients, called The Knowledge of the Evangelical Truth by the Philosophy of the Gentiles.

Theodosians.—A sect of Russian dissenters from the Established Church, who, under Theodosius, accepted Protestant teaching in 1552. The chief supporters of the movement were three monks who travelled from place to place condemning the worship of images; but their teaching does not seem to have taken great root. They built a Church at Vitepak.

Theodosius I., THE GREAT, Emperor of Rome, was a native of Spain. His valorous exploits and good conduct, and the services he had already rendered to the Empire, induced Gratian to admit Theodosius to an equal share of the government with himself. He received the purple in 379. Theodosius was possessed of remarkable powers of mind, and a truly noble character. He defeated the Goths in Thrace, and, falling ill at Thessalonica, he was baptised. He then went to Constantinople, whence he expelled the Arians, and gave their churches to the orthodox Christians, making Gregory Nazianzen Archbishop. In 381 he called together the second General Council, at which 150 bishops were present; they confirmed the Nicene Creed, and published several edicts for the punishment of heretics. He exercised also a religious influence over the West after the overthrow of Maximus and the establishment of Valentinian II. In 389 he came to Rome to receive the honour of a triumph, and abolished whatever traces of idolatry remained there. One blot on his character was an act of cruel vengeance executed on the people of Thessalonica, who, in 390, had in a tumult killed Botheric, the commander of the garrison, and dragged his dead body through the streets. This atrocious deed was reported to Theodosius in exaggerated colours by his minister Rufinus, whereupon he immediately gave orders for a terrible retribution. A body of his soldiers entered the town and murdered 7,000 of its inhabitants. This act he afterwards deeply regretted, and submitted to the sentence of his friend St. Ambrose of Milan, which required him to do penance for eight months, during which time he was not admitted to partake of the Eucharist. In 392 Valentinian was murdered in Gaul by Argobastes, who chose the rhetorician Eugenius as Emperor, on condition that he would tolerate idolatry. Theodosius defeated him, and became sole Emperor, but early in 395 he died of dropsy in Milan. He was certainly a remarkable man, and his death was deplored alike by Christians and heathen. Under his rule Paganism may be said to have received its death-blow.

Theodotians.—A sect which arose in the third century. Theodotus, a tanner of Byzantium, apostatised during a Roman persecution [192], and afterwards, to palliate his guilt, said that Christ, though of eminent virtue and born of a virgin by the operation of the Holy Spirit, was only a man, and that therefore he had denied man, but not God. For this heresy he was excommunicated. One of his disciples, Theodotus, a banker, organised a sect of Theodotians in 210, which was attacked in a book called The Little Labyrinth. Theodotus himself held that Christ, though born a man, became God at His baptism; but some of his followers thought He never became so, and others not till after His Resurrection. Artemon, a few years later, began to preach the same doctrines as Theodotus, and his followers were called Artemonites. The followers of Theodotus the banker are called Melchisedekians, because he held that Melchisedek was not a man, but a heavenly power, unbegotten, superior to Christ in that he is mediator for angels, whereas Christ only intercedes for men.

Theodotion, an Ebionite of Ephesus, who lived about the end of the second century, was a disciple of Tatian, and follower of Marcion. He afterwards became a Jew, and translated the Old Testament into Greek in the reign of Commodus. Origen observes that this is a free translation, in which important things are added and others are omitted. His version of Daniel was substituted by the ancient Church for that in the Septuagint.

Theologia Germanica.—The name of a book written in the fourteenth century by an unknown German author, the arguments of which are based on the doctrine of mysticism. As a devotional book it was placed by Luther next to the Bible, excepting only the writings of St. Augustine. It was written at a time of the wildest confusion—the time of the Papal schism, when the Church itself was, outwardly at least, a mass of corruption, and when the whole of Europe was devastated by war, pestilence, and famine. At such a period its calmness of tone is the more remarkable, and proves the strength of the writer's convictions. His object is to answer the questions which he has himself put forward, of the nature of goodness and sin, and of the end and aim of religion. He answers that goodness is simple submission to, and oneness with, God's will, and sin is independence; therefore, goodness can only be reached by a complete denial of self, and by such entire surrender to the Spirit of God that a man has no power over himself, and as it were abandons his own existence, his own desires, and the good works which he has done, and lies passive in God's hands to be disposed of according as He wills.

Theology [Theos, "God;" and logos, "doctrine"], the doctrine which God has given concerning Himself, the science which treats of the existence and character of God, and the relations in which we stand to Him. The word "theology" was in use among the heathens, who applied it to the works of those who speculated on the nature and worship of the gods, and therefore Hesiod and Plato were both regarded as theologians. Eusebius and Varro (as quoted by Augustine in his De Civitate) distinguished the heathen theology into three sorts: the fabulous (that of the poet), the natural (that taught in the philosophical schools), and the political (that of the priests and common people). The two former were open to the will of the professors to alter as they pleased, but the last was settled by authority, and could not be altered without national consent. The Roman Law was very strict on this point [Cic., De Legibus]. The state theology of the heathens consisted in the solemn service of the gods, and in attendance on the oracles and divinations.

The word theology is not used in the Bible. Its nearest equivalent is found in such phrases as "the mysteries of God," "the form of sound words," "sound doctrine" [1 Cor. ii. 7;

2 Tim. i. 13; Tit. i. 1, 9.] We have also in Scripture the words from which the term is compounded; e.g., ta logia tou Theou, "the oracles of God." [See Mark vii. 13; Rom. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12; 1 Pet. iv. 10, in the original.] But the Christian fathers applied the term especially to the doctrine concerning our Lord, and St. John, who wrote so much concerning Him as "the Word of God," is called "the Divine" Theologos. But the word was used in a wide as well as restricted meaning, and covered the whole subject of revealed truth.

The source of theology is regarded as twofold, natural and supernatural. The one is that which is revealed to man by the light of nature, i.e., by the voice of God in each man's conscience, and in the teachings of the creation. St. John distinctly claims a place for such theology when he speaks of "the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" [John i. 9]. Supernatural theology is that which comes by special revelation, embracing what we have learned from natural theology, but stating it more definitely, and establishing it by additional evidence, making known what could not have been known in any other manner. Thus the two do not conflict. Each has its own province. Reason, recognising its own inability to explain all the facts and mysteries of life and of the universe, does not proudly seek to be so independent of all knowledge as to refuse any revelation of Himself which the Unseen Creator may choose to make, and supernatural theology does not refuse the aid of reason or its claim to respect. Any doctrine which could be shown to contradict reason would have no claim on man's obedience.

Natural Theology teaches the existence of God, and leads us to believe that He governs the world; that it is in accordance with His will that men should be pious, just, benevolent; that the soul is immortal. Philosophers do not agree as to how the knowledge comes, whether from ancient traditions or from innate ideas, but it is the admitted fact that all over the world God "left not Himself without witness" [see Acts xiv. 15; xvii. 23; Rom. i. 19; ii. 14]. And thus the heathens confessed that they were the offspring of God; they taught that there is a duty incumbent on men to be pure, chaste, honest. But it is also manifest from the facts of history that Natural Theology was altogether inadequate to meet the purposes for which such knowledge is needed ["the world by wisdom knew not God"], though it confessed His existence, and felt and groped after Him. And in the moral systems which the philosophers taught, not only some great duties were omitted, but some of their virtues proved to be vices. When Cicero taught that the true reward of virtue is praise, and Zeno that we ought not to forgive injuries, and the Cynics that there is no shame in lewdness, and Aristippus that theft and adultery were admissible if the pleasure consequent upon them could be insured without after evil; all this teaching tended to the moral degradation of mankind. Hence heathenism involved a general depravity of manners, which extended not to the lower and uneducated classes only, but to the better informed, and even to the religious teachers themselves. The poetry of Horace and Ovid, beautiful as it is, gives terrible proof that the awful picture of heathen morals given in the first chapter of the Romans is not overdrawn.

Supernatural Theology was revealed to men "by divers portions and in divers manners." From the few particulars of the ancient world which Moses gives us we could hardly tell whether they knew of a general judgment to come. There was evidently a gradual development, an evolution, an increase of light from the faint dawn till the splendour of noonday in Christ.

When we come to separate the Science of Theology into different provinces, the following divisions will perhaps be regarded as covering the field. There is the theology of the Evidences, the grounds on which we believe that our religion is true. Such evidences are partly inward, partly outward. Men believe in God because He speaks to them. But they also have to weigh the evidences on which the Old and New Testament claim to be regarded as authoritative, that they are genuine and authentic. Then Theology is also exegetic, i.e. it aims to interpret and explain the Scriptures [exegesis, "the bringing out" of the meaning]. If Revelation is the source of Theology, it is plain that we cannot overrate the importance of the accurate knowledge of what the inspired writers said and meant. The study of Biblical Exegesis, or Hermeneutics, as it is sometimes called [from Hermeneuo, "to interpret"], is one which has received much more attention of late years than it formerly did; and this is one of the happiest signs of the time. Dogmatic Theology is that which gathers up and exhibits the results of exegetic theology by stating doctrines in a systematic manner and showing what their proofs are and whence derived. Polemic Theology [from polemos, "war"] has for its province to refute, cover, or defend the doctrines of a systematic or dogmatic theology. The epithet is said to have been first given by Friedman Beckmann, a theologian of Jena, in the seventeenth century. Many hold it in great disrepute, on the ground that sophistical arguments and unhallowed acts have been used in its service, and that the odium theologicum generated by religious strife has been an enemy to Christian charity. But it cannot be denied that the peace of the Church is dearly bought if the price be the sacrifice of truth. It behoves us to cast forth from our armoury every weapon which God does not approve; but the truth must not be left undefended nor error unassailed. The establishment of sound principles of criticism will be the surest method of terminating theological warfare. Practical Theology has its way prepared by all the departments of theological science that we have named; it depends on them, and at the same time is the crown of them all. It exhibits the precepts of religion and the motives which should guide us. There are those who declare that this department alone of theology is of importance, that all else is mere trifling. Thus Pope writes:—

"For modes of faith let senseless bigots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

But the answer to this is that the mode of Faith was revealed by God in order that men might be guided by it to better living, and therefore it cannot be lightly regarded. An opposite error is that which reserves all its admiration for the mysteries of faith. Religion is barren when it is cherished merely as a system of abstract truth, and it is weakness and inefficiency itself when regarded merely as a system of injunctions and prohibitions. Though it is a system of doctrines, it uniformly contemplates practical results, while the rules depend for all their power on the doctrines upon which they are based. Casuistry is the part of practical theology which applies itself to cases of conscience, decides difficulties as to what a man may or may not do in the way of duty.

When we survey the history of Theology from the beginning of Christianity until now, we discern the following divisions:—

1. The Apostolic Period.—One distinctive feature of Christianity has been the consistency of individual peculiarities with the presence of the Spirit. The records of the Lord's life and character in the four Gospels exhibit this feature in a remarkable manner. Though attuned by one and the selfsame Spirit, the individuality of each writer is never lost. The genuineness of their narratives is attested by the fact, which grows upon us the more attentively we peruse them, that the declared object of the revelation sent from Heaven accorded altogether with the effect upon the first hearers. Each of the authors of the Epistles, too, possessed his distinctive peculiarities. The last of the Apostles died; the age of the Twelve Apostles was contemporaneous with that of the twelve Cæsars—the beginning of the Kingdom of Christ and of the ungodly Empire which it was to overthrow—and the first age of the Church Theology was closed.

2. The Apostolic Fathers.—This name is given to the writers who succeeded the Apostles and Evangelists. Five writers have usually been reckoned under this head: CLEMENT, Bishop of Rome; IGNATIUS, POLYCARP, BARNABAS, HERMAS. Accounts of them will be found under their respective names. The transition has been truly said to furnish a striking proof of Biblical inspiration. The men who succeeded the sacred writers were men of holiness and piety; most, if not all, were martyrs; yet no one who reads their writings can fail to see the marked inferiority to those of the New Testament.

3. The Apologists are the next class of Theologians; those writers who came forth to lay at the feet of princes their protest against the charges of insubordination and immorality which were hurled against the Christians. [APOLOGUES FOR CHRISTIANITY.] The last of the Apologists anterior to the Middle Ages was Salvian.

4. The Early Heresies must be reckoned as a class of theological writings, arising from a falsification of the doctrines of the Gospel by admixture, now of Jewish doctrines and precepts, now of Oriental. The chief of these were the Gnostics and Manichæans. The anti-Trinitarian heretics came somewhat later: Praxeas, Noetus, Sabellius. Thus, while Christian Theology was at first occupied in preserving the Faith from corruption through mingling with heathen fables, its subsequent aim was to reduce the inequalities attendant on the assumption by Christianity of its dogmatic form to the standard of Catholic Faith.

5. Largely instrumental in this great work was the famous Alexandrian School of Theology, which, with all its faults, furnishes a beautiful chapter of ecclesiastical history. The works of its first great teacher, Pantænus, are lost, but his fame was excelled by that of his successor, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, and still more by that of ORIGEN, the father of Christian philosophy. The first condition of Theology was plain, simple, inartificial. It might be summed up in the belief that there is one God, whose Son came from heaven to bring remission of sins. But it was impossible that the world should accept this simple faith without inquiring into the reasons and meanings of these doctrines, and Origen's philosophical acuteness did much towards the reduction to greater precision of many dogmas which had been hitherto unquestioned. Neander, in his estimate of Alexandrian divinity, while he deals out high praise and admiration, yet discovers in some of its signs of the cold, unsocial selfishness of the later Platonism, and a deficiency of the sense of the still adherent, inveterate sinfulness of man, and of his littleness and insignificance. Another serious defect was the habit, characteristic of the Platonic atmosphere of the Alexandrian lecture-rooms, of allegorising the Old Testament narrative, still their plain meaning was oftentimes lost sight of. But when it is remembered that the piety of these men, their self-devotion, their great learning, were the human means of producing that great school of which Athanasius, the father of Christian orthodoxy, was the great flower, it will be acknowledged that the gratitude of the Church for the Alexandrian divines must be real and deep.

6. In contrast to this, but not without its use in the economy of Providence, was the Theology of Antioch, founded by Lucian, who died in 311. While the Alexandrian sometimes lost sight of the letter in pursuance of the spirit, the divines of Antioch followed a track which, in its bare literalness, landed some in Rationalism. Two of the greatest and noblest names in the history of theology are JEROME and CHRYSOSTOM, men who showed that their training in the one school did not prevent their admiration and good-will towards the other. Jerome was brought up in the principles of the Origenists, but made the fullest use of Antiochene writers. Chrysostom was brought up in the latter, but was far from giving a blind adherence to it. Few have exercised a wider influence than these two great men.

7. The Trinitarian Theology, i.e. the writings which arose out of the controversies concerning the Holy Trinity, is owing to the great conflict of the Church, first with the ARIANS, then with the MACEDONIANS. "Macedonius," says Hooker, "transferred unto God's most Holy Spirit the same blasphemy wherewith Arius had already dishonoured His co-eternally begotten Son. And Apollinaris began to pare away from Christ's humanity." In closest connection with this controversy were those of NESTORIUS and EUTYCHES, and out of them all came the theology of the first four General Councils. With this period we connect the great names of CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA and Pope Leo the Great.

8. Western Theology.—A difference is by this time clearly discernible between the theology of the East and the West. The former was essentially speculative, occupied with discussions on the Trinity and the Person of Christ. In the West the questions arose of ecclesiastical relations, and the great questions of Grace, Predestination, and the Justification of Man, were the paramount topics. By far the greatest theologian of the Western Church—of the whole Church, in truth—was Augustine of Hippo. His influence brings us down to the beginning of the Middle Ages.

9. The Scholastic Theology, which occupies so great a space in the history of religious opinion, has been considered in its place. Its cause was the desire of supporting by philosophical proof and evidence the system of faith which the Church had already adopted.

10. The Apogee of Mediævalism.—The dogmatic system of the Roman Church was built up at irregular intervals, according to the suggestions of interest or the impulse of fanaticism. The Popes did not interfere unless the interests of the hierarchy seemed to be threatened. Consequently many questions of the deepest importance were left unsettled, and controversy grew loud long before the Reformation. Questions about the Immaculate Conception, about purgatory, the source of infallibility, supremacy over princes, Transubstantiation itself, were hotly agitated, while the Popes made no sign. At length the crisis came, and it was largely owing to the Schoolmen. Questions which they had debated about Predestination and Freewill, about Faith, and Mercy, and the Propitiation of Christ, had not appeared to threaten the position of the Popes; and even when the Council of Trent met, it was hardly anticipated that the differences which had hitherto only disturbed the peace of the Church, or at least of its fabric, would be the real cause of a great divergence and the division of Christendom. Had the possibilities of human civilisation been limited to that of the Middle Ages, the division might not have come. But it was seen that there were other factors in the great problem of human history, which the Papal system could not meet.

11. Roman Theology since Trent.—The Tridentine decrees extinguished the hopes of reunion with the Roman Church which many had hitherto entertained, and extirpated the seeds of much that was evangelical and spiritual in the bosom of Rome itself. Doctrines hitherto regarded as indifferent were now made the subjects of sharp definition, while some were shrouded in language purposely obscure in the hope of obviating further controversy. From this moment began the influence of the JESUITS upon Roman theology, and the revulsion from it of the JANSENISTS. The decrees of the Vatican Council in 1870 led to a fresh departure in the separation of the OLD CATHOLICS.

12. Protestant Theology.—Naturally, the writings of the Reformers were devoted almost entirely to making good the ground they had taken, especially on the subject of Justification. The first dogmatic statement of the Lutheran Church is found in the Loci Theologici of Melancthon, but by far the most important was the Form of Concord in 1580. The HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, and the decrees of the Synod of DORT, are landmarks of the great struggle respecting particular points of theology, inevitable at a time when mediævalism was making way for the movements of the modern world. The great questions in controversy between the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches were Justification and the Eucharist.

Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion was the earliest dogmatic work of the Reformed Church, which has achieved a permanent reputation. Yet greater is the merit of his Biblical commentaries, especially on the Epistles of St. Paul.

Of the theology of the PRIESTS and the RATIONALISTS we have spoken in their places.

13. Anglican Theology.—The first great theological treatise of the Reformed Church of England was Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity. It may be truly said to have set a stamp on the Church which will never be effaced. From his time the great doctrines of the all-sufficiency of Christ, and of freedom of access to Him, were fully impressed upon Anglican Divinity, while the respect for Patristic antiquity and precedent, and the absence of the unhistorical and subjective element, became also a marked feature of it. Then controversies arose about the ministerial commission and about forms, which unhappily became connected with the political struggle between the early Stuarts and their subjects. When the wars had ceased, and peace returned, those writers arose who are the greatest masters in Anglican theology. A connecting link between the old and the new schools were Overall, Hook, and Ussher; the last-named endowed with learning which has rarely, if ever, been surpassed; the second wonderful for his tender and pathetic eloquence. First among the great names of the seventeenth century are JEREMY TAYLOR, the "English Chrysostom," and ISAAC BARROW. Almost contemporary with these were the leaders of the Nonconformists, Owen, Baxter, Howe, Manton, and Bates. Connecting links between these good men and the leaders of the Church party were Leighton and Reynolds, who taught within the Church with all the warmth and unction of the best Nonconformists. The bad and good qualities of the Latitudinarians and Nonjurors lie on the surface. The comprehensive views of Tillotson and Burnet caused them to many to appear cold and vague; yet they were men of deep piety, and possessed with a strong sense of ministerial responsibility. Those who believe the Nonjurors mistaken in their views, cannot refuse love and admiration for their consistency and self-sacrifice. The eighteenth century was a barren time, as in Europe generally, so in England. Yet Wake, Secker, Wilson, and Butler, will never cease to be honoured names in English theology.

Wesley and Whitfield were hardly theologians, though filled with missionary zeal and of resistless eloquence. But the Tracts for the Times brought in a new school of theology, learned, pious, and earnest; perhaps we should rather say it revived the theology of the seventeenth century. It has been the prevalent Anglican school since; but almost contemporaneously with it arose the Broad School of Theology, as expounded by Maurice, Kingsley, and others, which has also had a profound influence. The Church of Christ has profited from the teaching of all; and perhaps the most modern movement, and the best hope of the future, is an earnest endeavour to ascertain and absorb the real truth taught by able men of the most diverse views. It is becoming felt that each school has had its mission and its share of truth, and there never probably was a time when the Catholic Faith in its essentials was upheld by a nobler array of writers in every branch of the Church, and in every school of thought.

Theophanes of Byzantium, Abbot and Confessor [b. about 758, d. 816], educated at the court of the Emperor Constantine Copronymus. He assisted in 787 at the Council of Nice. He built two monasteries in Mysia, one of which, at Ager, he governed himself, training his monks and living himself in the greatest austerity. In 814 the Emperor Leo the Armenian renewed the persecution against the Church, and attacked the use of images, of the worship of which Theophanes was a staunch supporter. Being unable to conciliate him, Leo caused him to be thrown into a dungeon for two years, and afterwards banished him to the island of Samothrace, where he died immediately after his arrival. He wrote a Chronographia, an account of the events between the reigns of Diocletian and Leo the Armenian.

Theophany, or Theophaneia.—Another name for the Epiphany.

Theo-philanthropists [Greek, Theos, "God;" philos, "friend;" and anthrōpos, "man": "friends of God and man"].—The title assumed by a religious society formed at Paris during the French Revolution. The object of its founders was to revive public religious ceremonies [which had altogether ceased during the Reign of Terror] without returning to those doctrines and rites of Christianity which were incompatible with the Deism which they professed. In 1796 five heads of families—Chemin, Mareau, Janes, Haüy, and Mandar—associated themselves, and in December held their first meeting at a house in the Rue St. Denis for the purposes of Divine worship and moral instruction, according to the dictates of natural religion. Their services consisted of moral discourses, singing, and prayer. One of their number was Revellière-Lépaux, a member of the Directory, who allowed them the use of the ten parish churches of Paris, which they fitted up and adorned with religious and moral inscriptions, an ancient altar, a basket of flowers as an offering to the Supreme Being, a pulpit, and allegorical paintings and banners. Their services were at first performed every tenth day, but afterwards every Sunday at noon; they had no peculiar spiritual order, but the officers of the society were an overseer, a president of the temple, a reader and an orator, who wore a long white robe over a blue dress, with a sash or girdle of various colours, but who had no privileges nor payment. Their dogmas consisted solely of a belief in the existence of God, and in the immortality of the soul; in fact, pure Deism and practical morality. They implored the pardon of sins from God, but Jesus Christ was looked on as merely a man of extraordinary wisdom. Their chief writer was Chemin, who dwelt principally on moral duties. The festivals of nature, of love of country, of conjugal fidelity, etc., were scrupulously observed. Instead of baptism, a sort of consecration or initiation by exhortations to the parents and godparents was solemnised; for confirmation was substituted a reception into the society with vows, and in place of marriage a symbolical union with rings and bands wound round the hands of the couple; these were the only ceremonies. Schools were established for the instruction of youth in theophilanthropism. But the revival of the Catholic religion, and particularly the Concordat of Pius VII., caused the decline of the society, and in 1802 Napoleon I. forbade them to hold their meetings in the churches, and after this time they no longer appear as a body.

Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, succeeded Timotheus about 385, and was so much valued for his learning that the Council of Capua in 389 chose him to decide the difference between Evagrius and Flavian, who had both been ordained bishops of Antioch. He reconciled St. Jerome and Rufinus, and in 399, hearing that the monks of Nitria were infected with the doctrines of Origen, he convened a synod, in which they were condemned as heretics, and expelled both from Alexandria and Egypt. He afterwards quarrelled with St. Chrysostom, who wanted to heal the breach between him and the monks, and went so far as to depose him in 403. He died in 412, having been bishop for twenty-seven years. He wrote a treatise against Origen, and also against the Anthropomorphites, and about the right day for celebrating Easter.

Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, was consecrated in 168 or 170, and ruled the diocese for about thirteen years. He was a convert from Paganism, and a vigorous opponent of heresy; he wrote against Marcion and Hermogenes, and in refuting their errors quotes several passages from the Revelation. He wrote a commentary on that book and on the four Gospels, which have been lost; but there are extant of his, three books in defence of Christianity, addressed to a learned heathen named Autolyceus, in reply to his vindication of his own religion. He is said to have been the first person to apply the term Trinity to express the three Persons in the Godhead.

Theophylact, Archbishop of Achrida in Bulgaria, lived in the eleventh century, and was born at Constantinople. He was considered to be one of the most learned men of his time. He wrote Commentaries upon the four Evangelists, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles of St. Paul, and upon Habakkuk, Jonah, Nahum, and Hosea, in which he makes great use of St. Chrysostom's works. The exact year of his death is not known, only that it was after 1071, and that he lived at the same time with Pope Gregory VII.

Theosophy, Theosophists.—In a wide sense Theosophy is the name for speculations as to God, the mystery of being, and of creation generally. In a more restricted sense, it is the term applied to the speculations of those mystics who allege that by an internal and supernatural illumination, rather than by revelation, they are admitted to a knowledge of those mysteries; firstly on the side of nature, secondly on the side of religion. Theosophists themselves define it as "Divine wisdom." Some of the earlier Theosophists were chemists and physicists—as we should call them now—and obtained the title of fire-philosophers, since, according to their own account, they were enabled by a miraculous intuition of the properties of the so-called element of fire to provide a solution, not only for every difficulty of physics, but also for every doubtful problem in the spiritual world. Traces of such claims are to be found throughout the history of philosophy, but the movement to which the name Theosophy is applied was started by Paracelsus [A.D. 1493–1541], a Swiss physician, and the discoverer, to a large extent, of the medicinal properties of opium and mercury. He converted Robert Fludd, an English physician [1574–1637], to his views, who became an ardent advocate of the cause of the ROSICRUCIANS [q.v.], the name adopted by a large section of the Theosophists of the early part of the seventeenth century. Contemporary with Fludd was Jacob Böhm, or BEHMEN, a shoemaker in Görlitz, a mystical philosopher and the greatest of the Theosophists. Led away by the eloquence of Fludd, he came to consider his speculations on the Deity and the origin of things as given to him by internal illumination. According to Behmen, the Deity is to be contemplated first in His own existence as "the Eternal One, the Silent Nothing, the Temperamentum." The Divine Unity is itself a Trinity. Nature or creature proceeds therefrom, and is called "contrariety." But the proceeding of creature from God is at the same time the ingoing of God into creature; "the silent nothing" becomes something by entering into duality. The power of seeing this duality in things is spiritual-mindedness. Behmen's Theosophy, however, was at the bottom thoroughly Christian, and William Law [1686–1761], the author of A Serious Call to a Devout Life, in his declining years adopted his opinions, and became himself the translator of his work. This phase of Theosophy may therefore be considered a development of Christian mysticism.

The Theosophical Society was founded in 1875, at New York, by Mr., or as he is called in India, Colonel, Olcott, with the object of obtaining "knowledge of all the laws of nature." Colonel Olcott says that by the study of Asiatic Occultism as a science, we are enabled to find "dwelling in fire, air, earth, and water, sub-human orders of beings, some inimical, some favourable to man." By their means, the phenomena of Spiritualism are accounted for in a manner so superior to the supposed agency of departed friends or relatives, that although Theosophists and Spiritualists both believe in the reality of the spiritualistic phenomena, and the existence of the psychic force, they are here obliged to part company. But for this, modern Theosophy would apparently be only a form of Spiritualism, though its programme is a more ambitious one, since it "covers the whole range of natural phenomena, and everything that concerns mankind and its environments." Like it, Theosophy appears now as decidedly anti-Christian; and there is more or less of sheer charlatanism connected with it, very unpleasant exposures connected with a certain Madame Blavatsky having shown something of the methods by which the system is bolstered up and imposed upon ignorant dupes.

Therapeuts, or Worshipers, of whom Philo the Jew makes mention in his treatise concerning Contemplative Life, are by some supposed to be a branch of the Essenes, but this is not certain; they were undoubtedly Jews. Their sect arose at the close of the first century. They gave themselves up entirely to contemplation of the Deity, lived in solitary places, performing none of the duties of active life. They quitted their estates, relations, and country, and spent their time in prayer, and reading the Scriptures and the writings of their learned predecessors; they sang hymns in their religious worship; they met every Saturday, which they kept as a great holiday; they lived a life of frugality and discipline; at the end of their meal they had leavened bread and hyssop sprinkled with salt in honour of the shewbread of the Temple; the men and women were ranged in two divisions, and moved somewhat in the measure of a dance; in the morning they waited the rising of the sun, and with uplifted hands begged that God Almighty would send them a happy day, and after these devotions they went to their respective seminaries or cells, and spent their time in their customary speculations. This is Philo's account of them, and he evidently considered them to be Jews. Eusebius supposes them to be Christians, but their practices do not accord with this view. Others have thought them to be Egyptian monks. In fact, there is a great diversity of opinion as to the religion of the sect.

Theresa, Sr., a religious enthusiast, born at Avila in Spain, in 1515. At an early age the perusal of the Lives of the Saints inspired her with a desire for martyrdom; and she fled from her home to seek death at the hands of the Moors. Being brought back, she erected a hermitage in her father's garden for retirement and devotion, and became a professed Carmelite nun at twenty-one years of age. Being dissatisfied with the laxity of discipline amongst her Order, she undertook to restore its original severity, and established an Order which she called the Reformed Carmelites, who had their first convent at Avila in 1562. In 1568 she founded a monastery at Dorvello, where originated the Barefooted Carmelites, or Descalceati. At her death she left thirty monasteries—sixteen for women and fourteen for men, all founded by herself. She composed ten books either concerning her Order or on godly subjects. 1. Her Life, written by herself. 2. The Way to Perfection. 3. The Foundations. 4. The Manner of Visiting Nunneries. These four, by order of Philip II. of Spain, were sent in manuscript to the library of the famous monastery of the Escorial. 5. The Mansion, or Castle of the Soul. 6. Divine Love. 7. Exclamation. 8. Spiritual Advice. 9. Preparations for Confession. 10. Additions to her Life. She died at Alba, October, 1582, and was canonised by Gregory XV. in 1622.

Thirlwall, CONNOP, D.D., Bishop of St. David's [b. 1797, d. 1875]. He was educated at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a Fellow. He was called to the Bar in 1825, but changed his profession and took orders in 1828, and became rector of Kirby Underdale, Yorkshire. He was for several years examiner for the classical tripos at Cambridge, and also classical examiner in the University of London. In 1840 he was appointed Bishop of St. David's, and resigned his See in 1874. His principal work was his History of Greece, published 1835-40, and he was with Archdeacon Hare joint translator of Niebuhr's Roman History. Whilst Oxford, under the guidance of Newman and his friends, was silently bringing forth that vigorous revival of ecclesiastical life and thought which soon became so potent, there existed more particularly at Cambridge a school of what might be called "the new learning," attracted by the brilliant light which German scholars were throwing over ancient history and literature, and not less by the broader human foundations on which they were seeking, with whatever errors, to base the life and truth of Christianity. Bishop Thirlwall and Archdeacon Hare were two of the principal actors in this movement, and Dr. Thirlwall brought to the notice of English theologians one of the more important German criticisms on the Gospel history, which he published in 1825—namely, Schleiermacher's Critical Essay on the Gospel of St. Luke, to which Thirlwall prefixed a very learned and valuable introduction reviewing the state of Critical Controversy up to that date. As a bishop, he was probably more of a controversialist and general divine than administrator of his See. His charges, dealing with some of the most important questions of the day—e.g. the Colenso case, the Roman controversy, etc.—were, unlike the productions of many of his brethren, not mere ephemeral productions, but contributions to the solution of the great problem which will hold a place of permanent value. He was an active member of the Committee for the Revision of the Old Testament. On the question of the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, he stood alone among his episcopal brethren in voting for it. His Charges, Letters, and Sermons [3 vols.] were published after his death under the editorship of Dean Stanley.

Thirty-nine Articles. [ARTICLES OF RELIGION.]

Thirty Years' War.—A great religious war that raged from 1618–48, and was ended by the Peace of Westphalia. The cause was nominally religion, but in reality it was the ambition of the house of Austria. It began in Bohemia, where the intolerance of the Emperor (Ferdinand II.) produced a revolt, and the old animosities of the Hussite wars were all revived. Their cause was taken up by the Protestant princes, and soon all Central Europe was aflame. The war divided itself into three distinct periods. In the first Austria, under the famous General Wallenstein, was completely victorious, and threatened to subdue all Germany. In the second, owing to the military genius of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, who became their leader, the Protestants carried all before them; and in the third, victory was more uncertain and more equally divided. France took an active part on the Protestant side under Turenne and Condé. The great French Minister, Cardinal Richelieu, though he oppressed the Protestants in France, helped those of Germany, in pursuance of his policy of French rivalry of German greatness. The chief provisions of the Peace of Westphalia [1648] were:—

1. Austria lost Alsace, which became a possession of France, and also Lusatia, by which she had bought the help of the Elector of Saxony.

2. Sweden acquired Bremen, Verden, part of Pomerania, Stettin, Rügen, and Wismar, which made her a member of the German Federation.

3. Brandenburg obtained Magdeburg, Halberstadt, Minden, and Camin.

This was, therefore, to inflict a blow upon Germany which she had to wait until the present generation to recover. Not only were Alsace and other territories lost, but the right of France to the Lotharingian bishoprics was conceded; and Switzerland and the United Provinces, which had practically ceased for some time to belong to the Empire, were formally cut off. But the mischief to Germany was far greater than loss of territory. While France became united and compact as she pushed her boundaries to the Rhine, Germany was exhausted and prostrate through the long struggle for which she had formed the field. The authority of the Empire and the freedom of the people seemed to have perished together, and the once powerful unity was dissolved into a mere lax confederation of petty despotisms and oligarchies. The State of Brandenburg, which, as we have seen, received additions, began to lay the foundations of that monarchy which, under the name of Prussia, became, after a while, the leading State in the Confederation, and is now the all-absorbing power of the German Empire.

Tholuck, FRIEDRICH AUGUSTE, one of the greatest German divines of this century, was born at Breslau in 1799; died at Halle, 1877. He was of humble birth, and as a young man was apprenticed by his father to a jeweller in Silesia. He was, however, so thoroughly devoted to study and so anxious to be able to attend good classes, that some of his friends raised a subscription large enough to send him to a gymnasium in Berlin. He studied with great zeal day and night, and by so doing permanently ruined his eyesight. For many years he was a sceptic, and in his farewell speech before leaving college announced his conviction that Mohammedanism was a religion of equal dignity and beauty with Christianity. But just at this time he became acquainted with several good and learned men, amongst them Neander; and by their influence he was induced to study the Bible carefully, and was soon fully won over to the cause of Christianity. He has written several books describing the various conflicts that waged in his mind during this critical period of his life—Sin and Redemption, or the True Consecration of the Sceptic, and others. He lived chiefly in Berlin, superintending an orphan asylum which he had founded, and taking a special interest in young men studying for orders. This may be called his special work in life, for he had a peculiarly happy way of dealing with the doubts and difficulties of young men, and knew exactly how best to encourage them. But he also gave much time to the critical study of the Bible, and in 1826, on the death of Dr. Knapp, was appointed Professor of Dogmatics and Exegesis at the University of Halle. He was obliged to resign after a year on account of ill-health. He went to Rome for three years, and came back so far restored that he was able to undertake the professorship duties, and remained in the same post till his death. His chief commentaries are those on the Epistles to the Romans and Hebrews, Sermon on the Mount, the Gospel of St. John, and the Psalms. Another book which has been translated into most modern languages, is The Credibility of the Gospel History, a very able answer to Strauss's Leben Jesu.

Thomas, St., CHRISTIANS OF.—Origen tells us that Parthia was the province assigned for the labours of the Apostle St. Thomas, after which Sophronius says he preached to the Medes, Persians, and Bactrians, and legend says that he met with the Magi who brought gifts to the Infant Saviour, and that they joined him in spreading the Gospel. It is said that he visited India, and travelled to Sumatra; and Chrysostom intimates his preaching in Ethiopia. The Portuguese say that he came first to Socotra, in the Arabian Sea, and thence to Cranganor, where, having converted many, he travelled further into the East; and having successfully preached the Gospel, returned to the Coromandel coast, where he built a church at Malabar, and converted the prince of the country, but the Brahmins, being hostile to Christianity, had him put to death by running him through with a lance while at his prayers. At Cranganor, now called St. Thomas, there is a body who call themselves CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS. They are in some measure Arians and Nestorians, and live under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of the Nestorians, who resides at Babylon. In 1546 John de Albuquerque, a Franciscan, and first Archbishop of Goa, erected a college at Cranganor for the conversion of these Christians to the Church of Rome; the Jesuits established another, and in 1599 the Archbishop Meneses brought them into some sort of connection with Rome; but in 1653 most of the converts returned to their original faith.

Their liturgy is in the Syriac language. Their doctrines may be gathered from a letter published in the Guardian in 1884, showing the difficulty of a proposed union of these Christians with other Protestant bodies of Southern India:—"One who is imbued with the doctrine and discipline of primitive antiquity would find that the difficulty of uniting with these Syrians consists, not in their ordination of deacons at the age of fourteen, nor in their offering prayers for the departed, nor in ignorance of theology on the part of the Cantanars; but in the rejection, on the part of this Church and its rulers, of the Fourth General Council. This is a real difficulty, for although the Jacobites undoubtedly and strongly hold that our Lord is Perfect God and Perfect Man, yet they refuse to admit that these two natures are united in the One Person of our Lord; they hold that in the Incarnation, the Two Natures were so united as to become One Nature thereafter."

Thomas Aquinas. [AQUINAS, THOMAS.]

Thomas à Kempis. [KEMPIS, THOMAS A.]

Thomassin, Lewis, born at Aix, in Provence, in 1619; died in Paris in 1695. He was a priest of the Oratory, and lectured on humanity and philosophy in their congregation at Lyons; was afterwards divinity professor at Saumur. He was indefatigable in his studies, and wrote many books. In his youth he joined the Jansenists for a time, but afterwards made a public retraction, and wrote against them. His chief works are: Dissertations upon the Councils in Latin; Ancienne et Nouvelle Discipline de l'Eglise touchant les Bénéfices et les Bénéficiaires; various dogmatical tracts; a Method for Studying Philosophy, Profane History, and Poetry; a Universal Hebrew Glossary, etc.

Thomists.—The followers of THOMAS AQUINAS [q.v.]. They were called Thomists in opposition to the Scotists, or followers of Duns Scotus. The two sects were at variance as to the nature of the Divine co-operation with the human will, the measure of Divine grace that is necessary to salvation, the unity of form in man, or personal identity, and other abstruse and minute questions. The Thomists leaned in philosophy to NOMINALISM [q.v.], although they held the abstract form to be the essence of things; they followed the doctrines of Augustine as to grace, and disputed the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary. They belonged mostly to the Dominican Order, while the Scotists were Franciscans.

Thoresby, John of, Archbishop of York.—He was brought up as a lawyer, and in 1341 became Master of the Rolls. In 1347 he was made Bishop of St. David's, whence he was promoted in 1349 to Worcester, and became Lord Chancellor of England. In 1352 he was translated to York. He found his diocese in by no means a satisfactory condition, and set to work to remedy the existing evils. The clergy as well as the people were grossly ignorant, and Thoresby drew up for them a catechism in Latin containing an exposition of the Ten Commandments and other essentials, which he had translated into English that they might be frequently read to the people. In his time the jealousies between Canterbury and York were settled. He died at Thorpe in 1373. He rebuilt the choir of his cathedral, and was buried in the Lady Chapel.

Thorn, THE CONFERENCE OF, was one of many assemblies, the object of which was to reconcile the various branches of the Christian Church. It was held in 1645 by the express order of Ladislaus IV., King of Poland, and the conference was between several eminent doctors of the Roman, Lutheran, and Reformed Churches; it was designed to heal the divisions which existed among them, and to find out some means of reconciling their differences, and bringing about reunion. It was called The Charitable Conference; it lasted for three months, but terminated without any results.

Thorn, William.—A Benedictine of St. Augustine's at Canterbury. He lived in the latter part of the fourteenth century, and wrote a history of his monastery, for which he is much commended by Leland, on account of its exactness and the great industry it displayed.

Thorndike, HERBERT [d. 1672].—One of the most learned and able advocates of the Laudian theology of the seventeenth century. He held several preferments, among them the Mastership of Sidney College, Cambridge, from all of which he was ejected in the Great Revolution, but received a stall at Westminster at the Restoration. He took part in the Savoy Conference, and gave much assistance to Walton in his Polyglot, being a very accurate Oriental scholar. Thorndike's works have been republished in the Anglo-Catholic Library, in 6 vols.; the most eminent of them is the Epilogus to the Tragedy of the Church of England [1659], an earnest assertion of the grace of the sacraments.

Three Chapters.—A controversy concerning certain writings, known as the Three Chapters, caused much bitterness in the Church in the sixth century. The pieces distinguished by this appellation were: [1] The writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia. [2] The book which Theodoret of Cyrus wrote against the twelve anathemas which Cyril had published against the Nestorians. [3] The letter which Ibas of Edessa had written to one Maris, a Persian, concerning the Council of Ephesus, and the condemnation of Nestorius. These writings were supposed to favour the Nestorian doctrine, and such, indeed, was their tendency. It is, however, to be observed that Theodore of Mopsuestia lived before the time of Nestorius, and died not only in the communion of the Church, but also in the highest reputation for his sanctity; nor were the writings of the other two either condemned or censured by the Council of Chalcedon; rather, the faith of Theodoret and Ibas was there declared entirely orthodox. The Emperor Justinian was bent upon extirpating that violent branch of the Monophysites known as the Acephali, and consulted on this matter Theodore, Bishop of Caesarea, who was a Monophysite, and at the same time extremely attached to the doctrine of Origen. Theodore hoped to gain repose for the Origenists by casting a reproach on the Council of Chalcedon. He therefore suggested to the Emperor that those acts of the Council which had declared the writers of the Three Chapters to be orthodox should be effaced, and the writings condemned and prohibited. Justinian accordingly published an edict to that effect in 554, without any prejudice, however, to the authority of the Council of Chalcedon. This edict was warmly opposed by the African and Western bishops, and particularly by Vigilius, the Roman Pontiff, who considered it as highly injurious, not only to the authority of the council, but also to the memory of those good men whose writings and character it covered with reproach. Upon this, Justinian ordered Vigilius to come to Constantinople, thinking that once in his power he could persuade him to acquiesce in the edict, and reject the Three Chapters, and he was right; Vigilius yielded, and the council of seventy bishops condemned the writings. But the opposition of the Bishops of Africa and Illyricum obliged Vigilius to retract his sentence, for they separated from communion with him, and treated him as an apostate till he reasserted his former judgment. The effect of this retraction redoubled the zeal and violence of Justinian, who, by a second edict in 551, condemned anew the Three Chapters. It was finally thought best to assemble a General Council to decide the matter, and accordingly this was summoned by Justinian in 553, and is known as the Fifth Œcumenical, or General, Council. At this it was decided by the Eastern prelates (very few Western bishops being present) that the Three Chapters were heretical and pernicious.

Three Hours' Service.—A service adopted of late years in many churches on Good Friday, and though in nowise provided for in the Prayer Book, it is rendered legal under the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act (1872), which permits additional services, consisting of any prayers from the Liturgy or Bible, with address or sermon and hymns. The Three Hours' Service begins at noon, and ends at three, the hour of our Lord's death; and from a little book published at Rome in 1866, and entitled Origine e Progressi della Dedicazione delle tre Ore di Agonia di Nostro Signore Gesù Cristo, the following particulars are gathered. The idea originated with a Jesuit, Father Alfonso Messia, of Lima, who died in 1732. He first introduced this devotion on Good Friday at his own church, and it spread first in Peru and Chili, and afterwards through Central America. From Mexico it passed to Spain, and reached Rome in 1738. At the first church in which it was used there, it attracted crowds, and was soon generally adopted. In about the year 1865 it was first used in English churches. It consists, in all cases, of hymns, collects, or litanies, and addresses, generally on "the seven words from the cross," though this last feature is sometimes varied by meditations on other details of the Passion. The service is a very popular one, judging by the crowds which generally frequent it. Thus St. Paul's Cathedral is always filled from end to end at this service. It should be noted as a possibility, that a mistake may be occasioned as to the length of our Lord's sufferings. St. Mark's language leaves no doubt that the Crucifixion lasted for six hours. The darkness lasted for three of them, during which apparently the Divine sufferer was silent. And an error on such a subject is to be deprecated.

Three Kings, THE.—The Magi spoken of in the New Testament as offering gifts to Christ; this is celebrated in the Feast of Epiphany. [EPIPHANY.] They are called kings by the Catholic Church, and Cologne boasts of possessing their bones in her cathedral, where their monument is shown in a chapel built by the Elector Maximilian, whence they are styled "The Three Kings of Cologne." Legend relates that their names were Caspar, Melchior, and Balthazar; that they were baptised on their return to their own country, that 300 years afterwards their bodies were removed to Constantinople by the Empress Helena, thence by Eustathius to Milan, and lastly by Renatus to Cologne.

Throne.—The name applied to the special seat for an archbishop, or bishop, in his cathedral. It is usually placed in the choir and decorated with a canopy.

Thundering Legion. [LEGION, THUNDERING.]

Thuribulum, or Thurible.—The censer in which incense is burned; it is usually a silver or gold vessel with perforations in its cover, through which the fumes rise; long chains are attached to it by which it is swung backwards and forwards by the acolyte.

Tiara.—A name given to the crown worn by the Pope; a kind of round high cap, encircled with three golden crowns, set with jewels in three rows one over the other, ending in a point that supports a globe with a cross over it. At first the papal crown was similar to that of an ordinary bishop, but Nicholas I., chosen Pope in 858, added a golden circle as a sign of his civil authority. Boniface VII. added a second about 1294, and Urban V. a third about 1365.

Tiberius Caesar.—Emperor of Rome next to Augustus, from A.D. 15 to 37. In the fifteenth year of his reign, John the Baptist commenced his ministry, and three years later our Blessed Lord was crucified, under the Roman Governor Pontius Pilate.

Tiburtius, St., a Christian martyr, was the son of Chromatius, who, according to several writers of that time, was Governor of Rome under Carinus, and his successor, Diocletian. Chromatius was converted to Christianity by St. Sebastian, and Tranquillin, the father of two brothers whom he had condemned to death. [See MARCUS and MARCELLIANUS.] Tiburtius was baptised immediately, but Chromatius waited for a season; then he resigned his offices in the State, and opened his house, which was at some distance from Rome, for the reception of those Christians who were in need of help. Tiburtius was, from the first, eager to suffer martyrdom for the sake of his religion, and therefore refused to leave the city. He was impeached to Fabian, who had succeeded Chromatius, and was told that he must either offer incense to idols, or walk barefoot over hot coals. Tradition says that he chose the latter, and escaped without the slightest injury. Fabian was so angry at seeing his victim escape that he ordered him to be executed immediately. He was beheaded in 286, and the 11th of August is kept in his memory.

Tide.—The Saxon word for hour, time, and sometimes for a festival, as Easter-tide, Whitsun-tide, etc.

Tierce.—One of the hours of prayer. [CANONICAL HOURS.]

Tillemont, LOUIS SERASTIEN LE NAIN DE [born in Paris, 1637; died there 1698], was a celebrated ecclesiastical historian. He was educated at Port Royal, and ordained priest in 1676, on the persuasion of his friend and spiritual adviser, Le Maistre de Sacy. His whole time was devoted to the study of Church history, and holding that profane history should be interwoven with that of the Church, he first published, in 1690, a History of the Emperors, etc., and then followed it in 1694 by Notes to serve for an Ecclesiastical History of the first Six Centuries. The Mémoires are in sixteen volumes, the history in six. The history consists of the lives of saints, of famous men, of emperors, of the history of heresies, ranged under distinct titles, and interwoven with passages from the Fathers, and from more modern authors; he has subjoined critical notes at the end of each volume, which are remarkably exact and judicious. His works have been serviceable to many persons since who have published new editions of St. Cyprian, St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, etc.

Tillotson, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a clothier, and was born in Halifax in 1630. He was educated first in the Grammar School of his native town, and afterwards entered Clare Hall, Cambridge, as a pensioner. His parents were Puritans, firmly attached to the Independent party, and as this party was decidedly in the ascendant at Cambridge at the time Tillotson was there, it might appear likely that he would firmly adopt their opinions. He was attracted, however, by the writings of Chillingworth, and became one of the followers of his school, which taught a middle way between Catholicism on one side, and Calvinism on the other. The Low Churchmen of that day were sometimes called Latitudinarians, and Tillotson's sermons show that he adopted the teaching of that school. Before his ordination he was tutor in a family related in some way to Cromwell, and he afterwards married a niece of the Protector. The date and place of his ordination are quite unknown, and there seems a great probability that it was solemnised in a private manner for some reason or other. On his elevation to the primacy some of his enemies questioned whether he had ever been ordained, and some went so far as to say that he had never been baptised. There is, however, no doubt that this was mere ill-natured slander. His promotion was rapid. His first curacy was that of St. Lawrence Jewry, in the City of London, and when he had the living of Ketton in Suffolk, later, he was appointed Tuesday Lecturer in the same church, and was thus able to keep up his old connection. After the Restoration in 1660 he was successively a prebendary of Canterbury, Dean of Canterbury, Canon of St. Paul's, and, after the accession of William III., dean of that cathedral. On Sancroft's refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the new Government, Tillotson was made Archbishop of Canterbury. The state of morals at the Court of Charles II., and the indifference and even contempt with which religion was treated, caused the clergy to have many enemies, especially when, as Tillotson did, they openly reproved those in authority for their looseness of life. But he had gained the esteem and confidence of the King. He died in 1694, having been Archbishop only three years. He left his widow nothing but the copyright of his books; these, however, are said to have realised £2,500. In addition to this the King granted her a pension of £400 for life. Tillotson's sermons are still read and valued, both for the principles set forth and for the telling literary style. We may regard him and Burnet as the two chief divines of the Latitudinarian school.

Timotheans.—A sect of Alexandrian Monophysites, founded by Timotheus Ælurus, who strongly opposed the rules laid down by the Council of Chalcedon. He established his sect in Alexandria, one of the necessities for admission being that his followers should promise not to yield obedience to the Patriarch, the rightful authority. He used to climb up stealthily to the cells of the monks at night in order to persuade them to rebel against their bishop, and in consequence was nicknamed "The Cat." He persuaded two exiled bishops to consecrate him, and on the death of the reigning Emperor, Marcian, caused the Patriarch Proterius to be murdered, and usurped his office. He held it for three years, but was then banished. In 470, however, on a change of government, he was recalled, making his entry into Constantinople after the manner of Our Lord's entry into Jerusalem. A second decree of banishment was passed, but he died before it was carried out. His opinions were the same as those of the EUTYCHIANs [q.v.].

Tindal, MATTHEW, LL.D.—A Deistical writer, born at Beer-Ferrers in Devonshire, about 1657; died 1733. He was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, became Fellow of All Souls, and in 1685 Doctor of Law. At the commencement of James II.'s reign he joined the Roman Catholic Church, but in 1687 returned to the Church of England, or rather to Rationalism. Having concurred in the Revolution, he was admitted an advocate, and sat as a judge in the Court of Delegates. He published several political and theological pieces, among which were a Letter to the Clergymen of the Two Universities, on the Trinity and Athanasian Creed, and a treatise called Rights of the Christian Church. This work excited a great sensation among the High Church clergy, who attacked it with much animosity; and Tindal published two defences. About the same time he wrote another pamphlet, called New High Church turned Old Presbyterian, an exposure of SACHEVERELL [q.v.] and his party. This and the Rights of the Church, together with the Defences, were ordered by the House of Commons to be burnt by the hangman in the same fire with Sacheverell's sermon, thus treating the disputants on each side in the same manner. In 1730 he published Christianity as old as the Creation, or The Gospel a Republication of the Religion of Nature, in which his object was to show that there neither has been, nor can be, any revelation distinct from what be terms the internal revelation of the law of nature in the hearts of mankind. He left in manuscript a second volume of Christianity as old as the Creation, but its publication was withheld by Gibbon, Bishop of London, to whom he had entrusted it.

Tithes [an abbreviation of the Saxon Tro-thung, or Tithing, which is a translation of the Latin decuria], the tenth part of the profits of land and stock, allotted to the clergy for their maintenance. The custom of paying tithes is very ancient. In Gen. xiv. 20, Abraham pays tithes to Melchizedek, and they were legally enjoined by Moses. In the first days of the Christian Church, the preachers and ministers were sustained by the contributions of believers [Matt. x. 9, 10; 1 Cor. ix. 13, 14; Gal. vi. 6, 7; 1 Tim. v. 17]. And tithes (decimæ) were also known to the Roman law—a rent-charge paid to the State by any one who obtained any portion of public land, and collected by the publicani, or decimani. In the middle of the third century, when the first zeal of converts had grown colder, we have St. Cyprian writing to his flock at Carthage that he has designed Aurelius and Celerinus to the dignity of Presbyters that they may be honoured with such allowances (sportulæ) as Presbyters have, and receive equal shares in the monthly dividends. After the conversion of Constantine rich converts settled large lands on those who converted them, and the first publicly recognised churches were built on land thus bestowed. The adoption of tithes as a system was probably a transfer from the Roman system already referred to, harmonising as it did with the custom of the Jewish Church. Selden quotes passages from the ancient Fathers to prove that the Christian Church, even in the days of persecution, claimed tithes as due jure Divino, but there is no clear evidence how far this right was acknowledged until the establishment of Christianity as the national religion. Nor is it entirely clear whether the tithe paid under the Roman system was for a civil or religious purpose, but it appears probable that the Emperors laid claim to them as holding the office of Chief Pontifex. At the Synod of Cullen in 356 tithes are spoken of as "God's rents." Jerome and Augustine use the same language, and in the sixth century the Synod of Macon declared those who did not pay them excommunicate. Charlemagne established tithes all through his empire, even on the newly converted Saxons. As regards England, Coke [Litt. Tenures, lib. 1. c. 9.] declares that "it appeareth by the laws and ordinances of ancient kings, and especially of King Alfred, that the first kings of this realm had all the lands of England in demesne, and les grandes manors and royalties they reserved to themselves, and with the remnant they for the defence of the realm enfeoffed the Barons of the Realm with such jurisdiction as the Court Baron now hath. And at this time, when all the lands of England were the king's demesnes, Ethelwolf, the son of that Egbert who brought the Heptarchy under one sole prince, conferred the tithes of all the kingdom upon the Church by his Royal Charter." Selden quotes many laws of the Saxon kings for the payment of tithes, as their gift, and among them the dictum of Ethelred, "Nemo auferat a Deo, quod ad Deum pertinet et prædecessores nostri concesserunt." Then the payment of tithes was for hundreds of years payable by custom, and recognised as a duty before Parliaments began. When land changed hands the charge was transferred with it, and as a matter of fact there is nowhere any Parliamentary State document decreeing the payment of tithes. The earliest statutes which mention them assume the obligation [1 Rich. II. cap. 14; 5 Henry IV. cap. 11; 27 Henry VIII. cap. 20]. The Acts which were passed were to make clear points which had become doubtful or obscure. According to the original idea of the Church establishment the whole bishopric was in a large sense The Parish, and the income of it was the common stock of the clergy of the diocese, and Selden maintains that before the Lateran Council under Innocent III. every man might have given his tithes to what church he would within his own diocese, or might pay them into the hands of the bishop to be distributed at his discretion. But with the development of the parochial system the tithes of each parish were allotted to its own particular minister, first by common consent, and afterwards by the law of the land. Nevertheless "arbitrary consecrations," as the power of choice was called, again came into use, and became common till the reign of John. This was largely owing to the intrigues of the regular clergy or monks, and will account for the number and richness of the monasteries founded at that period. But in process of years the income of the laborious parochial clergy being reduced to a pittance, Pope Innocent III. in 1200 issued a Decretal Epistle to the Archbishop of Canterbury, enjoining the payment of tithes to the parsons of the respective parishes in which each man dwelt.

The composite nature of English institutions partly accounts for the different kinds of tithes; some are secular, some ecclesiastical: there are lay tithes and clerical. The tithes allotted to the ministry are divided into: [1] Prædial, those arising from the fruits of the ground, as corn, hay, hemp, underwood, or of trees—apples, cherries. [2] Personal, those arising from the profits of labour and industry. [3] Mixed, such as arise from the beasts, such as cheese, wool, milk, fowls, etc. Prædial tithes again are divided into great—those of corn, hay, wood; and small—flax, etc., as well as the mixed tithe. No tithe is to be paid on such things as do not increase and renew year by year. The transfer to a layman of the revenues of a benefice with the obligation to provide for the spiritual duties was known as Impropriation, and according to Spellman the name is intended to indicate that such a transfer was an impropriety, and ought never to have been made. However, it often was made before the Reformation, as well as the kindred habit of Appropriation—i.e. the transfer of the benefice to a monastery or a hospital. On the suppression of the monasteries the rights belonging to them were freely transferred by the Crown to laymen, and hence to their heirs descend not only the right to tithes, but in many cases the entire property of rectories. The spiritual duties of such rectories are performed by a clergyman who is called a vicar, who receives the small tithes with the parsonage and glebe. Tithes are no longer, as formerly, paid in kind, but are commuted for a money payment.

Under the Act 6 and 7 William IV. cap. 71, commutation may be effected through the Tithes Commissioners either by a voluntary parochial agreement, or by a compulsory award. In the latter case the basis of commutation is the clear average value for seven years of the tithes of the parish.

Title.—A name importing the sphere of spiritual work to which a clergyman is ordained. From a very early time there has been a rule that bishops shall not ordain a person unless he has some definite work in view, so that every candidate must, prior to his ordination, obtain a title.

The Thirty-third Canon of the Church of England says thus:—"It hath been long since provided by many decrees of the ancient Fathers, that none should be admitted, either deacon or priest, who hath not first some certain place where he might use his function. According to which examples, we do ordain, that henceforth no person shall be admitted in Sacred Orders, except he shall at that time exhibit to the bishop, of whom he desireth imposition of hands, a presentation of himself to some ecclesiastical preferment then void in that diocese."

Titular.—A term applied to a person who has merely a title to a benefice, not having yet entered on its privileges.

Toland, JOHN.—A Deistical writer; born at Redcastle, in Ireland, 1669; d. 1722. He discarded the Roman faith, in which he had been brought up, before he was sixteen, and was educated at Glasgow and Edinburgh. From thence he went to Leyden, where he studied with a view to becoming a Nonconformist minister. One of his masters here was SPANHEIM [q.v.]. Here also he made the acquaintance of Leibnitz, and on his return to England he commenced the work which he published in 1696 under the title Christianity not Mystical, in which he avowed his sceptical principles. It made a great sensation, and was censured by Convocation. To escape obloquy he revisited his native country, where he was assailed with even greater violence than in England; the Irish Parliament not only voted his book to be burnt by the hangman, but ordered its author to be prosecuted by the Attorney-General. He was therefore obliged to return to England, and soon after his arrival in London he published a life of Milton and a treatise entitled Amyntor, in which he attacked the authenticity of the received canon of Scripture. He afterwards went to reside in Hanover, and while there published, in 1702, Vindicus Liberius, a defence of himself against the judgment of Convocation, and in 1705 he openly avowed himself a Pantheist. In 1718 appeared his work entitled Nazarenus, or Jewish Gentile, or Mahometan Christianity, in which he stated his own views of primitive Christianity. This was followed in 1720 by a Latin tract called Pantheisticon, which subjected him to the charge of atheism; and by Tetradymus, in four parts, the second of which, on the exoteric and esoteric philosophy of the ancients, is deemed one of his most learned and valuable productions; in the conclusion of this work he professed his preference of the Christian religion, pure and unmixed, to all others. His posthumous works were published in 2 vols. 8vo in 1726, and again in 1747, with an account of his life and writings by Des Maizeaux. In his latter years he suffered both from literary and pecuniary struggles. An account of these forms one of the chapters in Disraeli's Calanities of Authors.

Toledo, COUNCILS OF.—Toledo is a famous old city in Spain, and is still the seat of an archbishopric. Many Church Synods were held there. About the date of the first council there is much difference of opinion, but it was probably called about 400 by Patronus, Bishop of Toledo, in the pontificate of Anastasius, to pass decrees against the Priscillianists. Another was called for the same purpose in 447 by Leo the Great.

That, however, known as the Second Council of Toledo was held in 531, under the presidency of the Archbishop Montanus, and five Canons were passed concerning ecclesiastical discipline, which had much relaxed under the Arian princes.

The Third Council of Toledo was held after the conversion of the Goths from Arianism, in order to fortify the people in their creed and bring the discipline of the Church into better form. It was held in 589, under Leander, Bishop of Seville; there were sixty-three prelates present, besides five proctors for those who were absent. King Reccared, who had been converted that year, ordered a fast of three days to be kept before the opening of the assembly; three-and-twenty important Canons were passed against Arianism, and the same number on matters of the Church. The second Canon enjoined repeating the Creed before receiving the Communion, and the eleventh regulated Penance. The Synod was closed with an eloquent address by Leander on the conversion of the Goths. Two smaller Synods were held in 597 to guard the sobriety of priests, and in 610 to settle the primacy upon the See of Toledo.

The Fourth Council of Toledo was held in 633, under the presidency of St. Isidore; it discussed both discipline and doctrine, and seventy-five Canons were made regarding the rights of the king. It was attended by seventy-two bishops.

The Fifth Council was convened in 636 under Eugenius of Toledo; twenty bishops were present, and nine Canons were passed confirming the decrees of the last assembly.

The Sixth Council, in 638, met to secure the orthodox faith, and amongst other things a Canon was made that none but Catholics should be allowed to live in Spain. Sylva, Archbishop of Narbonne, was president, and fifty-two bishops attended.

The Seventh Council was in 646; the eighth in 653, when measures were taken against Jews and heretics; the ninth, in 655; the tenth, in 656; the eleventh, in 675, settled the better partition of the diocese, and denounced the licentiousness of the priests; the twelfth, in 681, consisted of thirty-five prelates, presided over by Julian, Archbishop of Toledo; it confirmed King Erwig's title to the throne, and gave a check to the Jews; the thirteenth, in 683, made thirteen canons against those who should plot against or despise the authority of the Sovereign; the fourteenth, in 684, was against the Monothelites and Apollinarians; the fifteenth, in 688, discussed the substance and nature of Christ; the sixteenth, in 693, protested against idolatry and the licentiousness of priests; the seventeenth, in 694, was against the Jews. The eighteenth, and last, was held in 701: its decrees are lost. Other Synods of Toledo are mentioned down to 1473, but none of any importance.

Toleration.—The liberty allowed in countries which have an established religion, to persons holding other views or opinions, to teach publicly their own tenets, and to worship in the mode of their own choice, or not at all. Such liberty is so entirely taken for granted in the conditions under which we live, that it is difficult to realise how different was the state of things in former times. It is unfair to the Church of Rome to reckon intolerance as her special monopoly, though it may fairly be claimed for the Reformation that Toleration only became possible under it. It was no cruelty on the part of the authorities of the Church previously which led them to punish with fine, imprisonment, and death those who challenged the received doctrines. For as a State claims to itself the right to imprison thieves and hang murderers, so it was believed that there was a like duty to punish those who depraved morals and ruined the souls of men. A man who wilfully poisons a soul was as sinful as he who wilfully poisons a body. And the Church of Rome, holding itself to be infallible, and its doctrines to be necessary to salvation, proclaimed it her duty to visit with the heaviest penalties those who fell into heresy concerning the faith delivered to the Church. It also appears possible that the mode of execution by burning, so constantly adopted, had in it originally some idea of expiating, by burning on earth, sins which it was held deserved eternal torment of the same kind in a most literal sense. It does not, therefore, surprise us that some of the gentlest of men were uncompromising "persecutors;" such men were St. Francis de Sales and Sir Thomas More. It was the disbelief with which men came to regard this claim to infallibility, which led them to deny the right of any man, or body of men, to be regarded as an authority over consciences. We can therefore do justice to men like St. Dominic, and some of the promoters of the Inquisition, whilst we thank God that their day of persecution is over.

But the rejection of Roman infallibility was by no means the signal for general toleration. When Henry VIII. destroyed the Pope's authority in England he took it to himself, continued the censorship of books, and extended it over not only theological but political writings. In Queen Elizabeth's reign the right of printing was confined to the few presses in London, Cambridge, and Oxford which held royal licences, and in 1637 a decree of the Star Chamber limited the number of printers in the whole country to twenty, and of type-founders to four, and the work of these was subject to the strictest supervision. The danger to life and liberty into which a dissenter from Roman doctrine ran in the days of Queen Mary was transferred to Roman Catholics themselves under Queen Elizabeth. Not only so, but the animosities which divided Protestant from Protestant were no better. Barnes, a Lutheran, who himself had been imprisoned for heresy, impeached Lambert for heresy concerning the Sacrament in the days of Henry VIII., and procured his burning, and no sect recognised any shadow of divisions from its own standards. While the Romanist regarded all outside his dominion as outcasts from grace, the Anglican could only extend the terms of salvation to those who took the Sacraments from the Apostolically ordained minister, Lutherans anathematised those who denied the Real Presence, Calvin burned the Unitarian Servetus, and the Unitarians were uncompromising against those who denied the inspiration of the Scriptures. When the Star Chamber was abolished in 1640 the right which it had exercised was claimed by the Parliament, which pursued the same policy by an ordinance for the regulation of printing. When the Westminster Assembly met in 1643, the Independents proposed that all sects should be tolerated, but the Presbyterians successfully opposed them, and the Westminster Confession [c. 23] asserts the duty of the magistrate to promote the true religion, and to restrain and punish heterodoxy. That the Independents themselves had not learned to practise the principles of religious freedom is evident from the history of their proceedings in New England. "From the Reformation to the Commonwealth," says Bishop Heber, "there is abundant proof that, much as every religious party in its turn had suffered from persecution, and loudly and bitterly as each had, in its own particular instance, complained of the severities exercised against its members, no party had yet been found to perceive the great wickedness of persecution in the abstract, or the moral unfitness of temporal punishment as an engine of religious controversy. Even the sects who were themselves under oppression exclaimed against their rulers, not as being persecutors at all, but as persecuting those who professed the truth; and each sect as it obtained the power to wield the secular weapon, esteemed it also a duty as well as a privilege not to bear the sword in vain." The first home of religious liberty was Holland, where the keen discussions that went on opened the eyes of religious men to the sacredness of the conscience. But the greatest apostle of toleration in England was John Milton, whose Areopagitica: a Defence of the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, published in November, 1644, is perhaps the noblest pamphlet in our language. "The principle for which he contended," writes Professor Morley, "is that upon which all healthy growth and national prosperity, in its true sense, must depend. He took for his model an oration written to be read, which was addressed by Isocrates to the Areopagus, the great Council of Athens. Isocrates called on the Parliament of Athens to undo acts of its own; Milton was making a like call on the Areopagus of England" [Preface to Famous Pamphlets]. The first, however, to lay down unflinchingly this great principle was ROBERT WILLIAMS [q.v.]; and other works which have promoted the cause of the slowly learned lesson of Toleration have been Bishop Jeremy Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying, Barclay's Apology for the Quakers, Locke's Treatise on Toleration, Sydney Smith's Peter Plymley's Letters, Dr. Martineau's Rationale of Religious Enquiry, and John Stuart Mill's Essay on Liberty. The result may be summed up in the language of Mr. Froude:—"An enlarged experience of one another has taught believers of all sects that their differences need not be pressed into mortal hatred; and we have been led forward unconsciously into a recognition of a broader Christianity than as yet we are able to profess, in the respectful acknowledgment of excellence wherever excellence is found. Where we see piety, continence, courage, self-forgetfulness, there, or not far off, we know is the Spirit of the Almighty; and, as we look around us among our living contemporaries, or look back with open eyes into the history of the past, we see that God is no respecter of 'denominations' any more than He is a respecter of persons. His highest gifts are shed abroad with an even hand among the sects of Christendom, and petty distinctions of opinion melt away and become invisible in the fulness of a larger truth."

The question of Toleration came under discussion in 1883, when a ribald publication was sold in the streets of London assailing in grossly indecent fashion the life and works of Christ. The Incarnation, the Sermon on the Mount, the Crucifixion, were all used as subjects of hideous and brutal caricatures. The consequence was a prosecution for blasphemy, and the defence was that the doctrines assailed had been called in question and denied by many eminent men without their right being disputed. The judge, in summing up to the jury, laid down the principle that religious liberty gives no permission to violate the rights of others, or to infringe laws designed for the protection of decency, morality, and good order. The jury found the authors guilty, and they were sentenced to imprisonment, and the Times newspaper next day commented in the following words, which may be taken as expressing the general opinion of thoughtful men of all religious denominations:—"What we really punish by the law of blasphemous libel is an offence against public decency, and until we have other means of dealing with that nuisance we need not be alarmed by outcries about danger to free speech. We allow a man to differ from any other person, public or private, as violently he pleases; but we do not allow him to bawl his opinions couched in offensive language in the ears of passers-by. We do not punish a man for having a foul and prurient imagination, but we do punish him at once if he obtrudes indecent pictures upon our notice in the street. Liberty of clothing is as complete as liberty of speech, but if a man wishes to dispense with clothing altogether we compel him to gratify his taste in private. So in respect of religion, there is no conceivable latitude of view in which a man may not indulge unmolested, so long as he does not wantonly outrage the feelings of others, whose rights are as much entitled to consideration as his own. The law of blasphemy as laid down by Mr. Justice North, and as practically applied in this country during the present century, is a law for the protection of liberty."

Toleration Act.—This Act was passed on May 24th, 1689. Its object was to exempt all Protestants dissenting from the Church of England from the penalties of the Act of Uniformity, the Conventicle, and Five Mile Acts. The Nonconformists, on taking the oaths to the Government, were permitted the free exercise of their religious opinions, and those already convicted under the Acts were set at liberty. No meeting was, however, to be held with closed doors. Papists, and those denying the doctrines of the Trinity, were to derive no benefit from the Act. The places of worship were to be registered at the Bishop's or Archdeacon's Court, and then certificates were to be granted for opening these places of meeting.

Tongues, Gift of.—There are two main explanations which have been given of the wonderful Gift of Tongues on the Day of Pentecost as recorded in Acts ii. The one is that the diversities of tongues was given to the Apostles to enable them to preach the Gospel in various languages all over the world, and this is the view taken by the late Bishop Wordsworth. But this is not stated in Scripture, and will hardly harmonise with 1 Cor. xiv. 1-16, where St. Paul says tongues are for a sign only. As a matter of fact, the Greek language, from the time of Alexander's conquests, was understood all over the civilised world, and it will be remembered that the Epistles of the New Testament to the Romans and Asiatics, as well as to the Greeks, were all written in that language. There was no need of such a gift, and certainly there is no evidence that the early missionaries ever received it. The second view is that the Tongues were for a sign, not for permanent use. They seem to have been not set speeches, but short outpourings of praise, "as the Spirit gave them utterance." The gift of speech is that which distinguishes man. Supernatural speech was therefore a pledge of a new life and power in men. It was a sign of gifts of utterance, of knowledge and spiritual insight, a pledge of the fulfilment of the Lord's promise that His Spirit would teach them without help of men. Though the tongues were not an entire fulfilment of that promise, they were a sign of it. If the Apostles could speak with other tongues, they might believe that they could speak with superhuman wisdom. Most of all, the tongues were used as a means of praising God [Acts ii. 11]. For this was the highest work God committed to the tongue [Ps. cviii. 1], and now when the Spirit had descended upon redeemed man, to this work it was first applied. This view of the matter is well set forth in the sermon by the late Rev. F. W. Robertson on the subject; and it is also apparent from the Epistle to the Corinthians that the gift was liable to excess, and when so indulged was likely to lead to injurious reflections. Paul, therefore, places the gift of tongues in a very secondary rank compared with that of intelligible "prophesying," and it is well to bear this distinction in mind. For the alleged modern revival of this gift, see IRVINGITES.

Tonsure [corona clericalis].—A shaved crown has been from very ancient date one of the specific distinctions of the clerics of the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches. The early Christian teachers, however, did not carry out the practice, in order to distinguish themselves from the heathen priests. It was not till the sixth century that the fashion of shaving the head, with many other peculiarities of the monks, was adopted by secular priests. A difference was then made between a shaved forehead, which was called tonsure of the Apostle Paul, and a shaved crown, called tonsure of the Apostle Peter; the former being customary with the Greeks, Britons, and Irish; the latter in the Roman Church and those countries under its influence. At a Council held in Toledo in 633 the latter mode was formally prescribed, and called corona clericalis; since then the Roman tonsure has remained common to the secular clergy and monks in the West of Europe, and furnishes a means to distinguish the higher from the lower clergy, as the extent of tonsure increases with the rank till the priesthood is reached. Most of the mendicant and cloistered orders allow only a narrow strip of hair to grow round the head, all above and below is shaved. The tonsure is a necessary preliminary to entering the clerical state, whether secular or religious; in the former case it is conferred by the bishop of the diocese, in the latter by the head of the religious house. It invests the receiver with all the privileges of a cleric.

Toplady, AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE [b. in 1740 at Farnham in Surrey; d. in London, 1778].—He was educated first at Westminster and then at Dublin University. Very early in life he took up decided religious views, and wrote some sacred poetry. In 1762 he was ordained, and became Vicar of Broad Hembury in Devonshire in 1768, where most of his hymns were composed. He was practically a Calvinistic Methodist, and on this point got into hot controversy with John Wesley, in which he used very bitter and unbecoming language. He was a very weakly man, and under medical advice he removed to London in 1775; here he preached for three years in a private chapel with some success till his death. Most of his hymns were published whilst in London. He was the author of the well-known hymn, "Rock of Ages, cleft for me;" it was first published in 1776, in the Gospel Magazine, of which Toplady was at that time the editor. Another of his hymns is "Your harps, ye trembling saints, Down from the willows take." A complete edition of his verses was published by D. Sedgwick in 1860.

Torquemada, JUAN DE, a Spaniard [b. 1388, d. 1468].—He was present at the Council of Basel. He is the author of a book on The Conception of Mary the Mother of God. He was made a Cardinal in 1439.

Torquemada, THOMAS DE [b. 1420, d. 1498].—A Dominican who became famous by establishing the Inquisition in Spain in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella. He was made Grand Inquisitor in 1483, an office he held for fifteen years. He was an extremely cruel man; it is said that during his tenure of office nearly 9,000 victims were burnt at the stake. He was instrumental in procuring the banishment of the Jews from Spain to the number of 100,000.

Tractarian Movement.—The name given to the religious revival which commenced in Oxford in 1833. Two influences were at work in causing it. One was the tendency to Rationalism brought about by the study of German theologians; the other, the perfunctory way in which the clergy performed their clerical duties. Pluralists abounded, and there was a general spirit of money-getting abroad amongst the clergy. The rubrics were not carried out; there was no daily service, except in the cathedrals; the Holy Communion was administered only at long intervals, and, altogether, Church life was at a very low ebb.

The Reform Bill of 1831, with its political Liberalism, had made a deep impression, especially on some of the clergy of Oxford, and roused them up to a defence of the Established Church. The leaders of the movement were two celebrated Fellows of Oriel—John Keble and John Henry Newman, with whom were joined Richard Hurrell Froude, Arthur Philip Perceval, Frederick William Faber, William Palmer of Magdalen and William Palmer of Worcester; Edward Bouverie Pusey, and Isaac Williams. To these must be added one great Cambridge name, that of HUGH JAMES ROSE [q.v.].

Keble, by the publication in 1827 of the Christian Year, had exercised an immense influence. His was a singularly beautiful personal character, and to him the Church of England was the only possible Church. Newman, till the age of twenty-one, had been brought up under Calvinistic influences. Richard Hurrell Froude was a man of versatile genius, but of no real depth, very impetuous, the "knight-errant" of his party, and he undoubtedly led Newman towards Rome. These three men had, between 1828 and 1833, been gradually approaching towards a definite plan of action. On July 14th, 1833, Keble preached an assize sermon, entitled National Apostasy, which so moved Newman that a meeting was at once agreed on, at which the method of action should be decided. This meeting took place at Hadleigh, where Hugh James Rose was the rector, and at which all those named above were present except Faber, Pusey, and Williams. They had previously published a book called The Church's Manual, in which they had prominently brought forward the significance of the Sacraments and the importance of the priesthood; this manual they now revised, and as a means for further teaching Newman started the idea of Tracts for the Times, which were to be backed by higher pulpit teaching. Newman is called the Tractarian par excellence. Of the ninety which were published in the course of eight years he wrote twenty-eight. In 1835 Pusey, who at first had held aloof from the movement, came into the ranks with his tract on Baptism; he was a man of higher standing than the rest, being Hebrew Professor, a D.D., and a Canon of Christchurch. His accession gave the movement name and force, and originated the term Puseyite, which was so long the epithet of a High Churchman. In 1838 the Bishop of Oxford animadverted on the Tracts, but he did not oppose their publication; but the opposition waxed louder year by year, especially on the publication, in 1839, by Newman and Keble, of R. H. Froude's Remains (he having died in 1836). This book contained words of the strongest character against the Reformation, and opened the eyes of many who had hitherto doubted as to the tendency of the movement. In 1841 came the celebrated Tract 90, from the pen of Newman, which was said to teach that a man might subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles even when he held the doctrines of the Church of Rome. This raised a tremendous storm in Oxford. Four Tutors published a protest against it, and it was censured by the Heads of Houses. This was the last of the Tracts. The Bishop of Oxford, Dr. Bagot, wrote to Newman requesting that the series might cease, and Newman immediately yielded. Though their publication made so much noise at the time, the Tracts are now but little read, and those who do read them wonder that they should have caused so much excitement. The name "Tractarian" was given to the writers by Dr. Christopher Benson, Master of the Temple, who was one of their strongest opponents. Cardinal Newman's Apologia, written in 1864, is eminently the best book to read for the history of the movement.

The following is a list of the numbers and titles of the Tracts, with their authors, as far as it is possible to give them:—

1. Thoughts on the Ministerial Commission, respectfully addressed to the Clergy by one of Themselves. J. H. Newman.

- Records of the Church by various Translators, all anonymous, but edited by J. H. Newman.

Tradition.—Something handed down from one generation to another. In the Church the term includes customs, forms, rites and ceremonies which have been transmitted by oral communication. The Jews say that, besides their written law contained in the Old Testament, Moses delivered an oral law which was conveyed from father to son, and at length embodied in the Talmud; the Roman Catholics hold particular doctrines, supposed to have descended in like manner from Apostolic times, and they quote in support of this 2 Thess. ii. 15 and 1 Cor. xi. 2, where the word ordinances might be more strictly translated traditions. The Thirty-fourth Article lays down the Church's opinion regarding traditions; it does not mean that we may vary our doctrines or adopt fresh ones as matters of faith, but by its "traditions and ceremonies" is obviously meant those customs which, though not actually named in the Scriptures, nor in the written law or rubrics of the Church, have by long-established use become settled facts. Among these we may mention the custom of bowing in the Creed at the name of Jesus, the postures customary in various church offices, the use of a doxology and collects after the sermon, the pouring of water on the head at baptism, the saying or singing of the Psalms, and other matters of long usage, which, though unwritten, are held to be obligatory as standing customs of the Church.

Traditors.—Those who, in time of persecution—notably under Diocletian—to avoid martyrdom delivered up their Bibles or any of the ornaments and utensils of the Church to their persecutors. They were generally timorous priests, and were punished by the Church with dismissal from office. The Donatists considered the Traditors on a level with the worst heretics, and separated from the Catholic Church on the ground that it tolerated them.

Traducians [Lat. traduco, "I transmit"].—A name which the Pelagians gave to the orthodox Christians because they held original sin ex traduce, or conveyed from the parents to the children. The term is also applied to those who hold that souls are also transmitted to children by their parents. This opinion was first put forward by Tertullian and opposed by the Creationists, who teach God's agency in the origin of each human soul.

Trajan, PERSECUTION OF.—Trajan reigned from A.D. 98 to A.D. 117. He was not actively hostile to the Church, as is evident from his celebrated correspondence with Pliny, and indeed he was too much occupied with wars and conquests to give much attention to an obscure body like the Christians; but though no persecuting edict was issued, there was during his reign a great amount of persecution. Even when there were no laws in force against Christians, governors in search of popularity might easily satisfy the clamours of the people, and convict them of disaffection to the Government when they refused to swear by the name of Cæsar or sacrifice to his image, more especially as they were often known to speak of the kingdom of Christ. The hatred of the people, seditiously kept up by their priests, broke out frequently on occasions of excitement, such as the public games, and caused numerous martyrdoms.

About the year 111, Trajan received from Pliny, Governor of Bithynia, a letter inquiring how he wished the Christians to be dealt with. The Emperor's reply, though not altogether unfavourable, certainly did not check the spread of persecution. He answered that Christians were not to be sought for, nor condemned on anonymous charges, but if brought before the Governor and convicted they were to suffer death.

The two most eminent martyrs of this reign were Simeon, Bishop of Jerusalem, and St. IGNATIUS [q.v.], Bishop of Antioch. Simeon was the brother and successor of James the Less, and venerated by his people for his relationship to our Lord. In the year 104 he was denounced to Atticus, Governor of Syria, by the Gnostic heretics, as a Christian and a descendant of David. The firmness with which the old man, now 120 years of age, endured several days of torture, filled the Governor with astonishment, but did not move him to pity. He was condemned to suffer death by crucifixion.

It is probably to the reign of Trajan that the following story, related by Tertullian, belongs:—Arrius Antoninus, Proconsul of Asia, persecuted the Christians of his province with such rigor, that at last they all came in a body and gave themselves up. After putting a few of them to death, he dismissed the rest with the words, "Miserable people, if you prefer death, you may find precipices and halters enough."

Tralles or Trallis.—A town near Ephesus, to the inhabitants of which Ignatius wrote one of his epistles.

Transfiguration, FEAST OF.—One of the greater festivals of the Roman Catholic Church, appointed to be kept on August 6th, in memory of the glorification of Christ on Mount Tabor. The institution of the feast was very ancient, but its observance was made more solemn by Calixtus III. in 1456, when he attached to it indulgences in memory of a victory gained over the Turks.

Translation.—The term applied to the removal of a bishop from one See to another.

Transmigration of the Soul.—The doctrine of the passage of the soul from one body into another, had its foundation in the belief of the connection of all living beings, and of the gradual purification of the spiritual part of man, and its return to the common source and origin of all things—God. The earthly life, according to this system, is only a point in the succession of states through which the soul, proceeding from God, has to pass in order at last to return to its original source. Pious men—for example, Herder—have thought that many reasons were to be found for a belief in such a transmigration, which is also taught in the Talmud. The religion of the ancient people of India, in which the first traces of this belief are found, considers it partly as a decree of destiny, partly as a punishment for the neglect of religious duties, in consequence of which the soul is made to pass after death through the bodies of various animals by way of purification. From the Indians this belief passed on to the doctrine of the Egyptian caste of priests, who believed that the soul had to continue three thousand years after death in the bodies of animals before it could reach the habitations of the blessed. From them the Greeks received the doctrine, and termed it metempsychosis ["change of soul"], and metasomatosis ["change of body"]. Pythagoras adopted it into his philosophy as indicating the immortality of the human soul; the later Pythagoreans taught that the mind, freed from the fetters of the body, will enter the realm of the departed, there remain in an intermediate state for a longer or shorter time, and again animate other human or animal bodies, until the time of its purification is finished and its return to the Fountain of Life has become possible. The Greek mysteries enveloped the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul in myths, which represent Dionysos or Bacchus as the lord and leader of the soul. In these also the belief in a pre-existence is to be discovered, for they distinguish souls who are driven from their ethereal or heavenly life down to earth, to appear for the first time as men, from the souls in a state of penance which were obliged to enter a human body a second and third time, and also from those souls which voluntarily come to the earth from curiosity, or delight in individuality. The Greek poets and philosophers have given various forms to these myths. Pindar, the Pythagorean, lets the soul return to bliss after passing three unblemished lives on earth. Plato extends the period for the return of souls to God to ten thousand years, during which time they inhabit the bodies of men and animals. Among the Romans, Cicero and Virgil allude to this doctrine. The Rabbis maintain that God created only a certain number of Jewish souls, which therefore constantly return to earth as long as Jews are to be found here, and that as a penance they sometimes have to inhabit animals, but that on the Day of Resurrection they will all be purified and revive in the bodies of the just on the soil of the Promised Land. The sect of the Manicheans also considered the transmigration of the soul as a penance, and this belief existed among the Celtic Druids and Scythians, and is still entertained by the heathens of Eastern Asia, the Caucasian tribes, the savages of America, and the negroes. With the Hindoos it has led to the veneration of certain animals, and the fear of eating their flesh, lest their bodies should be the abode of departed ancestors or friends.

There are passages in the Apocrypha which indicate that there were holders of the doctrine of Transmigration among the Jews, and in John ix. 2 it seems indicated in the disciples' question. [See Dean Plumptre's note on that passage in the Bible for English Readers.] The doctrine has still advocates; and Charles Kingsley hints it in his well-known book The Water Babies.

Transubstantiation [Latin trans, "over," and substantia, "a substance"].—The Roman doctrine that in the Holy Eucharist the bread and wine, by the act of consecration, become the Body and Blood of Christ. The word itself is scholastic, and came into use in the eleventh century during the Berengarian controversy [BERENGARIANS], and was defended by the leading Schoolmen, and authoritatively adopted at the Lateran Council under Innocent III. in 1215. The decree states, "The true Body and Blood of Christ are verily contained in the Sacrament of the Altar under the appearances of bread and wine, the bread being transubstantiated into the Body and the wine into the Blood by Divine power." At the thirteenth session of the Council of Trent the doctrine was categorically reaffirmed. [TRENT.] But when we go back into an early period of mediæval times there is clear evidence that the doctrine was unknown. Thus a Canon, probably of the age of Theodore [668-689], speaks of the body of Christ as being present, not substantially but spiritually; the Council of Celcyth, A.D. 816, speaks of the elements as inferior in sanctity to relics, and in the Homilies of Ælfric, written about 987, is the following passage: "Housel is Christ's body, not corporally but spiritually; not the body in which He suffered, but that body of which He spoke when He blessed bread and wine for housel."

The Roman Catholics do not deny that the term "Transubstantiation" is of mediæval origin, but they contend that the doctrine expressed thereby is implied in Holy Scripture, and was held in the primitive Church. The cardinal passages on which they rely are the words of institution [Matt. xxvi. 26-28; Mark xiv. 22-24; Luke xxii. 19-20; 1 Cor. xi. 24-25], and the discourse in the synagogue of Capernaum [John vi. 26-71]. We may quote Milner's End of Controversy for an authoritative statement of their view:—

"Christ explained and promised this Divine mystery near one of the Paschs [John vi. 4], previous to His institution of it. He then multiplied five loaves and two fishes so as to afford a superabundant meal to five thousand men, besides women and children [Matt. xiv. 21], which was an evident sign of the future multiplication of His own person on the several altars of the world; after which He took occasion to speak of this mystery, by saying: 'I am the living bread, which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is My flesh, for the life of the world' [John vi. 51]. The Sacred Text goes on to inform us of the perplexity of the Jews from their understanding Christ's words in their plain and natural sense, which He, so far from removing by a different explanation, confirms by expressing that sense in other terms still more emphatical. 'The Jews, therefore, strove amongst themselves, saying, How can this man give us His flesh to eat? Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I said unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you. For My flesh is meat indeed, and My blood is drink indeed.' [Ver. 52, 53, 55.] Nor was it the multitude alone who took offence at this mystery of a real and corporal reception of Christ's person, so energetically and repeatedly expressed by Him, but also several of His own beloved disciples, whom certainly He would not have permitted to desert Him to their own destruction, if He could have removed their difficulty, by barely telling them that they were only to receive

Him by faith, and to take bread and wine in remembrance of Him. Yet this merciful Saviour permitted them to go their way; and contented Himself with asking the Apostles if they would also leave Him? They were as incapable of comprehending the mystery as the others were, but they were assured that Christ is ever to be credited upon His word, and accordingly they made that generous act of faith which every true Christian will also make, who seriously and devotedly considers the Sacred Text before us. 'Many, therefore, of his disciples, when they had heard this, said: This is a hard saying: who can hear it? . . . From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him. Then Jesus said to the twelve: Will ye also go away? Then Simon Peter answered him: Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life.' [Ver. 60, 66, 67, 68.]

"The Apostles, thus instructed by Christ's express and repeated declaration as to the nature of this Sacrament when He promised it to them, were prepared for this sublime simplicity of His words in instituting it. For 'whilst they were at supper, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples and said, Take ye and eat: This is my body. And taking the chalice He gave thanks, and gave to them, saying: Drink ye all of this; for this is my blood of the New Testament, which shall be shed for many unto the remission of sins' [Matt. xxvi. 26, 27, 28]. This account of St. Matthew is repeated by St. Mark [xiv. 22-24] and nearly word for word by St. Luke [xxii. 19, 20] and by St. Paul [1 Cor. xi. 23-25], who adds, 'Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread or drink the chalice of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord . . . and eateth and drinketh judgment (the Protestant Bible says 'damnation') to himself' [1 Cor. xi. 27, 29]. To the native evidence of these texts I shall add but two words. First, supposing it possible that Jesus Christ had deceived the Jews of Capharnaum, and even His disciples, and His very Apostles, in the solemn asseverations that He, six times over, repeated of His real and corporal presence in the Sacrament, when He promised to institute it; can any believe that He would continue the deception on His dear Apostles, in the very act of instituting it, and when He was on the point of leaving them? In short, when He was bequeathing them the legacy of His love. In the next place, what propriety is there in St. Paul's heavy denunciations of profaning Christ's person, and of damnation on the part of unworthy communicants, if they partook of it only by faith and in figure? For, after all, the paschal lamb which the people of God had by His command every year eaten since their deliverance out of Egypt, and which the Apostles themselves ate before they received the Blessed Eucharist, was, as a mere figure and an incitement to faith, far more striking than eating and drinking bread and wine are: hence the guilt of profaning the paschal lamb, and the numerous other figures of Christ, would not be less heinous than profaning the Sacrament if He were not really there."

It is clear that the doctrine of Transubstantiation implies a stupendous and continuous miracle. It is not only above reason, but it contradicts the evidence of the senses. This is met by the Scholastic distinction between "substance" and "accidents." The accidents are those of bread and wine, but the substance is changed. The material is so spiritualised, that wherever the Mass is solemnised the miraculous change takes place, simultaneously, all over the world, and Christ's whole person—body, soul, and spirit—is received by each communicant. One of the hymns of Thomas Aquinas puts this in the clearest and most unequivocal way:

A sumente non concisus,
Non confractus, non divisus,
Integer accipitur.
Sumit unus, sumunt mille
Quantum isti, tantum ille,
Nec sumptus consumitur.

Sumunt boni, sumunt mali,
Sorte tamen inaequali
Vitæ vel interitus.

One of the most acute divines who replied to Dr. Milner was an American prelate, Dr. J. H. Hopkins, Bishop of Vermont. Roman Catholics, he contends, talk triumphantly of their adherence to the very letter of Christ's words. But they cannot interpret those words without admitting a figure of speech at the outset. For when Christ said, "This is my blood, which is shed for you," the literal meaning does not agree with the unquestioned fact that His blood was not actually shed until the following day. Then St. Luke varies the phrase, and gives us the words of institution, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood." There was no literal covenant written in blood. Consequently an argument derived from the strict letter does nothing to decide the controversy. Next, Dr. Hopkins adduces nearly fifty texts from the New Testament, in which the word to be is employed in a figurative and symbolical sense. He contends that the view of the Reformed Church is as high as that of the Romanist, in the true spiritual incorporation of the soul with Christ. The supposed change gives no superiority in the essential privileges of the blessed gift. He then quotes the commentary of the great St. Augustine on John vi. against Milner:—

"Now here let us pause a little that we may have the benefit of St. Augustine's commentary. And this you are perfectly aware that you are bound to respect, since your Council of Trent forbids the Scriptures to be understood except according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers. Thus, then, this prince of the Fathers expounds the passage, and my readers will find it, I trust, instructive and interesting, notwithstanding that it is directly in the face of the carnal literal sense for which Dr. Milner contends.

"After quoting the words of the Saviour, Except ye eat my flesh and drink my blood ye have no life in you, Augustine proceeds to say: 'His disciples were offended—not all, indeed, but the greater part—saying in themselves, This is a hard saying. Who can hear it? But when the Lord knew this in Himself, and heard the murmurs of their thoughts, He answered to the thinkers, who had not yet spoken, that they might know that they were heard, and might cease to think so. What, then, does He answer? Does this offend you? What and if you shall see the Son of Man ascending up where He was before? What doth He mean by the question, Doth this offend you? Do you think that I am about to divide this body which you behold into parts, and cut my members into pieces, and give them to you? What, therefore, and if you shall see the Son of Man ascending up where He was before? Certainly, He who could ascend entire could not be consumed. Therefore, He gave us the salutary refectory of His body and blood, and resolved at once the great question of His integrity. Let those eat who eat, let those drink who drink, let them hunger and thirst; let them eat life, let them drink life. To eat, that is to be renewed; but you are so renewed that the source of your renewal may not be diminished. To drink this, what is it but to live? Eat life, drink life, you shall possess life, and that life is entire. Then the body and blood of Christ will be life to every one of you, IF THAT WHICH IS VISIBLY TAKEN IN THE SACRAMENT shall be SPIRITUALLY EATEN AND SPIRITUALLY DRUNK IN THE TRUTH ITSELF. (Si quod in sacramento visibiliter sumitur in ipsa veritate spiritualiter manducetur spiritualiter bibatur.) FOR WE HAVE HEARD THE LORD HIMSELF SAYING, IT IS THE SPIRIT THAT QUICKENETH; THE FLESH PROFITETH NOTHING. THE WORDS WHICH I HAVE SPOKEN UNTO YOU ARE SPIRIT AND LIFE.' Here we see that Augustine applies the language of the Saviour to the Sacrament, so as perfectly to destroy the idea of Transubstantiation. The flesh profiteth nothing. It is the Spirit which quickeneth. And, therefore, that eating and drinking which is effectual is not corporal, but spiritual. But the following passage will show his meaning yet more clearly:—'If a preceptive speech,' saith this eminent Father, 'either forbids a crime or a sin, or orders something useful or beneficial, it is not figurative. But if it appears to order a crime or a sin, it is figurative. Unless you shall eat, saith our Lord, the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you. Here he seems to order a crime or an outrage, and, therefore, IT IS A FIGURE, DIRECTING THE COMMUNION OF OUR LORD'S

"Thus we see that the sixth chapter of St. John's Gospel, instead of bearing the carnal and literal meaning which the modern Romanist puts upon it, was interpreted figuratively by the greatest light of the primitive Church in the fourth century. And the same result will be shown in reference to the next Scriptural proof which your author cites from the Gospels." [The passage from Milner is given above.]

"Now let us see how the Fathers interpret this; whether literally, with the modern Romanist, or figuratively and spiritually, with the Church of England. Thus saith the same great Augustine: 'If the Sacraments had not a certain similitude of those things of which they are the Sacraments, they could not be Sacraments at all. But from this similitude, for the most part, they take the names of the things themselves. Therefore, according to a certain mode, the Sacrament of Christ's Body is the Body of Christ, and the Sacrament of Christ's Blood is the Blood of Christ, and, in like manner, the Sacrament of Faith' (meaning Baptism) 'is Faith. Hence, the Apostle saith, speaking of Baptism, We are buried by Baptism into death. He does not say, We have set forth the Sign of Burial, but he saith We are buried. He calls the SACRAMENT of the thing by the word belonging TO THE THING ITSELF.'

"Augustine, elsewhere, applies this directly as follows: 'Our Lord,' saith he, 'did not hesitate to say, This is my body, when He gave them the sign of His body.' The same interpretation precisely was given to the language of our blessed Saviour by all the other primitive witnesses. Thus, Tertullian saith: 'The Lord, in the Gospel, showed bread, calling it His Body, in order that you might thence understand Him to have given to the bread THE FIGURE OF HIS BODY.' And again: 'Our Lord,' saith he, 'taking the bread, and distributing it to His disciples, made it His body by saying, This is My Body, that is, the figure of my body.' 'And that you may recognise an ancient figure of blood in wine,' continues Tertullian, 'Isaiah will teach you, saying, Who is this that cometh from Edom with dyed garments from Bozrah? I have trodden the vinepress alone—and their blood is sprinkled upon my garments. And still more clearly in the Book of Genesis, where Jacob, in the blessing of Judah, delineates Christ: He washed His robe in wine, and His garment in the blood of the grape, indicating His flesh in the clothing, and His blood in the wine. Thus, now He consecrates His blood in wine, as then He figured wine for His blood.'

"Cyprian, the Bishop and Martyr of Carthage, gives us another plain proof of the same doctrine. It appears that some foolish innovators, in his days, had undertaken to administer the Eucharist with water only, and he rebukes them in the following terms: 'I wonder greatly from whence this novelty has arisen, in certain places, that against the Evangelical and Apostolical discipline, water is offered in the cup of the Lord, which can never, by itself, express the blood of Christ.' For the water signifies the people; as the Divine Scripture declares in the Apocalypse: The waters which thou sawest, upon which the harlot sat, are peoples, and tribes, and nations, and tongues. Which thing we behold contained in the Sacrament of the cup. For as Christ carried us all by bearing our sins, we see that THE PEOPLE ARE SIGNIFIED BY THE WATER, WHILE BY THE WINE HE SHOWS THE BLOOD OF CHRIST. Therefore, when the water is mixed with the wine in the cup, the people are united with Christ, and the whole host of believers is conjoined and incorporated with Him in whom they believe. And thus it is manifest that, in consecrating the chalice or cup, water alone cannot be offered, nor yet wine alone; for if any one offers wine alone, the blood of Christ begins to be without us; but if the water be alone, the people begin to be without Christ: but when both are mixed together, then the spiritual and celestial Sacrament is perfected.

"Nothing can be more evident, from this decisive extract, than the entire agreement of Cyprian with Tertullian and Augustine. For he applies the same figurative language to the water, as signifying the people, and to the wine, as signifying the blood of Christ. And thus it is manifest that he could not have believed in Transubstantiation in the one, any more than he believed it in the other."

The repudiation of this doctrine by the Church of England is thus expressed in the Twenty-eighth Article: "Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of Bread and Wine), in the Supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ; but it is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions." Here, then, are four assertions: [1] That the Scriptural authority alleged by the Romish Church is not borne out—"cannot be proved by Holy Writ;" [2] that other passages of Scripture go against the doctrine; [3] that it contravenes the nature of a Sacrament; and [4] that it is the parent of superstitions.

The first point has been already dealt with by Bishop Hopkins, but it may be well to cite a learned divine of our own country, Dr. Turton, formerly Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, afterwards Bishop of Ely. His answer, published in 1837, to Cardinal Wiseman's discourses on the Real Presence [1836] is one of the most exhaustive treatises on the subject, and is devoted exclusively to the Scriptural passages named. The following extract is a fair specimen. It follows an examination of Dr. Wiseman's concession that our Lord was speaking of Faith in His doctrine when He spoke of Bread in the early part of the chapter, but that He changed His subject, and meant Transubstantiation in the latter portion:—

"The truth is, that our Lord, throughout His ministry, employed the miracles He wrought, and the events which daily occurred, as the means of instruction in the things appertaining to an endless existence; and He availed Himself of them in such a manner that, whether the figurative import of His words was more or less intelligible to His countrymen, His meaning in many instances, either by additional remarks at the time or in subsequent conversation with His disciples, became very clear. No one, however, can read the Gospels without perceiving that there were likewise instances in which His words, although not at the time understood, were left—so far as we know, without the slightest explanation—to produce their effect—which we can easily suppose they often would produce—on reflection, and in the after-time. We have, moreover, every reason to believe that, in the degrees of Divine knowledge afforded, as well as in the working of miracles, especial regard was had to the various moral dispositions of the people. The teachable were taught, while the obstinate were left to their ignorance; and without attempting to pry into the Divine councils, there are, even to our imperfect conception, distinct intimations that, in such a method of proceeding, judgment was blended with mercy.

"After the miraculous supply of food to the five thousand, as recorded in the opening of John vi., our Lord—aware of the anxiety of the multitudes for a similar relief of their wants, and of the disregard of that Divine power from which the supply had come—began to admonish them respecting the spiritual support of which they stood in need. They were seeking after 'the meat which perisheth;' but they ought to labour for that 'which endureth unto everlasting life.' That, indeed, was the meat which He was come to give unto them; 'the true bread from heaven,' which 'giveth life unto the world.' He was Himself that bread—'the bread of life'—to be given to those who came to Him, and believed on Him. 'This,' He said, 'is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent.' 'He that cometh to Me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on Me shall never thirst.' 'And this is the will of Him that sent me, that everyone which seeth the Son, and believeth on Him, may have everlasting life.' 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on Me hath everlasting life. I am the bread of life.' He who thus declared Himself to be 'the bread of life' is elsewhere called by St. John [1 John i. 1] 'the word of life,' and towards the end of this chapter [v. 68] is acknowledged by St. Peter to have had 'the words of eternal life.'

No extraneous learning, then, is demanded to perceive that the important truths primarily intended to be inculcated were these—that to hear and believe were the great requisites on the part of men; and that spiritual sustenance, even unto life eternal, would be the corresponding gift on the part of God. And thus, as far at least as the fifty-first verse, this discourse may be considered to be an amplification, by means of a constant allusion to ‘the bread of life,’ of what had been taught on another occasion: ‘Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life.’ [John v. 24.] All this is so clear, that, till we come to the fifty-first verse, Roman Catholics and Protestants, as Dr. Wiseman truly remarks, ‘are equally agreed’ that our Lord’s discourse ‘refers entirely to believing in Him.’ The truth is, that neither the hearers of that age nor the readers of the present can be deemed much more indebted, for their intelligence of the subject, to the above-mentioned expositions of the terms food and bread, than to the opinion in the Midrash Coheleth, previously referred to by Dr. Wiseman, that, ‘as [Moses] the first Goel [deliverer] brought down manna’—‘so likewise will [the Messiah] the second Goel cause manna to descend.’ In the art of interpreting, as well as in other arts, the time is at hand when it will be necessary to simplify our methods of proceeding very considerably.”

Dr. Turton adduces the judgment of an eminent Roman Catholic commentator, the annotator of the Rhenish New Testament, that the Jewish misconception was not what Milner and Wiseman make it, but far more gross and carnal.

“This carnality of theirs [the Jews] stood in two points especially: First, that they imagined that He would kill Himself, and cut and mangle His flesh into parts, and so give it them raw or roast to be eaten among them, ‘which could not be meant,’ saith St. Augustine, ‘for that had contained an heinous and barbarous fact; and therefore they might, and should, have been assured that He would command no such thing; but some other sweet sense to be of His hard, mystical, or figurative words; and to be fulfilled in a Sacrament, mystery, and a marvellous Divine sort, otherwise than they could comprehend. Secondly, they did err touching His flesh, in that they took it to be the flesh of a mere man, and of a dead man also, when it should come to be eaten.’ [From the note on John vi. 63.]”

The second dictum of the article, that Transubstantiation is “contrary to the plain words of Scripture,” would require a close examination of many passages of St. Paul’s Epistles, especially the Corinthians. We can only refer to Bishop Wordsworth’s learned commentary, which deals most fully with this subject, and may be taken as the latest expression of the Anglican view—the view held by a catena of the greatest divines from the Reformation downwards. On the two remaining points we will quote the weighty and pregnant comment of Bishop Beveridge:—

“The third thing is, that it ‘overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament,’ which I need not spend many words to prove; for in a Sacrament it is required, first, that there be some outward sign representing spiritual grace; whereas if the bread be really changed into the body of Christ there is no outward sign at all in the Sacrament, there being nothing else but the body and blood of Christ, which are not signs, but the thing signified. Nay, as Augustine observes, ‘The signs themselves are the Sacraments,’ and, therefore, where there is no sign there can be no Sacrament. And so, by depriving this sacred ordinance of its outward signs, they degrade it from being a Sacrament, making it to have nothing of the nature of a Sacrament in it. And, therefore, if they will still hold, that by the words of consecration the bread and wine are substantially changed into the body and blood of Christ, let them cease to call that holy action any longer a Sacrament, but name it ‘the body and blood of Christ;’ for, according to their opinion, there is nothing in it but the body and blood of Christ. So it is plain that by this doctrine the nature of a Sacrament in general must be destroyed, or this Sacrament in particular must be expunged out of their catalogue of Sacraments.”

“The fourth and last thing here objected against the doctrine of Transubstantiation is, that ‘it hath given occasion to many superstitions,’ which any one that ever observed their customs and practices cannot but acknowledge. For this fond opinion possessing their brains, that the bread is the real body of Christ hung upon the cross, and pierced for their sins, oh! how zealous are they in wrapping it up neatly in their handkerchiefs, laying it up in their treasures, carrying it about in their processions; yea, and, at the length, in worshipping and adoring it too!”

TRAPP, JOHN [b. 1601, d. 1669], Rector of Weston-on-Avon, and author of a Commentary on the Bible, which has been recently reprinted and finds favour with the Evangelical clergy.

TRAPPE, LA.—An abbey of the Cistercian Order founded in 1140 by Rotrou, Count of Perche. As in many other such abbeys, the discipline became greatly relaxed, but it was reformed by the Abbot Armand Jean le Bouthillier de Rancé. He was born in 1626 and ordained a priest in 1651, and in 1662 he determined on the reformation of his abbey, which he had already held in commendam for twenty-five years, it being in those days no uncommon thing to confer these posts on children of tender years. Cardinal Richelieu had given him this and several other pieces of preferment, and having also succeeded to a large fortune, the Abbot led for a time a dissipated life in Paris; but his heart being touched by the loss of a friend, he determined to sell everything and distribute the money to the poor, and, giving up all other benefices, he retired to La Trappe. He ordained that his monks should return to the "strict observance" of the Cistercians, and in 1663 he got leave from the King to hold the abbey as a regular abbot. Having entered on a new novitiate, he succeeded by his eloquence and example in persuading his monks to consent to the increased austerities, which forbade them to take wine, meat, fish, or eggs, and to cut themselves off completely from the outer world, and devote themselves to manual labour. They even exceeded the strict rules of the Cistercians: they rose at two o'clock, and went to rest at seven in winter and eight in summer. From two till half-past four they spent in prayer and meditation, and then retired to their cells till half-past five, when they said Prime. At seven they went to labour, either out or in doors; at half-past nine was said Tierce, followed by the Mass, Sext, and None; then they dined on vegetables; at one o'clock returned to work for another two hours, and then retired to their cells till Vespers at four o'clock; this was followed by a meal of bread and water, and spiritual reading till six o'clock, when Compline was said; at seven they went to their cells and slept on pallets of straw. Absolute silence was enjoined at all times, and they had to make their wants known by signs. Their dress was a long grey cloak with wide sleeves and a black cowl; they wore their dress by night as well as by day. Rancé died in 1700. In 1790, when other monasteries were suppressed, the Trappists were turned out of France and took refuge in Switzerland, in the monastery of Val Sainte in Freiburg, under Augustin de Lestrange; but this was destroyed by the French in 1798, and they wandered about till the Bourbon restoration in 1817, when they recovered La Trappe, and Lestrange established branches in connection with it in Spain, Italy, England, Belgium, and Ireland. In 1848 a branch was established in the United States.

Traskites.—The name given to a party among the early Puritans, from their founder John Trask, a native of Somersetshire, who first preached in London in 1617. He taught many extraordinary doctrines, insisted on his followers obeying every letter of the law of Scripture, as given to the Jews, however inapplicable to Christian times. They were obliged to fast three days at a time, his authority being a passage in the prophet Hosea [Hos. vi. 1]: "After two days He will revive us, in the third day He will raise us up and we shall dwell in His sight;" and he assured his followers that if they endured to the third day they would be in all respects in a condition of saintliness. Saturday was observed as the day of rest instead of Sunday, and was kept with all the strictness of the Jewish Sabbath. Trask and his wife were called upon to appear before the Star Chamber, the latter's offence being that she refused to teach in her school on Saturday. He was put in the pillory, and she was imprisoned for fifteen years. Towards the end of the seventeenth century the Traskites began to be called SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS [q.v.].

Tremellius, EMANUEL [b. at Ferrara, 1610; d. at Sedan, 1680].—He came to Germany with Peter Martyr and some others who had privately become Protestants; after some stay at Strasburg he came to England in 1647, and taught Greek at Cambridge. On the death of Edward VI. he returned to Germany, and taught in the college of Hornbach, until he was called thence to be Hebrew Professor at Heidelberg and afterwards at Sedan. He turned the Syriac translation of the New Testament into Latin, and undertook a new version of the Old from the Hebrew. In this work he was assisted by Francis Junius of Bourges.

Trench, RICHARD CHENEVIX, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin, was the second son of Mr. Richard Trench, brother of the first Lord Ashdown in the Irish peerage. His mother was the granddaughter and heiress of Dr. Richard Chenevix, Bishop of Waterford [1745-1799], the friend and correspondent of Lord Chesterfield. He was born, on the 9th of September, 1807, graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1829, and was ordained to a curacy under Hugh James Rose, at Hadleigh, Suffolk. He subsequently became incumbent of Curdridge, a chapelry in the extensive parish of Bishop's Waltham, Hants. Dr. Trench was a man of many literary gifts, but it was as a poet, and not as a scholar or divine, that he first attracted attention. In 1835 appeared his earliest work, The Story of Justin Martyr, and other Poems, soon to be succeeded by other works which placed him among the foremost of the young poets of his day. In 1841 Mr. Trench gave up his incumbency at Curdridge and accepted a curacy under Archdeacon Wilberforce at Alverstoke. From this time forward the two men were intimately associated, and the Archdeacon received from his curate much valuable literary and other aid. The latter continued in the active discharge of his duties at Alverstoke until 1846, when Wilberforce was promoted to the Deanery of Westminster, and Trench was presented to the rectory of Itchen Stoke by the late Lord Ashburton, to whom he had become known at Alverstoke. In 1845 and 1846 Dr. Trench was Hulsean Lecturer at Cambridge, and for a short time one of the Select Preachers. In 1841 he published his Notes on the Parables of Our Lord. When Dr. Wilberforce became Bishop of Oxford, he appointed Dr. Trench his Examining Chaplain; and a short time later he became Theological Professor and Examiner at King's College, London. This appointment he continued to hold until he was preferred to the Deanery of Westminster, on the death of Dr. Buckland, in 1856.

Upon the death of Dr. Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, in November, 1863, Dean Trench was appointed to the archiepiscopal See. He was consecrated on the 1st of January, 1864. The Archbishop speedily won golden opinions from all classes of society. He had not long held his high appointment, however, before he was called upon to take a prominent part in the agitation caused by the proposal to disestablish the Irish Church. After Mr. Gladstone had given notice of his resolutions in the House of Commons in the session of 1868, the Archbishop defined the policy of himself and his friends as follows:—"First, to fight for everything which we possess, as believing it rightfully ours; recognising, of course, the right of Parliament to redistribute within the Church its revenues, according to the changed necessities of the present time. If this battle is lost, then, totally rejecting the process of gradual starvation to which Disraeli would submit us, to go in for instant death at the hands of Gladstone." After the elections, which gave a great majority for Mr. Gladstone's policy, the Archbishop admitted that Establishment was hopelessly and irrevocably gone; but he pleaded for delay, hoping that Mr. Gladstone might be beaten on some of the important details of his scheme. Mr. Gladstone's measure became law, and in the controversies that ensued in connection with the reconstruction of the Irish Church, the Archbishop took that leading part which naturally devolved upon him as the result of his authority and position.

In consequence of ill-health, Dr. Trench resigned the Archbishopric in November, 1884. In notifying his resignation to the Synods of Dublin, Glendalough, and Kildare, which constituted the authority for the election of his successor, he stated that it was not his purpose to make any application to the representative body for the continuance of the income which he had received from them. During the reading of the Archbishop's letter of farewell, the members of the Synod remained standing, and there were cordial demonstrations of respect at its close. The news of the Archbishop's resignation was received with general regret throughout Ireland, and the cause of it elicited a widespread feeling of sympathy in England. He died March 28th, 1886.

Archbishop Trench's works occupy no inconsiderable place in English literature. His best-known theological works are his Notes on the Parables of our Lord, and Notes on the Miracles of our Lord; Lectures on Mediæval Church History; Lessons in Proverbs; The Sermon on the Mount illustrated from St. Augustine; St. Augustine as an Interpreter of Scripture; Synonyms of the New Testament; and The Epistles to the Seven Churches of Asia Minor. Further, Archbishop Trench was an ardent student of philology, and the work by which he is best known in literature is that entitled, On the Study of Words, consisting of five lectures addressed to the pupils of the Diocesan Training Schools, Winchester, and published in 1851. In 1855 appeared his English Past and Present, and two years later On some Deficiencies in our English Dictionaries. In 1858 Dr. Trench took up the question of the proposed revision of the Authorised Version of the new Testament; and, collaterally with this subject, it may be mentioned that some years afterwards he was selected as one of the editors of the New Commentary on the Bible, proposed by the Speaker of the House of Commons. Dean Trench was also appointed Chairman of the Literary and Historical Committee, intrusted, in conjunction with an Etymological Committee, by the Philological Society with the preparation and publication of a new English Dictionary.

Trent, COUNCIL OF.—Trent, the ancient Tridentum, is a town on the confines of the Tyrol, between Italy and Germany, and is celebrated as the place where the last General Council previous to that of the Vatican in 1869 (according to the Roman Church) was held. The reformation of the Church, which had been the object of the Councils of Constance and Basle, the policy of the Popes would not suffer to be carried into execution. There was a great desire on the part of many to have another General Council, but it had been long delayed, owing to the intrigues of the party who were most interested in retaining the abuses which were profitable to them, and especially hindered by the cardinals, and even by the Popes themselves. But to such a council only could Catholic Christendom look for the accomplishment of its most earnest wishes, and in the course of the German Reformation even the Protestant princes expressed their desire for such an assemblage of the clergy. The Emperor Charles V. urged it zealously; he found it a very effectual mode of alarming the Pope and curbing the Protestant princes, and thus controlling both parties, to persevere in demanding that a council should be convoked on German soil; so he solemnly announced a Council to the States at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530. In order to prevent his summoning it there, preparations were made for it in Rome. Accordingly Clement VII. in that same year decreed it, but without fixing a time; and Paul III., his successor, appointed it to be held May 27th, 1537, at Mantua. As the conditions offered by the Duke of Mantua were not acceptable, the place was changed to Vicenza, and May 1st, 1538, was fixed upon; when, as no prelates arrived, it was again delayed till Easter, 1539, and, as neither France nor Germany consented to the place selected, it was again indefinitely postponed. Paul summoned it again for Nov. 1st, 1542, and showed his willingness to choose a German city by naming Trent. His Legates arrived there Nov. 22nd, but a war between the Emperor and the King of France once more postponed it till a more convenient time. Such a time the Pope thought he had found when Charles was making preparations against the Protestants, and he summoned the Council to meet on March 15th, 1545. The Cardinals Del Monte, Cervino della Croce, and Pole, arrived at Trent at the appointed time, as presiding Legates, but no real work was done till Dec. 13th, 1545, when the General Council of Trent was solemnly opened, 25 bishops and some other prelates being present. In the Papal Brief, the Council was designated, Sacro-sancta acumenica, et generalis synodus Tridentina presidentibus legatis apostolicis. It was agreed that committees of bishops and Doctors of Theology should prepare the subjects to be discussed, and that the votes should be taken, not by nations according to the practice at Constance and Baale, but by individuals, and that the questions should be settled by a majority. The committees being chosen and instructed by the Legates, thus secured a majority for the Pope, so that even Italian bishops were heard to complain that the Council was not a free one. Princes and people expected from this meeting an improvement of the Church in its head and members, such as should obviate the objections of the Protestants, and induce them to return to the bosom of the Catholic Church; the Imperial envoys urged that this ought to be made the main object, yet in the first three sessions nothing was done beyond preliminaries. From the 4th to the 8th of April, 1546, when five archbishops and 48 bishops were present, two decrees were enacted, in which the Apocrypha was declared to belong to the canonical books of Scripture, the traditions handed down by the Church from Apostolic times were to be taken as of equal authority with the Bible, and the Vulgate translation was received as authentic. The 5th session was occupied with discussion about original sin; the 6th with justification; the 7th, held March, 1547, on the Sacraments in general, i.e. concerning the number, necessity, efficacy, matter, form, and ministry of them. They were declared to be seven. To these decrees were added several anathemas against those who dissented from them. Then came the victory of Mühlberg, which made the Emperor so powerful that the Pope sought a pretext for removing the Council from German territory, and the Legates, making use of a false rumour of the plague at Trent, resolved, in 1547, to transfer the assembly to Bologna—a resolution which was immediately acted on by the Italian Fathers. The Emperor, however, compelled 18 bishops from his own States, together with Cardinal Madruzzi, Bishop of Trent, to remain in that city, whilst the Legates, with 6 archbishops, 32 bishops, and 4 generals of religious Orders, remained at Bologna, and contented themselves, in the 9th and 10th sessions, with publishing decrees of adjournment and deciding nothing further on the subject of the Council. Neither was anything done by those left at Trent, so the Pope declared the Council adjourned in a Bull issued Sept. 17th, 1549. After his death, the Cardinal del Monte became Pope in 1550, under the name of Julius III., and formally announced, at the desire of the Emperor, the reassembling of the Council of Trent. His Legate, Marcellus Crescentius, came with two Nuncios to Trent, and opened the Council, May 1st, 1551, with the 11th session; but there were so few theologians present that nothing important was done before the 13th session, commenced Oct. 11th, 1551. The Jesuits Lainez and Salmeron, who had been sent as Papal theologians, exercised a decisive influence upon the decrees, which now, laying aside scholastic differences, were briefly and precisely drawn up. The Council concluded against the Sacramentarians, "That Jesus Christ was really present in the Holy Sacrament of the Altar," and against the Lutherans they decreed the doctrines of Transubstantiation and Adoration of the Host, and the Presence of Jesus Christ at other times than at actual receiving. They refused to define the point of Communion in Both Kinds for the laity, and the Sacrifice of the Mass, so that the Protestant divines to whom they had given a safe-conduct might have time to come up and set forth the reasons of their opinions to the Council. In the 14th session, begun Nov. 25th, 1551, the doctrines of the Church concerning Penance and Extreme Unction were declared. As to Penance, they set forth its necessity, and enlarged on its three branches—contrition, confession, and satisfaction; they also set forth the institution and effects of Extreme Unction. In the 15th session, begun January, 1552, they granted a new safe-conduct to the Protestants, and adjourned till May 1st. Under the Imperial protection the divines of Würtemberg and Upper Germany now also came to Trent, and the Saxons were already on their way thither under the conduct of Melancthon. These measures were only a stratagem on the part of Saxony to lull the Emperor into security, as was soon evinced by the commencement of hostilities on the part of the Elector Maurice, who forced the Emperor to fly, and the members of the Council to disperse. They resolved accordingly, on April 8th, to adjourn for two years without even having commenced negotiations with the Protestants. Amidst these circumstances, the Treaty of Passau and the religious peace of Augsburg were concluded, and two Catholic princes, King Ferdinand and the Duke of Bavaria, ventured, in defiance of the Council, to grant to their Protestant subjects the privilege of the cup. In France the power of the Protestants was so great that they talked of summoning a national synod to settle their religious disputes, and so Pius IV., who had succeeded Paul, saw himself compelled, in 1560 and 1561, to re-assemble the General Council. It was re-opened Jan. 8th, 1562, by six Legates, under the presidency of the Cardinal Hercules Gonzaga of Mantua, with 112 bishops (mostly Italian), four abbots, and four generals of religious Orders. In the 18th session, Feb. 26th, a decree was published for preparing an index of prohibited books, but in the 19th and 20th it was again resolved to delay the publication of new decrees, this being the Roman policy to avoid opposition; for France, as well as the Emperor and Bavaria, reiterated their desire for the reformation of the Church, the administration in both kinds to the laity, the marriage of priests, and a revision of the laws concerning forbidden meats; and, besides, all the bishops, except those from Italy, agreed in the opinion, so odious to the Pope, that the episcopal power and rights were of Divine, and not Papal origin. In consequence of the number of Italian bishops they could always get a majority in favour of the Roman Court, so in the 21st and 22nd sessions, July 16th and Sept. 17th, 1562, they passed decrees respecting the celebration of the Lord's Supper and the Sacrifice of the Mass, allowing preparatory explanations in the vernacular languages; but the laity were referred to the Pope respecting their demand for the cup in the Lord's Supper. In these sessions there were present 230 prelates, besides the ambassadors of the Catholic Courts, and the number was increased on Nov. 13th by the arrival of the Cardinal of Lorraine with fourteen bishops, three abbots, and eighteen theologians from France, who not only gave new strength to the opposition, but also proposed thirty-four articles of reformation, which could not but be exceedingly offensive to the Papal party. This party, therefore, resorted again to delays, and postponed the next session from one month to another. Gonzaga, who was generally esteemed for his uprightness, but who was fettered in every step by the directions which he received from Rome, died on March 2nd, 1563, and in his place the new Legates, Moroni and Stavageri, presided, and so hindered work by empty formalities that both the Imperial and French Courts despaired either of getting any Church reformation or of making peace with the Protestants, who entirely rejected the Council. Moreover, the Cardinal of Lorraine was won over to the Papal party by bribery, and at length, either wearied by long delay or influenced by intrigue, the German, Spanish, and French bishops consented to a decree concerning the consecration of priests and the hierarchy entirely in accordance with the views of the Pope, which received public confirmation in eight canons in the 23rd session, July 15th, 1563. With equal pliability they suffered in the 24th session, Nov. 11th, a decree to be passed respecting the sacrament of matrimony, in twelve canons, in which the celibacy of the clergy was enjoined; and, in the 25th and last sessions, Dec. 3rd and 4th, the hastily composed decrees respecting purgatory, the worship of saints, relics and images, the monastic vows, indulgences, fasts, prohibition of certain kinds of food, and an index of prohibited books—the last of which, together with the composition of a catechism and breviary, was left to the Pope. In the decrees of reformation published in these last five sessions, which contained mostly insignificant or self-evident ordinances, or, at least, the same repeated, only with different words, provision was made for the removal of the prevailing abuses, for the conferring and administration of spiritual offices, sinecures, etc. The most useful provision was that for founding seminaries for the education of the clergy and the examination of those to be ordained. At the close of the last session the Cardinal of Lorraine and the other prelates made the walls resound with their cry, "Cursed be all heretics!" and thus ended the Council of Trent, the decrees of which, signed by 255 prelates, perpetuated the separation of the Protestant from the Catholic Church, and acquired with the latter the authority of a symbolical book. The Pope confirmed the decrees in their whole extent, Jan. 26th, 1564. The chief object of the Council, the gaining back the Protestants to the Catholic Church, had not been attained, and the points of dissension between the Roman and the Greek Churches were marked out so distinctly as to leave no hope of any future reconciliation. By its decrees, the Catholic doctrines were more exactly determined, and many abuses remedied, though some of the most pernicious were left. The decrees were received without limitation in Italy, Portugal, and Holland; in Spain they were restricted by the statutes of the kingdom. In France, Germany, and Hungary they met with an opposition which gradually resulted in a silent approbation of the doctrinal decrees on the part of the Catholics, but has always prevented the reception of the decrees as irreconcilable with many laws of the respective countries. For the explanation and interpretation of the decrees, Sixtus V., in 1588, instituted a Council of Cardinals; and many books, both in support and opposition to this Council, have been written. Calvin wrote his Antidote against the Council of Trent during its session, and when in 1560 Pius VII. ordered the reassembling of the Council, the Lutheran princes of Germany issued their Concilii Tridentini Decretis opposita Gravamina. The fundamental error of this Council was that Catholics and Protestants could suppose it possible to reconcile their differences by a means which could only bring them out in stronger relief; but we can hardly blame men for wishing to restore harmony to Christendom.

Trentals.—Masses said every day for thirty days for a deceased person.

Treves, HOLY COAT OF.—It is alleged that the seamless coat of our Blessed Saviour is preserved in the city of Treves, it having been given to this place by the Empress Helena. The earliest mention of it is in the Gesta Trevirorum in the twelfth century. It was used at the consecration of Bishop Bruno in 1121, and translated from the choir to the high altar of the cathedral in 1196. In 1512, and several times since, it has been exposed for the veneration of the faithful; the last time was in 1844, when eleven bishops and thousands of people flocked to Treves on the occasion of the finding of an ancient ivory belonging to the cathedral, which had been lost, and which is supposed to confirm its authenticity. Many miracles were reported to have taken place at this time. Examination of the garment, however, has greatly shaken the faith of the most learned of the Roman Catholics in its genuineness, which is now pronounced not a matter of faith, but of "pious opinion."

Triers.—A commission of thirty-eight men, chosen by Cromwell in 1653 to sit at Whitehall to try candidates for the ministry; they consisted of Independent, Presbyterian, and Baptist clergy and laymen. The exercise of their power by these Triers was so arbitrary and bigoted as to cause them to be compared to the Inquisitors. In their judgment, to read the Prayer Book was evidence that a minister was destitute of "grace, knowledge, and utterance," and hence unfit for his office.

Triforium.—A gallery or open space over the aisles and choir of a church, between the pier-arches and clerestory. It was formerly used as a gallery for women, and also to let down tapestry for the decoration of the church on festivals. The derivation of the word is uncertain.

Trine Immersion is the act of dipping a person who is being baptised three times beneath the surface of the water, at the naming of the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity. It was the general practice in the primitive Church, and if circumstances rendered baptism by affusion necessary, the affusion was made thrice. Some of the Fathers teach that this practice represented the three days' burial of Christ and His resurrection on the third day; others that it signified faith in the doctrine of the Trinity. St. Augustine combines the two significations; and St. Jerome sees a symbolical resemblance between the three immersions and yet only one baptism, and the Three Persons of the Godhead and yet but One God. The practice of Trine Immersion was, however, appealed to by some Spanish Arians in giving support to their heresy of the inequality of the Three Divine Persons, and, consequently, some of the orthodox, with the approval of Gregory the Great, had recourse to baptism by single immersion; and some following the new practice and some retaining the old, and confusion and scandal resulting from the diversity, the Council of Toledo, A.D. 633, enforced the judgment of Gregory. Still, the more ancient custom generally prevailed, it being felt that the reason for the change was too slight to justify the alteration of the time-honoured and symbolical practice.

Trinitarians.—A name given to those who hold the doctrine of a Trinity in the Godhead, who believe that there is only one essence of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, but a threefold division by their personal operations.

Another application of the name is to a monastic Order of the Trinity and Redemption of Captives. St. John of Malta and Felix of Valois were its first Patriarchs in 1197; its members added to the usual vows, one pledging themselves to do their utmost to redeem the Christians who were in slavery amongst the Infidels.

Trinity.—The doctrine of the Holy Trinity, which is held alike by the Roman, Greek, and Anglican Churches, and by the greater number of Nonconformist Communions, is thus stated in the First Article of the Church of England: "There is but One Living and True God. . . . And in Unity of this Godhead there be three Persons, of one substance, power, and eternity; the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost."

This doctrine turns upon two points. The first is the Unity of God, a doctrine affirmed in the most express and emphatic terms both in the Old and New Testaments [Deut. vi. 1; Is. xlv. 6; Mark xii. 29-32; Eph. iv. 6]. The second is the revelation in the New Testament concerning Christ and the Holy Ghost. In the Rev. W. Jones's Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity, the following texts are adduced and commented on in proof of the Divinity of Christ:—Is. viii. 13, 14, compared with 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8; Is. vi. 5, compared with John xii. 41; Is. xlv. 6, compared with Rev. xxii. 13; Is. xliii. 11, compared with 2 Pet. iii. 18; Rev. xxii. 6, compared with verse 16; Luke i. 76, compared with Matt. xi. 10; Luke i. 16, 17, compared with Matt. iii. 11; Matt. xi. 10, compared with Mal. iii. 1; Pa. lxxviii. 56, compared with 1 Cor. x. 9; John iii. 29, compared with Is. liv. 5; John xx. 28; Rom. ix. 5; 2 Pet. i. 1; 2 Cor. v. 19; John xiv. 11; 2 Cor. v. 20; 1 John v. 20; Col. ii. 8, 9; John i. 1; Is. ix. 6; Jer. xxiii. 6; Is. ii. 17, 18; Rev. i. 8.

He then gives one by one the texts adduced by the impugnors of the doctrine, and in each case places what he holds to be the true interpretation upon them. They are the following:—Matt. xix. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 24; Acts x. 42; Acts x. 40, 41; John iii. 16; Eph. iv. 32; John vi. 38; Acts iv. 29, 30; Matt. xx. 23; 1 Cor. viii. 6; Matt. xxiii. 9; John xiv. 28; 1 Cor. xi. 3; Mark xiii. 32; John i. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 27, 28; Jude 4, 24, 25.

To the same author we are indebted for the following list of texts in proof of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost:—John iii. 6, compared with 1 John v. 4; Acts xiii. 2, compared with Heb. v. 4; Matt. ix. 38, compared with Acts xiii. 4; Luke ii. 26, 28; John xiv. 17, compared with 1 Cor. xiv. 25; 2 Tim. iii. 16, compared with 2 Pet. i. 21; John vi. 45, compared with 1 Cor. ii. 13; Acts v. 3, 4; 1 John iii. 21, compared with 24; 1 Cor. iii. 16, compared with vi. 19; Matthew iv. 1, compared with Luke xi. 24; 2 Cor. i. 3; 1 Cor. ii. 11; Acts v. 9; Gen. vi. 3; Matt. xii. 28; Ezek. viii. 1-3; Acts iv. 24, 25. And he mentions, as claimed by opponents on their side, Matt. iii. 16; Heb. ii. 4; and Rom. vii. 26.

There is no question that the texts we have named were accepted as inspired Scripture by the whole of the early Church, and the result was the Church had before it the plainest assertions [1] that there is One God; and also [2] that Christ was called God, as was also the Holy Spirit. How, then, were these truths to be combined? Some of the early heretics, no doubt, became Tritheists, and declared that the New Testament revealed three Gods. But against this stood the plain words of Scripture, and the uniform teaching of the Apostolic Church. Another doctrine was that of the SABELLIANS, who taught that the three names, Father, Son, Holy Spirit, were but three manifestations of the same Person under different aspects, a doctrine which involved the opinion that the Father died upon the Cross. [PATRIPASSIANISM.] The third and orthodox doctrine was that of the Trinity in Unity. The word "Trinity" is not found in Scripture, but the doctrine is held to be expressed in the words of Christ's commission [Matt. xxviii. 19], and in the Apostolic benediction [2 Cor. xiii. 14]. The word itself was first used by Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, in the second century. The early Fathers taught the doctrine by implication when they maintained the distinctness of the Son against the Sabellians, and the consubstantiality with the Father against the Arians; but it was the Councils of Nicæa and Constantinople, which, by affirming the Divinity of Christ and of the Holy Spirit, as well as the Unity of God, declared the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity to be the doctrine of the Church. The Athanasian Creed stated it in the most clear, emphatic, and categorical terms. From that time the doctrine was never called in question except by a few obscure sects, until the revolt against passive obedience, and the assertion of the freedom of the human conscience in the sixteenth century. That momentous epoch saw the doctrine of the Trinity again impugned, and Unitarianism thus became one phase of Protestantism. It is from this point of view that the doctrine must now be considered.

The great Reformers, equally with the Catholics, received and asserted the doctrine of the Trinity on the ground that it is clearly taught by Scripture when interpreted in its simple and natural sense. So evident is its implication in Scriptural statements, indeed, that Unitarians and Theists almost universally regard Scripture itself in a very different light from orthodox Christians, and attach to it a very much lower idea of Divine revelation, destitute of any really authoritative character. This ground of acceptance, then, may fitly be termed that of Authority, and is well set forth by the Protestant writer already cited, in terms which would also be accepted by all the historical Churches. We may take a few passages from the "conclusion" of his work, premising that the preceding body thereof consists of chapters upon [1] Scripture passages proving the Divinity of Christ; [2] the like proving the Divinity of the Holy Ghost; [3] texts proving the Plurality and Trinity of Persons; [4] Passages proving the Trinity in Unity. The "conclusion" first reviews the first two chapters (the texts most important to which have been above cited), and then proceeds:—

"It has appeared from the third chapter, that God is signified to us throughout the Old Testament by a name that is plural, and proved to be such from many particular instances; yet generally so restrained and qualified as to destroy the suspicion of a plurality of gods. That to this common name of God, many other plural names and expressions are added, and that an interchanging of the plural and singular is frequently observed, which neither grammar nor reason can account for upon any principle, but that of a real Divine plurality. That the Persons of God are three in number, precisely distinguished on some occasions by the personal names of the Father, the Word or Son, and the Holy Spirit, and also by different offices. That the same term is not always peculiar and proper to the same Person; because the words God, Lord, Jehovah, and Father, are sometimes applied to one Person, sometimes to another; while at other times they are not personal, but general names of the Divine nature. That in the Lord of Hosts, sitting upon His throne, and speaking of Himself in the plural to the prophet Isaiah, there was not one Person only, but three; the Father, Jesus, and the Holy Ghost, all expressed under one name in the Old Testament, but personally distinguished to us by three different ones in the New, where this matter is referred to.

"In the fourth and last chapter, the passages of the Scripture have been laid together, and made to unite their beams in one common centre—the Unity of the Trinity. Which Unity is not metaphorical and figurative, but strict and real; and there can be no real Unity in God, but that of His nature, essence, or substance, all of which are synonymous terms. This Unity considered in itself is altogether incomprehensible; but it is one thing to read and to know that there is a Divine nature, and another thing to describe it. That it is proved to be a Unity of essence:—First, because the three Persons are all comprehended under the same individual and supreme appellation. They are the one Lord absolutely so called, the Creator of the World, and the God of Israel. Secondly, because they partake in common of the name Jehovah, which being interpreted, means the Divine Essence; and what it signifies in one Person it must also signify in the others, as truly as the singular name Adam, in its appellative capacity, expresses the common nature of all mankind. And this name neither is nor can be communicated, without a contradiction, to any derived or inferior nature, as well on account of its signification as its application, which is expressly restrained to one only. Thirdly, it is further proved, in that the authority, the secret mind or counsel, and the power by which all things are established and directed, is ascribed to Christ and the Spirit in common with God the Father; and that in the same exercise of it, and upon the same occasions. Fourthly, because there is a participation of such Divine attributes as cannot subsist but where they are original. Our understanding, if it be moderately instructed, will satisfy us that there can be ONE ONLY who is eternal, and possessed of holiness, truth, life, etc., in and from Himself. Yet the whole Trinity is eternal, holy, true, living, and omnipresent: therefore these three were, and will be, one God from everlasting to everlasting. Fifthly and lastly, because there is a concurrence of the whole undivided Godhead in all those acts, every one of which has in it the character of a Divine wisdom and omnipotence; and expresses such an intimate union and communion of the Holy Trinity, as the understanding of man cannot reach, and which no words can explain. For though it is and must be one God who doth all these things, yet it is the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit who gave us our being, instruct and illuminate us, lead us, speak to us, and are present with us; who give authority to the Church, raise the dead, sanctify the elect, and perform every Divine and Spiritual operation.

"This is the God revealed to us in the Holy Scripture; very different from the Deity so much talked of in our systematical schemes of natural divinity; which, with all its wisdom, never yet thought of a Christ, or a Holy Ghost, by whom nature, now fallen and blinded, is to be reformed, exalted, and saved. The Bible we know to be the infallible Word of God; the rule of our faith and obedience. I find this doctrine revealed in it; therefore I firmly believe and submit to it. . . . And if the religion of Jesus Christ is to be corrected and softened till it becomes agreeable to the natural thoughts and imaginations of the human heart, then in vain was it said—Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in Me."

Yet though it is indisputably true that we are indebted solely for our knowledge of the Trinity to the teaching of Revelation, and that the doctrine could never have been discovered by human reason unaided, some of the ablest Protestant divines have maintained that human reason is able to some extent to follow the revelation, to acquiesce in its truth, and to find it harmonise with the deepest intuitions of the soul. The intellectual objections to the doctrine are practically two: [1] that it is a contradiction in terms; and [2] that if not, it in reality amounts to Tritheism. Neither of these will bear a moment's examination. The first objection may, indeed, be said to be itself a sheer intellectual absurdity, since it is based upon an application to the Infinite and Essential Being of God, of crude reasonings about number and distinction such as are applied to so many marbles, and which every thoughtful Christian rejects ab initio as regards any relation to the Divine Being. On this ground, indeed, theologians of unimpeachable orthodoxy have objected to portions of the Athanasian Creed, as giving concrete definition, beyond what is written or can be safely affirmed of God. As Robertson points out in his sermon on the subject, "we are puzzled and perplexed by words;" and as he remarks again in reference to such objectors, "though the doctrine may appear to them absurd, because they have not the proper conception of it, some of the profoundest thinkers have believed in this doctrine. . . . Let them be assured of this, that whether the doctrine be true or false, it is not necessarily a doctrine self-contradictory . . . that such men never could have held it unless there was latent in the doctrine a deep truth."

Bingham, again, two centuries ago, protests against such divines as played into the hands of these objectors, by "affecting to represent the mystery of the Christian Trinity as a thing directly contradictory to all human reason and understanding, and that perhaps out of design to make men surrender up themselves and conscience, in a blind and implicit faith, wholly to their guidance." The Christian does not believe that God is a Trinity in the same sense in which He is One; or One only God in the same sense in which He co-exists as Three Persons. Further reply to this objection will appear in what follows concerning the second.

Any statement of the various intellectual analogies and explanations which have been offered to assist an intelligent apprehension of the Divine Trinity in Unity must necessarily be brief. CUDWORTH [q.v.], as we have seen, was a Platonist, and has been misrepresented on that account; but he makes it clear himself, that his object was to show "the wonderful providence of Almighty God, that this doctrine of a Trinity of Divine hypostases should find such admittance and entertainment in the pagan world, and be received by the wisest of their philosophers before the times of Christianity." He accordingly draws striking analogies between the Platonic Trinity, and especially that form of it in which the hypostases are described as Infinite Goodness, Infinite Wisdom, and Infinite Love and Power (these not as accidents or questions, but as all substantial), and the Christian doctrine. He implies—an idea in advance of his own time, but far more familiar in this—that such an approximation of the most enlightened reason of antiquity was not without a real Divine illumination; and though this breadth of view brought upon him the charge (from Nelson and others) that his own views concerning the Trinity resembled those of Dr. Samuel Clarke, this is sufficiently refuted, not only by his express affirmation that both the Son and the Holy Ghost were "co-eve and co-eternal with the Father" [Intellectual System of the Universe, ii. 342], but by the definite statement that wherever the Platonic Trinity differed in any wise, not only from Scripture, but from the Nicene and Constantinopolitan Councils, and the doctrine of Athanasius, it is therein "utterly disclaimed and rejected" by him. [Ibid., ii. 457.]

The analogy with a quasi-philosophical system, as cited by Cudworth, is in truth very striking; and his work is, moreover, valuable as copiously citing within small compass the opinions and definitions of the Fathers concerning the true meaning of the word homo-ousios. This, says Cudworth, "was never used by Greek writers otherwise than to signify the agreement of things, numerically differing from one another in some common nature or universal essence." Hence St. Basil says that the word "plainly takes away the sameness of hypostasis [or individual person], for the same thing is not homo-ousios [co-substantial] with itself, but always one thing with another." [Epist. 300.] So Athanasius remarks [Epist. De Sent. Dien.] that "the branches are homo-ousios with the vine, or with the root thereof." And the Council of Chalcedon affirms that the Lord Jesus Christ was homo-ousios with the Father as to His divinity, but homo-ousios with us men as to His humanity," and Athanasius himself uses the same word in relation to the Saviour and mankind in the same sense. Athanasius further says, "We do not think the Son to be really one and the same with the Father, as the Sabellians do, and to be mono-ousios and not homo-ousios : they thereby destroy the very being of the Son." [Exposition of Faith.]

Concerning the hypostases in the Trinity, BINGHAM [q.v.] is worth quoting, and his remarks are more noteworthy because in his own day he was charged by some with Tritheism:—

"For though the three Persons in their sense be three distinct numerical substances, yet they are neither, firstly, three Beings of a different nature, as Arius meant; nor, secondly, three Beings actually divided or separated from each other as three men and angels are, but most inseparably and eternally (yet without confusion) united into One; which union of substances is so necessary in infinite Beings, that we cannot possibly conceive them otherwise than as actually and eternally united into one; nor, thirdly, are they three parts of one whole, sharing Divine perfections amongst them, but every one is equally possessed of all (and this naturally follows from their being equal in nature, and so falls in with the first sort of Unity); nor, fourthly, are they three Beings having that Divine nature independently, every one from Himself; but the Father alone has His Being from Himself, the Son from the Father, the Holy Ghost from both; for though they all have a Divine nature, that is, a necessary existence (for necessary existence is the properest notion we can form of a Divine nature), yet they have that necessary existence three different ways: the Father necessarily exists, but of Himself alone; the Son necessarily exists, but from the Father; the Holy Ghost necessarily exists too, but from the Father and the Son; so that the Son and the Holy Ghost are not properly without original, though necessarily existing from all eternity, but are as necessary and eternal Emanations of a necessary and eternal Cause; and this way of existing is what distinguishes the Son and the Holy Ghost both from the Father and the creatures, and at once preserves the Unity of the Godhead. Fifthly, and lastly, by virtue of this original and natural subordination of the Son and the Holy Ghost to the Father, they are not three opposite principles or Providences clashing and interfering with one another, but one harmonious Providence and one undivided principle of all other things; for it is impossible to conceive three infinite beings under the economy of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, without conceiving them at the same time united in an eternal harmony and concord." [Sermon on the Trinity.] In another Sermon on the Divinity of Christ Bingham further says: "The true notion of the Christian Trinity is three Divine Persons under the relation and economy of a Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; where the Father is considered as the Fountain of the Deity, the Son and Holy Ghost as the natural and eternal Emanations of the Father's substance; agreeable to what is said in the Nicene Creed, that the Son is 'God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God'—'Deus genitus,' not 'ingenitus' nor 'factus'; whereas Tri-theism asserts that the Son is another agenneton—that is, not a Son, but another distinct principle or substance, unbegotten as the Father is, and consequently a distinct God."

These older attempts at explanation have their use and value; but modern theology rather shrinks from such precise and essay-like definition concerning the holiest mysteries of Infinite and transcendent Being. In the sermon on this subject by the late Rev. F. W. Robertson, already referred to [Sermons, iii. 43], he speaks of the Trinity as the three "consciousnesses" by which God is known to us, and declines to affirm more:—"We do not dare to limit God; we do not presume to say that there are in God only three personalities—only three consciousnesses; all that we dare presume to say is this, that there are three in reference to us, and only three." This idea reappears in another sermon to be presently cited, and strictly it is true; yet the reply seems obvious that the Christian Gospel does appear to present itself as a full revelation of God; and that as redeemed man is moreover expressly affirmed to partake of the Divine nature, and to be made in the Divine image, such would seem to be required by the necessities of his manifold nature. But the sermon is chiefly remarkable as showing the modern tendency to substitute analogy or illustration for definition. Most of Robertson's illustrations do not appear to average minds very happy. That of body, soul, and spirit has often been used, but is bad ab initio, because we constantly think of the body as a mere servant of the spirit, and even of its perishing while the real man survives. But he remarks justly upon our common idea of a "Person" being that of "a being bounded by space," and how all such notions must be dissociated from the Persons of the Trinity; and then returning to the conscious human soul—which is, after all, our microcosm and datum for all things—he finds another illustration, which to many minds may be singularly helpful, in the will, the affections, and the thoughts. Men's mental constitutions differ widely; but to most men it will probably appear, as it does to the preacher, that there really are "distinct consciousnesses" in a man. It does seem to most, that what wills, and what thinks or reflects, and what loves, are in some way distinct from one another; and yet, on the other hand, the one whole mind does also seem to be thrown into every act of each. This seems to be Robertson's principal contribution towards an intelligent belief in the doctrine of the Trinity, and to be of real value, though confined to a few lines. And perhaps it is really as close an analogy or illustration as can be drawn from finite existence or consciousness, of the mode in which a Trinity in Unity may co-exist in the Divine Being.

Our next extracts are from one of the most eloquent of modern preachers, the Rev. Phillips Brooks, of New York. He takes as his text, "Through Him we all have access by one Spirit unto the Father" [Eph. ii. 18], and commences by remarking that this Trinity is not a dry creed to be believed, but a Gospel to be believed in, used, and lived by. He then has a passage, evidently borrowed in idea from Robertson's sermon on the same subject, disclaiming any statement that the Trinity is "all" there is of God, and referring (as Robertson does) to an alleged "deep law," by which the higher any nature is, the more complex and more simple at once it becomes. The following extracts from subsequent passages will speak for themselves:—

"The next thing we notice is the completeness with which this God, this part of God, is apprehended and depicted. See what he says. He is describing man's salvation. It is one single thing, the saving of a man. Here is the sinner in his sinfulness; there is the saint in his glory. It is the same man still, and the whole act, from the beginning to the end—the act that took him in his sinfulness and lifted him thence, and set him in his glory—is one single act. It stands a unit among the works of God's omnipotence. It is one throb of the all-loving heart; it is one movement of the Almighty arm. And yet this simple act—salvation—is clearly distinguished into its parts. See how clearly St. Paul discriminates them. Every act is made up of a purpose, a method, and a power. And so the purpose and the method and the power are here. What is the purpose or the end? 'To the Father we all have access.' What is the method? 'Through Christ Jesus.' What is the power? 'By the Spirit.' Through Christ Jesus we all have access by one Spirit unto the Father. In this one total act, the end, the method, and the power are distinguishable. Each stands out separate and clear. And what is more, each is distinctly personal. A personal name is given to the designation of each element. This salvation, which is all the work of God—first, last and midmost—has its divine personalities, distinct for its end, and its method, and its power. It is a salvation to the Father, through the Son, and by the Spirit. The salvation is all one; yet in it method, end, and power are recognisable. It is a three in one.

“Let us look into this a little more deeply. The perfection of any act consists in the elevation and the harmony of these three elements: its end, its method, and its power. Take, for instance, the act of a boy's education. It may extend over twenty years, but it is capable of being considered as one act still, from the time it begins in the nursery to the time it culminates in his profession. Now the perfection of that education will depend upon the perfection of its end, its method, and its power, and upon their being harmonious with, and suitable to, one another; each must be worthy of the rest. For instance, if the end be low, if no high ideal of scholarship and character is set up at the first, and kept clear all along, you may give him the best books and the best teachers, you may inspire him with the most eager enthusiasm, but you turn out only a half-taught scholar, a half-made man, as the result. The end was not worthy of the method and power. Or, again, you set the highest standard up to be aimed at, and you put the purest ambitions into the boy's nature, but you furnish only poor means, poor schools, poor teachers, and once more the education is imperfect. The method is not worthy of the end and the power. Or, again, you make the ideal perfect, and you provide all the appliances of study at their best, but you put only some low or mercenary impulse into the scholar's heart, perhaps a mere servile submission to your authority, perhaps only a selfish idea of the money he is going to get out of his learning, and again a most imperfect product comes.

“This is an illustration. Instead of a boy's education put a man's salvation. That is the perfect education of which all others are but types. And there we look for and we find the same harmony of end, method, and power. Make either unworthy of the others and the salvation is not complete. If it be not to the Father the Son's redemption is in vain. If it be not through the Son, the Father waits and the Spirit moves for naught. If it be not by the Spirit, the Father's heart stands open and the method of grace is perfect, but the unmoved soul stands inactive and unsaved. The Scripture revelation comes to tell us that end, method, and power, all are perfect, and each must thus be worthy of the rest. The three are one. Each is eternal, and yet, as the old creed cries, ‘There are not three Eternals, but One Eternal.’ Each is God, and yet ‘there are not three Gods, but one God,’ not three salvations, but one salvation, with its equal end and method and power, and so by the Trinity in Unity the soul is saved.

... Now we are very apt to take it for granted that however we may differ in our definitions and our belief of the Deity of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, we are all at one, there can be and there is no hesitation about the Deity of the Father. God is divine; God is God. And no doubt we do all assent in words to such belief; but when we think what we mean by that word ‘God,’ when we remember what we mean by ‘Father,’ namely, the first source and the final satisfaction of a dependent nature; and then when we look around and see such multitudes of people living as if there were no higher source for their being than accident, and no higher satisfaction for their being than selfishness, do we not feel that there is need of a continual and most earnest preaching by word and act from every pulpit of influence to which we can mount, of the divinity of the Father? Why, take a man who is utterly absorbed in the business of the world. . . . To such a man, what is the first revelation that you want to make? Is it not the divinity of the Father? Remember that wonderful passage in the story of the Passover where Jesus, with His agony before Him, is just rising to work His homely parable of washing the disciples' feet. And the description of the act is this: ‘Jesus knowing that He was come from God and went to God, riseth from supper and laid aside His garments, and took a towel and girded Himself.’ That was the key to all His life, the spring of every action: ‘Knowing that He came from God and went to God,’ knowing, that is, that God was His Father, the source and the satisfaction of His life. And that same knowledge which Christ had, you would want your friend to have. Does it seem as if no man could escape it? Does it seem as if the Divine Fatherhood were the patent fact of all creation? As if Nature uttered it in all her voices? These voices are not fancies. They are real. But the clear fact remains that multitudes of men do go through life and only in the dimmest tones hear either Nature or their own hearts proclaiming God. To such the truth must be uttered from some teaching of experience or doctrine. The divinity of the Father needs assertion first of all. Let men once feel it, and then Nature and their own hearts will come in with their sweet and solemn confirmations of it. But Nature and the human heart do not teach it of themselves. So we believe, and so we tempt other men to believe in God the Father. . . .

“And now pass to the divinity of the method. ‘Through Jesus Christ.’ Man is separated from God. That fact, testified to by broken associations, by alienated affections, by conflicting wills, stands written in the whole history of our race. And equally clear is it to him who reads the Gospels and enters into sympathy with their wonderful Person, that in Him, in Jesus of Nazareth, appeared the Mediator by whom was to be the Atonement. His was the life and nature which, standing between the Godhood and the manhood, was to bridge the gulf and make the firm bright road, over which blessing and prayer might pass and repress with confident golden feet for ever. And then the question is—and when we ask it thus it becomes so much more than a dry problem of theology; it is a question for live anxious men to ask with faces full of eagerness—out of which nature came that Mediator? Out of which side of the chasm sprang the bridge leaping forth towards the other? Was it some towering man, who, growing beyond his brothers, overlooked the battlements of heaven, and saw the place in the divine heart where man belonged, and then came back and bade his brethren follow him, and led them on with him into the home of a Father who, reluctant or forgetful, sat without effort till His children found their way to Him? It is the most precious part of our belief, that it was with God that the activity began. It is the very soul of the Gospel, as I read it, that the Father's heart, sitting above us in His holiness, yearned for us as we lay down here in our sin. And when there was no man to make an intercession, He sent His Son to tell us of His love, to live with us, to die for us, to lay His life like a strong bridge out from the Divine side of existence, over which we might walk, fearfully but safely, back into the divinity where we belonged. Through Him we have access to the Father. As the end was divine, so the method is divine. As it is to God that we come, so it is God who brings us there. I can think nothing else without dishonouring the tireless, quenchless love of God. . . . My friend says God sends Christ into the world, and therefore Christ is not God. I cannot see it so. It seems to me just otherwise. God sends Christ just because Christ is God. The ambassador, the army, is of the very most precious substance of the country that despatches it. This is the meaning of that constant title of our Master. He is the Son of God. Think of it. Does not 'Son' mean just this which the Church's faith, with the best words that it could find, has laboured to express, 'Two Persons and one Substance'? That is, the Father and the Child. Separate personality, but one nature. Unity and distinctness both, but the unity as true a fact as the distinctness. Nay, the unity the fact which made the essence of His mission, the fact which made Him the true, fit, only perfect messenger of God, and Saviour of the world.

"This is the glory of the Incarnation. It does seem to me that the great beauty of the old belief in the divinity of Christ is the faith in the capacity of manhood which it implies. It believes that man is of so godlike a nature that he can hold God, that God can be incarnated in him. Our sense of man's capacity is low. We do not think that God can dwell in the temple of a life like ours. But was not that just what He came to teach us that He could do? He teaches it to us by the rich experience of His Spirit dwelling in our spirits. But before that He taught it to us by the Word made flesh. A brute race could have seen no incarnation. God could care for them and feed them, but He could not come into them, live in them. But man is better. "Because we are sons, God has sent the Spirit of His Son into our hearts." Because we are sons, His Son Himself could take our nature upon Him. The more truly we believe in the Incarnate Deity, the more devoutly we must believe in the essential glory of humanity.

"And now turn to the point that still remains. We have spoken of the end and of the method; but no true act is perfect unless the power by which it works is worthy of the method through which, and the end to which, it proceeds. The power of the act of man's salvation is the Holy Spirit. 'Through Christ Jesus we all have access by one Spirit unto the Father.' What do we mean by the Holy Spirit being the power unto salvation? I think we are often deluded and misled by carrying out too far some of the figurative forms in which the Bible and the religious experience of men express the saving of the soul. For instance, salvation is described as the lifting of the soul out of a pit, and putting it upon a pinnacle, or on a safe, high platform of grace. The figure is strong and clear. Nothing can overstate the utter dependence of the soul on God for its deliverance; but if we let the figure leave in our minds an impression of the human soul as a dead, passive thing, to be lifted from one place to the other like a torpid log that makes no effort of its own either for co-operation or resistance, then the figure has misled us. The soul is a live thing. Let there be nothing merely mechanical in the conception of the way God treats these souls of ours. He works upon them in the vitality of thought, passion, and will that He puts into them. And so when a soul comes to the Father through the Saviour, its whole essential vitality moves in the act. With those affections with which it has loved the world, it loves its Lord. With that same will with which it chose iniquity, it chooses now holiness and heaven. It seems as if the Christian had simply chosen to love God instead of loving his business; but as he goes on and finds what this new love of God really means, he finds what it is that has happened. The capacities of faith and love and holiness have been taken possession of, and filled out to their completeness, by the very Spirit of holiness and love and faith which they were made to hold, but which is greater than themselves. The Divine power has taken possession of the soul's capacities, and, although it may seem at first as if the soul itself had originated this new movement to God through Christ, just as it may seem to the child at first as if his body did all these spiritual acts which the spirit does within it, yet, by-and-by, the conviction clears itself, and grows clearer and clearer constantly, that it is not the soul's simple ability to be religious that has made it religious, but that God by direct visitation has occupied that ability, and is drawing the soul to Himself.

"When this experience is reached, then see what Godhood the soul has come to recognise in the world. First, there is the Creative Deity from which it sprang, and to which it is struggling to return—the Divine End, God the Father. Then there is the Incarnate Deity, which makes that return possible by the exhibition of God's love—the Divine Method, God the Son; and then there is this infused Deity, this Divine energy in the soul itself, taking its capacities and setting them homeward to the Father—the Divine Power of Salvation, God the Holy Spirit. To the Father, through the Son, by the Spirit. . . . This appears to me the truth of the Deity as it relates to us. I say again, 'as it relates to us.' What it may be in itself; how Father, Son, and Spirit meet in the perfect Godhood; what infinite truth more there may, there must, be in that Godhood, no man can dare to guess. But, to us, God is the end, the method, and the power of salvation; so He is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. I look at the theologies, and so often it seems as if the harmony of Father, Son, and Spirit had been lost, both by those that own and by those that disown the Trinity. One theology makes the Father hard and cruel, longing, as it were, for man's punishment, extorting from the Son the last drop of life-blood which man's sin had incurred as penalty. Another theology makes the Son merely one of the multitude of sinning men, with somewhat bolder aspirations laying hold on a forgiveness which God might give, but which no mortal might assume. Still another theology can find no God in the human heart at all; merely a fermentation of human nature in this desire after goodness, this reaching out towards Divinity. The end is not worthy of the method; I do not want to come to such a Father as some of the theologians have painted. Or the method is not worthy of the end; no man could come to a perfect God through such a Jesus as some men have described. Or the power is too weak for both; and all that Christ has done lies useless; and all the Father's welcome waits in vain for the soul that has in it no Holy Ghost. But let each be real, and each be worthy of the others, and the salvation is complete. That is our faith in the Trinity—"three Persons and one God." [Sermons, New York, 1876.]

Analogies have also been drawn from the physical universe around us, as in the following passage from a work on physical science,* in which it is even suggested that, beyond mere analogy, there may be some actual manifestation of this mystery of the Divine nature, as of the Divine attributes, in the physical world around us. After a brief summary of the main results of experiment and research as regards the theory of Light, the writer concludes as follows:—

"Another step further yet. The inquiry is irresistibly suggested, whether the comparison and the analogy may not go further, and afford us some revelation deeper still. That inquiry is strictly legitimate. If our universe be in truth an objective and conditioned manifestation of any absolute Source of all being, it should be thus: the Actual ought, in its limited measure, to reveal to us truly the Essential and Eternal. The student of nature, at all events, does hold expressly that if Nature has any Author, she must speak aright of Him if she speak at all; and as for the so-called religious man, while any book can only take a secondary place in such an inquiry as this, he also believes that it ought to be thus, since his book actually says so. The point of surpassing interest therefore is, whether as regards this question there is any definite agreement between these two, as to which Science can have anything to say, or possesses any means of judging. What then do we find? We are bound here, at least, to ask the expounders of physical science first, for every reason. We inquire, therefore, what purely physical science, and experiment, and speculation—what they at present appear to teach us?

"[1] They tell us of an intangible, invisible Ether, which cannot be touched, or tasted, or contained, or measured, or weighed, but yet is everywhere; which contains within itself the most essential properties of Matter, fluid and solid; and yet which is not matter, though it can communicate its own motions to matter and receive motions from it. [2] They speak to us next, according to the latest and most widely-received vortex theory of Sir William Thomson, something vaguely about this Ether taking Form. They suggest to us how vortices in it may appear to us as the atoms of Matter, which we do see, and feel, and handle; and which, in this form, can be limited, and contained, and measured, and weighed; and in which the Ether may become, as it were, incarnate and embodied. [3] They tell us, in the third place, of a mysterious Energy, which also takes protean forms, but which, in one form or other, is doing all the physical work of the kosmos. Through it Ether acts upon Matter; and Matter reacts upon Ether or upon other Matter.

"And this is all; and our Light embodies them all and reveals them all. It is motion, a form of Energy; it is motion in the Ether; and it is invisible, inconceivable, unknown to us, unless Matter, to make it visible, be in its path. There are these Three and these only; each distinct and separate; and yet the three making up One, a mysterious unity which cannot be dissolved. So far the purely physical philosopher. Pondering attentively this wonderful triune splendour which he has put before us, it may seem strange that he at least should sneer at any other Trinity in Unity, seeing the kindred mystery in which he himself acknowledges that he dwells. Ether: Matter: Energy: no one of these can be conceived of, hardly, apart from the others; yet each is separate and distinct. Take away either, and what becomes of the Universe, as we know it or can conceive it? And yet this Universe, at least, is monistic—is one harmonious whole. The mystery of Nature is not only as great, but actually appears to be of the very same kind as that which theologians have taught us concerning the mystery of its Author.

"For now we are at liberty to turn to the other, and ask him. He has known nothing of all this; never even dreamt of it, since it is the last growth of the nineteenth century. But, purely from an old Book he possesses, he too has, somehow or other, and long before the other, also gathered a conception, and even framed it into a set theological formula. It will be interesting at least to see what his conception is.

"[1] He tells us, first, that he believes in an eternal, immortal, invisible, inconceivable, infinite Essence, the one Source and Father of all. [2] He believes that this first essential Being has in a mysterious way become embodied in a Second, in some inconceivable manner co-existent with and yet derived from Him; who is the brightness of His glory and the visible Image of His person,* and in whom and by whom all Things were made. [3] He affirms that these two work or act by and through a third, an equally mysterious Energy; whose operations assume many forms; who does all things, alike in matter and in spirit; who is as the wind, blowing where it listeth; and who finally brings all conscious agencies that yield to Him, into harmonious relation and equilibrium with all that surrounds them. That is the creed of the Christian, however he came by it: more particularly, indeed, it is the special creed of the Trinitarian Christian, so much derided during the last twenty years. He also says and believes, like the other, that, although he cannot explain it any more than the physical philosopher, these three are One. And, strange to say, he too goes so far as to affirm that the Motions of the third originally produced that Light which we have found such a fascinating study; and that to him, also, that is an express symbol and revelation of the Three!

"This is but a suggestion and inquiry, and dogmatism is not pretended from either side. But if there should be reality and fact behind the belief of both parties as we have listened to them, is there not indeed here an obvious, deep, fundamental, marvellous agreement? More than this; if there should be true wisdom in what has been taught us by one of the most popular teachers of modern philosophy; if it is true that 'Religion and science are, therefore, necessary correlatives;' if it is true that, 'Force, as we know it, can be regarded only as a certain conditional effect of the Unconditioned Cause, as the relative reality indicating to us an Absolute Reality, by which it is immediately produced;' if it is further true that 'objective science can give no account of the world which we know as external, without regarding its changes of form as manifestations of something that continues constant under all forms;' and if it is finally true as regards Spirit and Matter, that 'the one is, no less than the other, to be regarded as but a sign of the Unknown Reality which underlies both;' if these conceptions of one whom all regard as, at least, a great thinker,† embody anything more than a vague dream, is not this correspondence we have found, precisely of the sort we ought to have expected to find?

"The comparison and the inquiry appear in any case to be singularly interesting. The student of Nature, at least, will not object to it; nor should we turn away repelled from the suggestion that Light may be to him a Revealer such as he has longed for, leading him into sight of, though not within, the inmost Secret of all. And as for the other, he too, may perhaps learn to hear of Matter possessing 'the promise and potency of every form of life,' without resentment, and to attach to the phrase a new meaning, which may perchance be the basis of a great reconciliation that has been long and sorely needed. If what he believes be true, he will at least have learnt in another way, that 'the invisible things of Him since the creation of the world are clearly seen, even His eternal power and Godhead, being understood by the things that are made.'"

It may be said, in conclusion, that the method of regarding this great mystery of the Godhead by the principal divines of our own century is all characterised by the conviction that the doctrine is in unison with the highest instincts of our reason. It is remarkable, at least, that the doctrine of the Trinity has been accepted by many of the most profound of those philosophers who, leaving the old landmarks, have sought out independent lines of thought, and who were the last men in the world to accept a mere dry creed, or to receive anything merely upon authority under any circumstances. The deep teaching of the great mystic JACOB BEHMEN [q.v.], obscure as some of it is, has exercised a great influence on modern philosophy. The great names of Leibnitz, Schelling, Schleiermacher, may all be adduced as those of men who have felt that there is a profound truth in the Catholic doctrine, which answers to the facts of nature and the needs of the soul, and which would be lost by a rejection of all dogma but that of the Unity of God.

Trinity Sunday.—This festival is not of so ancient a date as the rest of the great feasts of the Church. Stephen, Bishop of Liège [820], had an office drawn up relating to the mystery of the Trinity which made its way into other churches, but for some time the practice was opposed on the ground that the praises of the Trinity were celebrated daily, and that it did not need a particular festival; but when the doctrine was attacked by the Arians and others, the Church thought it right to fix a special day in its honour. It is said that John XXII. fixed it for the Sunday following Whitsunday; but this is questionable, as in 1405 a Cardinal is found asking Benedict XIII. to settle this festival; and Gerson reports that in his time the keeping of it was newly begun. The reason why this day was chosen as most reasonable was that after Christ had ascended into heaven and the Holy Spirit had been sent down, as on Whitsunday, the Church received a fuller knowledge of the glorious and incomprehensible Trinity than even before.

Tritheism.—The doctrine which teaches that there are three Gods, instead of three Persons in the Godhead. There was a class of men in very early times who turned the doctrine of the Trinity into Tritheism, and instead of three Divine Persons under the economy of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, brought in three collateral, co-ordinate, and self-originated beings, making them three absolute and independent principles, without any relation of Father or Son, which is the most proper notion of three Gods. And having made this change in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, they made another answerable to it in the form of baptism, for, instead of baptising in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, they brought in an unheard-of form of baptising in the name of three un-originated principles, as we learn from one of the Apostolical Canons, which says: "If any bishop or presbyter baptise not according to the command of Christ, 'In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,' but in three unoriginated principles, or in three Sons, or in three Paracletes or Holy Ghosts, let him be deposed." It is supposed that this doctrine was introduced by a branch of the Gnostics.

Trithemius, JOHN, Abbot of Spanheim, in the diocese of Treves [b. 1462, d. 1516].—He was transferred to a convent at Wurzburg, where he died. The most remarkable of his works are on Church history—De illustribus Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis et Catalog. illustr. virorum Germaniam suis ingeniis et lucubrationibus omnifariam exornantium. He was accused of magic and unlawful correspondence with spirits, but his character has been vindicated from this charge by several writers.

Truce of God [in the Latin of the Middle Ages, Treuga Dei (treuge or treuca, from the German word trew, "faithful")] was a limitation of the right of private warfare introduced by the Church in order to mitigate an evil which it was unable to eradicate. It provided that hostilities should cease, at least on the holy-days, from Thursday evening to Sunday evening in each week, also during the whole seasons of Advent and Lent, and on the octaves of great festivals. This regulation was first introduced in 1017, in Aquitaine, where a bishop professed to have received command from God for its institution; then in France and Burgundy. In 1038 the Diet of Soleure deliberated respecting its establishment in Germany; under William the Conqueror it was introduced into England, and in 1071 into the Netherlands. It was a subject of discussion at many Councils; at Narbonne [1054], Troyes [1093], Clermont [1095], Rouen [1096], Rheims [1136], and St. John Lateran [1139 and 1179], and was enjoined by special decrees. At a later period the truce was extended to Thursday; excommunication was the penalty for those who engaged in private warfare on those days. The truce was also extended to certain places, as churches, convents, hospitals, etc., and certain persons, as clergymen, peasants in the fields, and in general all defenceless persons. At the Council of Clermont it was made particularly to include all crusaders.

Trudpert.—A missionary trained in Ireland who started off when he heard of the work accomplished by ST. GALL [q.v.], in the desire, if possible, of carrying it on after his death. He chose the Black Forest as his mission field, but when he got as far as Breisgau he was cruelly murdered by his enemies.

Trullo, COUNCIL IN. [COUNCILS, par. 6.]

Truro, BISHOPRIC OF.—Christianity was probably introduced into Cornwall in the third century. Soon after the Saxons landed in Britain, the Cornishmen purchased by an annual tribute permission from Cerdocius to exercise the rites of the Christian religion. Solomon, King of Cornwall, professed Christianity in the fourth century. The See of Cornwall was founded about 614, and extended as far as the Exe in Devonshire. In 927, Howel, King of Cornwall, was defeated by Athelstan, who in 936 nominated Conan, a native Cornish bishop, to the Cornish See in the Church of St. Germans on Dec. 5th, and from that time Cornwall became an English, not a British, See. On the death of Burthwold in 1027, the See of Cornwall was added to that of Crediton, and in 1050, under Leofric, who became Bishop in 1046, the seat of the united dioceses was fixed at Exeter. The union of the Sees continued till the passing of the Truro Bishopric Act in 1876, when the parish church of St. Mary was assigned as the cathedral church. The first bishop, Edward White Benson, the present Archbishop of Canterbury, was consecrated at St. Paul's on St. Mark's Day, 1877. Through his exertions a scheme for building a new cathedral was set on foot, the architect of which is Mr. J. L. Pearson. The Prince of Wales on May 20th, 1880, laid two foundation stones of the new building.

Besides the Bishop, the cathedral chapter consists of two archdeacons and nineteen honorary canons. The diocese extends over the whole county of Cornwall and part of Devonshire, and comprises 236 parishes, including sinecures. The income of the diocese is £3,000 per annum.

Trustees for Chapels.—The Act of 1850 [13 and 14 Victoria, c. 28], known as Sir Morton Peto's Act, provides a simple method of transferring chapel property to new trustees. The chairman of the meeting at which the appointment is made signs and seals the document, which is to be attested by two or more witnesses who were present at the meeting.

Tübingen, a small town on the Neckar, eighteen miles from Stuttgart, has been for 400 years the chief nursing place of the scholars of Würtemberg. Not only poets [Wieland, Uhland, etc.], but philosophers [Schelling and Hegel], Protestant theologians [as Œcolampadius, Osiander, Pfaff, Öttinger, Storr, Baur, Dörner], and Roman Catholics [Möhler, Hefele, etc.] were all graduates of Tübingen. This University, though the character of the country is deeply religious, has produced some of the most learned opponents of Christianity—Paulus the Deist, Baur the Pantheist, Strauss the author of the Life of Jesus. The theological students, though they are tinctured more or less with Hegelian Pantheism, cherish with grateful reverence the memory of such men as Bengel, who firmly taught Gospel doctrine during the infidel apostasy of the eighteenth century, and they crowd the churches. The Tübingen theologians of the last century were marked by mysticism. They had a special taste for speculations on apocalyptic and millenarian topics. Thus Gottlieb Storr, their principal representative in his time [b. 1746, d. 1805], occupied a position analogous to that of the eighteenth century Methodists in England; he asserted the authority of the Scriptures against the Rationalism of Kant, and laid especial emphasis on the evidential value of the miracles.

But a darker side of the university life of Tübingen is seen in the prevalence of the Hegelian philosophy. The founder of the new school was F. C. Baur [b. 1792, d. 1860], whose critical investigations in the New Testament led him to the opinion that the pastoral Epistles were the production of the second century, that some of St. Paul's Epistles are not genuine, and that a great gulf separated St. Paul from the other Apostles. In fact, this may be regarded as the special tenet of the later Tübingen school. Peter and John were Jewish in their views, only distinguished from their brethren by their faith that Christ was the promised Messiah. Paul maintained a doctrine that the Crucifixion made Christ the Saviour of the world, and elaborated a theory of justification which to them was strange, and of religious freedom which to them was abhorrent. For the sake of peace they were for a while silent, but the animosity broke out in the Apocalypse, which referred to St. Paul and his teaching when denouncing the Nicolaitanes. The Gospel of St. John, Baur pronounced not genuine. But as he grew older he modified his views greatly, and his Christianity of the First Three Centuries [1853], though it hardly rises above Unitarianism, is a more conservative work than his previous writings. He asserts the pure morality of Christianity, while he denies its miracles. The tendency of modern criticism in the Tübingen school has been to reverse all this. The judgment concerning St. John and the synoptic Gospels has been to recognize their historic truth, and the manifest untenableness of the theories of Strauss, who was Baur's scholar, has driven the scholars to a closer approximation to the ancient faith of Christendom.

Tulchan Bishops.—A celebrated epithet belonging to the annals of the Scottish Church. The Concordat of Leith [see p. 942] in 1572, had provided for the restoration of the old hierarchical titles, but the nobles who drew it up had no intention whatever of restoring the hierarchical endowments, which had mostly fallen into their own hands. The new prelates were intended to, be middlemen, who should farm their endowments for them, being called bishops and exercising certain rights over the clergy, but in thralldom to their lay masters. The men who consented to play this ignoble part were regarded by the people with utter derision, and were dubbed "Tulchan Bishops." "A 'tulchan,'" says Carlyle [Cromwell, i. 36] "is, or rather was, for the thing is long since obsolete, a calfskin stuffed into the rude similitude of a calf—similar enough to deceive the imperfect perceptive organs of a cow. At milking-time the tulchan, with head duly bent, was set as if to suck; the fond cow, looking round, fancied that her calf was busy and that all was right, and so gave her milk freely, which the cunning maid was straining in white abundance into her pail all the while. The Scotch milk-maids in those days cried, 'Where is the tulchan? is the tulchan ready?' So of the bishops. Scotch lairds were eager enough to milk the Church lands and tithes, to get rents out of them freely, which was not always easy. They were glad to construct a form of bishops to please the King and Church, and make the milk come without disturbance. The reader now knows what a tulchan bishop was. A piece of mechanism constructed not without difficulty, in Parliament and King's Council, among the Scots; and torn asunder afterwards with dreadful clamour, and scattered to the four winds, so soon as the cow became awake to it!"

The next General Assembly refused to recognise these bishops, but they remained as evidence that the Government intended to preserve an Episcopalian Church, and a battle consequently raged around them which did not end for a century. [SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF.]

Tulloch, JOHN, D.D. [b. 1823, d. 1886].—A learned Scottish divine. He was the son of a minister of the Established Church of Scotland, near Perth, and entered the College of St. Andrews in 1837, where he gained the Grey prize, then the highest honour to philosophical students. In 1842 he was ordained at Dundee, but the state of his health made it necessary for him in 1847 to go to Germany, where he acquired a large knowledge of the language and literature of that country. In 1849 he was appointed by the Crown to succeed Dr. Macduff at Kettins in Forfarshire, and he began his career as a successful religious essayist, contributing to Blackwood, the British Quarterly, and the North British Review. In 1854 he became Principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, and the same year won the second Burnett prize, value £600, for an essay on Theism. In 1859 he was appointed one of the Queen's chaplains, and used frequently to preach before her. In 1878 he was Moderator of the General Assembly. Since then he wrote some valuable theological works, the principal being Rational Theology in the Seventeenth Century, The Christian Doctrine of Sin, Facts of Religion and Life, and Movements of Religious Thought during the Nineteenth Century.

Tunkers. [DUNKERS.]

Tunstall, CUTHBERT, Bishop of Durham, born about 1476, at Hackforth in Hertfordshire. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, whence he removed to Padua, and took a Doctor's degree. He was a good scholar, being a perfect master of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and the best mathematician of his times; he was likewise a considerable civilian, canonist, and divine. He obtained the living of Stanhope in 1508, in 1515 became Archdeacon of Chester, in 1516 Rector of Harrow-on-the-Hill and Master of the Rolls, and in 1519 Dean of Salisbury. He went abroad on several embassies; amongst others he was sent by Henry VIII., in 1525, to treat with the Emperor for the release of Francis I. of France. In 1522 he was consecrated Bishop of London, in 1523 made Privy Seal, and in 1530 translated to the See of Durham. He was a decided Reformer, but without separating himself from the Church; he acknowledged the King's supremacy, and remained in favour with Henry VIII., to whom he surrendered the monastery of Durham in 1540. In 1552, not being prepared to accept Edward VI.'s sweeping measures, he was ejected from his See, but was restored again by Queen Mary, and ejected a second time by Queen Elizabeth in 1559, on declining to take the oath of supremacy, and died the same year at Lambeth, where he had been placed under a mild surveillance.

Turks.—The name in one of the Good Friday Collects under which are included in the prayers the followers of Mahomet, in whatever land they may be. In the four classes, Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics, are meant to be included all who are out of the Communion of the Church.

Turlupins.—A sect of the fourteenth century who had their chief seat in the Isle de France. They were the same as the Brethren of the Free Spirit, who were condemned by the Roman Pontiffs. There is nothing to explain the meaning of the name "Turlupin." They ran from place to place begging their bread with wild shouts, and refusing every kind of labour as a hindrance to Divine contemplation and the ascent of the soul towards God. In their excursions they were followed by women, with whom they lived in the most intimate familiarity. They distributed amongst the people books which contained the substance of their doctrine, and held nocturnal assemblies in out-of-the-way places at which, to imitate Paradise, they divested themselves of all clothing. They pretended to extraordinary spirituality and devotion. The sect was severely persecuted and did not last long.

Twisse, DR. WILLIAM, born at Speenhamland, near Newbury, in Berkshire, in 1575; died in London in 1646. He was sent from Winchester to New College, Oxford, where he studied for several years and took his D.D. He was the most celebrated Calvinist of his time, no one having managed the controversy with Arminius with more exactness and advantage. He was a man of upright life, and, as he sided with the Presbyterians at the commencement of the Civil War, he lost his preferments; but his party had a great value for him, and made him one of the Assembly of Divines, and at last elected him their Prolocutor. He wrote Of the Morality of the Fourth Commandment as still in force to bind Christians, and The Riches of God, Love unto the Vessels of Mercy, consistent with His absolute Hatred of the Vessels of Wrath, and a great number of tracts.

Tyndale, JOHN, translator of the Bible, was born at a small village in Gloucestershire, about 1484; died, 1536. Most writers say that the name of the village was Slymbridge, but there is a certain amount of uncertainty about all the facts of his early days. The exact date of his entrance at Oxford is also unknown, but recent researches have discovered that he took his degree in 1512. A few years later he went to Cambridge, his zeal for studying the Bible probably inducing him to go and consult Erasmus, then at the height of his fame. In 1521 he became tutor to a gentleman named Welch, who lived in Gloucestershire, and it was there that he finally resolved to undertake the task of translating the Bible into English. He was much dissatisfied with the teaching and general behaviour of the clergy in the neighbourhood of Sir John Welch, and translated a pamphlet which Erasmus had written in Latin called The Manual of a Christian Soldier; this was a violent protest against the wicked lives of the clergy, and, of course, brought down a storm of abuse on Tyndale's head; he was, however, firmly supported by his master and patron. In 1523 he went to London with an introduction to Tunstall, Bishop of London, expecting to have extra facilities for carrying out the work to which he was resolved to devote himself. He found that, so far from that being the case, it was impossible to do the work there, so many impediments being thrown in his way. In the following year, therefore, he went to Hamburg, from thence to Wittenberg, where he became acquainted with Luther, and there he translated the New Testament into English. He used for text-books Erasmus's Greek Testament, the Vulgate, and the German translation by Luther. It was printed at Cologne, and it was decided that the first edition should consist of 3,000 copies. An enemy to the Reformation, named Cochleus, tried to prevent its being printed at all; but, failing in this, he sent word to Henry VIII. and Cardinal Wolsey to advise that all the ports should be strictly watched, in order that its admission into England should be prevented. It arrived in England about the middle of the year 1526, and immediately an assembly of the Bishops was called together, and they unanimously denounced it. The Bishop of London went so far as to say that any one in his diocese found to be possessing a copy was to be excommunicated. Of this first edition a portion of one copy only, so far, is known to exist, and that is in the British Museum. In language, except for spelling, it is astonishingly like our Authorised Version published in 1611, which we still have in use. The next few years of his life were devoted to writing pamphlets on the doctrine of Justification by Faith, the first of which was entitled the Wicked Mammon. It was condemned on all sides, Sir Thomas More going so far as to call it "a very treasury and well-spring of wickedness;" but Tyndale was nothing daunted by this unfavourable reception, and in the following year published The Obedience of a Christian Man, next to his translation the most important work of his life. He now began to translate the Old Testament, and published the Pentateuch in 1530, of which there is one perfect copy extant in the British Museum; and in the same year he wrote the Practice of Prelates, in which he again fiercely denounces the customs and ways of the Roman Catholic priests. All this time he was still living in Germany, chiefly at Marburg; but in 1534 permission was given to print the Bible in England, and Tyndale intended to return home. With that intention he went to Antwerp; but his enemies, by treachery, took him and had him put into prison. He was kept there for nearly two years, in spite of all the efforts made in England and on the Continent; and at last, in 1536, he was burnt to death at Vilvorde, near Brussels, with the prayer on his lips, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes."

Tzschirner, HEINRICH GOTTLIEB, a German theologian [b. at Mittweida in Saxony, 1778; d. in 1828].—He was educated at Leipzig, and took orders in 1801. In 1805 he published the first part of a History of Christian Apologetics, with a preface by Reinhard, but he never finished it. The same year he was appointed Professor Ordinarius in Wittenberg, and in 1809 received a Chair at Leipzig, where he showed himself to be a Rational Supernaturalist, adhering to principles which he subsequently developed in his Letters on Reinhard's Confessions [Leipzig, 1811], as Reinhard had maintained that the entire separation of Rationalism from Supernaturalism was indispensable. In 1814 he accompanied the Saxon troops, under the Grand Duke of Weimar, as chaplain. In 1815 the Corporation of Leipzig appointed him a minister in that city. In 1821 he published his Explanation of Haller's Secession, and, in 1822, Catholicism and Protestantism in a Political Point of View, which quickly went through three editions and was translated into English, French, and Dutch; both works were occasioned by Haller's becoming a Catholic. In several publications he attacked the arrogance of Catholicism and the mysticism of Protestants. His last work was How Did it Happen that France remained Catholic? in Pölit's Annals of History and Politics. He died very suddenly.

U

Ubiquitarians [from Lat. ubique, "everywhere"].—A sect of Lutherans which rose and spread itself in Germany, and whose distinguishing doctrine was that the body of Jesus Christ is everywhere, or in every place. Brentz, one of the early Reformers, is said to have broached this error in 1560; Andreas and Flacius helped to spread it. They were heartily opposed by the Universities of Wittenberg and Leipzig. Soon after, a controversy began in the Palatinate about the oral manducation of the Body of our Lord in the Sacrament. To prevent the ill consequences of this dispute Frederick III. ordered the Heidelberg Catechism to be drawn up. [HEIDELBERG CATECHISM; URSINUS.] Afterwards, at the Conference at Maulbronn, 1564, they argued about the sense of the words used at the receiving of the Sacrament. Luther and Melancthon both denied that they held the doctrine of ubiquity, but after their death the disputes were renewed, and this hypothesis was dressed up in a specious and plausible form by Brentz, Chemnitz, and others, who maintained the communication of the properties of Christ's Divinity to His human nature. In 1577, at the monastery of Bergen, it was recognised as a Lutheran doctrine in the Formula of Concord, though by no means all the Lutheran divines are agreed on this point. The divines of Tübingen in the seventeenth century upheld the theory in opposition to the divines of Giessen.

Ubiquity. [UBIQUITARIANS.]

Uckewallists.—A sect who derived their name from Uke Wallis, a native of Friesland, who published his opinions in 1637. He entertained the doctrine of Universalism, and believed in the eternal salvation of Judas and the rest of Christ's murderers. His argument was, that the period of time between the birth of Christ and the descent of the Holy Ghost was a time of deep ignorance, during which the Jews were deprived of Divine light, and that therefore their sins would not be visited with the deepest severity. His followers did not long retain his name as a badge of separation, and became merged in the MENNONITES [q.v.], to whose doctrines their founder strictly adhered.

Ullmann, KARL, a great evangelical theologian, born at Epfenbach, in Baden, in 1796, died 1865. He was first educated in the schools of Morbach and Heidelberg, and afterwards in the Universities of Heidelberg and Tübingen. His first work, written while he was a private tutor, Ueber die Sündlosigkeit Christi ["On the Sinlessness of Christ"], at once gained for its author the reputation of a powerful theologian. He had been under the influence of Neander, and must be held one of his most distinguished disciples. In 1821 he was appointed Professor of Divinity at Heidelberg, and there made the acquaintance of UMBREIT [q.v.], with whom he began the publication of a journal called Studien und Kritiken. It has been in existence ever since, and is one of the most able and widespread theological journals in Germany. He was always an advocate for theological discussion being utterly unrestricted, his first essay on the subject being published at Halle in 1830, whither he had recently been invited to become professor. He soon, however, returned to Heidelberg, where he was made Director of the highest ecclesiastical council [Oberkirchenrath], a position of great trust and dignity. Here he wrote several articles against Strauss's Life of Christ. Some years later, in 1853, he was elected to the office of Bishop, so called, in the duchy of Baden, and went to live at Carlsruhe, where he stayed till his death. His greatest work is of an historical nature, and raises Ullmann to the rank of one of the chief historians of this century. Its title is Reformers before the Reformation. He strenuously maintains that the Reformers based their teaching on that of the Bible, while the Roman Catholics ignored the Bible altogether. He worked hard, but not successfully, to unite the different Protestant sects that existed in Baden, and also to raise and improve the social position of the Lutheran clergy.

Ulphilas.—The most interesting figure in the history of early Teutonic Christianity. All nations of Germanic descent may be said to owe to him the beginning of their religion and literature. The knowledge we possess of the working of the Church in the fourth century is very scanty, but the life of Ulphilas, the Apostle to the Goths, as he is called, is a striking exception. He was born in the year 318, during the reign of the Emperor Constantine, and while still young was appointed chaplain to the Emperor, and came to Constantinople a young man just as the Arian reaction was beginning, and believed what he was told, namely, that the Arian doctrine was the true doctrine of the Catholic Church. When the tide turned against the Arians, Ulphilas led a great migration of them across the Danube, his zeal quickened by his sense of the persecution of his faith, and he set himself eagerly to convert the Goths in the valleys of Messia to Christianity. He did not confine himself to religious instruction, but devoted himself also to the secular education of the people. As a necessary preliminary he invented an alphabet for them, their own, if they ever had one, having been lost during their wanderings. He translated the Bible into the Gothic language, omitting, however, the Books of Kings, as he feared the influence such writings might have on the bold, warlike spirits of his flock. He made great progress, having from the first won their confidence by his frank and cheerful disposition, and persuaded them to cultivate their lands, to make their homes comfortable, and to live at peace with their neighbours. But about the year 374 the little settlement was disturbed by an invasion of the Huns, and it was agreed that they should ask to be allowed to make a settlement within the boundaries of the Roman Empire—thinking that they would there be safe from intrusion. Gibbon describes in his stately periods the great movement across the Danube which followed the permission. A million of them are said to have crossed, and they gradually spread themselves over the countries of Southern Europe, and mixed with the native inhabitants. Ulphilas was engaged with them until the year 388, when he died.

The translation of the Scriptures made by Ulphilas has for us this surpassing interest: that it is the first writing we possess in our own mother tongue. The discovery of the Codex Argenteus (so called because it was written with silver letters) in a Westphalian monastery in the eleventh century gave the Teutonic race the first example of their language written down. Up to the days of Ulphilas it had been only a spoken, barbarous tongue. His reduction of it to writing by means of his new alphabet was no less than the beginning of Teutonic literature. The version has been printed by the Clarendon Press, and the student of his mother tongue will, after a very brief apprenticeship, be able to trace out in it the roots of the language in which Englishmen still read the Bible. The Codex Argenteus is now in the Royal Library at Upsala.

The following is Ulphilas's version of Matt. vii. 26, with the corresponding modern English:—

Yah hwa-suh-aei hauseith waurda meina yah
Yea whoso he heareth words mine, yea

Ulrich or Udalric, Sr., Bishop of Augsburg, the son of a powerful German nobleman, was born in 893. At seven years old he was sent to the monastery of St. Gall for his education, and the members all became so attached to him on account of his goodness and learning that they tried to persuade him to take the habit and devote his life to the monastery. He asked time to consider the proposal, and asked the advice of a nun, Guiborate, who lived the life of a recluse close by. She said she was sure that he was destined to lead an active, not a contemplative, life, so he went to Augsburg as Chamberlain to Adalberon, the Bishop, and, when he was old enough, took orders. He made a pilgrimage to Rome, and while he was there his friend and patron, Adalberon, died. Ulrich did not like the successor, Hiltin, so much, but performed his duties in the cathedral well and faithfully. In 924 Hiltin died, and Ulrich was appointed his successor by Henry the Fowler. From his early boyhood he had regarded with horror the secular duties imposed upon the Bishops, especially the being obliged to raise and often lead an army; but as long as Henry lived, he refrained from expressing his dislike to the custom. On his death, however, he immediately applied to his successor, Otho I., for permission to send his nephew to fulfil all his temporal duties and attendance at Court pageants, etc., thus securing more time for attending to the spiritual cares of his diocese. He visited all parts of it at least once a year, and held meetings and synods for his clergy twice—allowing them to come for help and advice at all times, if they wished. During the civil war that broke out between Otho I. and his son Luitolf, Ulrich stoutly upheld the rights of the Emperor, and succeeded at last in effectually reconciling them. His city and cathedral were completely devastated by an invasion of Hungarians, but Ulrich and his nephew drove them back. The cathedral was quickly rebuilt, though not without great trouble to get the necessary funds together. It was dedicated to St. Afra, a favourite saint of Augsburg. As soon as the cathedral was finished, Ulrich much wished to retire into a monastery for the remaining years of his life, being old and worn out with work and constant fasting. But his people were so attached to him that they could not bear the idea of losing him, and begged him to remain, which he did. He died July 4th, 973, and was buried in his cathedral, which has since been named after him. He was canonised by Pope John XV., in a Bull dated Feb. 993; his canonisation is remarkable as being the first ordered to be considered general. Up to that time the saints were only revered in their own diocese or province. [CANONISATION.]

Ultramontaniam [from ultra montes, "the other side of the mountains"—i.e. the Alps].—As the nations north of the Alps—France, Germany, etc.—have been opposed to the Papal assumption of absolute power, they have termed the endeavours of the Roman Curia to extend the papal authority and destroy the consequence of the national Churches, such as the Gallican Church, ultramontaniam. Those who explain the Canon Law on ultramontane principles are called Curialists. [CURIA ROMANA.] Ultramontaniam may be briefly described as the endeavour to render the Catholic Churches of the various countries more subservient to the Pope than is compatible with the existing ecclesiastical laws of the various countries, with the rights of the bishops and Sovereigns, with the independence and intellectual freedom of each country, and with various elements of Catholicism itself. Its principles are decidedly in the spirit of GREGORY VII. [q.v.]. Among the books that have been written on the subject are Count Montlosier's work against the sovereignty of priests—Mémoire à consulter sur un Système religieux et politique tendant à renverser la Religion, la Société, et le Trône [Paris, 1826]. Its most eloquent defender was the Abbé de Lamennais, whose work—De la Religion considérée dans ses Rapports avec l'Ordre politique et civil—defends the supremacy of ecclesiastical powers over the secular in all States; declares all Protestants, and even the Jansenists, atheists, and affixes the same stigma to the Government, because the charter of France allows freedom of religious worship.

Umbreit, FRIEDRICH WILHELM KARL, Protestant theologian, was born at Sonneborn, in the duchy of Saxe-Gotha, in 1795; died, 1860. At the University of Göttingen he made the acquaintance of Eichhorn, who inspired him with that love of Oriental languages which is to be discovered all through his works. These, almost entirely, are devoted to the study and explanation of the Old Testament. He considered that part of the Bible to be neglected in Germany, as it still is in some parts, and therefore wrote to show the depth and power to be found in the writings of the Prophets. He was professor at Heidelberg between the years 1823 and 1829, and was engaged with ULLMANN [q.v.] in the editorship of Studien und Kritiken. His principal works were: Lied des Liedes, das älteste und schönste aus dem Morgenlande ("The Song of Songs, the oldest and most beautiful from the East"); Uebersetzung und Auslegung des Buch Hiob ("Version of the Book of Job"); Grundtöne des alten Testaments ("Fundamental Principles of the Old Testament," etc., etc.

Unam Sanctam.—The name given to a Bull, published in 1302 by Boniface VIII., which fully defined the powers claimed by the Pope. It asserted the unity of the Catholic Church under St. Peter and his successors, and declared that those who denied this doctrine denied their own Christianity. "There are two swords, the spiritual and the temporal: our Lord said not of these two swords, 'It is too much,' but 'It is enough.' Both are in the power of the Church: the one the spiritual, to be used by the Church, the other the material, for the Church; the former that of priests, the latter that of kings and soldiers, to be wielded at the command and by the sufferance of the priest. One sword must be under the other, the temporal under the spiritual. . . . The spiritual instituted the temporal power, and judges whether that power is well exercised. If the temporal power errs, it is judged by the spiritual. To deny this is to assert, with the heretical Manichæans, two co-equal principles. We therefore assert, define, and pronounce that it is necessary to salvation to believe that every human being is subject to the Pontiff of Rome." This Bull was revoked by Clement V. in 1305, under pressure from Philip the Fair of France.

Unhallowed Uses.—When a church or chapel is consecrated the building is said to be henceforth separated "from all unhallowed, ordinary, and common uses." By this is meant such as have not been made sacred or consecrated to holy purposes.

Uniformity, ACTS OF.—Acts which secure in every congregation of the Church of England the same form of public prayer, administration of Sacraments and other rites. The first was passed in 1559, which confirmed the Revised Prayer Book of Edward VI., and inflicted severe penalties on those who should have any other form used in church: for the first offence they were to forfeit their goods; for the second, to be imprisoned a year; for the third, life imprisonment. All who absented themselves from church on Sundays and Holy Days, without just cause, were to be fined a shilling.

The second and by far the most important Act of Uniformity was passed in 1662, by which all ministers were required to give their assent to the Book of Common Prayer, and to read the Morning and Evening Services from it, on pain of being deprived of their benefices. They were ordered to make a declaration that it was unlawful on any pretext to bear arms against the king and to deny the binding force of the Solemn League and Covenant. Episcopal Ordination was also declared to be indispensable to the retaining of a benefice. In consequence of this Act some 2,000 clergy resigned their livings. This Act was set aside by the Act of Toleration under William and Mary. [TOLERATION, ACT OF.]

In 1872 was published the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act. With exception of the introductory portion of the Act, the definition of terms used, and the Schedule, we give the Act verbatim :—

“The shortened Order for Morning Prayer or for Evening Prayer, specified in the schedule to this Act, may, on any day except Sunday, Christmas Day, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, and Ascension Day, be used, if in a cathedral in addition to, and if in a church in lieu of, the Order for Morning Prayer or for Evening Prayer respectively prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.

“Upon any special occasion approved by the ordinary, there may be used in any cathedral or church a special form of service approved by the ordinary, so that there be not introduced into such service anything, except anthems or hymns, which does not form part of the Holy Scriptures or Book of Common Prayer.

“An additional form of service varying from any form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer may be used at any hour on any Sunday or holy-day in any cathedral or church in which there are duly read, said, or sung as required by law on such Sunday or holy-day at some other hour or hours the Order for Morning Prayer, the Litany, such part of the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion as is required to be read on Sundays and holy-days if there be no Communion, and the Order for Evening Prayer, so that there be not introduced into such additional service any portion of the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion, or anything, except anthems or hymns, which does not form part of the Holy Scriptures or Book of Common Prayer, and so that such form of service and the mode in which it is used is, for the time being, approved by the ordinary; provided that nothing in this section shall affect the use of any portion of the Book of Common Prayer as otherwise authorised by the Act of Uniformity or this Act.

“Whereas doubts have arisen as to whether the following forms of service, that is to say, the Order for Morning Prayer, the Litany, and the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion, may be used as separate services, and it is expedient to remove such doubts: Be it therefore enacted and declared that any of such forms of service may be used together or in varying order as separate services, or that the Litany may be said after the third collect in the Order for Evening Prayer, either in lieu of or in addition to the use of the Litany in the Order for Morning Prayer, without prejudice nevertheless to any legal powers vested in the ordinary; and any of the said forms of service may be used with or without the preaching of a sermon or lecture, or the reading of a homily.

“Whereas doubts have arisen as to whether a sermon or lecture may be preached without the common prayers and services appointed by the Book of Common Prayer for the time of day being previously read, and it is expedient to remove such doubts: Be it therefore enacted and declared, that a sermon or lecture may be preached without the common prayers or services appointed by the Book of Common Prayer being read before it is preached, so that such sermon or lecture be preceded by any service authorised by this Act, or by the Bidding Prayer, or by a collect taken from the Book of Common Prayer, with or without the Lord's Prayer.

“Nothing in this Act shall affect the provision with respect to the chapels of colleges in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham, which is contained in Section Six of the Universities Tests Act, 1871.

“The schedule to this Act, and the notes thereto and directions therein, shall be construed and have effect as part of this Act.

“This Act may be cited as ‘The Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, 1872.’”

Unigenitus Dei Filius, etc.—These are the opening words of a Bull issued by Clement XI. in 1713, which, under the name of Constitution of Unigenitus, has acquired a celebrity dangerous to the Papal authority and the peace of the Catholic Church. This Bull condemns one hundred and one propositions drawn from the work of PASQUER QUESNEL [q.v.], priest of the Oratory, entitled Le Nouveau Testament traduit en Français, avec des Réflexions Morales. These condemned propositions were taken, almost literally, either from the Bible or other acknowledged authorities of the Catholic Church, and included those which insisted upon purity of motives, the necessity of true religious love of virtue, reconciliation with God, the general use of the Bible, and the correction of the morals of the clergy. [JANSENISM.]

Union, HYPOSTATICAL. [HYPOSTATICAL UNION.]

Unitarians.—A religious body who believe in the personal Unity of God, in opposition to the Trinitarians, who believe in three Persons in one God. They are sometimes called Socinians, from Faustus Socinus, who, with Lælius, in the sixteenth century originated a fresh form of Anti-Trinitarian doctrine in Poland.

Unitarianism in England dates almost as far back as the earliest translation of the Bible. Strype alludes to it in his Memoirs of Archbishop Cranmer. In 1551 a German, named George van Paris, was burned in London for this heresy, and, four years after, another person at Uxbridge. A more distinguished victim was Joan Bocher, the “Maid of Kent.” Under James I. a large number of persons, some of them of rank and consideration, were executed for the same offence. The posthumous works of Milton, first published in 1825, show him to have adopted these views. An Act of the Long Parliament, in 1648, making the profession of Unitarianism a felony, was so far mitigated after the Revolution by Statutes 8 and 9 of William III. as to make it punishable, in the first instance, by certain civil disabilities, and, in the second, by three years' imprisonment and virtual outlawry. These statutes were not repealed till 1813. In the latter part of the seventeenth, and beginning of the eighteenth centuries, we find among avowed Unitarians such names as Firmin, Emlyn, Whiston, Samuel Clarke, and Lardner, and, greater still, Locke and Newton. Towards the close of the last century several clergymen of the Established Church (Lindsey, Jebb, Wakefield, Disney, and others) resigned their benefices in consequence of having adopted Unitarian views, while, at the same time, among numerous converts from the Dissenters, appear the names of Doctors Priestly, Price, Aikin, Rees, and others of scientific and literary merit. Amongst the General Baptists many became Unitarians. In the Presbyterian Churches of the North of Ireland the Unitarians have a society of their own, consisting of several presbyteries. In Scotland there are Unitarian chapels in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and elsewhere. The supply of Unitarian ministers is chiefly from Manchester College, at York; some, however, come from the Scotch and Dublin universities.

JOSEPH PRIESTLY [q.v.], a Nonconformist minister of Birmingham, ordained in 1774, openly avowed his belief in the non-inspiration of Scripture, and maintained that Christ was no more than a man, and that it was idolatry to worship Him, thus taking a strictly Humanitarian view. Priestly was compelled to leave Birmingham in 1793, and he died in America in 1804. After his death the writings and labours of Thomas Belsham did much to support Unitarianism. In 1811 he published his celebrated work, Calm Inquiry into the Scripture Doctrine concerning the Person of Christ, which was an able defence of his creed, and is to this hour considered the standard work on the subject.

The Unitarian faith appears first to have been avowed in Germany soon after the Reformation by Martin Cellarius, a native of Stuttgart, who adopted Luther's views, but afterwards developed Unitarian principles, for which he was imprisoned, released in 1536, and died at Basle in 1564. Among other theologians who about the same time were led to a like result were Lewis Hetzer, put to death at Constance in 1529; John Campanus, of Wittenberg; Adam Pastor, of Westphalia; and Claudius, a Frenchman, who, about 1530, preached his doctrines in Switzerland and Alsace. Still more noticeable was MICHAEL SERVETUS [q.v.], put to death in 1553.

In Holland, Erasmus John, Rector of the College of Antwerp, published, in 1585, an anonymous work favouring this doctrine, called Antithesis Doctrinæ Christi et Anti-Christi de Uno Vero Deo. He was forthwith banished. Thirteen years later, Ostorode and Voidove, for similar publications, were ordered by the States-General to leave the United Provinces within ten days and to have their writings burnt. In 1627 Adolphus Venator was banished for composing a work which savoured of Socinianism, and in 1653, finding that Unitarians were increasing in Holland, the States-General, after consulting with the divines of Leyden, issued an edict forbidding the profession of the Socinian heresy and holding of its assemblies; but this does not appear to have been carried into rigid execution. To mention no other names than Episcopius and Grotius, there has probably always been a large number of Unitarians among the Remonstrants of Holland, and recent publications show that Unitarian opinions have disseminated themselves in that country to no inconsiderable extent.

As early as 1690 some English ministers complained to a synod, convened at Amsterdam, of the growing heterodoxy of the Genevan Church. In 1757, in the French Encyclopedia, the article "Geneva" announced that "many of the ministers disbelieved the Divinity of Jesus Christ, of which Calvin, their leader, was the zealous defender." In 1798, the catechism of Calvin was superseded by another, of a character to indicate the justness of this statement. In 1807 a Liturgy, expurgated upon Unitarian principles, was substituted for that formerly in use, and two years earlier a professedly amended version of the Scriptures, which had been in preparation for upwards of a century, was published under the authority of the Venerable Company of Pastors.

In America Unitarian principles appear to have been extensively adopted in Massachusetts as early as the middle of the last century. In 1756 Emlyn's Humble Inquiry into the Scripture Account of Jesus Christ was published in Boston, and in one of its churches a Liturgy excluding the doctrine of the Trinity was adopted. In 1805 attention was drawn to the subject by several publications, occasioned by the appointment of a distinguished Unitarian (Dr. Henry Ware) to the Divinity Chair of the American University of Cambridge; in 1816 the controversy was revived by a republication of a chapter from Belsham's Life of Lindsey, with the title American Unitarianism. Dr. Priestly visited Philadelphia, and started a small society there in 1794. Since then they have congregations in various parts of the United States; their ministers are supplied chiefly from Cambridge. Besides the Congregational Unitarians, the denomination called Christians, which is numerous, maintains Unitarian opinions, and they also prevail in the Reformed Baptists.

In France many of the Protestant clergy reject the doctrine of the Trinity, and the principal sources of supply for their ministry are the schools of Geneva and Montauban. A society has been formed in Paris called the Unitarian Association of France.

Unitarians profess to derive their views from Scripture, and to make it the ultimate arbiter in all religious questions, thus distinguishing themselves from the Rationalists of Germany. They say that being interpreted according to the settled laws of language, the uniform testimony of the Scripture is, that the Holy Spirit has no personal existence distinct from the Father, and that the Son is a derived and dependent being who was, as some say, created in, a remote period of time, or, as others affirm, beginning to live when he appeared upon earth. The Unitarians do not admit the necessity of an atonement, and consider that a conscientious discharge of moral duties is in itself sufficient to secure a man's future happiness; they cast aside the doctrine of eternal punishment, and deny the personality of the devil and the existence of fallen spirits. In America their creed is called UNIVERSALISM. [q.v.] Their church government is virtually congregational. It is a curious fact that many of the buildings now occupied in England by Unitarians formerly were the property of English Presbyterians. They were excluded from the benefits of the Toleration Act until 1813, but since then have enjoyed the same political privileges as any other Protestant Dissenting body. It is difficult to ascertain their numbers, but there are probably something under 100,000 in the United Kingdom. In the official return made in 1882 their places of worship number 124.

United Brethren, Unitas Fratres.
[MORAVIANS.]

United Greeks.—A name given to those Greeks scattered in Italy, Russia, Hungary, Transylvania, and specially in Austria and Poland, who belong to the Roman Church. They acknowledge the authority of the Pope, and accept the doctrine of the double Procession of the Holy Ghost, but in other respects follow the rites of the Greek Church. They have their own clergy, who are allowed to marry when in minor orders; they receive the communion in both kinds and with leavened bread, and use their own Liturgy. Their position in the Roman Church was settled by a Bull of Benedict XIV. in 1742. They have three seminaries, each having a bishop of the Greek rite residing there to ordain the priests, but otherwise they are subject to the bishop in whose diocese they live. They number about four millions and a half.

United Presbyterian Church of Scotland.—Formed in 1847, when the United Secession and Relief Churches were amalgamated. Some account of the secessions will be found under ERSKINE, EBENEZER; SECESSIONISTS. In 1835 negotiations were begun between the two Synods, and in 1840 a scheme of union was agreed on. But for a time the Secession Church was occupied with the Atonement controversy, and it was not till 1847 that the union was consummated. The two Synods met in Edinburgh May 10th, and walked in procession to Tanfield Hall, where the Articles of the Basis of Union were read and adopted. In doctrine this branch of the Scottish Church holds to the theology of the Westminster Confession and of the Larger and Shorter Catechisms. Its form of government is Presbyterian; it has no intermediate courts between presbyteries and the supreme court, which it calls a Synod. Each congregation has a session, composed of elders, who watch over Church matters, fixing the time for the dispensation of the Lord's Supper, etc. It is a voluntary Church, and every member has perfect freedom of action; it is, in fact, conducted on Congregational principles. It has a Theological Hall of its own in Edinburgh, to which are attached five Chairs: [1] Sacred languages and Biblical criticism; [2] hermeneutics and evidences; [3] exegetical theology; [4] systematic and pastoral theology; [5] ecclesiastical history, comprehending the history of doctrine, ritual, and government. This Church may be said to be in a very prosperous condition.

United States of America, RELIGION IN.—America has been the resting-place of many bodies of persecuted Protestants and also, in a smaller degree, of Roman Catholics. The first English settlers were a small colony of Puritans who landed in Virginia in 1607 with their chaplain, Mr. Hunt. These were followed, in 1620, by the PILGRIM FATHERS [q.v.] who were persecuted by Laud. Each colony brought with it its own ministers and settled its own rules and forms of worship, so that New England became the stronghold of Puritanism, which developed into Congregationalism. The Quakers also fled thither from the persecution in Charles II.'s reign; Baptists, Moravians, Huguenots, Lutherans from the Palatinate, etc., settled here to exercise their religious opinions unmolested. Numbers also of the members of the Church of England emigrated to America, but unfortunately the Church at home was lethargic and took no pains to provide for the spiritual wants of the colonists, and consequently for many years the Church of England steadily dwindled away. New life was infused into the Church at home by Wesley, and carried by him also to America. In 1740 he and George Whitfield preached at Boston with wonderful success. At Whitfield's farewell sermon 20,000 persons are said to have been present. Meantime the Episcopal Church was struggling for feeble existence amongst manifold troubles. At length the Declaration of American Independence brought about a crisis; it became clear that if Episcopacy was not altogether to die out there must be bishops on American soil. Hitherto the clergy of the Anglican Church had to go to England for their ordination, and had to take the Oath of Allegiance to the Sovereign. This could no longer be done under the relations of the two countries, so it was resolved that Samuel Seabury should go to England and be consecrated as the first American Bishop. [SEABURY, SAMUEL.] His consecration took place in Aberdeen.

Whilst Seabury was in Europe American Churchmen were not idle; they held a Convention of Clerical and Lay Delegates in 1785, to choose some candidates who should be sent to England for consecration. Their choice fell on Dr. White and Dr. Provost, and on Feb. 4th, 1787, these were consecrated in Lambeth Palace Chapel, and the Church of England gave to the American Colonies which yet remained to her Bishop Inglis, who may be regarded as the first missionary bishop. The Rev. J. Madison was consecrated at Lambeth in 1790, and thus there were sufficient bishops to consecrate others in America as they should be wanted. The first Consecration Service performed by American bishops took place in 1792, when Dr. Thomas Claggett was made Bishop of Maryland in Trinity Church, New York. There are now forty-eight bishops, four assistant bishops, and fourteen missionary bishops. They elect one of their number to be the presiding bishop at their Conventions. The friendly relations between the Church of England and the American Church have been greatly cemented by the meetings known as the PAN-ANGELICAN SYMPOSIA [q.v.].

Wesley was so disgusted with the apathy of the Church at home that he did not wait for its help, but proceeded to ordain clergy and consecrate bishops for America. These now form the body known as the Methodist Episcopal Church.

All the religious bodies in the United States are voluntary. The principal theological seminaries are at New York, Cambridge, Madison, Rochester, Princeton, Hartford, and Andover.

Unity of the Church.—The importance of Christian Unity is plainly declared in the New Testament, as well as in the conscience of Christian men. It was one of the principal topics of our Lord's prayer on the night of His Agony [John xvii. 20]. The Apostles accordingly treated the question as one of transcendent moment, asserted the Unity of the Body with great emphasis, and warned disciples against endangering it [Eph. iv. 4—6]. Yet, when we look upon Christendom as it is, we seem to behold a picture of a very different character. The disciples of Jesus, professing to be His members and followers, and to live in union with Him, are broken into a countless number of outward communions, and the question at once arises, "Has the Saviour's prayer been answered?" To this question there are three main lines of answer.

[1] The Church of Rome declares that there was established one visibly connected religious community, of which St. Peter was appointed the head, this headship devolving upon his successors in the Roman See until the end of the world. It is therefore a mark of true Churches throughout the world, that they dutifully submit themselves to the Roman authority, and so preserve themselves in the original organic Unity of the Church. All who do not confess this obedience, and refuse to submit themselves to the central authority of the Roman Church, are in schism, and the religious bodies to which they belong have no right to the name of Churches.

[2] The view which we may call the Anglican, is that the Church was intended to preserve an organic Unity under its Bishops, but not under one visible head. Doubtless, in the Apostolic times, the Unity was so preserved, that all branches of the Church were in communion with the other branches throughout the world. Bingham gives his view of the means which were taken by the Church to preserve this Unity as the Church spread far and wide over the world, and he states them thus:—

[a] The Unity of faith was principally insisted on as the foundation; and next to this the Unity of holiness. When Christ sent forth His Apostles He enjoined them two things:—To baptise the nations in the Name [or faith] of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and to teach them to observe all things whatsoever He had commanded them [Matt. xxviii. 20]. "If it be inquired," he goes on to say, "what articles of faith and what points of practice were reckoned thus fundamental or essential to the very being of a Christian, and the union of many Christians into one body or Church, the ancients are very plain in resolving this. For as to fundamental articles of faith, the Church had them always collected out of Scripture in her creeds; and as to the other point of obedience to the laws and institutions of Christ, it was generally summed up into the short form of renouncing the devil and his science and his works, and covenanting with Christ to live by the rules of His Gospel."

[b] The Church required that men should unite themselves to her by baptism, to be administered but once, and that by the hands of a regular ministry, except some urgent necessity obliged them to do otherwise.

[c] Another requisite was Unity of worship, common prayer, and the administration of the Word and Sacraments. "Which did not require that all Churches should exactly agree in the same form of words—for it was no breach of unity for different Churches to have different modes and circumstances and ceremonies in performing the same holy offices, so long as they kept to the substance of the institution. But that which was required was that every particular member of any Church should comply with the particular customs and usages of his own Church (nothing being inserted into her offices that was unlawful), and meet for religious worship." There are several canons in the Council of Gangra against a schismatical spirit which raises disputes about variations in practice. [GANGRA.]

According to this view the broken Unity is in part owing to the unlawful usurpation of authority by Rome, and in part to the wilfulness of other sects. The following passages from the late Bishop Wordsworth's Theophilus Anglicanus will probably be regarded as among the most authoritative statements of this, which we have called the Anglican view, of Church Unity.

"The Church is One, or United, inasmuch as all its members have one God and Father; and are united as sheep of one fold, under one Shepherd, and as members, under Christ their Head, of one Body, into which they are all baptised in one Spirit; and are all partakers of one Bread and one Cup in the Holy Eucharist; have all one Faith, and one Hope of their calling; are of one heart and one soul, loving each other as Brethren, and keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; walking by the same rule and minding the same thing; united by the same Apostolic government, discipline, and worship; and all living with this one aim, that they may with one mind and one mouth glorify God.

"But since the Church is always a Visible Society of men, united by visible tokens, and since every Society requires a governing power for its own preservation, what is the power which governs the Visible Church?

"The Church, as a whole, is subject, under Christ, to the Laws given her in Holy Scripture, and to those laws which (not contrary to Scripture) have been enacted for her by herself, and which have been generally received and put in use in the Church.

"But Laws require living Interpreters and Executors: who, then, have this power in the Church? The Bishops of the Church, convened in General and Provincial Councils; each having full spiritual jurisdiction in that National Church, or portion of it, committed to his charge.

"Christ, as Creator, Redeemer, and Governor of the world, has delegated to every supreme Governing power, in a Christian State, an external superintending, directing, and controlling jurisdiction, with the exercise of which no foreign prelate, prince, or potentate can interfere. This jurisdiction is what the Emperor Constantine called that of an Episcopus ab extra; and it consists not only in maintaining and defending the Church of Christ in its own dominions, but in regulating and governing it; not, however, after any new code of laws, but of those of God and of the Church. And so Christ has provided for the maintenance of unity in the Church by the distinct though concurrent exercise of the spiritual and temporal Powers, and not by the commission of both or of either of them to the hands of one man.

"In the early ages of the Church, Christendom consisted of independent Provinces, and these were subdivided into what are now termed dioceses, each of which had a Bishop as its Centre of Unity, the Presbyters of the diocese being subject to and united with their Bishop, and the people being in communion with their respective pastors. And as the Bishop was the Centre of Unity, for the purposes of diffusing Grace to all, and of joining all together, and of presenting them unitedly to God, so the cathedral was the common Mother Church of the whole diocese; and thus, by personal and local communion, the faithful of each diocese were united together as one man in the offices of Public Worship, and were partakers of those Graces which are specially promised by God to those who 'dwell together in Unity.'

"St. Paul informs us, 'There is one Body, and one Spirit, and one Hope of our calling; one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism; one God and Father of us all.' He does not add, 'One Visible Head.' Let all the members of the Catholic Church be 'joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment,' let them 'walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing,' let them be united in the same Faith, in the same Sacraments, and in the same Apostolic Discipline and government; let them communicate with one another by means of their lawful Bishops, in National and in General Councils, according to the institutions of Christ, and to universal primitive practice; let them all, each in his own sphere, 'endeavour to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace;' they will then enjoy the blessing of primitive Christian unity. But they will never attain this Unity by subjection to one supreme visible Head, of which the primitive Church knew nothing; and especially they cannot expect it from subjection to such a supreme visible Head as subverts the one Faith by a New Creed, mutilates the Sacraments, destroys Apostolic government, and sets at naught the authority of the Church in her synods, and having thus dissolved all the bands of unity, exacts an implicit subjection to all these innovations and infractions, as an essential condition of communion with itself, as a test of Church membership, and as necessary to eternal salvation."

This view may be further illustrated by a correspondence published in January, 1887, between the Bishop of Winchester and Canon Basil Wilberforce, and by the circumstances which gave rise to it. All the Nonconformist ministers of Southampton had attended St. Mary's Church in that town to receive the Lord's Supper at the hands of Canon Wilberforce, avowedly as a sign and symbol of Christian Unity in spite of their many differences. At a later period Canon Wilberforce had preached at Albion Chapel (Congregational); not at an ordinary service.

but at a monthly mission service, for which the regular worshippers vacate their seats, and make an effort to gather in those who habitually attend no place of worship. Against this the Bishop, his attention being drawn to the matter, remonstrates, on the ground mainly of what is expressed in the following passages, which may be compared with those cited above:—

"There are certain principles of the English Church which she has held almost throughout her history, and which, but for her, would have been probably lost sight of in the world. One is that the Church of Christ (not only an invisible spiritual company, but the visible living organism) is a gift of God, and has lived on in an unbroken continuity from the days of our Lord's bodily presence unto this day. So the Church is from above, not from beneath; and it is not possible for a single man, or body of men, in recent times to constitute a new Church at their own pleasure. Another is that, though the Church is Divine, it has yet human elements, and so may require pruning, prudent and careful pruning, if it runs into excessive or unhealthy growth. Unless these two principles are true, the Church of England is indefensible; her very raison d'être is gone. The Church as one with the Church of the New Testament and the primitive ages; the Church as reformed (when corrupt) on the exact model of the primitive body; these two are the pillars on which she rests. To give these up is to give up all, for if they are not sound the Church of England cannot be defended, either [1] for having separated herself from communion with the Roman patriarch, or [2] for not simply taking her stand as one of a number of Protestant sects.

"Now to ignore this, to break down all boundaries, to acknowledge that we are but one of a multitude of heterogeneous committees of human origin, is to deprive us of our vantage ground, and the world of the hope which springs from our occupying such vantage ground. If we, and all the other Christian bodies in England, are to be described as alike 'Churches of different denominations,' then we are the most schismatical body in the world, assuming a position to which we have no right, unless we are, indeed, the ancient Church of the nation come down in a continuous stream from the fountain head."

In a second letter responding to a reply from Canon Wilberforce, the Bishop implies that the maintenance of this Church position is the real hope for the unity of the Church in the future, and says:—

"My chief objection to dissent is not to the doctrines or discipline of any particular sect, but that its very principle is to ignore the unity of the Church of Christ, inventing a thing unknown to Scripture and the primitive Christians, of a spiritual, invisible community only, and instead of the one Body of Christ, substituting a multitude of disunited and disconnected sects. All that tends to confirm and perpetuate this theory is a direct countermove to the prayer of our Blessed Lord, that His Church might be One as a united witness to the world" (John xvii. 21).

To this it should be added that the Bishop himself and those who agree with him pass no judgment on the piety or the devotion of Nonconformists. It would be absurd and contrary to plain facts to question the deep religious earnestness and intense spirituality of such men as Baxter or Robert Hall. But Churchmen hold that the Church of England, with her precise formularies, her august traditions, and her apostolic ministry, is peculiarly fitted to be a pillar and ground of the truth; that though she has at times seemed to bow before the set of public opinion, it was but for the moment, and that she quickly recovered her position; and especially that her influence has been very great, and was never greater than now, upon religious bodies outside her pale. Those who hold this view point to the vast difference between the Roman clergy in England and those in other parts of Europe, and hold that the high superiority in England is owing to the influence of Protestantism upon them; while it is urged that the influence of our Liturgy and of Church teaching upon the Nonconformist bodies also is indirectly very great, and that where such influence has been absent, as in America and elsewhere, Nonconformity has passed into avowed Unitarianism. On these grounds Anglicans hold that for the Church to practise self-effacement, and to abandon her distinctive marks and insignia, would be to inflict a blow upon religion in general, without furthering the cause of Christian brotherhood.

[3] It remains to state the Nonconformist view of this great question. This is of necessity very largely a direct negative to many of the statements on which the foregoing argument is based, but accompanied also by a positive doctrine of a totally different character. It will be convenient to state each aspect of this view in turn.

Nonconformists altogether deny that the "government, discipline, and worship" referred to in the foregoing, are (as there implied) "Apostolic," on which the entire argument depends. They deny this on the following alleged grounds: [a] Whilst it may be traced to early Fathers and the early Church, it cannot be found in the New Testament, or traced to the primitive Church, and is therefore due to corruption and a craving after outward ceremonial, which have ever been active in causing such developments. They point to the historical fact that the growth of ecclesiastical prerogative was of great rapidity during the early centuries, and believe therefore that the process crept in at an exceedingly early period, and that the only safe authority for the practice and nature of the really Primitive Church is to be found in the teaching and history contained in the New Testament itself. [b] When thus tested, according to the simple, evident, natural meaning of the text, much of the Episcopal system (they say) is in direct contrast to Apostolic teaching and practice, neither of which gives the slightest hint of a worship confined to Liturgy, of "consecrated" elements, of a ministry confined to Episcopal "orders," or of any of the modern ideas of a "bishop" whatsoever, but very many indications and hints of the contrary to all these things. [c] If Episcopal claims are just, the difference between their own view and the Episcopal, in regard to ministry and the sacraments, is so enormous, that there must appear conspicuous differences in Christian graces and life between those enjoying such exalted privileges, and others. This they affirm, with all charity, and especially as regards the attitude assumed towards themselves, they are unable to find.

Nonconformists further say that the Episcopal argument, legitimately worked out, leads to Rome and not to Anglicanism. This they consider is borne out both by the notorious number of conversions to that faith during late years, and by the fact that the Christian recognition denied to themselves is freely awarded to that communion, even in such cases as that of the SPANISH REFORMED CHURCH [q.v.], Roman orders being freely acknowledged, whilst attendance at their own meetings is frequently denounced as a grievous sin. And as to the assertion in reply [see above] that the Church was "reformed (when corrupted) on the exact model of the primitive body," they respond [a] as stated already; and [b] that this was not the fact, as simple matter of English history; that the Church never did as a whole reform herself, with that pure desire and intention; that her emancipation from Rome, and reform, were effected by the civil government, and formed a political shuttlecock during four reigns; that a very few ecclesiastical individuals directed it who had themselves risen high in the Roman communion, without any consultation of the Church at large, and under limits rigidly laid down; and that all existing practices were simply taken for granted as Apostolic, which were not either felt to be intolerable corruptions, or held to be politically objectionable. Church writers themselves, when writing from other points of view, represent what happened as a "compromise" between widely different beliefs. In reference to their own beliefs, on the other hand, they deny and disclaim what is imputed to them; affirm that they on their part have, with that single purpose lacking on the part of the Church, made honest and conscientious endeavour to find and to follow the "model of the primitive body," from what they regard as alone authentic evidence thereof; and say that to stigmatise the result of this their endeavour as "of man," in supposed contrast to the other, is simply the easy arrogance of self-assertion, and—considering human fallibility—unbecoming to any body of professing Christians whatever.

Nonconformists have, however, also a positive doctrine on the subject. They hold that as [a] the Mystical Body or true Church of Christ confessedly consists of all who have possessed a true and living and obedient faith in Him, so [b] the Visible Church similarly consists of all who on earth profess such faith, and may in charitable judgment be fairly accounted His followers. It is therefore amongst these that Unity is to be manifested; and obviously this must be mainly done by a manifest spirit of love, mutual kindness and forbearance, the pursuit of common objects, and fellowship in the Gospel. This view, it is affirmed, is borne out by Scripture. In the passage cited at the beginning [Eph. iv. 4—6], the one emphatic direction for practical conduct which precedes that statement of the doctrine, is to endeavour to "keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." This they affirm they endeavour to do, and by the grace of God do in some measure attain unto. As to their different organisations, they say that Scripture itself contains abundant evidence of much variation in practice amongst different (local) Churches, and at different times. Whilst churches were few, and persecution forced them together, this was not sufficient to cause even outward distinctions: but they reason that when persecution has ceased and congregations have multiplied, it is natural for those who agree in most points to congregate together. They say that their "denominations" really, and by their own express profession, mean no more than this: and that these denominations take care, by speech and action, in countless ways, to make the world understand that they do regard one another as brethren, and as belonging to the One Church of the Redeemed. It is freely admitted by some Nonconformists, that differences in practice afford insufficient ground to build denominations upon. But they argue that the Episcopal Church is even more open to this reproach: since there was a time when their forefathers were in communion with her, but were compelled to choose between a painful departure, or a surrender of all the beliefs they held concerning primitive doctrine and practice; and this also disposes of the assertion sometimes made, that they ought to find, and would find, sufficient liberty within her walls. On the other hand, they affirm that among Nonconformists these distinctions show signs of fast breaking down. Others hold that such denominations are useful as bearing special witness to some special truth—as that of the Friends to the work and power of the Holy Spirit—but in the meantime it is agreed by all, or nearly all, that in brotherly co-operation and intercourse the essential Unity of the Body can be and is fully manifested, so far as these are shown. It is affirmed that as regards that witness to the world, of which so much is said, the world at large does fully understand this, and that the "lapsed masses" practically think nothing at all of the differences in organisation between those whom they see to be working in real harmony, while they do often speak bitterly of the differences between Church and Dissent, which they see to be of a very different kind.

Comparing the two views, Nonconformists further argue as follows:—[a] If the Unity of Scripture was to be outward and organic, and in the Episcopal form, it is very strange that no means were taken to ensure so important an object, which a very few sentences of apostolic instruction would easily have done; whereas there is none such, but countless exhortations to the Unity of Spirit.

[b] If organic union were the true Unity, and so far beyond other considerations as Anglicans make it, then the days when it was as yet unbroken would exhibit the golden age of the Church in piety, devotedness, and holiness. The direct contrary is the case, and the Reformation movements were simultaneous with true religious-revival in an age of nauseous ecclesiastical corruption. [c] Those who, at a later period, adhered to the Anglican Unity, would be, on the whole, conspicuously superior in Christian graces and work, and those who departed from it, on the whole, marked by deficiency in these respects; regarding the great secessions caused by the Act of Uniformity, and under the Wesleys, and in other cases, they allege that the very reverse was conspicuously the case. [d] Lastly, they say that the Episcopal idea of Unity has absolutely no promise and no hope (beyond an absolute surrender of men's convictions such as is demanded by Rome), and has been evidently and conspicuously condemned by the Providence of God itself, since it is manifestly now impossible and impracticable, and every day sees its realisation further removed; while, on the other hand, the Unity of the Spirit, openly manifested in the sight of men, is quite practicable, is only limited by the grace of God given to men irrespective of conscientious conviction, and is, in every direction but one, growing more manifest day by day. That exception, they say, lies in Anglicanism itself, which they affirm, adopting the Bishop of Winchester's conditional admission above in an affirmative sense, is in truth "the most schismatical body in the world," since it alone, with the exception of the Church of Rome (and without the special historical plea of that Church in justification), and one or two obscure sects of the Plymouth Brethren description, refuses as a whole any practical manifestation in the sight of men of that Unity which the Lord and His Apostles held so dear. In fine, they affirm that there is no real breach of unity, and is in fact felt to be none, amongst different denominations who on fit occasions work together, exchange pulpits, and meet and regard each other as brethren; but that there is sin and schism, and division of the visible Body of Christ, on the part of any who stand apart and deny to other godly Christians such recognition, much more who apply to them injurious language or epithets.

This view also may be illustrated in the occurrences and correspondence cited above. Canon Wilberforce himself, in his reply to the Bishop, though in many points he is a recognised exponent of what are called High Church principles, to a certain extent endorses the Nonconformist view as to Christian Unity. He supposes the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, and asks if the "Church" which He would recognise and call to Himself, would be in any degree coterminous with the Church of England, or would not be rather gathered from all united by faith to Him? And he then says:—

"If this would be true in the event of the archangel's trumpet sounding to-morrow, it must have been true upon that Sunday night when I was preaching in the Albion Chapel; and if I refuse to recognise it, and consider many of His own to be outside the pale of His Body because they walk not with us, while they cast out devils in His name, and are doing, and doing well, half the Christian work of this country, it is I, and not they, who are guilty of the sin of schism."

"Allowing to the uttermost all the advantages to be derived from the fact that the Church of England is 'indeed the ancient Church of the nation come down in a continuous stream from the fountain head,' it is nevertheless true that the soul of man has not to wander eighteen centuries back to find the thrilling touch, the close guidance, and the all-surrounding love of the personal Lord Jesus Christ; and if I refuse fellowship with believers in Christ who are living in vital union with their risen Lord, because they do not see eye to eye with me upon questions of apostolic order, I am grieving the Spirit, marring the secret unity of the Body, and rending the seamless robe."

Pointing then to this episode, and to many such on record, Nonconformists affirm that there is no schism on their part, but that in countless ways (as on this occasion by going in a body to partake of the Lord's Supper at Canon Wilberforce's hands) they have tried to manifest, and so far as lay in them did manifest, to men, the Unity of the Body; but they ask if the Church of England has done the same, or manifested by its action any Unity, of any sort at all which the world can judge of? They admit that Episcopal views must of necessity affect reciprocity; as, e.g., in this case, no conscientious Episcopalian could go to receive the Lord's Supper at unconsecrated hands. All such distinctions and limits they understand and respect. But when such action as the Canon did take is protested against, and the same position is taken in other ways, they say that it is the Anglican Church, and not they, who are breaking the Unity of the Body of Christ.

It hardly needs mentioning, that there are varieties and degrees of each view. Thus, even above we find Canon Wilberforce in part adopting that of those who, in all points of detail, differ from him widely; and there are Nonconformists who more or less incline towards Anglican views. But in their real and essential nature the opposite views are as above; and while there is such profound difference of opinion, the bounden duty of each is to exhibit the utmost personal kindness and Christian fellowship consonant with his own conscientious convictions. The Bishop of Winchester's letters above quoted, it is well to remark, furnish very strong evidence of this, and it is in this direction that all must seek, and may hope to find, the more excellent way. Meanwhile, whichever may be adopted of these conflicting views, the evils of disunion are but too patent; and although matters have greatly—very greatly—improved since his day, we cannot but still find only too much to endorse in the following vigorous protest of Robert Hall—"Christian societies, regarding each other with the jealousies of rival empires, each aiming to raise itself on the ruins of all others; making extravagant boasts of superior purity, generally in exact proportion to their departures from it, and scarcely deigning to acknowledge the possibility of obtaining salvation out of their pale, is the spectacle which modern Christianity presents. The bond of charity which unites the followers of Christ, in distinction from the world, is dissolved; the evils which result from this state of division are incalculable. It supplies infidels with their most plausible topics of invective; it hardens the consciences of the irreligious; weakens the hands of the good; impedes the efficacy of prayer; and is probably the principal obstruction to that ample effusion of the Spirit which is essential to the renovation of the world."

Universalism.—The name given to the doctrine held by large numbers of Christians to the effect that all men, and also the devil, and fallen angels, will be forgiven and will share eternal happiness. The belief in Universalism is of very ancient origin, and passages implying it may be found in the works of Origen and his followers, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, etc. It is also said to have constituted part of the creed of the Lollards, Albigenses, and Waldenses. Among the English divines who have held the doctrine are Archbishop Tillotson, Dr. Burnet, and William Law, and in modern times Professor F. D. Maurice. All Unitarians hold the doctrine of Universalism, and some of the Universalists agree with the Unitarians in rejecting the doctrine of the Trinity.

The Universalists ground their reasons for their doctrine in the love of God, Who, they say, is only angry with sin, not the sinner, and therefore if the sinner repents even after death his repentance will restore him to God's favour. The sovereignty of God will be finally vindicated by the ultimate harmony of the moral universe, and the submission of all things in heaven and earth to His holy will. That will is righteousness; to the triumph of that, and not universal happiness, all things tend, but when righteousness is triumphant then peace and happiness will prevail; until then pain and suffering will be His instruments to work out His will. With regard to the argument from Scripture, Universalists hold that in the text, "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal" [Matt. xxv. 46], the word aiônios, translated "everlasting," does not express any idea of duration at all, either finite or infinite, but is used to denote a mode of existence perfectly dissimilar to any chronic state. To prove this they quote John xvii. 3: "This is life eternal, that they might know Thee." The late Bishop Martensen quotes in favour of this view, "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" [1 Cor. xv. 22]; "At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow" [Phil. ii. 10]; "That He might gather together in one all things in Christ" [Eph. i. 10]; "For it pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell, and . . . by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself" [Col. i. 19-20, and 1 Tim. iv. 10].

Universalism is better known as a distinct sect in America than in England. In 1827 a division arose among the American Universalists concerning punishment after death, some asserting it to be limited, while others denied it altogether. Some separated from the main body and called themselves "The Massachusetts Association of Restorationists." Most of them afterwards joined the Free-Will Baptists or the Unitarians, while the others returned to the main body. In 1840 the whole sect divided into two, the Impartialists and the Restorationists. But Universalism is also held by members of other sects.

Universals.—A term of scholastic philosophy signifying the general properties which many things share alike, and which the mind must conceive of by abstracting itself from the things that exhibit them. Thus, for example, if I make use of the words "animal," "blackness," "kindness," the possible ideas may occur to the hearer of a dog, ink, giving money to the poor. For each of these would come under the respective words, but they would not exhaust them, nor even necessarily suggest them. My next neighbour might think of a horse, ebony, visiting the sick. Consequently the question was raised, Are Universals real existences, apart from the mind which has imagined instances of them, and from the examples of them which we adduce, or are they mere modes of intellectual expression? Those who answered the former question in the affirmative were known as REALISTS [q.v.]; those who denied it were, with various modifications, termed NOMINALISTS [q.v.].

Universities were originally spontaneous aggregations of learned men; the circumstances of attraction to particular localities are seldom to be traced. A teacher inspired by a love of learning gathered around him a circle of learners. Other teachers followed, the circle increased, and thus by a purely natural process a school was founded. This process may in general be said to have taken place in the eleventh or twelfth centuries, but earlier schools of the nature of universities were founded at Alexandria and Antioch in the fourth century [ALEXANDRIA, CATHOLICAL SCHOOL OF], and became exceedingly famous under Panteenus, Clement, and Origen. "How great must have been the reputation and influence of such schools when they were but few in numbers and when oral instruction was nearly the only path to knowledge; how great the noble pride of the professors and the enthusiasm of the scholars when, from all the countries of Europe, learners flocked to spend long years in Bologna and Paris that they might share in this instruction." [Mullinger, p. 71.]

The earliest of this kind of European school, the histories of which can be historically traced, are those of Bologna, Paris, and Salerno: the first, the great school of civil law; the second, of "arts" and theology; the third, of medicine. But although these "schools" were originally distinct, those who wanted to perfect themselves in each branch of learning going successively to the "school" where it was specially taught, just as in modern times a man would sometimes go to Cambridge for mathematics and to Oxford for logic and classics, graduating perhaps at both universities—each "school" gradually incorporated with its own particular study the branches of learning which were taught at the others. Thus a school of arts and medicine was founded at Bologna in 1316, and in the latter half of the same century a school of theology was founded by Pope Innocent VI. The name is preserved at Oxford, where the Lecture and Examination Halls are still called "The Schools," and where the studies of the several branches of university learning are named "The School of Theology," the "School of Arts," etc.

But the University or "School" of Paris was that which had most influence in Europe during the early revival of learning, and upon its model Oxford and Cambridge, and all the other great universities of Europe, appear to have been established. It was distinctly ecclesiastical in its associations, and tradition points to the Church of St. Geneviève as the place of its origin; and it was in Paris that the particular studies which had been previously carried out in separate "schools" were first combined under the name of "universities," a term originally applied to any corporation, but in this case taking the sense of such a combination or incorporation of various branches of learning, that the whole body might fairly be called a place of universal learning. It was in Paris that university degrees originated, the "degree" being originally a licence to teach under the title of "Doctor," as a Doctor of Theology, a Doctor of Civil Law, or a Doctor of Medicine. At Paris also originated the division of students into "nations," which were four in number—the "French Nation," which included Spaniards, Italians, and Greeks; the "Picard Nation" which included students from the North-East and from the Netherlands; the "Norman Nation;" and the "English Nation," which included Irish, Scottish, and German students.

Many Continental universities were formed in the thirteenth century by the dispersion of students from Bologna and Paris through civil discords. Thus arose those of Montpellier, Toulouse, Padua, Vicenza, Pisa, Vercelli, Arezzo, and Ferrara. To the same period and the same cause may be attributed the great increase and development of the two great Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. [OXFORD, UNIVERSITY OF; CAMBRIDGE, UNIVERSITY OF.]

Unleavened Bread.—There was a great dispute in the Middle Ages between the Schoolmen and the Greeks as to what kind of bread should be used at the Eucharist; the Greeks called the Latins Azymites, for consecrating in azymus, i.e. unleavened bread; and the Latins charged the Greeks with deviating from the example of Christ and the practice of the ancient Church by using leavened bread. Our Saviour doubtless used unleavened bread when He celebrated His last supper, but it was at the time of the Passover, when none other was to be had; and from the following arguments it will be seen that the early Church always used common bread: [1] The elements were usually taken out of the oblations of the people, where doubtless common bread and wine were offered. [2] It is noted by Epiphanius, as a peculiar rule of the Ebionite heretics, that they celebrated in unleavened bread and water only, which argues that the Church did otherwise. [3] The ancients say expressly that their bread was common bread, such as they made for their own use upon other occasions. [4] The ancients are wholly silent as to the use of unleavened bread in the Church, but they many times spake of leavened bread, and sometimes the Eucharist is spoken of as fermentum, i.e. leaven. [5] It is observable that neither Photius nor any other Greek writer before Michael Cerularius, A.D. 1051, ever objected to the use of leavened bread in the Roman Church, which argues that the use of unleavened bread did not prevail till about that time, else there is no doubt that Photius would, among other things, have objected to this. These arguments put the matter beyond all dispute, that the Church for a thousand years used no other than common or leavened bread in the Eucharist, but how or exactly when the change was made it is not easy to determine. The first Common Prayer Book of Edward VI. enjoins that unleavened bread be used in the Holy Communion throughout the whole kingdom; it was ordered to be round, in imitation of the wafers used by the Greek and Roman Churches, but it was to be without all manner of print; (referring to the impression either of a crucifix or the Holy Lamb), and something more large and thicker than the wafers, which were the size of a penny. This rubric was set aside at the review of the Liturgy in the fifth year of Edward, and another inserted in its room, by which it was declared sufficient that the bread be such as is usually eaten at the table. By the injunctions of Queen Elizabeth wafer-bread seems to have been again enjoined, for among other orders this is one, "For the more reverence to be given to these holy mysteries, the sacramental bread [shall be] made and formed plain, without any figure thereupon, of the same fineness and fashion, round, though somewhat bigger in compass and thickness, as the usual bread and wafers, heretofore called singing-cakes, which served for the use of private mass."

In the Ritualistic controversy which has recently been going on, the restoration of unleavened bread was one of the points in dispute. A Rubric at the end of the Communion Service says, "It shall suffice that the Bread be such as is usual to be eaten." On the one side it is contended that the words "it shall suffice" leave it optional to use either; on the other, that ordinary bread is alone admissible according to the rubric. The Folkestone Judgment took the latter view as follows:—

"The only question on the construction of the rubric is that raised upon the words 'it shall suffice.'"

"There is no doubt that in many cases these words standing alone, and unexplained by a context, would be quite consistent with something different from, larger or smaller, more or less numerous, more or less costly, than what is mentioned, being supplied. Here, however, the sentence commences with the introduction, 'To take away all occasion of dissension and superstition, which any person hath or might have concerning the bread, it shall suffice,' etc. These words seem to their lordships to make it necessary that that which is to take away the occasion of dissension and superstition should be something definite, exact, and different from what had caused the dissension and superstition. If not, the occasion of dissension remains, and the superstition may recur. 'To suffice,' it must be as here described. What is substantially different will not 'suffice.'"

"The rubric, which orders that the bread and wine shall be provided by the curate and churchwardens at the charges of the parish, seems to contemplate ordinary bread as the only material to be used, and the Twentieth Canon is still more precise in the same direction.

"The former rubric (1552, 1559, and 1604) had said, 'It shall suffice that the bread be such as is usually to be eaten at the table with other meats, but the best and purest wheat bread that conveniently may be gotten.' Queen Elizabeth's Injunction of 1559 on the same subject (in its form mandatory, and acted upon many years afterwards) was issued when this rubric had the force of law, and must be understood in a sense consistent with, and not contradictory to it. That Injunction distinguishes between 'the sacramental bread' and 'the usual bread and wafer, heretofore named singing cakes, which served for the use of the private mass'; directing the former 'to be made and formed plain, without any figure thereupon, and of the same fineness and fashion round' as the latter, but 'to be somewhat bigger in compass and thickness.' The form, and not the substance, is here regulated. To order the use of the substance properly called 'wafer,' which was not 'bread such as is usual to be eaten at the table,' would have been directly contradictory to the rubric; and this cannot be supposed to have been intended." [FOLKESTONE RITUAL CASE.]

Urban.—There were eight Popes of this name: URBAN I. was chosen to succeed Calixtus I. in 226, and was behewed in 231 under the Emperor Alexander Severus.

URBAN II., called Odo or Eudes, was born at Châtillon-sur-Marne, and was a monk of Cluny. Pope Gregory VII. made him Cardinal and Bishop of Ostia. He was chosen Pope after Victor III. in 1088, the Church of Rome being then divided by the schism of the Anti-Pope Guibert, or Clement III. He excommunicated the Emperor Henry IV. and Clement III., but was at length compelled by their superior strength to fly from Rome; but on the revolt of Conrad against his father, the Emperor, in 1093, he was once more re-established in Rome. He ruled with great prudence. In 1095 a Council was held at Clermont, at which Urban made the famous speech which was the means of stirring up the Christians to undertake the first Crusade. He died at Rome in 1099.

URBAN III. was Archbishop of Milan, and was raised to the Popedom in 1185, in succession to Lucius III.

URBAN IV., the son of a cobbler at Troyes, was chosen Pope after Alexander IV., in 1261. He was Archdeacon of Liège, then Bishop of Verdun, and afterwards Patriarch of Jerusalem. Manfred, King of Sicily and head of the Ghibellines, sent troops to attack the Papal States. Urban published a crusade against him, and, with the help of Robert, Count of Flanders, defeated him and invited Charles, Count of Anjou and Provence, to come and receive the crowns of both Sicilies. Manfred, however, drove the Pope out of Rome, and he died at Perugia in 1264. He instituted the Feast of Corpus Christi in 1262.

URBAN V., a native of the diocese of Menda, was a Benedictine monk, and took his degree of Doctor in Canon Law and Divinity, which he taught at Montpellier and Avignon. He was then made Abbot of St. Victor of Marseilles, and in 1362 chosen Pope in succession to Innocent VI. He took up his residence at Avignon, and one of his first acts was to excommunicate Bernabo Visconti, the tyrant of Milan, who had seized some cities belonging to the Papal States, and having defeated him, Italy for a time enjoyed some peace. The Pope then went to reside at Rome in 1367, where he was received with acclamation; but the city was in a miserable condition, and the surrounding country a prey to incessant internal dissensions. These he tried, with the help of Joanna, Queen of Naples, to suppress; but, finding the task beyond his powers, he determined, in 1370, to return to Avignon, where he died almost immediately on his arrival.

URBAN VI., Pope from 1378-1389. An account of him will be found in the article PAPAL SCHISM [q.v.].

URBAN VII., a native of Rome, Cardinal of St. Marcel, and famous for his learning. He had held important posts under Paul IV., Pius IV., Pius V., Gregory XIII., and Sixtus V., and on the death of the latter, in 1590, was unanimously chosen to succeed him, but he died before his consecration.

URBAN VIII., Cardinal Maffeo Barberini, was chosen Pope in 1623, after Gregory XV. He was a native of Florence, and studied in Rome and Bologna under the Jesuits, and held various offices under several Popes. He aimed at the temporal rather than the spiritual prosperity of the Papacy; he was a lover of learning and a patron of learned men. In 1624 he concluded the wars about the Valtellina, which had become an intricate political question between the Courts of Rome, France, Spain, Austria, and Savoy; he declared that the Commonwealth of Venice was to be treated as a crowned head; in 1626 he re-annexed the Duchy of Urbino to the patrimony of the Church without the aid of arms; he also settled the dispute about the succession of the Duchy of Mantua. In his time began the long conflict known as the Thirty Years' War and also the earlier stages of the great Jansenist controversy. He supported Richelieu and France against Austria and Spain in a war which broke out in Italy in 1635. In 1642 the Papal State itself became the scene of petty warfare. The nephews of the Pope (the Barberini) persuaded their uncle to take military possession of the Duchy of Castro, then held by Odoardo Farnese, Duke of Parma; Farnese, aided by the Duke of Modena and the Republic of Venice, marched an army across the Papal frontier, and bore all before him, and in 1643 the Pope was obliged to give back Castro. The disappointment of his schemes is said to have hastened his death; he died in 1644. He composed some hymns and several pieces of Latin and Italian verse. He instituted a new order of Knights, The Conception of Our Lady, the first of which were Charles Gonzago, and Uladislav IV. of Poland. He canonised Ignatius Loyola and St. Philip Neri. In his pontificate happened the trial of GALILEO [q.v.], and also that of Centini, a nephew of Cardinal Centini of Ascoli, who joined with several dissatisfied men bent on destroying the Pontiff, and had recourse to magical arts to effect his purpose. He intended to murder Urban, and then to place his uncle, the Cardinal, on the Papal throne. The plot was, however, discovered, and as the judges themselves believed implicitly in the virtue of magic, the crime was made capital. Centini was beheaded, others of the conspirators were burned, and the rest were sent to the galleys. Urban founded the College of the Propaganda, enlarged the Quirinal Palace, and enriched the library of the Vatican.

Urbi et Orbi.—A phrase applied to Papal rescripts which, having been issued by proclamation in the Piazza of the Campo di Fiore, are affixed to the gates of the Vatican, and so published "to the city and the world."

Ursinus, ZACHARY.—One of the most eminent divines of the sixteenth century [b. at Breslau in Silesia, 1534; d. at Neustadt, 1583]. He was educated at Wittenberg, and here made the acquaintance of Melancthon, who entertained a great friendship for him, and took him to the Conference at Worms in 1557, from whence he went to Geneva and thence to Paris, in order to learn the French language and perfect himself in Hebrew under the famous Jean Mercier. On his return to Breslau he wrote Theses de Sacramentis de Baptismo et de Cœnâ Domini, in which he took the side of Calvin and Melancthon, but he so managed the subject of Cœnâ Domini that the leading party in the town accused him of being a Sacramentarian. He endeavoured to justify himself, but, not giving satisfaction, he chose rather to quit his country than continue a quarrel, and, his friend Melancthon being now dead, he went to Zürich, where he fraternised with Peter Martyr, Bullinger, etc. In 1561 he was invited by the University of Heidelberg to settle there in their "Collegium Sapientiæ," and they made him their Professor "Locorum Communium," a chair which he held till 1568. In 1564 Ursinus, with Olevianus, drew up the Palatinate or Heidelberg Catechism, and at the instance of the Elector, Frederick III., wrote a defence of it against the attacks of Flacius Illyricus and other rigid Lutherans. The Elector was accused of having set forth a doctrine concerning the Eucharist which the Augsburg Confession had condemned, so he ordered Ursinus to write a Tract explaining the Doctrine of the Sacraments. Ursinus was present at the Conference of Maulbronn, where he argued vigorously against the UBIQUITARIANS [q.v.]. On the death of Frederick III., in 1577, his son and successor, Lewis, would allow no minister to live in the Palatinate who was not a thorough Lutheran, so Ursinus had to leave Heidelberg for Neustadt, where he was made Divinity Professor in the Schola Illustris, newly founded by Prince Casimir, the second son of Frederick III. Here he died in 1583, in the forty-ninth year of his age.

Ursula, Sr.—Said to be a princess of Great Britain, who was martyred near Cologne with eleven thousand virgins, who accompanied her. Certainly some parts of the story are fabulous, but it is impossible to sift truth from legend with accuracy. The story accepted by Baronius is that Maximus, being proclaimed Emperor in 382 by his army in Britain, passed into Gaul to establish the power thus usurped against the Emperor Gratian. One of his commanders, called Conan, a British prince and a Christian, so signalled himself in this expedition that Maximus gave him, as a reward, the kingdom of Armorica or Little Brittany. Conan having established his residence at Nantes, sent deputies to demand Ursula in marriage from her father Dunnat, King of Cornwall, with as many young women as would bear her company and become the wives of the Britons who had accompanied him to Brittany. The ambassadors being well received, the princess and her companions took ship at London, but a storm carried them towards the Rhine. The Huns, who were on the side of Gratian, seeing that the ships were British, came down upon them and took them; and the women, being exhorted by St. Ursula to die rather than surrender their virtue, were barbarously massacred. This was in 383. It is not easy to say how many were killed; an historian of the eighth century says only that the number was very great; it is a writer of the twelfth century who affirms that 11,000 virgins were slain; and others say there were but eleven in all, which opinion they ground on ancient titles wherein the number is marked in Roman figures thus: xi. m. v., which, they say, means "eleven martyred virgins," and they add that the arms of the city of Cologne were eleven flambeaux, because, being besieged by the Swedes in 1205, these virgins presented themselves for its defence, each with a flambeau; while others say each flambeau represents a thousand. In Cologne there is still a church dedicated to the 11,000 virgins, where their skulls and various relics are shown.

Ursulines.—An Order of nuns founded originally by St. Angela of Brescia in 1537, and so called from St. URSULA [q. v.], to whom they were dedicated. At first they did not live in a community, but dwelt in their own homes, and were employed in acts of charity and compassion, such as visiting hospitals, nursing the sick, relieving the poor, and teaching the ignorant. In 1544 Paul III. confirmed their Order, and they were further approved in 1572 by Pope Gregory XIII. at the instance of Carlo Borromeo, who had brought some of them to Milan. Sixtus V. and Paul V. granted them new privileges, and in process of time they lived in nunneries and embraced the regular life. The first to do so were the Ursulines of Paris, who entered the cloister in 1614 under Madeline Lullier, a nun of St. Beuve. The foundress of the Ursulines in France was Frances de Bermond, who induced twenty-five young women of Avignon to embrace the rule of St. Angela of Brescia. The chief employment of the Ursulines, after their establishment into a regular Order, was to teach young women; their nunneries were chosen for the education of girls of the higher rank of life.

Use.—The different customs which prevailed in different dioceses with regard to ritual, specially the celebration of mass, are known as "uses." In former times bishops had the power of making what they considered improvements in their liturgies, and these customs or uses in time took the name of the diocese where each prevailed. The principal uses are those of York, Hereford, Sarum, Bangor, and Lincoln. The most remarkable is that of Sarum [Salisbury]. It was drawn up by Osmund, Bishop of Salisbury, about 1085; he rebuilt his cathedral and regulated the ecclesiastical offices of his diocese, and brought the service into such order that in time his book of offices was adopted in many parts of the kingdom. The uses of Hereford and York were adaptations of the Sarum Missal. To this day, in churches where the seasons are marked by the use of different colours, there is diversity, some following the Roman, others the Sarum use.

Ussher, JAMES, one of the greatest ornaments of the Irish Church, was born in Dublin in 1580. His father was a clerk in the Court of Chancery; his mother was daughter of James Stanihurst, three times Speaker of the Irish House of Commons, a man who had become prosperous and wealthy by conforming alternately to Romanism and Protestantism according as expediency seemed to point. It is no wonder that his daughter was of no deep convictions, and that her eminent son received no help from her in his religious guidance. But he had two old blind aunts who supplied the deficiency, for they were clever as well as pious. They carried his education to a certain point; beyond that he owed it to Trinity College, Dublin. James VI. of Scotland, while taking such steps as he could to secure his succession to the throne of Elizabeth, sent two eminent scholars to Ireland, James Fullerton and James Hamilton, with the object of starting a good school in Dublin, and at the same time creating an interest on behalf of James. Under them little Ussher was placed. His uncle, Henry Ussher, then Archdeacon of Dublin, was then busily engaged, by Queen Elizabeth's sanction, in founding Trinity College. He collected large funds, and the college was opened Jan. 9th, 1593. The first Provost was Walter Travers, who has obtained an unenviable notoriety as the opponent whom Hooker overthrew in controversy, but he was a learned as well as pious man. Among the first fellows were Hamilton and Fullerton already mentioned, and Daniel, afterwards Archbishop of Tuam, who translated the New Testament into Irish. To the new college Ussher was sent, now in his thirteenth year. He laboured hard at the learned tongues, but from the first his attention was given chiefly to history and chronology, and he drew up a chronology of Old Testament history as far as the Book of Kings, differing little from that which he put forth as the result of his maturer study. He was also led, through the faltering and conflicting views of his mother's family, to study the Roman controversy, and from his twentieth year, when he took his M.A. degree, to his thirty-eighth, his biographers tell us that no day passed without his studying the Fathers, from the Apostles' time down to the Schoolmen of the thirteenth century. But he had already made his mark as an active controversialist. In his nineteenth year he accepted the challenge of a Jesuit, Fitz-Symonds, to a public disputation, and is said to have completely discomfited him. In due course he was ordained, and at once made his mark as a preacher, and before long was appointed Professor of Divinity in the University. Some officers in the army subscribed a very large sum for a present of books to the University, and Ussher was appointed, with a Dr. Challoner, whose only child, Phoebe, he afterwards married, to administer it. This led to his first visit to England, which from that time he repeated every third year, spending three months, one in Oxford, one in Cambridge, and one in London. Archbishop Loftus appointed him to a stall in the Cathedral which involved the pastoral care of the parish of Finglas, and whilst he pursued his learned studies, he was always once on Sunday in his parish pulpit. His work in drawing up the Irish articles in 1615 has been spoken of elsewhere. [IRELAND, CHURCH OF.]

During one of his visits to England, Ussher, who had been warmly recommended to King James by the Irish Government, had an interview with him, and the King was so impressed with him that, the Bishopric of Meath falling vacant, he appointed him in 1620. He is said to have shown himself powerful there in converting the Roman Catholics to Protestantism, and he published a tract on the religion of the ancient Irish to show how unlike it was to Romanism. In 1624 he was appointed to the Primacy of Ireland, the Archbishopric of Armagh. Not long after he converted the famous Earl of Peterborough to his faith.

The troubles between Charles I. and his Parliament brought heavy calamities on Ussher. He fearlessly urged Charles I. not to yield to the popular clamour by signing the warrant for Strafford's death, and when the unhappy King gave way Ussher was with Strafford to the very end. The Irish rebellion of 1641 laid the country waste; Ussher's house was plundered—only his books were saved to him. They were sent to him in England. His income was gone; he was even for a while left in want. He was with the King at Oxford in 1642, and his preaching is said to have been most moving. When the King had to leave Oxford, Ussher took refuge at Cardiff, until Lady Peterborough, in gratitude for the service he had done her, invited him to London. Some of the gentry round Cardiff subscribed for the money to convey him there, and sometimes at the London house of the Peterborough family, sometimes at their country residence at Reigate, he spent the rest of his life. He was studious as ever, and for eight years held the office of Preacher at Lincoln's Inn, but was at length compelled by bodily infirmity to resign. He still remained loyal to the unfortunate Charles, visiting him in the Isle of Wight, where he attempted to mediate between him and the Parliamentary Commissioners as to Church government. He proposed that the bishops should still be continued, but should not have independent authority, but should act in conjunction with their presbytery, that the archbishops should be moderators of provincial, and bishops of diocesan synods, and that the important business of provinces and dioceses should be transacted in these assemblies; but that nothing should be done against the direct will of the bishop. This has often been referred to as affording a possible means of uniting Episcopal and Presbyterian discipline. The Parliament were much inclined to it, but their power was gone; it had passed into the hands of Cromwell and his army.

Ussher laboured to the last. The day before his death he spent several hours in his study, then visited a sick person, discoursing, says his biographer, "for near an hour in so heavenly a manner as if, like Moses on Mount Pisgah, he had then a prospect of the celestial Canaan." He died in 1656, and by Cromwell's command was buried in Westminster Abbey, the Church Burial Service being allowed for the occasion.

His learning seems to have been amazing, especially in historical subjects. His chronology of the Scriptures, though modified by later discoveries, is still known as the "Received Chronology" which we have in our reference Bibles. His Antiquities of the British Churches, Treatise on the Religion of the Ancient British and Irish, Answer to a Jesuit, are all works of sterling value. He also wrote on the epistles of Polycarp and Ignatius, on the Samaritan Pentateuch, on the Septuagint, on the ancient civil laws of Ireland. His greatest work, Bibliotheca Theologica, a digest of the works of the Fathers, he did not live to publish.

Usury.—A contract for the loan of money to be returned again with interest. By the laws of Moses the Israelites were forbidden to take usury from their brethren upon the loan of money, victuals, or anything else [Ex. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36; Deut. xxiii. 19], though they might do so from strangers [Deut. xxiii. 20]. This latter permission, as Michaelis observes, is a proof that the Law of Moses did not condemn the borrowing at interest as bad in itself; but because the Israelites were now poor, and strangers to commerce, borrowing at that stage of their life would be not for the purpose of raising capital wherewith to traffic, but from poverty, and in order to procure the common necessities of life. It would therefore have been a hardship to have exacted from such borrowers more than was lent. That later in Jewish history Usury among the Jews was practised, we have clear proofs [Ps. xv. 5; Prov. xxviii. 8; Isaiah xxiv. 2; Jer. xv. 10]. On the return from the Captivity, Nehemiah called on them to "leave off this usury" [Neh. v. 7, 10, 11]. Our Saviour denounced extortion and promulgated a law of love and forbearance. [Luke vi. 30, 35.]

The practice of exacting an exorbitant rate of interest for the loan of money is condemned by the universal conscience of mankind, and many laws have been made to check it. The first prohibition in England was made in the days of Edward the Confessor, but that law appears to have become obsolete, for in 1126 usury was forbidden only to the clergy, and in 1138 it was decreed by the Council that "such of the clergy as were usurers and hunters after sordid gain and for the public employment of the laity ought to be degraded." In 1199 the rate of interest for money was restricted to 10 per cent., and this continued to be the market rate until the reign of Henry VIII. In 1311 Philip IV. fixed the interest that might be exacted in the fairs of Champagne at 20 per cent. James I. of Arragon, in 1242, fixed it at 18 per cent. In 1490 the rate of interest in Placentia was 40 per cent. Charles V. fixed the rate of interest in his dominions at 12 per cent. In 1546 the rate in England was fixed at 10 per cent.; in 1624 it was reduced to 8, in 1661 to 6, and in 1714 to 5.

In the early Christian Church the Fathers were strongly opposed to the system of lending money on interest; Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, Jerome, may all be quoted against it. But as the laws of States and of political economy changed, it became evident that commerce could not be carried on without a rate of interest, and it was acknowledged by casuists that there were just grounds why a moderate rate might be exacted. Such were the risk to the lender, and the loss to which he is put by the want of the capital by which he might have traded. Luther took the ground which had been taken by the early Fathers, and condemned the whole principle; and in modern days Mr. Ruskin has taken the same ground with much heat and vigour. Calvin, however, drew the distinction which is ever since admitted between fair and exorbitant interest. The latter he called "usury." Under such a head would rightly be classed interest which is unjust, because it is not justified by risk to the lender nor by advantage to the borrower, and exorbitant money which is exacted from the borrower because he is in extremity of need and has no choice. In the Roman Church considerable debate has been held from time to time on the lawfulness of usury, and in theory it is so forbidden under certain conditions that abolution is refused to receivers of it. But in 1830 the Congregation of the Holy Office, with the sanction of Pope Pius VIII., decided that they who take interest on the ground that the law has fixed it are not to be disturbed. And this is generally accepted. Even the law which forbids the clergy to take interest is practically in abeyance. "The ancient world," says a Roman Catholic writer, "believed that money was barren, and the schoolmen inherited this principle from Aristotle. Experience proves that money produces fruit and multiples of itself, and a man may justly take 5 per cent. for money which is well worth that to the merchant, bank, railway company, etc., who receive the loan." By the English law bills of exchange and contracts for loans above £10 are not affected by the laws against usury. Five per cent. is left as the legal rate of interest for money, unless proof is forthcoming that any different rate was agreed upon between the parties.

Vagantes.—This name was used in ecclesiastical law for clergy who were ordained without having been nominated to any office. Laws against such clergy were made as early as the fourth and fifth centuries, and the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451] forbade a bishop to ordain any who had no office. Often the Vagantes obtained ordination by simony, paying for it by doing work for those who ordained them. These were complained of in the Carolingian period, and laws were enacted against them by Charles the Great. Many bishops also wrote against them. At length it was enacted that a bishop should support all whom he ordained without an office, which effectually put a stop to it. This was adopted by the Roman Church at the Council of Trent. Ordination without office is also forbidden in the English Church.

Valentine, Sr.—One of the black-letter Saints in the English Prayer Book, whose name is celebrated on Feb. 14. During the persecution at Rome under Claudius II., he was very zealous in his attention to those condemned to martyrdom, and was in consequence arrested and at last sentenced to death. He was beheaded at Rome about the year 270. A church on the Ponte Mole at Rome was built by Pope Julius I. to his memory. "In our calendar," says Bishop Barry, "he is called a bishop, but this is probably an error." The habit of "choosing valentines" seems to have been a pagan custom, probably connected with the season of the year, and associated by pure accident with the Christian festival.

Valentinus, Sr.—One of the Christian preachers who in the fifth century went forth to labour in those countries where Arianism had taken strong hold on the minds of the people. We first hear of him in 440, when he appeared at Vindelicia, an important fort on the shore of the Danube. He managed, with the help of the few followers he had attracted, to build a rough church in the Tyrol. He spent his time in preaching to and advising all those who came to him, and found at last that his influence was making itself felt. He was joined by other disciples, among whom was SEVERINUS [q.v.]. He is said to have been Bishop of Passau.

Valentinus was an Egyptian heresiarch, who flourished under the Emperor Antoninus Pius. It is said that he quitted the Church because another man was preferred to a bishopric which he had hoped to gain. He afterwards visited Rome and abjured his errors, but soon relapsed. He died about A.D. 260.

The religious system of Valentinus was extremely fanciful. He taught that there was one eternal and supreme Deity, Bythos, the Abyss or Unfathomable One, who, after dwelling with Sige, or Silence, for numberless ages, manifested himself by sending forth a number of Æons. These Æons, whom he represented as male and female, were the personified attributes of the Supreme Deity, each being the revelation of some quality of Bythos. They were developed in pairs, of which the first were Nous, or Intelligence, and Aletheia, or Truth. From these sprang another pair, and from them again another. These six, with Bythos and Sige, formed the Ogdoad. From the Ogdoad were produced twenty-two other Æons, and the whole thirty constituted the Pleroma, or Fulness of the Deity.

The Æons decreased in rank and knowledge, and increased in imperfection in proportion to the distance of their descent from Bythos. Nous alone possessed a perfect knowledge of the Supreme One, and the burning desire of the inferior Æons to obtain this knowledge led to a Fall even within the limits of the Pleroma. To restore order Nous produced Christ and the Holy Ghost, who spread the knowledge of Bythos among the other Æons, and re-established peace.

During the struggle in the celestial world, Achamoth was born of Sophia, the last and most discontented of the Æons. Achamoth, being too imperfect to be received into the Pleroma, was cast out into Chaos, and there produced the Demiurge, or Creator, and elements of three kinds—viz. spiritual, animal, and material. Out of the elements the Demiurge constructed six regions, with six intelligences to govern them, in imitation of the celestial world, while he himself with Achamoth and the six intelligences constituted an Ogdoad, a distant imitation of the Ogdoad of the Pleroma. Man was formed by the Creator in His own image, without the spiritual element. This element was supplied by Achamoth without His knowledge, and, soon becoming apparent, roused the jealousy of the Demiurge, who forbade man to taste of the tree of knowledge, and expelled him from the intermediate region to this terrestrial world for disobeying His command.

Man growing degenerate, redemption became necessary, and the Æons combined to provide a Redeemer, each contributing something to produce the Æon Jesus, who was to be to mankind what Christ was to the Pleroma. Jesus was only apparently born of the Virgin Mary, and hence had nothing material about Him, but was formed of the spiritual and animal elements alone. The Christ of the Pleroma descended on Him at His Baptism, and left Him before the Crucifixion.

Valentinus held that men were of three classes, corresponding to the three kinds of elements—spiritual, animal, and material. The spiritual, no matter what lives they might lead, were to be united with Christ, as Jesus was, and finally received into the Pleroma; the animal men could not aspire so high, though they might, if they lived virtuously, be translated to happiness in the region of the Demiurge, but those of them who lived wickedly were to be included with the material men; these last were doomed to inevitable annihilation, however virtuously they might live.

Valentinus received the Scriptures, but interpreted them in his own way. He acknowledged as canonical many apocryphal writings which could be made to support his views. His works have not come down to us, but an account of his system is given by Irenæus.

The sect of the Valentinians spread widely. Their doctrine of the infallible salvation of spiritual men led many of them to practise all kinds of immoralities, which were doubtless the foundation for many of the charges against the early Christians.

Valerian, PERSECUTION OF.—Valerian began to rule in A.D. 253. His reign opened very auspiciously for the Church; there were many Christians in the Emperor's household, so that it was even compared to a Church of God. But in the year 257 there was a sudden change. The Christians attributed this to the influence of Macrianus, an Egyptian philosopher, who was accustomed to kill new-born infants for the purpose of drawing auguries from the inspection of their entrails, and who hated the Christians for their opposition to his infamous practices. But, whatever may have been the cause, Valerian issued an edict, addressed to the Proconsul of Africa [1] commanding the bishops and presbyters to adopt the State religion, under pain of exile; [2] forbidding private meetings of any sort, and especially the customary meetings in the cemeteries at the graves of martyrs. The punishment of death was not expressly mentioned, but it was frequently inferred. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, and Dionysius of Alexandria, were amongst those who were affected by this edict. They were both banished, but were still able to address the crowds who flocked to hear them, and continued the work of conversion with great zeal.

The first edict failing to produce the desired effect, a second and severer rescript was published. By it [1] bishops, priests, and deacons were to be put to immediate death; [2] Senators and Roman knights were to be degraded, their property confiscated, and if they refused to recant, to be beheaded; [3] matrons were to be banished and have their property confiscated; [4] Cæsariani, or members of the imperial household, were to be sent to work as slaves on the Emperor's property. The first victim was Sixtus, or Xystus, Bishop of Rome. [SIXTUS, Str.] He was executed on Aug. 6th, and was followed, three days afterwards, by the deacon Laurentius, who was broiled to death on a huge gridiron. Cyprian was also martyred, but Dionysius escaped. Another victim was the child Cyril, at Cassarea, disowned by his heathen father for becoming a Christian; he was led before the Governor, and after withstanding all efforts to make him deny Christ, he was put to death.

The persecution continued for three years and a half, and a considerable number of Christians suffered. It was terminated in 260 by the capture of Valerian by the Persians.

Various Readings.—We have shown in previous articles how the variations in the manuscript copies of the Scriptures have caused difficulties in the way of ascertaining the very words of the original authors in certain places. The method of treatment of the variations constitutes the work of critical investigation.

Evidence for the sacred text is of two kinds, called External and Internal. The external evidence is that of the manuscripts, and the work of weighing probabilities in the case of variations calls for the highest critical acumen as well as for delicacy of perception. Thus it is evident that a mere preponderance of numbers will not settle a doubtful question; the majority may be copied from one faulty one, and so be valueless. But if it be found that the most ancient copies be in harmony in a given text with quotations in the writings of early fathers, and with ancient translations, that constitutes a strong presumption in favour of that text. Again, if copies belonging to one region be found in agreement with those in a far-distant one, so that it is clear they are not transcripts of each other, this is evidence in favour of that reading. Where ancient copies differ, that furnishes probable evidence that they may all be attempts at correcting some earlier corruption of the text. But on the whole we may say of external evidence that the most ancient manuscripts demand the greatest respect.

Internal evidence turns upon critical examination of MSS. and the proofs to be discovered by their relative value. Thus Griesbach lays down the general canon that "a shorter reading is to be preferred to a longer," on the ground that transcribers have a knack of adding notes and glosses which they find on their copies from a fear lest anything should be lost. But such a rule cannot be accepted as always good. A transcriber in copying may be misled by the catch of a word and accidentally omit a phrase. It was on the same principle that Bengel held that where readings differ, if one is easier and the other more difficult, the probabilities are in favour of the latter, on the ground that transcribers coming upon something which they did not understand, could not keep their hands off it, but altered it to what seemed to them the better sense. Here is a case in point. 1 Cor. xi. 29 in the A.V. reads: "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body." But all the best MSS. are without the word "unworthily." It is evident that the word was inserted by some one who found a difficulty in what he would regard as too broad a statement. But the mistake was his own, for the true translation is: "He that eateth and drinketh, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, unless he discern the Body [me diakrino to soma]." See further on this subject in Mr. C. E. Hammond's very interesting and lucid little volume, Outlines of Textual Criticism of the New Testament [Clarendon Press], pp. 87-92.

We give from the same volume a few of the most important variations of the New Testament text. In 1 John v. 7-8 the Authorised Version reads: "And there are three that bear record in Heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness on earth, the spirit, and the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one." But the words in italics are not found in any Greek MS. older than the fifteenth century; and though many of the Latin versions have the words, even the best of these omit it. All critics, therefore, have come to the conclusion that the words are not genuine.

Much controversy has been spent upon the last chapter of St. Mark's Gospel, verses 9-20. Some ancient MSS. omit these verses, and it is undoubted that the style is unlike the rest of the Gospel. The Dean of Chichester, Dr. Burgon, has written a volume on this subject full of learning and of keen critical power, and has gone a great way towards establishing the genuineness.

The narrative of the woman taken in adultery [John vii. 53-viii. 11] is absent from most of the ancient MSS., and the general conclusion is that it is an authentic history preserved by the tradition of the Church, but not part of the original Gospel of St. John.

In John v. these words—waiting for the moving of the water, for an angel went down at a certain season into the pool and troubled the water: whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had—are not in most of the old MSS. The Revised Version omits them, but places them in the margin.

In Acts xx. 28, "the flock of God which He hath purchased with His own blood," there are several variations—"the flock of the Lord," "the flock of Christ." The Revisers have probably done well to retain the received version.

Acts xi. 20.—The Authorised Version reads "spake unto the Grecians;" the Revisers have "unto the Greeks." The MS. authority is evenly balanced, but the ancient versions and the general context favour the latter reading. The point is an interesting one, for the reason that if "Greeks" be the right reading, we must conclude that the persecution which followed St. Stephen's death led to the preaching to heathens, very possibly in anticipation of St. Peter's conversion of Cornelius. [See note in Bishop Ellicott's Commentary.]

1 Tim. iii. 16: "God was manifest." The Revised Version reads "He who was manifest," and the margin gives a third reading, "which was manifested." The variation will be understood if we give the Greek equivalent. $\Theta\Xi$ stands for Theos, "God;" $\text{O}\zeta$ for hos, "He who;" and O for "which." For the first of these readings there is no manuscript authority older than the ninth century, and only one ancient version—namely, the Slavonic. Therefore the probability is against this reading. Between the other two there is great difficulty. The Latin version favours the neuter, the Gothic the masculine. The masculine is the more difficult, because there is no clearly expressed antecedent, and for that reason is to be preferred. Moreover, $\text{O}\zeta$ is more likely than O to be changed into $\Theta\Xi$. The Revisers, therefore, have adopted the most probable reading for their textual authority.

Vatican, PALACE OF THE.—The residence of the Pope, called by this name, is the largest palace of modern Rome, and takes its name from the Vatican Hill upon which it stands. It is an irregular group of buildings, containing twenty-two courtyards and an immense number of rooms, estimated at from 4,500 to 16,000, and built at different periods. An Etruscan temple is said to have stood on the site, which gave rise to the name Vatican, from vates, "a prophet." The first palace of the Vatican is reported to have been built by Symmachus about the beginning of the sixth century, and to have been occupied by Charlemagne during his residence in Rome: it was rebuilt and enlarged in the twelfth century. It was first used as the Papal residence after the healing of the great schism, as being convenient from its nearness to the castle of St. Angelo; the two buildings were connected by Pope John XXIII., and the palace was enlarged and beautified from time to time by his successors. Nicolas V. [1447-1456] began the "Tor di Borgia," which was completed by Alexander VI. [1492-1503]; the Sistine Chapel was built in 1473, and the Belvedere, formerly a garden-house, in 1490. The part now used as the Pope's residence was finished at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The Sistine Chapel is adorned on the walls and ceiling by the famous frescoes of Michael Angelo, and the stanzes and loggias are ornamented with paintings by Raphael. The Vatican contains other very famous paintings by Raphael, Titian, Domenichino, etc., but they are few in number. The Vatican Library is the finest in the world, containing nearly 25,000 MSS. and about 50,000 volumes. The most valuable of the MSS. is the Codex Vaticanus, which reaches back to the fourth century, and is a little older than the Codex Sinaiticus. It contains the LXX. version of the Old Testament with very few omissions, and all the New Testament as far as Hebrews ix. 14.

Vatican Council.—The last General Council of the Roman Church. It was convened by Pope Pius IX. by an Encyclical Letter, June 26th, 1868, to discuss Papal Infallibility and to condemn Rationalism and Liberalism. The Council was opened Dec. 5th, 1869. There were 719 members present, the numbers afterwards rising to 764—the largest number that has been reached since the Second Lateran Council of 1139. "All bishops of the Churches of Oriental rite not in communion with the Apostolic See," and all "Protestants and Non-Catholics" were invited to attend, in order, as Cardinal Manning says, that they might be referred to "experienced men" and have their difficulties solved. The Council was prorogued on Oct. 20th, 1870, in consequence of the Franco-German War, and is not yet completed, as it may be reconvened at any time by the Pope.

The chief work which has been completed consists of two Constitutions. The first, De Fide Catholica; or, Decrees on the Dogmatic Constitution of the Catholic Faith, contains the primary truths of natural religion, on revelation, faith, and the relation between faith and reason, and is directed against modern pantheism, atheism, materialism, etc. The opening clauses hint that Protestantism is responsible for modern infidelity, which was strongly denied by Bishop Strosmayer from the Turkish frontier. But the Constitution was unanimously accepted by the 667 Fathers present, and confirmed by the Pope at the third public session on April 24th, 1870.

The second Constitution was far more important, being De Ecclesia Christi; or, Decrees on the Dogmatic Constitution of the Church of Christ, which discusses the absolutism and infallibility of the Roman See over all Christians. Nothing had been said openly of such a question before the Council began, but the subject was mentioned at the end of 1869. In 1870 the discussion was objected to by 135 Bishops, and Dr. Dollinger and others outside the Council who objected, formed themselves into a separate body of resistance, but were excommunicated. They assumed the name of OLD CATHOLICS [q.v.]. The Constitution was laid before the Council early in May, and was first voted upon in general congregation on July 13th, when 451 Fathers agreed, 62 were ready to accept it subject to alterations, 88 refused, and 70 did not vote at all. It was again read on July 18th, when several who disapproved absented themselves, and it passed with only two dissenting votes, and was confirmed by Papal authority. For the contents of this decree see INFALLIBILITY.

Vaudois, CHURCH OF. [WALDENSES.]

Vaughan, HENRY, was born at Newton St. Bridget in Wales in 1621, and died there in 1695. When nearly seventeen he entered Jesus College, Oxford, where he remained for two years. He wrote much poetry when at one of the Inns of Court in London, and after studying physic became a doctor of eminence in his native place. His life passed quietly and happily there, while so many of his friends were suffering, in those troubled times, much anxiety, if not real privations. In his Olor Icanus we find frequent invitations to his friends to partake of his rustic pleasures. His poetry deserves more praise than has fallen to its share, as it shows much originality, though there are places where he certainly imitates George Herbert.

Vaughan, ROBERT, D.D., a Congregational minister [b. in Wales, 1795; d. at Torquay, 1868], studied for the ministry at Bristol, devoting himself also especially to the study of history. In 1819 he became a minister in the Congregational Church, and took charge of a church at Worcester, which he held for six years. He then became minister of an Independent Chapel at Kensington, and Professor of History at the London University, which had then been recently founded; and in 1843 he was chosen President of the Independent College of Lancashire. He there made himself exceedingly popular as a preacher, and still more so as a lecturer in the college and a speaker at political meetings in Manchester, near which place the college is situated. In 1857 he resigned this post and took a small charge at Uxbridge, whence he removed to St. John's Wood, and finally to Torquay as pastor of a newly-formed Independent congregation. In 1865 he went to America on a mission from the Congregational Union, of which he was President. His chief works are: The Life and Opinions of John de Wycliffe, D.D. [1828], a Monograph; with some account of the Wycliffe MSS. [1853]; A History of England under the House of Stuart; The Causes of the Corruption of Christianity; Congregationalism, and other pamphlets.

Vedas. [BRAHMINISM.]

Veil, CHALICE.—The veil used to cover the chalice during the Communion Service. In some Churches it is pure white, and in others of various colours, according to the particular day or festival.

Veil, TAKING THE.—The ceremony by which a woman is received into a nunnery. When entering upon her year's novitiate she takes the white veil, and if she is considered fit for the full profession she takes the black veil and makes her irrevocable vows of chastity and obedience. The veil is blessed by the bishop with prayers, and placed upon the woman's head as a type of the holiness and humility with which she is henceforth to be clothed; for three days the veil is worn so as entirely to cover the face, and is lifted on the third day by the abbess, from which time the nun is of the same rank as the others of the convent.

Venial Sin is defined in the Roman Church to be a disease of the soul, not its death. It does not annihilate the friendship of the soul with God, but there is grace left to repair the sin. Some sins, though mortal in their nature, are held to be venial if not done deliberately, and if the amount of harm done is small, e.g. in the case of small theft. On the other hand it is held that circumstances may make sins generally counted venial become mortal. There are two classes of venial sins, deliberate and indeliberate. But the Roman casuists speak with much caution on this subject, and declare that the distinction between grave and light sins in many cases must rest solely on the judgment of God, and cannot be judged of by man. [MORTAL SIN.]

Veni, Creator Spiritus.—An ancient hymn generally supposed to be the composition of St. Ambrose, but more probably by Rabanus Maurus, poet to Charlemagne, in use in the Church at Whitsuntide from early times. From the year 1100 it has formed a part of the service for the consecration of bishops, and some hundred years or so later was inserted in that for the ordination of priests. It was translated as it stands in our Prayer Book in King Edward VI.'s reign. The Lutheran Church has also adopted it very generally for services at certain stated times.

Venite, exultemus.—The heading of the 95th Psalm, which opens the second part of Morning Prayer—that of praise. It has also been called, from the spirit that runs all through it, the Invitatory Psalm. Its fitness for its position was recognised as early as the days of Chrysostom, for then, every day after penitent confession, the 95th Psalm was sung. In the English Church it is ordered by the rubric to be sung every day, except Easter Day and on the 19th day of the month, when it comes in the regular course of the Psalms.

Venn, HENRY [b. at Barnes, Surrey, in 1724; d. 1797].—A leader in the Evangelical movement of the last century. He was educated at Cambridge. After his ordination he held several curacies, and was Vicar of Huddersfield, and afterwards of Yelling in Huntingdonshire, where he died. During the first years of his ministry he had a hard battle to fight against the indifference shown by all classes to religion; but he worked untiringly, and afterwards, in conjunction with Whitfield, one of his nearest friends, was among the chief movers in the Evangelical revival. The improvement wrought by him, especially in the town of Huddersfield, was most striking. He wrote The Complete Duty of Man, to counteract the effect of the Whole Duty of Man, which he and Whitfield held to be too formal. His children's children bore an honoured name in the Church.

Verger.—Supposed to be derived from the Latin word virga, "a twig." The name is given to the officers of the cathedral who carry the mace, or virge, before the clerical dignitaries.

Veronica, Sr.—A legendary saint whose story was from very early times introduced into that of our Lord's Passion, but has been rejected since the eleventh century. It is said that, as our Saviour passed by on His way to Calvary, bearing the cross, a woman was moved with compassion, and stepped forward and wiped the blood and sweat from His face with her veil; after which, she discovered the impression of His face remaining upon the linen. The portrait was called vera icon, "the true image," and in course of time the name, altered to Veronica, was transferred to the woman herself. Stories were afterwards invented concerning her life: some said she was the daughter of King Herod, and was converted from the love of the world to the love of Christ by witnessing His sufferings; while others identify her with the woman who had been healed of an issue of blood. The cloth with the miraculous image is said to be preserved at St. Peter's at Rome, and is exhibited among its relics; but other images, each declared to be the vera icon, are exhibited at different places.

Verse.—A term applied in Church music to that part of an anthem, or hymn, which is sung as a solo, or by a part of the choir only; to distinguish it from those parts which are sung as a full chorus by the whole choir.

Versicles.—Short sentences occurring in various parts of the Prayer Book, appointed to be said by priest and people alternately; as, for example:

Mn.: O Lord, shew Thy mercy upon us.
People: And grant us Thy salvation.

Very God of Very God.—The word "very" in theological language signifies "real," "true," "indisputable." Thus in the second Article Our Lord is called "The Very and Eternal God," and in the Athanasian Creed "Very God and Very Man." And Latimer says, "Believe steadfastly that He was a very natural man, sin only excepted." The doctrine expressed in the phrase of the Nicene Creed is that Our Lord is Himself perfect God, and is begotten of perfect God, the word "of" not expressing the possessive case nor a mere superlative like "heart of hearts," but signifying "out of" or "from."

Vesperale.—The book which contains the vesper services.

Vespers.—One of the CANONICAL HOURS [q.v.].

Vestments.—There have been two theories as to the origin of Christian vestments: one is, that they are derived from those used by the Jewish priests; the other, that they have their origin in the ordinary dress worn in early Christian times. The first view is now seldom accepted. Some of the chief Jewish garments were not known in the Christian Church. Thus no distinctive head-dress was worn for the first thousand years, and the girdle was not known till the eighth century. On the other hand, the chasuble, the chief Christian vestment, was unknown among the Jews. Also their garments were of many different colours, while in the primitive Christian Church white only was worn. The second view seems much more tenable. The three vestments mentioned at the Fourth Council of Toledo [633] seem to have been the alb, planeta or plenaia, and orarium or stole: the first of which is the tunic, the under-garment worn by the Romans; the second, toga or over-garment; and the orarium or stole was a garment worn by Roman matrons. From these garments the ecclesiastical vestments of the Eastern and Western Churches were developed. The chief vestments worn in the Greek Church are: the sticharion, so called from its black lines [stoichos], which answers to the Latin alb, and is always white; the phelanon, the chief garment of the priest, resembling a chasuble, which is of various colours; and the epigonation, a square pouch or satchel richly embroidered. The bishops instead of the phelanon wear the saccos, a garment with sleeves, resembling the dalmatic, and the omophorion or pallium, and over the saccos the mantia, a loose blue or black garment ornamented with stripes. They wear a mitre in the sanctuary, a panagia or pectoral cross, and carry the paterissa or pastoral staff, which is shorter and less ornamented than that of the Western Church.

The chief ornaments of the Roman Church are the alb, which is white, made of linen, held by the cingulum or belt, which was formerly a broad sash, but now is very narrow; the chasuble or casula, which formerly resembled the Roman toga. These are white for greater and red for lesser festivals, and black for Lent, etc. Also the manipuleum, like the Greek orarium, and the biretta. The bishops wear the mitre, tiara, and pallium.

These garments are chiefly worn at the celebration of the Mass, so at the Reformation they were all discarded, and the plain black cassock adopted. For the use of vestments in the English Church see ORNAMENTS RUBRIC; RITUALISM.

Vestry.—In its first meaning the word "vestry" is applied to the room attached to the church in which the clergy robe, and where the various articles in use during the service are kept. In consequence of the meetings being generally held in this room it has also come to mean the assembling together of the ministers of the parish, the churchwardens, and the parishioners, for electing churchwardens and settling various other affairs. The minister, be he rector, vicar, or perpetual curate, has the right of presiding over these meetings. The general custom is for him to choose one churchwarden, and let the vestry choose the other; but in some parishes the vestry has the right of electing both. Every ratepayer in the parish is qualified to vote, residence not being necessary. The notices of the meetings are given by the churchwardens, and must by law be so given at least four days before that appointed for the meeting. The president is bound to consult the vestry before he makes any alteration in the structure of the building, and it has the power of making small bye-laws for the regulation of order in the parish.

Veto Act.—Passed by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, May 31st, 1834; it enacted that no pastor should be intruded on a congregation against the will of the people, and that if a minister was appointed who was disapproved by the greater number of the congregation, he should be rejected by the presbytery, provided it could be shown that the disapproval was for legitimate reasons. This Act led to the disruption in 1843, and the foundation of the FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND [q.v.].

Vianney, JEAN BAPTISTE MARIE, better known as the "Curé d'Ars" [b. 1786, d. 1856], was the son of a peasant of Dardilly, near Lyons. Displaying unmistakable signs of early piety, he was taken by a neighbouring curé to live at his presbytery, and was trained for orders. But though extremely good, those who had opportunities of watching him judged him so "simple" that they doubted whether he could ever pass the needful examination. In 1809 he was seized for a soldier by the Conscription, and but for an illness might have perished in the Russian Campaign, as his brother did, who went as his substitute. At last he was admitted to orders, "more for his devotedness than his capacity," and in February, 1818, was made Curé of Ars, and remained so for more than forty years, thereby converting an obscure village, remote from great towns, and almost devoid of roads, into one of the best known places in France.

Very early he obtained a great reputation for sanctity by the passion with which he devoted himself to his duties, and by his life of incessant labour and severity. A miraculous incident attributed to him of the multiplication of corn in the granaries of the Sisters of Providence spread his fame still wider, and from 1834 onwards a regular line of eight or ten coaches a day ran from Lyons to Ars, a distance of twenty miles, to convey pilgrims. The Government were compelled to put the roads into good order, and when railways were at length established special privileges were granted to the Ars pilgrims. For the behoof of these pilgrims he entered the confessional before daybreak, and did not leave it till midnight, except to say his daily mass, give a short "instruction," and eat his simple meal. Crowds used to stay all night in the Church in order to be heard at three or four o'clock in the morning. An eye-witness states that on his visit he found that the Curé retired to rest at eleven at night, and was in his Confessional again at one in the morning. "I saw the old man come from the Confessional in a battered soutane and coarse surplice. His leanness was excessive. His face the shape of a heart, triangular from the cheeks to the chin, with large eyes, and a diadem of white hair. He tottered under the pressure of the crowd who came eagerly forward to touch him. I do not think I ever heard him pronounce the name of God without his voice being interrupted and broken by his tears."

A movement almost immediately followed his death to procure his canonisation, it being asserted that miracles were being wrought at his tomb. "Putting these aside," says a Protestant writer, "there remains abundant matter, free from all doubt and cavil, to command our admiration, and almost awe, in such an existence passed among ourselves in the middle of the nineteenth century. Forty years of such labours, devotion, privations, fervent sanctity, and holiness of life passed in determined and voluntary obscurity; and total forgetfulness of everything that is worldly, sensual, or selfish, is surely an example well worth dwelling on and considering, were it only for its startling contrast with everything around it. When considered as apart from a system, and as an individual fact, it is certainly a bright example, worthy of the deepest admiration and respect. It may very possibly be mixed up with much one might wish away from it; there may be some weak points visible in the confessor himself, and far more among those who often, it may be conjectured, from vain, morbid, restless, or even merely inquisitive feelings, flocked to him. But the great fact of the pious, devoted, humble, and self-denying life stands out boldly far above all suspicions, which in truth one is ashamed to dwell on in such a case, and leaves the obscure Curé of Ars a true saint of these latter days, in the best and highest signification of the term—a saint of whom any Church may well be proud, and of the like of whom no true Church can pretend to be above desiring to be the mother."

Viaticum.—The provision made for a journey. The term was applied in the early Church to Baptism and the Holy Communion, "because," says Bingham, "they were equally esteemed men's necessary provision and proper armour, both to sustain and conduct them safely on their way in their passage through this world to eternal life." The term was afterwards confined to the Eucharist given to a person in immediate danger of death, and in that sense it is used several times in the canons of the Nicene Council.

Vicar, derived from vicarius, meaning representative or vicegerent. In England the name is applied to the parish priest of a particular standing; he is called the rector if he owns all the tithes of the parish; if he receives a part only, he is then called the vicar. The origin of vicars can be traced as far back as the reign of Henry IV., when a law was passed providing that they should be sufficiently endowed to perform Divine Service, inform the people, and keep hospitality. The incomes were for the most part derived from glebe land belonging to the parsonage—that which was most fruitful being, as a rule, kept as rectorial tithe, and the rest being handed over to vicarial. The system was by no means equally carried out, and that is the reason that the incomes in different places vary so much in value.

Vicar-Apostolical.—A name formerly given to a bishop or archbishop to whom the Pope gave authority to act upon his own responsibility, or to any ecclesiastic invested with power to exercise jurisdiction in some place where the resident priest was for some reason incapable of discharging his duties efficiently. In modern times vicars-apostolic are appointed to supply the place of bishops where no episcopate has been established or where the succession has been interrupted. There are at present over a hundred of such vicariates in existence.

Vicar-General.—An officer employed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and some other bishops to assist in such matters as ecclesiastical causes and visitations. His duties are much the same as those of the chancellor of a diocese.

Vicar of Christ.—A title now appropriated only by the Pope, but belonging in the days of the early Christian Church to bishops all over the world.

Vicarage.—The term was originally applied to the church and land, in fact, everything under the charge of the vicar of the parish; but latterly it has been confined to the house belonging to the living. In former times the vicarage was always under the patronage of the rector, but in James I.'s reign it was decided that under certain circumstances the patronage was in the hands of the manor, and sometimes in that of the bishop of the diocese.

Vicars-Choral.—In some cathedral foundations, the assistants of the dean and chapter, for the most part, though not always, in charge of the choir and the chancel. They have to provide for a sufficient number of choirmen, etc., being in their place for the proper performance of the daily services. In some of the old foundations they were practically synonymous with the minor canons. Lay members of the choir of mature age were sometimes called lay-vicars.

Victor, St., an African bishop, was raised to the See of Vita in the reign of Genseric, about 477. In 484 he was banished by the Emperor Hunerick, son of Genseric, on account of a book he had written against the Arian heresy then prevailing. It is uncertain where he went—some say to Constantinople, but it is highly probable that he remained in Africa, from the exact account that he gives of the African martyrs in the fifth century under the Arian kings. This work was divided into five books. Hunerick died about 490, and his nephew Gondebaud allowed the bishops to return to their Sees; but they were all banished again at his death in 496 by his successor Thrasamond, who in 504 published an edict at the instigation of the Arian bishops, which forbade the consecration of any Catholic bishops in the room of those who might die. As many of them disobeyed this edict, 200 were banished to Sardinia. St. Victor, however, continued to consecrate Catholic pastors, and in 506 was sentenced to imprisonment for life at Carthage. On his journey thither the inhabitants of Ruspa asked him to consecrate Fulgentius to that See, which he did in spite of the anger and threats of those in charge of him. After spending a year in confinement at Carthage he was sent to Sardinia, and died there in 512. The exact day of his death is not known, but August 23rd is the day kept in memory of him. His history of the persecution was edited by Ruinart in 1694, and has been republished in Vienna in 1881.

Victor.—There were three Popes and two Anti-Popes of this name. VICTOR I. succeeded Eleutherius about 185; he was a native of Africa. In his time the dispute about keeping Easter ran high, and he showed great intolerance to those who did not agree with him. [EASTER; IRENÆUS; QUARTODECIMANS.] He also excommunicated Theodotus for heresy. [THEODOTIANS.] He died in 201.

VICTOR II. succeeded Leo IX. in 1056. His name was Gebhard, Bishop of Eichstadt, and he was the chief adviser of the Emperor Henry III. Hildebrand, afterwards Gregory VII., was sent to Germany to beg the Emperor's consent to the nomination of Gebhard to the papedom. Henry would fain have kept his counsellor with him, and the Bishop himself was not anxious for the promotion, so he gave his consent very reluctantly. At Hildebrand's bidding, Victor engaged at the Council of Florence to pursue the reforming policy of his predecessor. During his short pontificate he held many councils and synods, as at Tours, Lyons, Rouen, Narbonne, the decrees of all of them being directed against simony and the marriage of priests. At the close of 1056 he was summoned to the deathbed of the Emperor, who confided his heir to Victor's charge; but the Pontiff died himself in 1057.

VICTOR III. succeeded Gregory VII. in 1056. His name was Desiderius, Abbot of Monte Casino, and he was so little anxious for the office that he allowed nearly a year to pass between his election and his consecration; almost immediately after this ceremony, he hurried back to his convent, and Rome was left in possession of the Anti-Pope Guibert and his partisans for nearly two years. In 1087 he was present at a council held at Capua, and then went to Rome; but Guibert forced him to leave the city, and he went to Beneventum, where he held a council, at which he excommunicated Guibert. He then went to Monte Casino, where he died in 1087. He was a man of considerable learning, and his bookish habits rendered him far more fit for the cloister than a public station.

The name VICTOR was also assumed by an Anti-Pope elected in 1138, on the death of Anacletus, in opposition to Innocent II.; and by Octavian, Cardinal of St. Clement, in 1159, set up by Frederick Barbarossa in opposition to Alexander III.

Victorius, Sr. Bishop of Rouen b. about 330, d. after 403].—He was by profession a soldier, but wished to leave the army and become a Christian. For this he was sentenced to death by the commander, but was delivered, as Paulinus reports, through the sudden blindness of the executioner hired to do the work. He became Bishop of Rouen in 380 or 390, and was zealous in the propagation of the Gospel in his own diocese and in Flanders and Hainault. He was sent to Britain in 394 to wage war against the Pelagian heresy: but being accused of heterodoxy he was obliged to go to Rome in 403 to vindicate himself before Pope Innocent I., whom he consulted in some matters of discipline. The only work he has left is De Laude Sanctorum. He is commemorated on the 7th of August.

Vienne, COUNCIL OF.—There were numerous councils held at this ancient French city, but most of them were of little importance. The most celebrated were that held in 1112, presided over by Archbishop Guido, afterwards Pope Calixtus II., at which the Emperor Henry V. was excommunicated, and investiture by lay hands was declared to be a heresy; and that in 1311, convened by Clement V., at which the Order of Knights Templars was suppressed. Various different statements are given as to the number of prelates present at this Council; some say 300, others 140. It was decreed that the Templars should be secure in no part of Christendom. Instructions were sent to Spain, Constantinople, and elsewhere, to torture them into confession; but suddenly nine Templars who had been in hiding appeared, and demanded to be heard in defence of their Order. The Pope ordered them to be seized and imprisoned. The Archbishops of Rheims and Rouen, who had both been persecutors of the Templars, insisted that in common justice the defence of the Order ought to be heard by the Council, and so for a time the Pope prorogued the meeting. On April 3rd. 1312, the Council again met, and the Order was declared to be extinct, the Pope reserving to himself and the Church the disposal of their persons and property. The Council also proposed the recovery of the Holy Land:

but the crusading fire had now burnt out, and nothing was done. The third object proposed was the reformation of manners and of ecclesiastical discipline, and a number of decrees regulating these were passed; also sentences of condemnation against the BEGHARDS and FRATICELLI [q.v.].

Vigil.—A word derived from the Latin vigilia, watches kept by the Roman soldiers during the night; hence, originally, watches kept in the Church by the early Christians during the night preceding a great festival. Vigils were kept at least till midnight before the feasts of martyrs, and those of Easter Eve and Christmas Eve were prolonged till cock-crow. At first the night was spent in prayer and hymns, but in course of time the keeping of vigils gave rise to scandals, and about the thirteenth century the practice was forbidden, or limited only to the midnight Mass before Christmas. The vigils of the greater festivals were always observed by fasting, and in the Middle Ages this was extended to the days before all holy days—a rule which has prevailed among Roman Catholics, with few exceptions, till the present day. In England the Roman Catholics are exempted from fasting on all vigils except those of the Assumption, St. Peter and St. Paul, and All Saints' Day, Pentecost, the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, St. Lawrence, and Christmas Day.

Vigilantius.—A priest of Gaul, living at the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth century; b. at Calagurris, a village in Commenges, in the south of Gaul. He was ordained at Barcelona in 396, and was sent by Paulinus of Nola with letters of recommendation to St. Jerome at Jerusalem, which resulted in a quarrel between himself and St. Jerome, and the departure of Vigilantius for Alexandria. Vigilantius condemned the worship of saints and relics as a revival of Paganism; he objected to monasticism, and denied that the state of celibacy is more acceptable to God than that of marriage; and he said that the use of candles in churches in the daytime is useless and indefensible. St. Jerome attacked these opinions in one of his letters and in an essay, Contra Vigilantium, written when the latter had returned to Gaul.

Vigilius.—Bishop of Tapsus, in Byzacene, of whose life nothing is known except that he was present at a Synod held at Carthage in 484, convened by Hunerick, King of the Vandals. Vigilius was the author of five books against Eutyches, formerly wrongly ascribed to Vigilius, Bishop of Trent. They are valuable as polemical works, but not of much account for historical purposes.

Vincent, Sr., a native of Saragossa, suffered martyrdom during the Diocletian persecution, Jan. 22nd, 304. He was educated by Valerius, Bishop of Saragossa, and by him ordained deacon. He was brought before Dacian, the Roman Governor of Tarragona, and sentenced to the most horrible tortures. Legend says that no cruelty practised on him by his tormentors could in the least shake his faith, or even abate his courage and calmness; that Dacian, enraged at his inability to vindicate the honour of his own gods, threw Vincent into a dungeon where no light could enter, and left him there to starve; but here, too, he was disappointed, for the first news he had from the dungeon was that it was filled with heavenly light, the saint's wounds all healed, and he walking about singing praises to his deliverer. Dacian directed that Vincent should be laid on a soft bed that he might gain strength to bear new torments; but the martyr's sufferings were now at an end, for the moment he was laid on the couch he expired with a calmness more like sleep than death. A church was built in his honour at Valencia, and St. Augustine says that in his days the feast of St. Vincent was celebrated wherever Christianity was planted.

Vincent de Paul, Sr. was born at Pouy, in Gascogne, on April 24th, 1576. He was educated by the Franciscans at Toulouse, and ordained priest in 1600. On a voyage which he made from Marseilles to Narbonne he was captured by corsairs and sold at Tunis. He belonged successively to three masters, the last of whom, a Savoyard renegade, he converted, and the master and servant escaped together and landed in France in 1607. He went for a short time to Rome, and was sent thence on a mission to the French Court, where he became almoner to Queen Marguerite de Valois. He did not remain at Court long, but became tutor in the family of Count Gondy. He at this time began to form the Confrérie de Charité, an association of women who nursed the sick and visited the poor. In 1619 he became, through Count Gondy, almoner-general of the galleys, and he seems to have had wonderful success in softening the stony hearts of the reprobates with whom he was brought into contact. It is said that once he offered himself, and was accepted, in place of one of the convicts who would have left his family in the utmost poverty. He founded other societies, as the Society of St. Borromeo, against begging in Burgundy [1623]; and a congregation called Priests of the Mission, which was confirmed by Pope Urban VIII. in 1632 under the name of LAZARISTS [q.v.] The members of the Confrérie de Charité were mostly married, so he instituted the Order of Filles de Charité, the members of which were not nuns, but after their novitiate they took vows for one year. This congregation soon spread all over Europe. St. Vincent died at St. Lazare, September 27th, 1660, was beatified in 1727, and canonised by Clement XII. on July 19th, 1737, on which day he is commemorated. He was not learned, but his sermons, though very simple, were affecting and impressive, and he is considered one of the most eminent saints of the modern Roman Catholic Church.

Vincent of Lerins, St.—A native of Gaul, and of noble extraction [b. at the latter end of the fourth century, d. in 450]. He spent some years in the army, but desiring to avoid the temptations of the world, he retired to the Monastery of Lerins, situated on an island not far from the coast of Lower Provence, where he spent the remainder of his life. After a course of monastic discipline he was admitted to the priesthood. In 434 he wrote a Commonitory against Heretics, in which he attacks principally the Nestorians, who had been condemned by the Council of Ephesus three years before. It was divided into two parts, the first of which remains entire; the second was lost during St. Vincent's lifetime, and he has left an abridgment of it. He signed himself "Peregrinus," and was at first accused of Semi-Pelagianism, for which accusation, however, there is no ground in his writings.

Vinet, ALEXANDRE RODOLPHE [b. 1797, d. 1847], was born and educated at Lausanne. He was ordained a minister of the Swiss Protestant Church in 1819, holding besides his cure the Chair of Professor of Theology at the University of Basle. He was obliged to resign both in 1840 on account of being unable to agree with the union which existed between the Church and the State, the Church being, as he considered, completely subservient to the State. At the same time he explained most fully to his friends and parishioners that by this act he did not consider himself in any way severed from his National Church, which he held to be perfectly sound in doctrine, and to which he was firmly attached. All this time he seems to have been privately engaged by the University to give lessons in French literature, of which he was particularly fond, and which he had studied carefully for years. In 1845 he formed an assembly of all those who, like himself, had seceded from the National Church, under the name of the Constitution of the Free Church of Vaud. His works are partly theological, partly historical—the latter being mostly on the history of French language and literature. A great many of them have been translated into English. His theology is entirely such as is known by the word "Evangelical," insisting strongly on the necessity of repentance and salvation by faith. His basis of belief is the subjective, that the Divine origin of Christianity is proved by its fitness to meet the deepest needs of the human heart. He denies the need of any priestly character in the minister, who is simply a Christian commissioned by his brother Christians to carry out their views, but possessing only such authority as his study and practice give him.

Virgilius, St., Bishop of Salzburg, was born of noble parents in Ireland, went to France, and became a great favourite in King Pepin's Court. He went thence to Bavaria, and was, either in 744 or in 745, made Bishop of Salzburg. He was strongly opposed to St. Boniface, who twice complained of the Bishop to Pope Zachary, accusing him of heresy. The Pope, however, decided in favour of Virgilius. He built a church, which he dedicated to St. Rupert, his predecessor, converted the Carinthians, and died at Salzburg in 784. He was canonised by Gregory IX. in 1233, and is commemorated on November 27th.

Virgilius, St., Bishop of Arles, was born in Aquitaine about the middle of the sixth century. His parents were most anxious that he should receive a sound Christian education, and sent him to the Monastery of Lerins, one of the most famous in France at that time. He was there for some years, and then sent to superintend the Monastery of Autun in Burgundy. He there gained such a good name, both for his learning and piety, that on the death of Licorius, Bishop of Arles, in 588, he was appointed to succeed him. In 590 Gregory the Great became Pope. He appears to have held Virgilius in great veneration, and in 595 sent him the pallium—a great mark of distinction, and also appointed him his Vicar in the Gallican Church—which meant the Church in the kingdoms of Burgundy and Austrasia. Virgilius died in 624, and was buried in his cathedral at Arles.

Vision.—By this word we understand the supernatural representation of an object to a man when waking. Thus Isaiah was worshipping in the temple when he saw a vision of the Lord seated upon His throne [Isaiah vi. 1]. And Cornelius was praying in his house in open day when he saw the vision of the angel. The frequent mentions of visions in Holy Scripture, as also the prophecy that they should be made means of God's revelation of His will to men under the Christian dispensation, prepares us for the fact that many visions are recorded in ecclesiastical history, which, however we may choose to account for them, whether by supernatural revelation or by the strength of fancy, have, in some cases, had a very marked and unmistakable effect. Thus the beautiful story of Caedmon tells how this first of English poets was a servant in the monastery of Whitby, knowing nothing of literature or song; that he retired from the table when the harp came round to his turn because he had no skill with it; that the vision of an angel appeared to him and bade him sing the beginning of created things, whereupon he burst out into his song of the Creation, which is one of the noblest pieces of our ancient literature.

The vision of St. Boniface is another very charming story. Dissatisfied with the pursuits of his companions, he used to wander sadlv of an evening among the lime-trees or to prostrate himself before the crucifix in his cell, when he frequently heard a voice which followed him about and bade him go to preach the Gospel. One day whilst listening to this voice, and wondering how he should obey it, he saw stretching out before him the German land from which his race had come, and so strong was the vision upon him that he passionately sought means to visit it and fulfil his mission, and so went forth in 716 to labour and to martyrdom.

The alleged visions of St. Catharine of Sienna were manifold. At the early age of seven years she had a vision as of the open heavens, with Christ seated on a throne with St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. John the Evangelist standing beside Him, and it is said that this determined her to lead a monastic life. Being beset by terrible temptations and foul images which she tried in vain to rid herself of, she went at midnight to the church and spent much time in prayer and fasting and scourging of herself, and at length she was comforted by the visible presence of Christ, who came and talked with her and calmed her by His conversation. At Pisa, when prostrating herself before an ancient crucifix, she is said to have received the STIGMATA [q.v.].

Three alleged appearances of St. Michael in visions at different times have had great influence; in the fifth century he is said to have appeared to a Bishop in a cave at Monte Galgano, and to have directed that a church should be built there in his honour; this was done, and it became the object of pilgrimages from all parts of Europe. The second was in the sixth century, when Rome was almost depopulated by the plague. St. Gregory was heading a procession through the streets singing litanies; on the third day St. Michael appeared to him at the top of Hadrian's Mount, sheathing his bloody sword as a sign that the pestilence was at an end; a church was built there in his honour, and the hill has borne the name of St. Angelo ever since. The third was to Aubert, Bishop of Avranches, commanding him to repair to Mont Saint-Michael and build a church there.

St. Francis of Assisi is said to have found his true vocation by means of a vision of a splendid room filled with jewels and arms all marked with a cross, and in the midst the figure of Christ, who said to him, "These are the riches reserved for My servants, and the weapons wherewith I arm those who fight in My cause." His most extraordinary vision was in the cave of Monte Alverna; he had fasted forty days in his solitary cell, passing the time in prayer and contemplation, when he beheld a seraph descending from above, bearing between his six shining wings the form of a man crucified. When the vision left him his hands, feet, and side bore the impress of the Saviour's wounds. This story is frequently the subject of art.

St. Ignatius Loyola on his way to Rome turned aside from his companions to pray in a small chapel, and it is said that whilst he was thus engaged the Saviour appeared to him, bearing His Cross and strengthening His servant with encouraging words: Ego vobis Romæ propitius ero.

To his friend and disciple, Francis Xavier, frequent visions came in slumber of the trials he was to encounter in his missionary labours, and made him yearn to make great sacrifices for the conversion of mankind, so that when the call to go and evangelise India and Japan came, it found him ready and anxious for the service.

The visions of Edward the Confessor are interesting as being portrayed in bas-reliefs in his chapel in Westminster Abbey. One is that of a demon dancing on the Danegelt which had been collected, on whose appearance the King restored the money to his subjects and abolished the tax. Another is the appearance of our Saviour at the altar in Westminster when Edward was partaking of the Eucharist. Others represent the Danish king drowned as he was about to make war on England, a fact which was revealed in a dream to Edward; and the vision of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, which was taken to predict the Norman invasion.

To St. Gregory the Great several visions of our Saviour are reported; one, when Gregory was celebrating Mass, Christ descending on the altar with the instruments of His passion; and another when Christ came in bodily presence to the supper-table of Gregory and revealed Himself, afterwards saying that He was the beggar on whom Gregory had had unwearied compassion before he became Pope.

In the foregoing instances we have referred to records which are enshrined in the Hagiology of the Roman Church, are read in her legends, and commemorated on painted windows, especially on the Continent. Similar stories, however, are not wanting outside that Church. The appearances of the devil, for example, to Luther and Bunyan, were to their imagination so real that we might well class them under the head of visions; and the story of the conversion of Colonel Gardiner may claim a like place. He had been a thorough reprobate, and was still living the life of one, when sitting alone one evening he suddenly saw an appearance of the Saviour dying on the Cross, who spoke to him and said, "I bore all this for thee, then how canst thou treat me so?" We may form our own ideas as to the explanation of the phenomenon, but there is no question as to the consequence. He flung himself upon his knees in an agony of penitence, and from that hour led a most strict and religious life. While some such stories may be regarded as apocryphal, others, well authenticated, remain wonderful and unexplained.

Visitation.—There are two distinct visitations in the Church of England—that held by the bishop of the diocese, which now takes place once in every three years, and that by the archdeacon of the district, which is held annually. In each case the clergy are expected to attend if possible, so that the bishop or the archdeacon may personally become acquainted with the clergy, and be able to judge of their efficiency. Formerly the bishop was bound to visit the parishes of his diocese, to inquire into the state of the Church, the condition of the schools, and general well-being of the parish, but of late years this duty has devolved entirely on the archdeacon.

Visitation of the Sick.—This is made by our Lord one of the tests of discipleship, and has been practised in the Church ever since earliest times in compliance with St. James's injunction: "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins they shall be forgiven him" [James v. 14, 15]. In the Greek Church the priest still anoints the sick person with oil, but in the Roman it is only done when he is on the point of death. [EXTREME UNCTION.] The form for anointing was inserted in the Prayer Book of 1549, but was omitted in that of 1552. The service for the Visitation of the Sick is founded on those in ancient liturgies, omitting the formal procession of the priest and his clerks to the house of the sick, the saying of the Penitential Psalms, and the using of oil. The four last prayers—for a sick child, for a sick person when there appeareth small hope of recovery, a commendatory prayer for a sick person at the point of departure, and a prayer for persons troubled in mind or in conscience—were added in 1662.

Visitation of the Virgin Mary.—A festival instituted in the middle of the fourteenth century by Pope Urban to commemorate the Virgin's visit to Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist.

Visitation, ORDER OF.—An Order of nuns founded at Anney under the guidance of Francis de Sales by Mme. de Chantal in 1610. No distinctive dress was insisted on, and as the object of the foundress was to make it possible for invalid ladies to join, the rules of living were not very severe. The work of the members is the visitation of the poor by those strong enough to undertake it. The Order has flourished in France ever since, and there are two houses belonging to it in England, at Walmer and Westbury-on-Trym.

Vitalis, ORDERICUS, Church historian [b. at Attengesham, near Shrewsbury, 1075; d. about 1143], was of French extraction, and educated at St. Evroul, Normandy, where he became a monk under the name of Vitalis. He was made priest in 1107. He wrote Historia Ecclesiastica, a history from the creation to 1142, part of which concerns the relations then existing between England and Normandy.

Vitringa, CAMPEGIUS, a Dutch divine and commentator [b. at Leeuwarden in Friesland, 1659; d. at Franeker, 1722], studied at Franeker and Leyden, where he took the D.D. degree in 1679. He was made Professor of Oriental Languages in 1681, and in 1683 obtained the post of Professor of Theology at Franeker, which he held till his death. Vitringa was famed for his learning and industry, and has left many valuable works, most of which are Latin commentaries on the Scriptures, chiefly on the Prophets.

Vitus, Sr., was born in Sicily of heathen parents. He was given into the charge of a Christian nurse named Crescentia, who, with her husband Modestus, took great care to bring him up in their religion. His father Hylas, after repeated attempts to make him abjure his faith, informed against him, and at the early age of twelve years he was brought before Valerian, the Governor of Sicily, and on his refusal to give up his belief in Christ, was ordered to be whipped and sent back to his father. His parents thought their family disgraced by one of its members being a Christian, and determined to give up their son to the authorities. But Vitus heard of their design, and escaped with his nurse and her husband to Lucania, near Naples, but they were all martyred either there or in Rome (it is uncertain which), on June 15th, 303, during the Diocletian persecution.

Vladimir, Sr., a Russian prince of Kieff, grandson to the Princess Olga, who had embraced Christianity in 955, and was canonised. He then sent messengers to visit the various churches, and of all they gave unfavourable reports till they reached Constantinople, where they were so impressed with the magnificence and earnestness of the worship in the grand church of St. Sophia, that they could hardly find words to express their admiration. On their return they pressed on Vladimir that his grandmother Olga had embraced the Greek form of worship, and this decided him. But he determined that his success in laying siege to Cherson should decide for him; having conquered the city, he and many of his suite were baptised by the Bishop of Cherson in 988. He married Anne, sister of the Emperor. On his return to Kieff, Vladimir destroyed the huge idol Peroun, which he had hitherto worshipped, and ordered the immediate baptism of all his subjects in the river Dnieper. Many churches were built in his realm, and the people instructed in the Slavonic Scriptures and Liturgy which had been compiled by Methodius.

Void.—A parish is said to be void when it is destitute of a pastor or incumbent. When the incumbent holds several benefices which are incompatible, the voidance is de jure; if he dies or is deprived, it is de facto.

Vocation.—The Greek word so translated in Eph. iv. 1, but generally in the Authorised Version rendered "calling," is applied to the position of all Christian men. In the same sense it is used in the second Collect for Good Friday: "Receive our supplications and prayers, which we offer before Thee for all estates of men in Thy Holy Church, that every member of the same, in his vocation and ministry, may truly and godly serve Thee." In a more restricted sense the word is applied to the calling by Providence to special work in the Church—e.g. to the ministry of souls. Such calling, it is evident, must first of all be inward, springing from the love of Christ, the zeal after holiness, the promotion of God's glory, and the salvation of souls.

Volney, CONSTANTIN FRANÇOIS CHASSEBŒUF, COMTE DE, author of several anti-Christian works [b. at Craon in Anjou, 1757; d. 1820].—He was educated at Angers and Paris, and studied at first for the law and afterwards for medicine; but he gave up both professions, and, in 1783, started on a four years' expedition to Egypt and Syria. On his return to France he published his Travels in Egypt and Syria, a trustworthy and accurate book, written in a lively and interesting style, which at once procured him a great reputation. In 1790 he was elected by his native district Deputy of the National Assembly, and took a prominent part in the politics of the next few years. He wrote, in 1791, Ruins, or Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires; and in 1793, Natural Law, or Catechism of the French Citizen, otherwise called Physical Principles of Morality. This was thoroughly anti-Christian, and an exposition of such a system of ethics as can be reared on the theory of Materialism. In 1793 Volney was imprisoned as a Royalist by Robespierre, and not liberated till the following year, when he was made Professor of History in the École Normale at Paris. In 1796 that school was suppressed, and he then went to the United States; but returned to France in 1798. He was soon after made a member of the Academy. Bonaparte wished him to be one of his colleagues in the Consulate, but he would only accept a seat in the Senate and the title of Count, together with the command of the Legion of Honour. But he made no secret of his dislike of Bonaparte's tyranny and want of principle, and the latter sneeringly called him an "idéologue." On the fall of Napoleon, Louis XVIII. made him a peer. In 1819 he published his latest work, The History of Samuel, the Inventor of the Sacredness of Kings, in which he treats the character of Samuel and the Hebrew Scriptures with equal freedom. Volney was a fast friend of the public liberties, and a fearless opponent of popular excesses. But he remained to the end of his life an enemy to all systems of religion.

Voltaire, FRANÇOIS MARIE AROUET DE, the most celebrated of infidel writers, was born at Chatenay, near Sceaux, in 1694. His father, François Arouet, was a notary of good repute; his mother belonged to a noble Poitevin family, and is said to have been of brilliant ability. She died, however, when her son was seven years old. The child was so feeble in constitution that, as in the case of Fontenelle, whose hundred years surpassed even Voltaire's long span, his life was long despaired of. He was educated by the Jesuits at the Collège Louis-le-Grand, and it is said that one of his tutors there, Father le Jay, predicted that he would be the Coryphæus of Deism in France. Between the staid temperament of his father, proper to a notary with many responsibilities, and the bold vivacious son, there was little sympathy, and before many years had passed the two were at open variance. His godfather, the Abbé Châteauneuf, introduced the young man into the gay and corrupt world of the Regency, where his sprightliness and skill in literary trifling made him a favourite. The celebrated Ninon de l'Enclos, now eighty years old, who had been a friend of his mother, and still preserved her wit and power of epigram, took him up, and on her death left him a legacy to buy books. His father, unhappy at the sight of the frivolity of the Court, and also at the reaction against it into sourness and Jansenist narrowness, persuaded Châteauneuf, who was now ambassador to Holland, to take his son with him, and accordingly, in 1713, the young man went to the Hague. Here he fell in love with a young countrywoman; the course did not run smooth, and the ambassador sent his godson back to Paris in displeasure. In 1716 Louis XIV. died, and next year the young Arouet was thrown into the Bastille on the charge of having written a pungent satire on the Regent d'Orleans, though he had nothing to do with it. Here he lay for nearly a year, and amused himself by sketching his epic poem the Henriade, and by writing the first of his dramas. The Regent, convinced of his innocence, at length released him, and he spent the next six years in Parisian society industriously engaged with his pen. In 1722 his father died, and he dropped the name of Arouet for that of Voltaire, which was an anagram from Arouet [[e] [une]]. An incident at the house of the Duke of Sully led to a great change in his life. A noble at one of the gatherings there spoke to him contemptuously, and received back a sharp answer, which turned the laugh against him, whereupon the mean-spirited aristocrat caused Voltaire to be caned by his footmen. Voltaire practised with his rapier, and challenged him to fight, and for this was thrown a second time into the Bastille. After six months he was released, but ordered to leave Paris, and he came to London. It was a prevailing fashion of Frenchmen at that time to do so—Buffon, Brissot, Lafayette, Mirabeau, the Rolands, Rousseau did the like. Voltaire came with a hatred of feudalism in his heart, and at once found himself entranced with the freedom of thought prevailing in England, especially as exhibited in the power of Deism, of which England was the original parent, and which was now in its full swing. He eagerly read Woolton, Tindal, and Collins, but was also deeply moved by the discoveries of Newton and the philosophy of Locke, both of which had given England an unprecedented position in the philosophical thought of Europe.

It was altogether new to the young Frenchman to see the social and political consequence of the men of letters, and the recognition given to the power of the pen. He saw Newton's funeral, in 1727, conducted with a pomp and circumstance which could not have been surpassed had he been a king. He saw in England a country in which personal liberty was secure, and in which the priesthood had lost the power of persecution. And connecting the two things together, he formed his notion of liberty, which was that of writing against priests and religion. After residing three years in England, during which his poetical pen was busy, he returned to Paris, and for some time lived a quiet life, dividing his time between literature and commercial speculations, in which he proved very successful. His Philosophical Letters, published in 1733, raised a storm, and he judged it wise to retire from Paris with the Marquise du Châtelet, a clever woman and an ardent student of Newton, with whom he formed a connection. They took up their residence at Cirey, on the borders of Champagne and Lorraine, and here he finished his disgraceful Pucelle, a savage and indecent libel upon the character of Joan of Arc. In 1749 the tragical death of the Marquise left him free in his movements. He had from time to time visited Paris, and received overtures from Madame de Pompadour, the King's favourite mistress at that time, and she had with much difficulty procured his election to the Academy [1746], but not until he had written a letter to Father Latour, head of his former school, protesting his affection for religion and his admiration of the Jesuits. But he felt that his position in France was precarious, and he accepted an invitation from Frederick the Great, then at the height of his influence in Europe. He arrived at Potsdam in July, 1750, at the time when Diderot was busy with the first volume of the Encyclopædia. For three years Voltaire resided at the Prussian Court, and neither he nor the King reaped any good from the mutual intercourse. Berlin was a great barrack, the King a martinet. There was no intellectual vigour as in England. Frederick simply imbibed Voltaire's doctrines; he had none of his own to inspire back. At length they quarrelled—the miserable story is fully told in the graphic pages of Carlyle—and Voltaire left Berlin. He could not return to Paris, but took up his residence at Geneva, then and until 1798 an independent municipality. In 1758 he bought the estate of Ferney, by the Lake of Geneva, and here the rest of his life was spent. Here it was that he set himself in awful earnest to the endeavour to destroy Christianity from off the earth. His enmity contained two elements. The one was his disbelief in the miraculous and in the inspiration of the Old Testament; the other was his hatred of the Roman priesthood as he saw it in France, the intolerance, the opposition to knowledge, the internecine struggles of Jesuits and Jansenists, the cruelty of persecution. Probably the second of these two feelings was prior in order of time, and the cause of the former, but as time moved on it was not more fierce than the other. Voltaire so entirely identified the priests with the religion which they professed, that the Scriptures and the theology which they taught were hated with a fierceness which no fanatic ever surpassed. His admiring biographer, Mr. John Morley, makes this admission about his principles:—"It is necessary to admit, from the view of impartial criticism, that Voltaire had one defect of character, of extreme importance in a leader of this memorable and direct attack. With all his enthusiasm for things noble and lofty, generous and compassionate, he missed the peculiar emotion of holiness, the soul and life alike of the words of Christ and St. Paul." The beauty of real religion had never been brought before him: he was a critic, a destroyer, in no sense a builder up. Hence his days at Ferney become to us a strange record of inconsistencies. His passion for the stage was unabated; he built a theatre, and procured the first actors of the day from time to time to serve it, occasionally acting himself. He was a benefactor to the poor around him, and even rebuilt the church at his own expense. But having ordered the demolition of a large wooden crucifix, complaint was made to the Bishop of the diocese, and Voltaire, in order to quiet matters, received the Communion—an act of undoubted hypocrisy. Next year the Bishop forbade his clergy to confess or communicate him. Thereupon Voltaire pretended mortal sickness, and persuaded a Capuchin friar to administer the Communion to him, and all other rites which a Catholic could claim. And all the while he was writing his fiercest diatribes, and making sport out of his religious conformity. In 1770 he applied to the Pope for the post of temporal father of the Order of Capuchins for the district of Gex, and through the influence of the Duchess of Choiseul received it. It was partly his love of farce and mischief which moved him to this miserable act, partly a desire to worry his foe the Bishop, to whom he wrote letters signed "Voltaire, Capucin indigne;" partly also a dread of personal harm. He had no desire, he said, to be burnt alive, and so conformed. There are other features of his history at this time which are pleasanter to think of. He generously exerted himself in favour of the Calas family, a case in which an unfortunate old man, Jean Calas, a Calvinist, was accused of murdering his son to prevent him becoming a Roman Catholic, and entirely against evidence was convicted and broken on the wheel. Voltaire received his family into protection, and never ceased to agitate until he had procured a reversal of the condemnation, and restored the children to their rights. His endeavours for justice on behalf of Sirven, of Lally, and of the English Admiral Byng, were in unison with that for the Calas household.

In 1778, when he was eighty-four years of age, he once more visited Paris, and was received with the wildest enthusiasm. But the excitement was more than he could bear. A fit of illness came on, and he asked for a reconciliation with the Church on the ground that he did not wish to be deprived of Christian burial. The Abbé Gauthier obtained from him a declaration that he would die in the Roman Catholic faith, and that he asked pardon of God and the Church for his sins. But he recovered, and transferred his thoughts from the Church to the stage, attending successive representations of his plays. A relapse came on, and he lay down on his bed to die. The accounts of his deathbed are contradictory. The Abbé Gauthier signed a paper stating that he was sent for at Voltaire's request, but found him too far gone to be confessed. He died May 30th, 1778. An order from the Bishop forbidding his Christian burial came too late, for on the strength of Gauthier's certificate the rites had been performed.

The works of Voltaire were published by Baudouin [1824-34] in ninety-seven volumes. The brilliancy and vivacity of his style will cause him to be read probably for ages to come, but he can only be regarded as a destroyer in the world of theology, though doubtless even destructives have at times their necessity and their use. He had no deep convictions, had little simplicity or sincerity of character, and none of his friendships seem to have been strong. The deep earnestness of Bossuet and Pascal and Massillon, their resolute grappling with the awful problems of life and death, of God and His relations to the universe, of suffering and temptation, of guilt and remorse, of pain and bereavement—all these things were strange to him, and his influence as a philosopher is now gone.

Voluntary.—The name given to the music played at the beginning or end of Divine Service and occasionally in other parts of the service; so called because this music formerly was mostly extemporaneous or voluntary.

Voluntary Controversy.—The name given to a controversy which arose in Scotland in 1829, and which began with a sermon preached by a minister named Marshall, a member of the United Secession Church in Kirkintilloch. He endeavoured to prove the unscriptural and unjust nature of the maintenance of Church establishments, the principle of which he declared to be the exertion of the civil authority to compel payment of the endowments of the clergy. He said that civil establishments of religion are condemned in the New Testament, and opposed in every way to the dictates of conscience and common sense. He and his followers took the name of the Voluntary Church Association, and started a periodical called The Voluntary Church Magazine. They were opposed first of all in the Edinburgh Christian Instructor; but as the matter went deeper, a rival association was formed, calling itself the Association for Promoting the Interests of the Church of Scotland, by which the Church of Scotland Magazine was started. Great interest was felt in the matter, and various able men took part in the controversy on both sides.

Vorstius, CONRAD.—An Arminian divine [b. at Cologne, in 1569; d. at Tünnigen, in Schleswig, in 1622]. He studied at Düsseldorf, Cologne, and Heidelberg, and left the Roman Church to become a Protestant. At Heidelberg he was made a Doctor of Divinity, and lectured on theology at Basle, Geneva, and Steinfurt; and in 1610 he was called to succeed Arminius as Professor of Theology at Leyden. He soon became involved in theological controversy, and was accused at one time of Socinianism, while the Gomarists accused him of publishing heretical doctrines in his Tractatus Theologicus de Deo, which appeared in 1610. Vorstius was attacked as being the supposed author of a work called De Officio Christiani Hominis, which he disclaimed; but the suspicion with which he was regarded became so strong that he was condemned as a heretic by the Synod of Dort, and banished, first from Leyden, and finally from Holland. He returned secretly after some time, and remained concealed until his death.

Vossius or Voss, GERARD JOHANNES [b. near Heidelberg, 1577; d. at Amsterdam, 1649], studied at Dordrecht and Leyden, where he devoted himself chiefly to the study of theology, Hebrew, and ecclesiastical history, and took a degree in philosophy in 1598. He began his literary career at the age of twenty by the publication of a Latin panegyric upon Prince Maurice of Nassau, and in 1600 was appointed to the Head-Mastership of the school at Dordrecht. In 1614 he became Rector of the Theological College of Leyden, and in 1618 Professor of Rhetoric and Chronology in addition, but he was deprived of this appointment the same year, in consequence of a book he had published (Historia de Controversiis quas Pelagius ejusque Reliquiae moverunt) containing a history of the Pelagian heresy, of which he was declared to be an adherent, while others accused him of Arminianism. He was restored in 1621, on condition that he would say or write nothing against the judgment of the Synod of Dordrecht, which had condemned Arminianism; and at the same time Archbishop Laud, the English opponent of the Calvinists, made him a Prebendary of Canterbury. In 1633 Vossius was appointed to the Professorship of History at Amsterdam, and died there in consequence of a fall from a ladder in his library. Among his many classical works may be mentioned De Origine Idolatriæ, De Historicis Latinis Libri Tres, De Historicis Græcis Libri Tres, De Poetis Græcis et Latinis, De Logices et Rhetoricæ Natura et Constitutione, De Scientiis Mathematicis, De Philosophorum Sectis, etc.

Vows.—A vow is a special promise made to God, binding the maker to do or forego something for the promotion of God's glory. Vows took a prominent part in Judaism, as they have also done in the religious observances of all races. Vows are common in the Roman Catholic Church, which holds that to be valid they must be of free and deliberate choice, and therefore must be made by persons capable by age of contracting the obligation. As they are always made to God, and are acts of divine worship, it follows that to vow to a saint means vowing to do something to God's worship in honour of a saint. Thus to vow a church to St. Agatha would mean a church for God's worship, where the purity of St. Agatha should be specially commemorated. The Reformers held that, as it is the duty of man to devote himself wholly, his life and his goods, to God, vows as a religious observance were unnecessary; but with the Roman Catholic to take a vow is considered to be a great merit, as Works of Supererogation are. The merit conferred is said to be threefold: it elevates the acts performed under the vow to the rank of sacrifice, and raises a good action to the level of divine worship; it offers not only the action but the faculty from which it proceeds, so that the whole spirit is elevated thereby; and it strengthens the will to the perfection of virtue. There are two sorts of religious vows in the Roman Church: simple and solemn.

Simple vows are those taken in all religious Orders when the period of noviceship has elapsed. They are held for three years, and then, if the superior allows it, solemn vows are taken. The chief difference between them is that in solemn vows of chastity, marriage contracted afterwards are null and void, while a simple vow of chastity makes it unlawful to marry, but, except in the Jesuit Society, does not invalidate a marriage if subsequently contracted. Solemn and certain simple vows, as those of chastity and of greater pilgrimage, can only be dispensed by the Pope, or by a superior specially delegated for the purpose; but most of the simple vows can be dispensed by the bishops.

Vulgar Tongue.—Several times throughout the Prayer Book it is directed that the service should be held in the English or vulgar [i.e. common] tongue, as in the rubric before the Te Deum, etc. This was first ordained in the reign of Henry VIII., the service having always previously been read in Latin. This is forbidden by Article XXIV., which says: "It is a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God, and the custom of the Primitive Church, to have public prayer in the Church, or to minister the sacraments in a tongue not understood of the people."

W

Waddington, GEORGE [b. 1793, d. 1869], Dean of Durham, and first Warden of Durham University. He wrote two ecclesiastical histories: The History of the Church from the Earliest Ages to the Reformation, and The History of the Reformation on the Continent. He also wrote works on Ethiopia and Greece, having travelled much in the East.

Wafer. [UNLEAVENED BREAD.]

Wahabees or Wahabites.—The name of a modern Mohammedan sect whose object is to purify their religion from the abuses and idolatrous practices which have crept into it. The Wahabee religion contains no new precepts, but its followers are rigid in their observance of all the laws and usages which the Turks neglect, such as the reading of the Koran, the five daily prayers, the reverence for the City of Mecca, etc. The founder was Abd-ul-Wahab, the son of an Arab chief of Nedjed, born at the close of the seventeenth century. He lived to the age of ninety-five, and during his life peaceable means alone were used in the making of converts; but his successors followed the example of Mahomet in propagating their faith by the sword. The most important convert was a young chief named Saoo'd, and about 1746 he began to be the principal mover in the work of reformation, and carried his arms with success against his heretical neighbours. He died in 1765, and was succeeded by his son Abd-ul-Aziz, who followed in his steps and pushed his conquests all over Arabia. The Wahabees reached the height of their power at the beginning of the present century; when, in 1803, they became masters of Mecca, and in 1804 of Medina. They laid a yearly tribute on the Turks in return for the privilege of making pilgrimages to the sacred city. In 1808, while pressing on to the east coast of the Persian Gulf, they came into collision with Great Britain, and were severely defeated. In 1811 the Pasha of Egypt, Mahomet Ali, sent an expedition against them, and in 1812 and 1813 recovered Medina and Mecca, and his adopted son, Ibrahim Pasha, in 1816 attacked them in their stronghold, central Arabia, and in 1818 captured their capital, Deraijeh, and took their chief, Abdallah, prisoner to Constantinople, where he was beheaded. Their power was thus for a time crushed, but, according to the Eastern travellers Palgrave and Pelly, they are still very powerful in the peninsula. The former speaks of their empire as "a compact and well-organised government, where centralisation is fully understood and effectually carried out, and whose mainsprings and connecting links are force and fanaticism. Its atmosphere, to speak metaphorically, is sheer despotism—moral, intellectual, religious, and physical. . . . Its weakest point lies in family rivalries and feuds of succession, which, joined to the anti-Wahabian reaction existing far and wide throughout Arabia, may one day disintegrate and shatter the Nedjean empire, yet not destroy it altogether. But as long as Wahabism shall prevail in the centre and uplands of Arabia, small indeed are the hopes of civilisation, advancement, and national prosperity for the Arab race." Their political power is now confined to their native province, Nedjed, but they have missionaries and spies in many places north of that, and also on the coast of the Persian Gulf.

Wake [derived from an old Gothic word, wakan, "to watch"].—The people had been accustomed to hold wakes in honour of the heathen gods. When it became a recognised Christian use to dedicate churches to popular saints, the day on which such saints were commemorated came to be celebrated with great rejoicing. At first the congregation used to meet the night before, and watch (hence the name) all through the night; and in the morning, after a solemn service had been held, gave themselves up to feasting and rejoicing. In time the custom became abused, and the day was no longer treated as a religious festival. In the reign of Henry VIII. it was ordained that the wake should be kept in all parishes on the first Sunday in October, in the hopes of getting the day observed more quietly; but in spite of this the festivals fell into such bad repute that the Puritans made a vigorous effort to bring about their discontinuance. In 1627 one of the judges in Somersetshire ordered that no wake should be held henceforth, and the custom gradually died out, especially in the western counties. [Sports, Book of.] In the north and midland counties they are still, though rarely, to be found. A lyke-wake, or liche-wake, is the watching of a dead body all night by the relatives or friends.

Wake, WILLIAM, D.D. Archbishop of Canterbury [b. 1657, d. 1737], was educated at Oxford, and became successively Canon of Christ Church [1684], Dean of Exeter [1701], Bishop of Lincoln [1705], and Archbishop of Canterbury [1715]. He began his career as a divine with his Exposition of the Doctrines of the Church of England, an answer to Bossuet's recently published Exposition of the Roman Catholic Faith, and this led to a controversy in the course of which Wake published two more treatises. Pope Clement XI. is said to have regretted that so profound a theologian was not a member of his Church. In the earlier part of Wake's episcopate he belonged to the Low Church school, but he steadily became more conservative, as was shown by his sharp controversy with Hoadly, and by his votes in the House of Lords against the repeal of the Test and Corporation and the Occasional Conformity Acts. One of his most memorable works was his endeavour, in conjunction with Dupin, to bring about a union between the English and Gallican Churches, which, though it failed, has left a longing hope on the part of many Anglicans that it may even yet promote a reunion of Christendom. His English Version of the Genuine Epistles of the Apostolic Fathers is still regarded as a standard work in English divinity.

Wakefield, GILBERT, a distinguished scholar and critic, was the son of a clergyman, George Wakefield. He was born at Nottingham in 1756, died in London in 1801. He entered Jesus College, Cambridge, in 1772, and was elected a Fellow in 1776. The same year he published a volume of Latin poems, with some clever criticisms on Homer, which already gave promise of the brilliant scholarship for which he was afterwards famous. In 1778 he took deacon's orders and obtained a curacy first in Cheahire and afterwards near Liverpool. He was never ordained priest, for, before the year had expired, he had become so dissatisfied with the teaching and discipline of the Church of England that he resolved to leave it, and, in 1774, took the post of classical tutor in a Dissenting school at Warrington. While there he published A New Translation of the First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Thessalonians; A Plain and Short Account of the Nature of Baptism; An Essay on Inspiration, and a New Translation of St. Matthew's Gospel, with notes critical, philological, and explanatory. Soon after, the Warrington school broke up, and he took a house at Bramcote in Nottinghamshire, hoping to get some private pupils. Here, in 1784, he published the first volume of an Enquiry into the Opinions of the Christian Writers of the First Three Centuries Concerning the Person of Jesus Christ, a book which he never finished. In 1789 he began a book called Silva Critica, the object of which was to illustrate the Scriptures by the philology of Greece and Rome. In 1796 he was offered the post of classical tutor at the Dissenting college at Hackney, which he accepted, and kept until he got himself into trouble about a tract in which he advocated the superiority of private to public worship, and was obliged to resign. He next defended revealed religion by his Evidences of Christianity. He also turned his attention to theologico-political discussion, and published in 1794 The Spirit of Christianity compared with the Spirit of the Times in Great Britain, and Examination of the Age of Reason in answer to Paine. He then turned his attention to select Greek tragedies; his edition of Lucretius particularly gaining him the distinction of being one of the ablest classical critics. In a pamphlet written in 1798, entitled A Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff's Address to the People of Great Britain, he censured the policy of the war against France produced by the French Revolution. For this he was subjected to a prosecution on the part of the Crown for libel, which terminated in a sentence of two years' imprisonment in Dorchester Gaol. A subscription amounting to £5,000 was raised by his friends for the support of his family during the time. At the end of the two years he was set at liberty, and immediately began to give a course of lectures on Virgil in London, but in August of the same year, 1801, was seized with typhus fever, and died in the September following. Besides the critical power already mentioned, his zeal for what he considered the truth, no matter what the consequences were to himself, ought to be noticed. In his private and family life he was gentle and amiable, the direct opposite to what he was in controversy and criticism. After his death a collection of letters between him and C. J. Fox, chiefly relating to Greek literature, was published.

Waldenses.—A remarkable Christian sect dwelling in some of the Swiss valleys, principally in those of the Pellice (or Luserna) and the Germanasca, in the Western Alps. A large amount of information respecting them is found in some old MSS. in the possession of the University of Cambridge, and a very valuable account is given in Histoire Littéraire des Vaudois du Piémont d'après les Manuscrits Originaux par Édouard Montet [1886]. They owe their origin and name to Peter Waldus (Waldo, Vaud), a rich citizen of Lyons. About 1170 Waldo, from reading the Bible and some passages from the Fathers of the Church, which he caused to be translated into his native tongue, determined to imitate the mode of life of the Apostles and primitive Christians, gave his goods to the poor, and by his preaching collected numerous followers, chiefly from the class of artisans, who, from the place of their birth, were called "Lyonsists;" sometimes "Poor men of Lyons," on account of their voluntary poverty; or "Sabotati," on account of their wooden shoes or sandals [sabots]; or "Humiliati," on account of their humility. They have often been confounded with the Cathari or Albigenses, but M. Montet has proved conclusively that they had no connection with them; they even spoke of the Albigenses as "dæmones." In their contempt for the degenerate clergy and their opposition to the Roman priesthood, the Waldenses resembled other sects of the Middle Ages; but as early as 1184, by which time they had spread over Southern France and North Italy, they were excommunicated by the Pope, though the reason is not clear. They were distinguished from "heretics" generally, and seem to have held the doctrines of the Church, going to Catholic sources for literature and to the priests for the sacraments. Probably the objection to them was that they were preachers, the same objection which was afterwards made to the Mendicant Friars. But once driven from the Catholic pale, they made the Bible alone the rule of their faith, and, rejecting whatever was not founded on it or conformable to Apostolic teaching, they gave the first impulse to a reform of the Christian Church. They, or at least the Italian branch of them, began to preach that a bad priest cannot validly administer the Sacraments, and to reject Confession. As the French Waldenses were stamped out by persecution the Italians assumed the lead. The body thus separated from the Church held their way until the war broke out against the Albigenses, by which time they had spread and established themselves in the South of France, under the protection of the Counts of Toulouse and Foix. At that time [1209-1230] many Waldenses fled to Aragon, Savoy, and Piedmont. Spain would not tolerate them at all. In Languedoc they were able to maintain themselves till 1330; in Provence, under severe oppression, till 1545, when the Parliament at Aix caused them to be exterminated in the most cruel manner; still longer in Dauphiny; and not till the war of the Cevennes were the last Waldenses expelled from France. In the middle of the fourteenth century single congregations of this sect went to Calabria and Apulia, where they were soon suppressed: others to Bohemia, where they were called

"Grubenheimer," because they used to hide themselves in caverns. These soon became amalgamated with the Hussites, though as they were not so advanced in view as the Taborites there was a good deal of delay. From them the Bohemian Brethren derived the consecration of their bishops. They found a safe retreat, fortified by nature, in the valleys of Western Piedmont, where they founded a distinct Church, which has remained till the present day the main centre of their sect. A correspondence which two of their pastors, Morel and Maasson, had with Ocolampadius, in 1530, is preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, from which it appears that among the Waldenses there were sisterhoods bound by vows of celibacy, that the preachers received confessions, but resorted to the Catholic priesthood for the Sacraments. But now they resolved to abolish Confession, two Sacraments only were acknowledged, and the doctrine of Predestination was asserted. Their doctrines rest entirely on the Gospels, which, with some catechisms, they have in their old dialect, a mixture of French and Italian. In this language their worship was performed till 1630, when their old "barbes" or teachers became extinct. They then had recourse to Geneva to supply the vacancies, and ever since the French language has been used in their services, and teachers are sent from the Calvinistic colleges. The constitution of their congregations, which are chiefly employed in the cultivation of vineyards and the breeding of cattle, is republican. Each congregation is governed by a council, consisting of the elders and deacons, under the presidency of the pastor, which maintains the strictest discipline. The congregations are all united at the yearly synod. From their origin the Waldenses have been distinguished for their pure morals and industry, and have always been regarded as good subjects. After they had joined the Calvinists, in the sixteenth century, they were again exposed to the storm which was intended to sweep away the Reformation, the doctrines of which they had held practically for nearly three hundred years. This was the cause of their being expelled from France. Those who had settled in the duchy of Saluzzo were totally exterminated by 1633; and those in the other valleys, having received from the Court of Turin, in 1654, new assurances of religious freedom, were treacherously attacked, in 1655, by monks and soldiers, and shamefully treated. By the aid of other Protestant Powers they procured a new, though limited, promise of freedom by the Treaty of Pignerol, signed Aug. 18th, 1655, but the persecution, again brought about by French influence, obliged thousands to take refuge in Protestant countries: in London they joined the French Huguenots; in the Netherlands, the Walloons; in Berlin, the French; while nearly 2,000 went to Switzerland. They now enjoy religious freedom and all civil rights in Lucerne, St. Martin, and Perusa, where they number over 20,000, while there are about 1,600 settled in Württemberg.

M. Montet has given a very thorough account of Waldensian literature, dividing it into three periods: [1] The Catholic period, during which the dogmas and practices of the Church were accepted. The writings of this period are taken from the Fathers and the Liturgies. The Pope during this period is never attacked, the Seven Sacraments and Transubstantiation are assumed, and ascetic views are strongly maintained. [2] The Hussite period. Now the Pope is fiercely attacked, the Sacraments are invalid by reason of the wickedness of the priests, and there is a strong leaning towards the Universal Priesthood. [3] The Calvinistic. Unhappily this last period has been marked by a wholesale falsification of documents, by forgery and by mutilation, with the object of showing that the Waldensian is a Christian body which had descended from Apostolic times, preserving their faith through the ages in primitive form. This fiction M. Montet has altogether destroyed, though, as he acknowledges, the late Mr. Henry Bradshaw had already discovered and exposed the real character of some of the documents adduced. Much kindness has been expended on the Waldenses by English, Scotch, and American sympathisers, and every year in the first week of September delegates from these countries attend the Synod, when not unfrequently a dispute arises between the United Presbyterians and the Free Kirk men. Much money, diverted from home charities, finds its way hither. A short time since the Waldensian inhabitants of Dormitrouse in Dauphiné were transported by mistaken kindness to Algeria, the result of which was that their bones were scattered, not on Alpine mountains, but on scorching African plains. The services are the very plainest and barest type of Genevan Protestantism; the minister taking the whole service and the people taking no share, except the occasional singing of a hymn.

Waldo, PETER, the alleged founder of the WALDENSES [q.v.], was born at Vaux, or Waldum, on the Rhone, early in the twelfth century. He made a large commercial fortune in Lyons. In 1170 he employed a priest to translate from Latin into French the Four Gospels, with other books of Holy Scripture, and the most remarkable sentences of the ancient doctors so much esteemed at that time. It was through the perusal of these books that he determined to lead a religious life, and, abandoning his mercantile pursuits, he distributed his riches among the poor, and formed an association with other pious men who adopted his sentiments, and then assumed the character of a public teacher and instructor of the multitude in the doctrines of Christianity. His opinions were condemned by a General Council held in the Lateran in 1179, and he was forced to leave Lyons; he fled to the mountains of Dauphiné, and afterwards probably to those of Piedmont. He is said also to have visited Bohemia. The exact date of his death is not known, but it was about 1190.

Wall, WILLIAM [b. 1646, d. 1728], Vicar of Shoreham in Kent. His History of Infant Baptism remains the standard work on the subject. It was answered by JOHN GALE [q.v.] in his Reflections on Mr. Wall's History, and Wall then replied with a Defence of the History. Hardly anything is known of his life. Like Baxter, Newton, Warburton, he owed nothing to either of the Universities. That he possessed considerable property is clear from his selling a great part of the manor of Otford to Sir Jeffrey Amherst, and that he had a large family appears from the register of christenings at Shoreham. A tradition preserved in the village has it that he used to walk solitary in the churchyard on fine nights for hours, plunged in deep meditation. He was a good Hebrew scholar, and took part in the controversy of Whiston with Collins.

Wallin, JOHAN OLOF, Archbishop of Upsala [b. 1779, d. 1839], was born of poor parents, but by his own exertions as a teacher he raised the sum necessary for his support at the University of Upsala. In 1803 his poetical genius was first manifested in some translations of Horace, which won the prize of the Swedish Academy. He had, however, already determined to devote himself to the sacred ministry, and, having passed through a distinguished course at the university, received the degree of Doctor of Theology, and became pre-eminent as a parish minister, an eloquent preacher, a powerful speaker, and a Christian poet. He was the chief instrument in revising and compiling the hymn-book of the Swedish National Church, and enriched it with many of its noblest hymns, full of deep thought, evangelical fervour, and true poetry. In 1815 he became President of the Swedish Bible Society, and earnestly promoted its work; in 1824 we find him a leading member of the Commission for the revision of the Swedish Bible. His scholarship and attainments justified the high position he acquired. After filling various distinguished posts in Church and State, he was, in 1834, made Archbishop of Upsala and Vice-Chancellor of the university of that city. His health, which had never been strong, gave way at last under his manifold labours. His last words were: "My God—my country—my King."

Walloon Church.—This body is a branch of the French Reformed Church, and was originally composed of the refugees who left France on account of religious persecution in the early part of the sixteenth century, and settled in England. The name was a Dutch form of the name "Gallican." Many refugees came over from Flanders in 1520, after the condemnation of Luther's doctrines at the Diet of Worms, and the first recognised congregation of the religious refugees in England was established in 1547. Strype says that in that year a body of them met together at Canterbury; Jan Utenhove went there shortly after his arrival in this country, and probably took a great part in founding the Walloon Church there, which had as its first minister François du Rivière, who, two years later, occupied a similar position in the French and Walloon Church in London, established in 1549. There was another at Southampton. The refugees from France had greatly increased in numbers in consequence of the persecution of Henry II., and there were in 1548 over five thousand Netherlands in London, a large proportion of them being Walloons. By the intervention of the Duchess of Suffolk Edward VI. favoured them, and the Privy Council agreed to give them part of the church of the dissolved monastery of the Augustine Friars, and this grant was confirmed by letters patent in 1550; it was ordered that the church should have a superintendent and four ministers, and that it should be a body corporate. The first superintendent was Joannes A'Lasco, all the foreign churches in London being under his charge. Divine service for these strangers was first celebrated in Austin Friars on Sept. 21st, 1550. A'Lasco translated the Psalms into Dutch verse, and set them to music for the use of the congregation. On the accession of Queen Mary an order was issued that all Netherland and other Protestant refugees should leave the kingdom within twenty-four days, and so the congregation was dissolved, and they settled in Emden, where they soon re-established their church. At Norwich, too, there had been a large body of Flemish weavers, and also at Glastonbury; these latter removed to Frankfurt. The letters patent of Edward VI. are still preserved in the archives at Austin Friars. On the accession of Elizabeth, the religious refugees were allowed to return to London and resume the use of their church, but instead of being a body corporate, they had to submit to the supervision of the Bishop of London. In 1561, there being two hundred refugee families in Sandwich, by royal letters patent they were allowed the use of the aisle in St. Clement's Church on payment of forty shillings a year. In the same year Queen Elizabeth ordered that the whole of the crypt in Canterbury Cathedral should be given up to the French and Flemish refugees; the main body was occupied by their silk looms, and the south side aisle was set apart as their place of worship, and in it they still regularly assemble; it has been recently restored. There were many other Walloon settlements in different parts of England. At the present day weekly service in Dutch is conducted only at Austin Friars; at Norwich there is still a small sum left of church property, which is divided among a few poor descendants of Dutch settlers, and once a year the minister of Austin Friars goes there and holds a service in Dutch. In 1866 the land on which some almshouses of the Austin Friars Church were built was needed by the railway, and the almshouses were rebuilt at Old Charlton, Kent, and afford a home to ten members of the church. At the present time the congregation at Austin Friars varies from fifty to eighty persons. A very interesting account of the Church and its past history was published in 1885 by Mr. W. J. C. Moens.

Walpurgis or Walpurga, Sr., was born in England, but spent most of her time in Germany, assisting her brother, Sr. WILLIBALD [q.v.] and her uncle, Sr. BONIFACE [q.v.], in their missionary labours. About the middle of the eighth century she became the Abbess of a convent at Heidenheim, in Franconia. She is generally considered the authoress of a Latin description of the Travels of St. Willibald. She died about 777, and after her death many chapels were built in her honour. Of the origin of the curious legends and customs connected with the so-called Walpurgisnacht, April 30th, very little is known. It is said that May 1st was a very important day for the German farmer, who signs contracts and begins to arrange for the work of the summer. With a view to harassing him and doing him mischief, Satan and the witches were supposed to meet the night before on the Brocken and lay plans for his ruin. Hence the custom of burning straw in some parts of Germany on that night, which was supposed to have the power of dispersing all evil beings—a custom still, though very rarely, preserved.

Walstan, Sr., Confessor.—A saint of Norfolk, born of a rich family, who renounced his wealth at the age of twelve and became a farm-labourer at Taverham, near Cossey. He died May 30th, 1016, and was buried at his native place, Baber. Two wells in the neighbourhood bore his name and were the object of pilgrimages for the cure of palsies, lameness, and blindness. He died in a field, in the act of mowing, and was for a long time looked on in Norfolk as the patron saint of farm-labourers.

Walton, BRIAN, D.D., Bishop of Chester, born at Cleveland, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, in 1600. He was educated first at Oxford and then at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1623. He was ordained, and, while serving his first curacy, was also a schoolmaster in Suffolk; he then became Curate at All Hallows, Bread Street, and in 1626 was made Rector of St. Martin's Orgar in London and Sandon in Essex. About the same time he was appointed Chaplain to the King and made a Prebendary of St. Paul's. When the Puritans gained the upper-hand he was ejected from all his appointments, and fled to Oxford; while here he spent his time in collecting the materials for his celebrated Polyglot which has made his name famous. Several Polyglot Bibles had been published in foreign countries before Walton's, which appeared between the years 1654-57; but all critics allow that his is by far the most useful, and shows the greatest scholarship. It is supposed to be the first book printed in England by subscription. Nine languages are used in the course of the work, as many as seven being sometimes given in one page. On the Restoration he was made Chaplain to Charles II., and in September, 1661, was consecrated Bishop of Chester in Westminster Abbey, but died in the following November. Dr. Walton published, in 1655, as a help to the study of his Bible, an Introduction to Oriental Literature.

Walton, IZAAK, best known as "the Father of Angling," but also as a Christian biographer, was born in Stafford in 1593; died 1683. Little is known of him before his marriage, in 1626, to Rachel Floud, a descendant of Archbishop Cranmer. From her uncle, George Cranmer, who had been the pupil of RICHARD HOOKER [q.v.], he probably gained the material for his celebrated Life of Hooker. Walton's first literary effort was an elegy on his friend Dr. Donne, whose life he wrote as a preface to the volume of sermons published in 1640. Walton's "Lives" comprise those of Donne, Hooker, Sir Henry Wotton, George Herbert, and Sanderson Bishop of Lincoln. Walton's second wife was Anne Ken, half-sister to the celebrated Non-juring Bishop of Bath and Wells. He is buried in Winchester Cathedral, as, at the time of his death, he was residing with his son-in-law, Dr. Hawkins, Prebendary of Winchester. His greatest fame rests on his Complete Angler, or Contemplative Man's Recreation—a beautiful pastoral, breathing forth the love of the Creator and His works, and full of delightful descriptions of rural scenery.

Warburton, WILLIAM, Bishop of Gloucester, was born at Newark-upon-Trent, in 1698, died at Gloucester, 1779. He was the son of an attorney, and his father, wishing to train him in the same profession, apprenticed him, in 1714, to an attorney at East Markham. He was there five years, and then gained admittance in one of the courts at Westminster; but, having by this time come to the conclusion that his talents were not suited to the law, he gave it up, and in 1723 took deacon's orders. Two years later he published his first literary work, entitled Miscellaneous Translations, in Prose and Verse, from Roman Authors, with a dedication to Sir Robert Sutton, who, in return, presented him, on his being admitted to priest's orders in 1726, with a small living. In 1727 he began to distinguish himself as an original author by his Inquiries into the Causes of Prodiges and Miracles, which he dedicated to Sir Robert Sutton. His patron gave him the living of Brant Broughton, in Lincolnshire, and by his interest at Cambridge caused Warburton's name to be placed on the list of the King's Masters of Arts, a favour which proved of great service in his after-career, supplying to some extent the position he would have lost by not having received a university education. In 1736 appeared his Alliance between Church and State; or, the Necessity and Equity of an Established Religion and a Test Law, demonstrated from the essence and end of civil society upon the fundamental principles of the law of nature and nations, which passed through four editions during the life of the author, though it is said to have given satisfaction neither to the upholders of the Church nor to those who advocated religious liberty. The first volume of his chief work was published in 1738, under the title of the Divine Legation of Moses Demonstrated on the Principles of a Religious Deist, from the Omission of the Doctrine of a Future State of Rewards and Punishments in the Jewish Dispensation. This brought a storm of abuse upon his head from all Church parties; but, nothing daunted, Warburton remained firm to his opinions, and published a Vindication of them. In 1740 he wrote a defence of Pope's Essay on Man in a leading journal called Works of the Learned, which so enchanted Pope that he bequeathed Warburton half his library and the copyright of such of his works already printed as were not otherwise disposed of. In 1746 he became Preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and in the following year appeared as an editor of Shakespeare. His name was by this time famous, and his rise in the clerical profession was rapid. He became Prebendary of Gloucester in 1753, King's Chaplain in 1754, Prebendary of Durham the same year, Dean of Bristol in 1757, and Bishop of Gloucester in 1759. He died at Gloucester in 1779, and was buried in the cathedral. After his death his works were collected and published in six volumes by his friend Bishop Hurd, and a biographical memoir, forming a seventh volume, appeared some years later. Doctor Johnson in his life of Pope thus describes Warburton: "He was a man of vigorous faculties, a mind fervid and vehement, supplied by incessant and unlimited inquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge, which yet had not oppressed his imagination, nor clouded his perspicuity. To every work he brought a memory full fraught, together with a fancy fertile of original combinations, and at once exerted the powers of the scholar, the reasoner, and the wit. But his knowledge was too multifarious to be always exact, and his pursuits were too eager to be always cautious. His abilities gave him a haughty consequence which he disdained to correct and mollify; and his impatience of opposition disposed him to treat his adversaries with contemptuous superiority, as made his readers commonly his enemies, and excited against the advocate some who favoured the cause."

Warburton Lectures.—This lectureship, the object of which is "to prove the truth of revealed religion in general and of the Christian in particular from the completion of those prophecies in the Old and New Testaments which relate to the Christian Church, especially to the apostasy of Papal Rome," was established in 1768 by Bishop Warburton. It is endowed with the dividends of £500 Consols, and is tenable for four years. The lectures are to be delivered in the chapel of the Society of Lincoln's Inn on the first Sunday after Michaelmas Term and the Sundays before and after Hilary Term.

Ward, SETH, Bishop of Salisbury, and the most noted mathematician and astronomer of his time [b. at Buntingford, in Hertfordshire, in 1617; d. in 1689]. He was educated at Sydney College, Cambridge, where he applied himself specially to the study of mathematics, and became a Fellow. In 1643 he, with the Master of his college and several other Fellows, was imprisoned and deprived of his fellowship for refusing to subscribe to the Solemn League and Covenant, and, in conjunction with Isaac Barrow and Peter Gunning, wrote a treatise against the Covenant. For a time he carried on his mathematical studies with Mr. William Aughtred, at Aldbury in Surrey, and mastered his Clavis Mathematica. At the end of the Civil War he became Chaplain to Lord Wenman, and in 1649, by shifting his opinions and casting in his lot with the Commonwealth, he obtained the chair of Astronomy at the University of Oxford, on the ejection therefrom of Mr. Greaves. He then associated himself with Wadham College, and took his M.A. the same year, and his D.D. in 1654. In 1656 he obtained of Dr. Brownrigg, the silenced Bishop of Exeter, the Precatorship of that cathedral, and the following year was elected President of Jesus College. In 1659 he was chosen by a majority of the Fellows, President of Trinity; at the Restoration he was forced to restore these posts to their rightful owners, but was presented to the Rectory of St. Lawrence Jewry, in London, and confirmed in his post of Precator at Exeter. In 1661 he was made a Fellow of the Royal Society, and soon after Dean of Exeter; and in 1662, on the translation of Bishop Gauden to Worcester, he became Bishop of Exeter, from which See he was translated to that of Salisbury on the death of Bishop Hyde in 1667. In 1671 Charles II. made him Chancellor of the Order of the Garter. He was distinguished for his power as an orator, and for soundness of argument.

His chief theological works are: A Philosophical Essay towards an Erection of the Being and Attributes of God, the Immortality of the Souls of Men, and the Truth and Authority of the Scripture, published in 1652; a volume of Sermons [1674], as Against the Resistance of Lawful Powers, Against the Anti-Scripturists, etc. His most celebrated writings, however, are astronomical.

Ward was a very munificent man; he gave a considerable sum of money towards making the river at Salisbury navigable to Christ Church in Hampshire; and in 1679 he bestowed £1,000 on Sydney College, Cambridge. In 1683 he built a hospital or college at Salisbury for the benefit of ten poor widows of clergymen, and the following year erected at his birthplace almshouses "for four ancient men and four ancient women who had lived well, but by misfortune brought to poverty."

Wardlaw, RALPH, D.D., Scottish divine [b. at Dalkeith, 1779; d. at Glasgow, 1853]. In 1791 he entered the University of Glasgow, and afterwards attended for five years the divinity lectures of the Secession Church, which decided him to become a minister of the Scottish Independent congregation. He began to preach in 1800, and a church having been built for him in Glasgow, he took charge of the congregation there in 1803, and continued to hold the office for more than fifty years. In 1811 he was elected Professor of Systematic Theology in the Theological Academy of the Scottish Congregationalists, then established in Glasgow, and this post also he held until his death. In 1833 he delivered a course of lectures in London in defence of Congregationalism, and was appointed in 1839 to appear in London to reply to some lectures, defending Church Establishments, delivered by Dr. Chalmers. Wardlaw wrote many controversial and theological works, remarkable for learning, vigour, and grace of style. The chief of these are Discourses on the Socinian Controversy; On the Nature and Extent of the Atonement of Christ; Christian Ethics; Congregational Independency; and numerous essays and discourses.

Warham, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Oakley, in Hampshire, about 1450, died at St. Stephen's, near Canterbury, in 1532. He was educated at Winchester, and afterwards at New College, where he obtained a Fellowship in 1475, and a few years later the degree of LL.D. He was ordained, and is supposed to have possessed some living; but he was for the most part employed in the business of the Court of Arches. He was a member of Sir Edward Poyning's mission to Burgundy, on the question of the support given by Margaret, the Dowager-Duchess, to Perkin Warbeck, and Bacon gives one of his speeches on this occasion in the life of Henry VII. He was in high favour with the King, and obtained promotion quickly—being Keeper of the Great Seal, Lord Chancellor, Bishop of London, and Archbishop of Canterbury, in the course of a very few years. When Henry VIII. came to the throne Warham was made to resign several offices in favour of Wolsey, a former pupil. This was partly because Warham had opposed the marriage of Henry, when Prince of Wales, with Catherine of Aragon, his brother's widow. He and the Cardinal were jealous of one another, and the question of rights—one being Archbishop and one Cardinal—was always arising. But Warham lived to see his rival disgraced, and was afterwards even again offered the Chancellorship, but declined it on account of his age and ill-health. He was a generous patron of Erasmus, who dedicated to him the collection of St. Jerome's works which he edited.

Warrants, Warranty.—A term used in the Thirty-nine Articles to signify a proof or security to the truth of a doctrine. Thus in Article VIII. it is written that "the Three Creeds . . . ought thoroughly to be received and believed: for they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture;" while Article XXII. says that "The Romish doctrine concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping and Adoration . . . is a fond thing, vainly invented and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture."

Washburn, EDWARD ARIEL, D.D. [b. at Boston, Massachusetts, April, 1819; d. at New York, February, 1881], studied at Andover and New Haven, and entered the Congregational ministry; but soon left this and became a clergyman in the Episcopal Church. From 1845 till 1851 he was Rector of St. Paul's, Newburyport; subsequently he travelled in Egypt, Palestine, India, and China, and on his return in 1853 was appointed to the rectory of St. John's, Hartford. In 1862 he was removed to St. Mark's, Philadelphia, and in 1865 to Calvary Church, New York, where he spent sixteen years in unwearying labour, attracting large numbers by the earnestness and depth of his sermons. He published only one volume, The Social Law of God; but he wrote numbers of essays, reviews, and commentaries, and some of his sermons have been collected and published since his death, as The Great Social Problems of the Day, published in 1884.

Watch-night Service.—That kept in the night between the old and new year.

The watch-night service was originally started by the Methodists under Wesley, but is now very generally adopted in the Established Church under the elasticity allowed by the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act. The form of service varies a good deal. A usual plan is to begin with the Litany, followed by an address, then a few minutes' silent prayer until the striking of midnight. Then follows the Te Deum, or sometimes Holy Communion.

Waterland, DANIEL, D.D., an English theologian and divine [b. at Waseley, Lincolnshire, of which his father was rector, 1683; d. in London, 1740]. He studied at Magdalen College, Cambridge, of which he was made Fellow in 1704; took orders, and after some years spent in tutorship became Rector of Ellingham, to which he was presented by the Earl of Suffolk in 1713. Here he published Advice to a Young Student, with a Method of Study for the first Four Years, which brought him under the notice of George I., who made him his chaplain in 1717, and conferred on him the degree of D.D. Waterland made his first appearance as a controversialist in 1718, when he criticised a book by Dr. Whitby on Bull's defence of the Nicene Creed, afterwards publishing his criticisms in a book called A Defence of Christ's Divinity. He was attacked by Dr. Clarke and other Arians, and a sharp contest was maintained, much being written on both sides. In 1721 Waterland was presented by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's to the rectory of St. Augustine's and St. Faith's, and in 1723 received the Chancellorship of York Cathedral; in 1727 he was made Canon of Windsor; in 1728, Archdeacon of Middlesex; and in 1730, Vicar of Twickenham, which he held with the two latter appointments. During the later years of his life he engaged in a controversy with the Freethinkers, and with many other theologians who were opposed in any respects to his doctrines. Besides the works above mentioned he wrote A Critical History of the Athanasian Creed; Scripture Vindicated; The Doctrine of the Holy Trinity Asserted; and A Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist, as laid down in Scripture and Antiquity. Some volumes of his sermons were also published.

Watson, JOSHUA.—A distinguished layman of the Church of England, born in London, 1771, died at Clapton, 1855. For half a century he was one of the most conspicuous movers in all ecclesiastical work, encouraging it by his exemplary piety, his unwearied zeal, and his clear judgment. He was one of the founders, and the first treasurer, of the National Society for the Education of the Poor, and also of the Additional Curates' Fund; was one of the largest benefactors of the Clergy Orphan Corporation, a munificent church builder, and editor of one of the most popular manuals of devotion, namely, Help's Offices. In all the controversies of his time—e.g., the Ecclesiastical Commission and the Oxford Tracts—Mr. Watson took a leading part, his opinion being highly valued by the bishops and the leading Church statesmen, and his name will descend to lovers of the Anglican Church with those of Walton, Evelyn, and Robert Nelson.

Watson, RICHARD, Bishop of Llandaff, was born at Heversham, Westmoreland, in 1737, died 1816. His father was a clergyman and master of a free grammar school, at which Richard received his early education. In 1754 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, as a sizar, and there had a hard struggle on account of his poverty. He was distinguished from the first for his diligent application to his work, took his degrees regularly, became a College Tutor, and in 1760 obtained a Fellowship. Four years later he was appointed Professor of Chemistry to the University, a very singular choice, as he had never studied the subject. He was not, however, soon daunted by difficulties, but started for Paris, where he worked hard in a laboratory for fourteen months. When he came back he was able not only to lecture on the subject, but even wrote books, which were popular for some time, was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and often contributed articles to its collection of Philosophical Transactions. In 1771 he was appointed Regius Professor of divinity, and seems to have known as much Divinity as he did chemistry a few years before. He was often called the "self-taught professor," and prided himself on the title. But his political speeches and sermons made his name especially famous. The first effort of this kind that he made was in a sermon preached before the University on the anniversary of the French Revolution, which was printed under the title of The Principles of the Revolution Vindicated. He had already appeared as an opponent to Gibbon, to whom he had addressed a series of letters, entitled An Apology for Christianity. The patronage of the Duke of Rutland was exerted to obtain his promotion to the See of Llandaff, in which he succeeded Bishop Barrington in 1782; and he was permitted to hold at the same time the Archdeaconry of Ely, his professorship, and other ecclesiastical benefices. And yet we find him often grumbling at having to sacrifice himself to his principles, and being left in poverty. Soon after this his income received a large addition by the bequest of a valuable estate from a former pupil at Cambridge, worth £20,500. At the same time he addressed a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, suggesting the advisability of equalising the value of church benefices. During the illness of the King in 1788 Watson, in a speech in the House of Lords, strongly defended the right of the Prince of Wales to the Regency, in opposition to the policy maintained by Pitt. In 1796 he appeared a second time as the defender of revealed religion in his Apology for the Bible, designed as an answer to Paine's Age of Reason. In 1798 he published an address to the people of Great Britain on the danger which threatened their country from the influence of those principles which had occasioned the Revolution in France. GILBERT WAKEFIELD [q.v.] published an answer to this publication, for which he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Watson always continued to be the advocate for liberality, both in politics and in religion; but his fears from the ascendancy of French principles were expressed in a publication under the title of The Substance of a Speech intended to have been spoken in the House of Lords, Nov. 22nd, 1803. The latter part of his life he spent in retirement at Calgarth Park, in Westmoreland. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote others, for the most part political sermons; also Considerations on the Expediency of Revising the Liturgy and Articles of the Church of England, by a Consistent Protestant, and several letters, signed at the time "A Christian Whig." After his death his autobiographical memoir was edited by his son.

Watts, ISAAC, the well-known Puritan divine and hymn-writer, was born at Southampton, July 17th, 1674, died in 1748. He was brought up a rigid Nonconformist, and from his earliest years determined to become a Dissenting minister. He was educated in his native town, and at the age of sixteen was sent to an academy in London kept by Mr. Thomas Rowe, an Independent minister. He remained there for four years, studying so hard as to injure his constitution. He returned home in 1694 for two years, and during this time most of his hymns, and several other works, were composed. In 1696 he became tutor to the son of Sir John Hartopp, of Stoke Newington. In 1698 he was chosen assistant to Dr. Chauncey, minister of the Independent Church in Mark Lane, but continued his duties as tutor till he succeeded Dr. Chauncey in 1702. He became very ill, and an assistant was provided. He remained sick for some time, and in 1712 was attacked by a violent fever, from which he never entirely recovered. He went to visit Sir Thomas Abney, at Theobalds, intending to stay a week; but remained there till his death, in 1748. He officiated in London when he was well enough, but if prevented refused to receive his salary, and devoted himself to literary work. His books were formerly very popular, but have now been superseded. The chief are: Logic, which was at one time used as a text-book at Oxford University; Psalms and Hymns; a number of works for young children, among which are his Divine and Moral Songs; An Essay towards the Encouragement of Charity Schools; Three Dissertations relating to the Christian Doctrine of the Trinity; Horæ Lyricæ; Sermons; etc.

Week.—A period of seven days; also used in the Bible to signify a heptade of anything. The antiquity of the custom of measuring time by seven days is certain; it has even been said that our first parents were commanded to do so in commemoration of the time employed in the creation of the world, and many instances in the early chapters of Genesis testify to its use. It is in use among all the Semitic races, among the Egyptians and Persians, which leaves no doubt of its antiquity; other tribes among which it is found may have adopted it in modern times from the people with whom they have come in contact. Whether the division was made by the Hebrews purely for theological reasons, or whether it was a natural division, hallowed by associations, is open to doubt. The Jews seem to have made no distinction between the six days of the week, the only division being that occasioned by the SABBATH [q.v.], the other days were reckoned merely by ordinal numbers.

Wenceslaus, Sr., Duke and patron saint of Bohemia, martyr; born in the beginning of the ninth century. He was the son of a Christian prince, Duke Wratislaus, and of his wife, Drahomira, a pagan. He was sent to Prague to be brought up in the Christian religion by his grandmother Ludmilla; when old enough he was sent to a college at Budweis, distant about sixty miles from Prague, and led a grave, modest, and pure life. His father died when he was still young, and his mother became regent, and at once repealed the laws her husband had made in favour of the Christians, and a great persecution and slaughter of the Christians followed. Ludmilla then got Wenceslaus to take the reins of government into his own hands, and helped him with her advice; the nobles, however, decided to divide the kingdom between him and his younger brother, Boleslaus, who had been educated as a pagan, and in whom consequently Drahomira found an ally in her crimes. They plotted against the life of Ludmilla, and she was strangled with her own veil in her chapel. Wenceslaus turned his mind to the reformation of several abuses in his country and governed with great wisdom, but among his subjects there were very many who were averse to any changes, and who mocked at his prayers and religious life, saying that such employments were unfit for a prince and incompatible with the courage and policy necessary to govern a state. His mother and brother were concerting plans to murder him when they learnt that he had begged the Pope to send some Benedictine monks to his kingdom in order that he might spend the rest of his life with them in religious retreat. As, however, there was some delay in their arrival Drahomira and Boleslaus grew impatient, and as Boleslaus had just had a son born to him they invited Wenceslaus to be present at an entertainment of rejoicing at the birth. Wenceslaus fell into the trap laid for him, and went. But at midnight he left the company to go as usual to his prayers in the church; his brother followed him and murdered him with his own hands. This was in the year 929.

Werburch or Wareburge, the patroness of Chester, lived in the seventh century, and was born at Stone in Staffordshire. She was the daughter of Wulfere, King of Mercia, and of St. Ermenilde, daughter of Ercombert, King of Kent. St. Werburch devoted herself to fasting and prayer, refusing all her suitors, till Werbode, a wicked knight of her father's Court, obtained the king's consent to his suit. Werburch's two elder brothers, Wulfade and Rufin, who had retired to be taught by St. Chad, Bishop of Lichfield, were strongly opposed to the match, so Werbode persuaded the king to murder them, which he did, but immediately repented, did penance, destroyed all idols, founded the Abbey of Peterborough and the Priory of Stone. Werburch now, for the first time, made known her wish to become a nun, and entered the abbey at Ely. She afterwards founded the monasteries of Trentham and of Hanbury, in Staffordshire, and of Weedon in Northamptonshire. She died at Trentham on Feb. 3rd, about the end of the seventh century, and was buried at Hanbury. Her body was removed in 875, for fear of the Danes, to West Chester, where a church was raised for it, which afterwards became the Cathedral. [CHESTER.]

Wesley, CHARLES, the well-known hymn-writer, was born in 1708, educated first at Westminster School, then at Christ Church, Oxford, after which his history becomes merged in that of his brother. In 1749 he married Miss Gwynne, a Welsh lady, and from that time confined his preaching almost entirely to London and Bristol. He had great talent for verse-writing; several of his hymns have taken their place among our sacred classics; and such poems as "Come, O Thou Traveller Unknown," will also hold their own. Charles Wesley was of quiet and domestic habits, with little ambition of power, pious even to fervency, but not averse to jocularity in its place; whereas John held laughter to be almost a sin. Charles Wesley died in 1788. His son, Samuel, belonged to the first rank of English musicians.

Wesley, REV. JOHN, A.M.—The second son of Saul and Susannah Wesley (b. at Epworth in Lincolnshire, June 17th (O. S.), 1703). At six years of age he nearly lost his life through the burning of the parsonage house, set on fire, according to his own account, by some of the ill-conditioned parishioners, who resented his father's plain speech. The memory was always potent in the child's imagination, who frequently refers to it in his writings. He was deeply religious from the beginning, and at eight years of age became a communicant. He was sent to Charterhouse, to which school, though he suffered a good deal from bullying, he was always affectionately attached, and used to visit it yearly to the end of his life. The big boys used to eat his meat, and he was very often reduced to a bit of bread for his day's meal; but he was hardy, and obeyed his father's strict command to run round the Charterhouse Gardens three times every morning. From the Charterhouse he went to Christ Church, Oxford, and in due time took his B.A. He soon became conspicuous as a scholar in the learned languages, but also for the religious earnestness of his life. He put away all acquaintances that he found injurious to his soul's health, new modelled his life so as to regulate his time, his studies, his expenses, and chose all his companions from among those that he thought likely to help his efficiency in the ministry, for which he was now zealously preparing. In 1725 he was ordained by Potter, then Bishop of Oxford, and officiated for a while as his father's curate. But in 1726 he was elected a Fellow of Lincoln College (taking his A.M. degree the same year), and became resident at Oxford as Greek Lecturer, and Moderator of the Pases. He wrote a form of prayer for his pupils, showing how desirous he was that they should be good as well as learned. His impressions deepened, and he joined an association which had been formed by his brother Charles, then an undergraduate of Christ Church, along with James Hervey, Whitfield, Morgan, and others. They met to read divinity on Sunday evenings, and classics on other days. And they also arranged to visit the prisoners in the castle, and the sick poor of the town. Then it came to Greek Testament readings very frequently on the week evenings instead of the classics. "We were now," he says, "about fifteen in number, all of one heart and of one mind." How the name of Methodists came to be applied to this little band has already been told [METHODISTS]; but in truth this little Oxford society, never exceeding thirty in number, had nothing in common with the Methodism which afterwards arose, save religious earnestness. It was of a most pronounced High Church character, had no organisation or bond of union, and hence its members became scattered in different directions. Whitfield bent in one direction and Wesley in another; Clayton remained High Church to the end; James Hervey became a fervid Evangelical Churchman; Gambold a Moravian bishop; Ingham a Dissenter. While thus the name once given to Wesley's friends remained, the Methodists he founded must not be confused, as they so often have been, with that Oxford company of which he was also the leading spirit.

One of his intimate friends at this time was Law, whose Serious Call had been one of the books which had most strongly impressed him. Twice or thrice in the year John and Charles Wesley had visited him, travelling for sixty miles on foot in order to save the more money for the poor. One day Law said to John, "You would have a philosophic religion, but there can be no such thing. Religion is the most plain, simple thing in the world. It is only—we love Him because He first loved us." This remark he never afterwards forgot. Another time Law saw him much depressed, and inquired the reason. "It is because I see so little fruit of my labours," was the answer. "My dear friend," said Law, "you reverse matters from their proper order. You are to follow the Divine light, wherever it leads you, in all your conduct. It is God alone that gives the blessing. I pray you, always mind your own work, and go on with cheerfulness, and God will take care of His."

Wesley's father wished his son to succeed him at Epworth, but he was so wedded to a college life and to the advantages he enjoyed of his retirement and his chosen companions, that he could not be persuaded to consent. His father died in 1735. He had desired John to present to Queen Caroline a book he had just finished, and he went to London for that purpose. There he was strongly solicited by Dr. Burton, one of the trustees for the new colony at Georgia, to go there and preach to the Indians. He refused at first, but afterwards consented; and on Oct. 14th, 1735, he sailed from Gravesend with his brother Charles and two other friends. They arrived at the Savannah in the February following, and preached to the people whom they found on landing, who were the more rejoiced, that means of grace had been scarce with them. Not finding any open door for the prosecution of work among the Indians, the two brothers laboured incessantly where they landed. "The inconveniences and dangers," says one of Wesley's biographers, "which he embraced that he might preach the Gospel and do good of every kind to all that would receive it at his hands: the exposing of himself to every change of season and inclemency of weather in the prosecution of his work, were conditions which few but himself could have submitted to. He frequently slept on the ground as he journeyed through the woods, covered with the nightly dews, and with his clothes and his hair frozen by the morning to the earth. He would wade through swamps and swim through rivers, and then travel till his clothes were dry. His health in the meantime, strange as it may seem, was uninterrupted." His work here was interrupted by a love-passage. He became attached to Miss Causton, the niece of the chief magistrate of Savannah, but eventually declined to marry her, on the advice of his friends. On this disappointment she married a Mr. Williamson, and Wesley refused to admit her to the Communion, upon which her husband indicted him for defamation. The affair was never brought to an issue, but was the occasion of Wesley leaving the colony, which he did on Dec. 3rd, 1737, "shaking the dust off his feet," to use his own expression.

During his voyage back to England Wesley became conscious of a great change in his religious feelings, which may be told in his own words. "It is upwards of two years since I left my native country in order to teach the Georgian Indians the nature of Christianity, but what have I learned myself in the meantime? Why, what I least of all suspected, that I, who went to America to convert others, was never converted myself. . . . All this time that I was at Savannah I was beating the air. Being ignorant of the righteousness of Christ, which by a living faith in Him bringeth salvation to every one that believeth, I sought to establish my own righteousness, and so laboured in the fire all my days."

He arrived in England Feb. 1st, 1738, and found that Whitfield had sailed for America the day before on purpose to assist him. It is characteristic of him that on his journey from Deal to London he preached and read prayers at several places. He was still under concern from a sense of sin and a want of assurance of forgiveness, but he says that the light came to him through the conversation of Peter Böhler, a Moravian, whom he renewed acquaintance with on his arrival. As he attended the afternoon services at St. Paul's he heard the 130th Psalm sung as an anthem, and the same evening he attended a religious meeting in Aldersgate Street, where one was reading Luther's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans. And he says, "I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ alone for salvation, and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins, even mine." This event he regarded as his conversion. During his absence the religious movement which began to be known by the name of Methodism had made great progress in London, Bristol, and other parts of the South of England, under the impulse of the enthusiastic preaching of Whitfield. With this enthusiasm Wesley now found himself in full accord, and under its influence he determined, three weeks after his "conversion," to retire for a short time to Germany. He hoped, he said, that the conversing with those holy men [the Moravians] who were themselves living witnesses of the power of faith, and yet able to bear with those who were weak, would be a means, under God, of establishing his soul. Accordingly, in June, 1738, he crossed to Rotterdam, and went on to Herrnhut, the Moravian settlement in Upper Lusatia, when Count Zinzendorf introduced him to the Prince Royal of Prussia, afterwards Frederick the Great. On his return to England in September, he heard that Whitfield had returned from Georgia, and they once more became intimately associated. From this time the history of Wesley becomes merged in that of Methodism, and we refer the reader to the article on that subject. [METHODISTS.] It only remains to note the main dates of the rest of his biography. He began his open-air preaching early in 1739, and the same year gave his sanction to lay-preaching, to the disgust of his High Church brother Samuel. In 1740 he broke with the Moravians, on what he regarded as doctrinal points, and from that time the two parties were in undisguised, and even bitter, hostility. Before the year was ended he had also broken with Whitfield, the result of which was a division of the new religionists into two permanently distinct bodies, though after a while the two men themselves renewed their personal friendship.

From that time his whole life was spent in hard labour for the consolidation of his new Society. He rode 40, 50, even 60 miles a day, reading as he rode, and preaching sometimes five times a day. Towards the end of his life he exchanged horseback for a chaise, and not the severest weather ever hindered him. His journals are filled with graphic accounts of his preachings. We extract his account of his visit to his native Epworth: "Sunday, June 6th, 1742. A little before the services began I went to Mr. Rowley, the curate, and offered to assist him, either by preaching or reading prayers. But he did not choose to accept of my assistance. The church was exceedingly full in the afternoon, a rumour being spread that I was to preach. After sermon, John Taylor stood in the churchyard, and gave notice as the people were coming out—"Mr. Wesley, not being permitted to preach in the church, designs to preach here at six o'clock." Accordingly by six o'clock I came, and found such a congregation as I believe Epworth never saw before. I stood near the east end of the church upon my father's tombstone, and said, 'The Kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.' Friday, the 11th, I preached again at Epworth, on Ezekiel's vision of the resurrection of the dry bones. And great indeed was the shaking among them; lamentation and great mourning were heard; God bowing their hearts, so that on every side, as with one accord, they lifted up their voice and wept aloud. Saturday, the 12th, I preached on the righteousness of the Law and the righteousness of Faith. While I was speaking, several dropped down as dead, and among the rest such a cry was heard of sinners groaning for the righteousness of faith as almost drowned my voice. But many of these soon lifted up their heads with joy and broke out into thanksgiving, being assured they now had the desire of their souls, the forgiveness of their sins."

In 1750 Wesley married Mrs. Vixelle, a widow with four children, having not long before written a tract recommending celibacy. The marriage was a most unhappy one. He had stipulated that he was not to preach or to travel less, but his wife became dissatisfied at his continual absences, and was even jealous. He had a high opinion of marital authority, and wrote to her to know him and know herself. "Suspect me no more, asperse me no more, provoke me no more. Do not any longer contend for the mastery; be content to be a private, insignificant person, known and loved by God and me," etc. In consequence she several times left him, and was induced to come back. But at length he besought her no more. "Non eam reliqui, non dimisi, non revocabo" he wrote ["I did not desert her, I did not dismiss her, I will not recall her"]. She died ten years later, in 1771.

Wesley himself lived twenty years longer, keeping up his indefatigable labours till the last. The amazing amount of work he got through could only be accomplished by the most rigid economy of time, and resolution in the use of it, under a strain that would have broken most men down; but his health only failed about three years before his death. In spite of this he still rose at four o'clock in the morning, and preached and travelled as usual until the Wednesday before his death, when he preached for the last time at Leatherhead, in Surrey. On Friday symptoms appeared which left little doubt as to the end, and the next four days were mainly occupied by him in praising God. He died about ten o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, March 2nd, 1791, in the 88th year of his age, and after lying in state in his ministerial robes at his chapel in City Road, was interred there on March 9th.

Westminster Abbey.—It is supposed that Sebert, King of the East Saxons, built a Church on the site of the present abbey some time during the seventh century, and this would seem probable, as his grave has always been shown there. In its neighbourhood sprang up a monastery founded by Edgar, the site of which in those days was insular, through the stream which, running down from the Hampstead hills, forked off into a delta, the one branch falling into the river on the site of Millbank Prison, the other near Whitehall. It was known as Thorn Ey, or the Isle of Thorns, and was afterwards called Westminster, to distinguish it from the Cathedral of St. Paul, which was the Eastminster. This structure was destroyed by the Danes in the ninth century. It was rebuilt by Edward the Confessor between the years 1055 and 1065, but of his work little now remains beyond the Pyx-house, which lies to the south of the present abbey, adjoining the chapter-house. It was dedicated to St. Peter, and consecrated on the feast of Christmas, 1065, in the presence of King Edward and many of his nobles; he died five days after, and was buried in the Abbey Church, which he had rebuilt. His tomb is one of the most conspicuous objects in the building. From that time the Abbey became to the English people the most sacred spot in the country, as, groaning under the rule of the Norman conquerors, they looked back to the days of the Confessor as the golden age. On the first anniversary of the consecration, namely on Christmas Day, 1066, William of Normandy was crowned king of the nation which he had conquered. Since him, all the Sovereigns of England have been crowned there. Edward I. brought the famous coronation stone from the Abbey of Scone, and had the coronation chair made which covers it, and on which the Sovereign is still crowned.

Henry III. built most of Westminster Abbey as it now stands; he pulled down the greater part of the Confessor's work, and erected a chapel to the Virgin at the east end in 1220. The Abbey was completed in 1285, in the reign of Edward I. The western parts of the nave and aisle were erected between 1340 and 1483. Henry VII. rebuilt the Lady Chapel of Henry III., and it is called after his name; it stands behind the head of the cross, in the form of which the abbey is constructed. With the exception of the two western towers, the upper parts of which were built by Sir Christopher Wren, Westminster Abbey remains in outward aspect much as Henry VII. left it. Inside, the Abbey is at once imposing and inspiring; it was at one time the burial-place of the English kings, and now it is a mark of national honour to be buried there. The chapel of Edward the Confessor contains his shrine, and the altar-tombs of Edward I., Henry III., Henry V., and Edward III. In Henry VII.'s Chapel, Henry himself, Edward VI., James I., Charles II., William and Mary, Queen Anne, Georges I. and II. were buried, and in the aisles adjoining are buried Mary and Elizabeth, and Mary, Queen of Scots. This is the Chapel of the Order of the Bath. Poets' Corner, which forms the most southern portion of the arm of the cross, contains memorials to the most eminent British poets; here, too, are the graves of Chaucer, Dryden, Dickens, Handel, Sheridan, Campbell, Garrick, Samuel Johnson, Macaulay, etc. In other parts are the tombs of Pitt, Fox, Chatham, Wilberforce, Livingstone. The monuments in the north transept have caused that part to be called "Statesmen's Corner." In the north aisle behind the choir is "Musicians' Corner," with the graves of Purcell, Croft, Blow, Bennett, and others. At the west end of the south aisle is "New Poets' Corner" with monuments to Keble, Wordsworth, Kingsley, Maurice, and others. South of the Abbey are the cloisters, which also contain many graves of interest, and the architecture of which is exquisitely beautiful.

The Abbey, as the name implies, was a monastery ruled by an abbot. The present Deanery, Cloisters, Chapter-house, and other adjacent buildings, form part of what was once this great Benedictine Abbey. The Abbots of Westminster were mitred, and of almost as much dignity as bishops, ranking only second to those of St. Albans. Like Holyrood, this Abbey was enclosed within the precincts of the Royal Palace. Not even the Archbishop could officiate in the Abbey without his leave except at a Coronation. Until 1642 the Regalia were kept here, and though they are now lodged in the Tower, they are placed under the care of the Dean before a Coronation. On the Dissolution of the Monasteries by Henry VIII., a monk of Westminster lived seventy years longer, dying at the age of ninety at the village of Westmeon, Hants, quite blind, reverently tended by a Roman Catholic gentleman there.

Westminster is, like Windsor, a Royal Peculiar; it has a Dean (whose income is £2,000 per annum), an archdeacon, six canons, and six minor canons. For a short time only was it under a bishop. Bishop Thirlby was consecrated in 1540, and remained Bishop of Westminster, which included all Middlesex except Fulham, for ten years, when he was translated to Norwich.

The Memorials of this Abbey, by Dean Stanley, is one of the most delightful works in the language. The daughter of Dean Bradley has also written a very charming handbook.

Westminster Assembly. [ASSEMBLY, WESTMINSTER.]

Westminster Confession.—A confession of faith drawn up by the Westminster Assembly, and completed Dec. 4th, 1646, adopted by the Scotch Church in 1647, and by the Long Parliament in 1648. It is based upon the Scriptures, and upon the Irish Articles drawn up by Archbishop Ussher in 1615. [PROTESTANT CONFESSION, par. 12.] The Presbyterian Church of Scotland has [in 1874] made additions to it on the doctrines of Redemption, Divine Decrees, Man's Total Depravity, Salvation of Infants, and Civil Magistrates. The Westminster Confession has also been adopted, with modifications, by the Baptists and by the Welsh Methodists. It is reckoned to be the best existing Calvinistic Confession.

Westminster School.—It would appear that a school was attached to the Abbey of St. Peter's from its first foundation, but we have very few trustworthy notices left to show us the character of that institution. Dean Stanley, in his Memorials of Westminster Abbey, after describing the cloisters, adds: "In the north cloister, close by the entrance of the church, where the monks usually walked, sat the prior. In the western cloister sat the 'Master of the Novices' with his disciples. This was the first beginning of Westminster School." But the actual greatness of the school dates from no earlier period than the reigns of Henry VIII. and his daughter Elizabeth. Henry, out of the revenues of the Abbey which he had seized, provided a certain endowment for the newly created Chapter, but charged its revenue with the maintenance of a master and scholars. Elizabeth gave form to her father's scheme, settled statutes for the school, and arranged for the yearly election of the Queen's scholars to the two royal colleges of the Trinity, at Cambridge, and Christ Church, Oxford. These statutes constituted an "archididasculus" and an "hypodidasculus" (as they learnedly designate the master and under-master), forty Queen's scholars and eighty "pensionarii," "oppidani," and "peregrini," as members of the school. The whole charge of the school fell on the income of the Dean and Chapter, and continued to do so until the new scheme was put in force by the Royal Commission of 1862. Until this time the nomination of boys as King's or Queen's scholars rested with the Dean and members of the Chapter, but now admission to the college is gained only by competitive examination; the competition is open to those who have been at the school at least a twelvemonth and are under fifteen years of age. The Queen's scholars, who now number forty, live together in college, and are distinguished by cap and gown and white neck-cloth; in the Abbey they wear white surplices, as being part of the foundation of the Collegiate Church. Since 1872 the studentships at Oxford and the scholarships at Cambridge have been thrown open to competition among the whole school. The College Hall, where the scholars dine, was originally the refectory of the abbot's house, and dates from the reign of Edward III.; it is said to have been built by the same Nicholas Littleington to whom the Jerusalem Chamber and a great part of the deanery are ascribed. On each side are two long tables of chestnut wood, taken from the wreck of one of the vessels belonging to the Spanish Armada. The schoolroom was originally the dormitory of the monks. Many old customs are still kept up in the school: for instance, Latin prayers are used at the beginning and end of school. The prayers are said by the captain of the school and three monitors in turn, each taking a week; the monitor kneels in the centre of the school, with his face turned to the east, the headmaster, the usher, and the other masters kneeling in file behind him.

At Westminster School there is a custom which dates from its very foundation, and is prescribed in the statutes of its royal foundress, of performing before Christmas a play from Terence or Plautus. There are now added to the performance a prologue and epilogue, also in Latin, the former recounting the events of interest to the school during the past twelve months, the latter satirising the political and social events of the day.

The nearness of the school to the Court of Whitehall, and the fame of its teachers, made Westminster for two centuries after its foundation the chosen seminary of the English nobles. Its numbers increased from 200 boys under Dr. Busby, to twice that number in the next century, and remained over 300 so late as 1814. From that time onward the school rapidly wasted away, and was likely to have fallen into entire decay had not fresh blood and new measures been introduced. The reasons for this decay are not far to seek: the disadvantage of a school buried in old and highly unsuitable buildings in the heart of an ever-growing city; the rivalry of Eton and Harrow; the great growth of modern schools of large size and resources; and, last but not least, the conservative spirit and nature of the teaching maintained at Westminster, and the entire dependence of the school on the bounty and enterprise of the Abbey Chapter, are among the more obvious. Nor could the system which confined the selection of the candidates for the headmastership to those educated at Westminster fail to be a source of weakness to a declining school. It may, however, fairly be hoped that the separation of the school from the Abbey, and its independent endowment, however much to be regretted for sentimental reasons, will prove of lasting benefit.

Amongst the famous scholars of Westminster we may name William Camden, Ben Jonson, Dryden, George Herbert, Cowper, Southey, Cowley, Gibbon, Froude, Sir Christopher Wren, John Locke, Horne Tooke, Warren Hastings, etc.

Wetstein, JOHN JAMES, was born at Basle in 1693, died at Amsterdam in 1754. His uncle was a famous professor of divinity in that town, and John received most of his early education under him; while Buxtorf taught him Hebrew. In 1713 he was admitted into the Church, and from that time devoted his life to the study of one subject—the genuineness and authenticity of the commonly received text of the Greek Scriptures. He visited most of the countries in Europe in order to examine MSS. in the different libraries. He was in England for this purpose three times; and once, in 1720, was employed by Bentley, who himself published an edition of the Greek Testament. In 1730 Wetstein published Prolegomena to a new edition of the Greek text, which created so much stir and dissatisfaction amongst the clergy of Switzerland that the author was obliged to leave the country. He settled in Amsterdam, where he obtained the post of Professor of Philosophy and History at one of the universities. The Basle Senate offered to allow him to return, but he refused. His edition of the Greek Testament, on which he had spent many years of study and research, appeared two years before his death. It is very rare now, but in spite of some errors is valuable to the student.

Wette, WILHELM MARTIN LEBERECHE DE, one of the most brilliant theologians of modern Germany, was born at Ulla, near Weimar, in 1780, died at Basle in 1849. He was educated at Jena University, and in 1807 became Extraordinary Professor of Philosophy at Heidelberg, and two years later Professor of Theology. In 1810 he was made professor at the new university of Berlin, but was deprived of his post nine years after on account of a letter which he had written to the mother of Karl Ludwig Sand, an Erlangen student who had murdered August von Kotzebue. In this letter De Wette, though he blamed the murderer, said that the crime was due to patriotism, and therefore was not so bad as had been stated. On his ejection from Berlin he went to Weimar, and in 1822 was called to be Professor of Theology at Basle. He became Rector of the University in 1849, but died the same year.

De Wette was the author of Contribution to the Introduction to the New Testament [1805], Contribution to the Introduction to the Old Testament [1806], Commentary on the Psalms [1811], Commentary on the Expiatory Death of Jesus Christ [1814], Compendium of Christian Dogmatics [1813], Christian Ethics [1827], Religion, its Essence and Formal Manifestations [1827], Essence of Christian Faith [1848], etc.

De Wette is one of the leaders of the modern Rationalistic school of Germany. Thus he denied the Mosiac authorship of the Pentateuch, assigning Genesis to the time of David, Deuteronomy to that of Josiah. He also denied the Messianic character of the Psalms, further than holding that Christianity answered to the ideal future which the prophets set forth. Of miracles he spoke somewhat doubtfully, but settled down to the conviction that, though not historically true, they were symbolic of truth. Of Christianity as a practical system he always spoke with enthusiasm, as well as of the character and person of Christ. In fact, he adopted as his own view the expression of the Apostle, that there is no salvation but in the Name of Jesus Christ, and Him crucified, which he interpreted as the assertion that all nobility of character, all spiritual health, lies in the formation in each man of the Christ-spirit of self-sacrifice.

Whately, RICHARD, Archbishop of Dublin [b. 1787, d. 1863].—One of the leaders of popular religious thought in this century. His father was a Prebendary of Bristol, and Richard was the youngest of a large family. He was entered at Oriel College, Oxford, in 1805, and became a Fellow in 1811. There, in union with Davison, the author of Discourses on Prophecy, and Copleston, then Provost of Oriel, afterwards Bishop of Llandaff, he founded what is known as the "Early Oriel School." To this school belonged Arnold, who came as a youthful scholar of Corpus in 1815; Hampden, afterwards Bishop of Hereford; and for a short time J. H. Newman. Keble was a Fellow of Oriel at the time, but always stood aloof from this society. To these names is to be added that of Dr. Hawkins, who succeeded Copleston as Provost in 1828, and held the post until 1882—a man of powerful influence in his time, who, surviving his fellows, still maintained their liberal principles even when the potent influence of Newman was at its height. The most popular writer of the school was Whately. The best of his writings was probably his Historic Doubts Respecting Napoleon Bonaparte [1819], a clever pamphlet in which he reduces to absurdity the dictum of Hume of the incredibility of miracles in spite of any evidence.

Whately, by analysing the evidence for the existence of Bonaparte, gravely professes to maintain that no such person ever existed. In 1822 he was Bampton Lecturer, and took for his subject On the Use and Abuse of Party Feeling in Religion. In 1825 he wrote his essays On Some Peculiarities of the Christian Religion, and in 1828 a series On Some Difficulties in the Writings of St. Paul. The object of this work was to show that the common Evangelical doctrines of Election, Final Perseverance, Assurance, Imputed Righteousness were not Pauline; that they had grown up in the Christian Church from various sources, and were shaped in such a way as to fit with certain perversions of Pauline language. All this while he was entirely under the influence of Copleston, the real master-mind of the Early Oriel School, who led him firmly on into Liberalism both in Church and State, and into strong independence of judgment. The new men were called "Noetics," from their supposed claim to superior mental penetration, and they were regarded with something like dismay by the older members of the University. In 1820 Arnold left Oriel, but afterwards returned to Oxford as Professor of History [1841]. In 1831 Whately became Archbishop of Dublin. Though the appointment gave great offence to the clergy, who disliked Whately's strong Liberalism, the choice proved by no means an unwise one. Whately, staunch Protestant as he was, won the confidence of the Roman Catholics by his fairness and impartiality, and the system of education which he so strenuously promoted was wise and popular.

Whately was not a theologian, nor a deep thinker. But he was wonderfully clear and lucid in style. His theology was entirely of the school of Paley, and opposed to that of Coleridge and the Platonists. Christianity with him rested on external evidence, not on any internal teaching. Doctrines to be believed must be proved from Scripture, which is authoritative, and can command belief in matters of which we should otherwise have no cognisance. Whately was a determined opponent of the Tracts for the Times, denying Apostolical Succession and the authority of the Church.

Whichcote, BENJAMIN, one of the most eminent of the "Cambridge Platonists," was born at Stoke in Shropshire in 1610, died in 1683. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and elected a Fellow there in 1633. He soon became a famous Tutor, and, after his ordination, was appointed one of the University preachers. In 1659 he took his degree of D.D., and soon after accepted the living of Milton, and was also made Provost of King's College. At the Restoration he was deprived of this last piece of preferment, the Government objecting not so much to the man himself or his politics, as to allowing any one who had been appointed under the Commonwealth to keep a position of importance. He was presented to St. Anne's, Blackfriars, which he kept until his church was burned down in the Great Fire of 1666. Two years later he became Rector of St. Lawrence Jewry, which he held till his death in 1683. He wrote very few books, and his influence, which was very great, was exerted rather by his sermons and speeches than in any other way. Some of these were published after his death, one volume of sermons being edited by the Earl of Shaftesbury; and the same collection appeared many years after in Edinburgh. Dr. Campbell collected the whole of his works, and published them in the middle of the eighteenth century. "He stood," writes Principal Tulloch, "at the head of the Cambridge thought of his time. Men like Smith and Cudworth and More and Tillotson looked back to him as their intellectual master."

Whiston, WILLIAM, was born in 1667, at Norton in Leicestershire, where his father was rector, and died in 1752. He was educated by his father till he was seventeen, and then became the pupil of Mr. Antrobus of Tamworth. In 1686 he entered Clare College, Cambridge, where he chiefly studied mathematics and the Cartesian philosophy. He took his degree in 1690, was elected a Fellow, and ordained in 1693. He became chaplain to Dr. More, Bishop of Norwich, and in 1698 was made Vicar of Lowestoft in Suffolk. He had become acquainted with Sir Isaac Newton, who in 1703 caused him to be appointed his successor to the Lucasian Chair at Cambridge. He also undertook clerical duties; but his views gradually changed, till he openly declared himself to be an Arian, and also rejected infant baptism. He was, in 1710, expelled from his Professorship and from the University, his writings were censured in the Lower House of Convocation in 1711, and in 1713 he was accused of heresy before the Dean's Court of St. Paul's; but after the proceedings had been prolonged for two years he was acquitted, and was allowed to remain formally a member of the Church of England. He was, however, preached against by many clergy, at whose head was Dr. Sacheverell, who also refused him communion. In 1720 he was proposed as a member of the Royal Society, but refused admittance by his former friend, Sir Isaac Newton. Whiston, who was a vain man, ascribed the refusal to jealousy of his scientific genius. He spent the rest of his time in retirement in London, formed a religious society at his house, occasionally gave lectures, and carried on scientific studies. His chief works were: Theory of the Earth, containing very peculiar notions as to the Deluge; Primitive Christianity Restored; several scientific works, and a translation of Josephus, the only one which lasted any long period.

Whitaker, WILLIAM [b. 1548, d. 1595], Regius Professor of Divinity at Trinity College, Cambridge [1579]; Chancellor of St. Paul's [1580], and master of St. John's [1586]. He wrote many works on behalf of Protestantism and Calvinism; as—A Disputation on Holy Scripture against the Papists, especially Bellarmine and Stapleton [1588], and An Answer to the Ten Reasons of Edward Campian the Jesuit [1581], both of which were written in Latin, but have been translated into English.

Whitby, DANIEL, D.D. [b. at Rushden, Northamptonshire, 1638; d. at Salisbury, 1726].—An English divine. He entered Trinity College, Oxford, 1653; took his M.A. degree, 1660; was elected a Fellow of the College, 1664; made chaplain to the Bishop of Salisbury, and afterwards Precentor of the Cathedral in 1672; and in the same year he was presented to the Rectory of St. Edmund's, Salisbury. He published from time to time a series of attacks on Romanism: The Absurdity and Idolatry of Host Worship, Romish Doctrines not from the Beginning, &c.; and also appeared as a defender of the Dissenters in his Protestant Reconciler himself humbly pleading for condescension to Dissenting brethren in things indifferent. The book was attacked on all sides, and condemned by the University of Oxford to be publicly burnt; and Whitby was obliged to recant his opinions, with an apology for the heresy. He also published a second part of the Protestant Reconciler, with an appeal to the Dissenters to rejoin the Established Church. The next turn which he took was a publication of an Arminian work: A Discourse on the Five Points of Calvinism. His Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament, published in two folio volumes in 1703, was long regarded as a valuable work. In D'Oyly and Mant's Bible it is largely drawn upon. But it is now looked on as of little worth, either as regards scholarship or devotional feeling. He is continually protesting, in a sort of nervous and excited manner, against Arianism, and in 1714 he adopted Arian views, and published Disseratio de S. Scripturarum Interpretatione, which involved him in a controversy with the Trinitarians. To the end of his life he continued to uphold Arianism, and to write repeated attacks on Popery. He is said to have been a very lovable man in personal life.

Whitby, SYNOD OF.—By the middle of the seventh century the Irish Church, through the exertions of its workers, had become so powerful that the clergy of England deferred to the judgments of its bishop rather than to those of the Pope. Oswy's Queen, Eanfleda, daughter of Edwin and Ethelburga, brought with her from Kent the Roman way of calculating Easter, while her husband's household adhered to the custom of St. Columba. This led to disputes between those of the clergy who had been ordained by the Scots, and the disciples of Augustine and Paulinus; and a few years before the arrival of Theodore, a famous council was held on this question at the Abbey of Whitby in 664. Agilbert, a French prelate, who was now Bishop of Dorchester, was the leader of one party; and Colman, Bishop of Lindisfarne, was speaker of the other. Agilbert, however, retired to France, and deputed Wilfrid, a young Northumbrian priest, who had passed some years in study at Rome and Lyons, to plead for the rule of Italy and France. Oswy, who presided at this council, after listening in turn to Colman and Wilfrid, one of whom traced his practice to St. John, the other to St. Peter, on hearing the text, "Thou art Peter, and I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," stopped the debate. "Is it true, Colman," he said, "that our Lord spoke these words to Peter?"—"Most true."—"But can you prove that any such power was given to your Saint Columba?"—"We cannot."—"Then," said the King, "I dare not withstand this door-keeper of heaven, but must obey his rule, lest, when I come to that door and ask for entrance, he should refuse to turn the key." The assembly of earls and commoners decided that it would be expedient to leave the erroneous calculation and adopt the better. It is most likely that the influence of the Queen had previously persuaded Oswy to take the part he did. It was unfortunate in its result, as it gave offence to Colman, a plain sincere Christian, who shortly after resigned his bishopric, and retired, with the greater part of his Scottish monks and clergy, to a monastery in Ireland.

White Brethren.—Christian hermits who arose in Italy among the Alps in the fourteenth century. They were called "White Brethren," "Albati," or "Bianchi," from their garments of white linen, which reached to their feet, and covered all their faces except their eyes. They were headed by a priest, whose name and nationality are unknown, who, with a crucifix in his hand, led them down into the Italian plains in 1399. He called himself the prophet Elias, and called on the people to follow him to a crusade to regain the Holy Land from the Turks. Not only the peasants, but priests and cardinals enrolled themselves under his banner, till his followers are said to have numbered forty thousand. They marched from city to city, singing hymns, and daily increasing, till Pope Boniface feared they would attack the Papedom, and sent out a band of troops, which met the pilgrims at Viterbo, seized the leader, and dispersed the others. The priest was put to death as a heretic at Rome about the year 1403.

White, HENRY KIRKE, Christian poet [b. at Nottingham, 1785; d. at Cambridge, 1806]. He was the son of a butcher, and destined to follow his father's trade, but was afterwards sent to an attorney's office, and, while there, with very little help, he studied Latin and Greek and other branches of education. At the age of fourteen he wrote for several periodicals, and in 1802 published a volume of poems, which, however, met with very little attention, but procured him the notice of Southey. At this time a great change took place in him; he had indulged a leaning towards infidelity, but now he became ardently impressed with the truth of Christianity, and devoted all his powers towards getting to 'Cambridge and being educated for the Church. In 1804 he succeeded in getting a sizarship at St. John's College, and for two years he studied with wonderful perseverance, and gained a First Class in 1806. But the strain proved too much, and he died that year of consumption. Southey published a selection of his prose writings and poems under the title of The Remains of Henry Kirke White. Some of his hymns are popular, but his literary merits have probably been exaggerated owing to the circumstances of his early death.

White, JOSEPH BLANCO (b. 1775, d. 1841), a remarkable theological writer, was of Irish descent, but a Spaniard by two generations, and was born in the Roman Catholic faith in Seville, unfortunately for him the most bigoted and ascetic town in Spain. From his tenderest years he was subjected to monastic discipline, his parents' object being to "make him religious and in perfect deference to the priest who directed the conscience of the family." But the child was unfit for such discipline, being exceedingly shy and sensitive, and he has put on record the mental agonies he suffered at the confessional, and the terror which haunted him for years, because he had been ashamed to confess the hideous crime of robbing a bird's nest. In due course, though his heart hardly went with him, he took orders in the Roman Church, but from the first Reason disturbed the supremacy of Faith, and though for a while he stilled his fears by ascetic practices, and took refuge from them in the infallibility of the Church, they rose up after suppression, and after ten years of this hot and cold fever he determined to leave Spain, though the sorrow of bidding farewell to his home ties was very poignant. He came to England and enthusiastically joined the Established Church. His devotional habits had never deserted him, and he rejoiced to believe that the Church of England was able to supply his needs, while he rejected Popery. For it was not the doctrines which are considered orthodox which had disgusted him, but the persecuting spirit of Popery and the theory of Church infallibility. The Church gladly received him as a man of ability and unblemished character, and the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.A. When Whately was appointed to the Archbishopric of Dublin he took White with him. But doubts of the tenability of his position again came upon him, and, after a twenty years' struggle, he went forth from the Archbishop's house a lonely and poor man, and again put into writing the history of his mental trials. He became a Unitarian, and for the rest of his life remained in that creed. He is described by one of their eminent members as "the most distinguished convert Unitarianism ever had." He died at Liverpool, and the Rev. J. Martineau preached a remarkably touching sermon over his grave. Interesting notices of him will be found in the second volume of Mr. Gladstone's Gleanings, and in Cardinal Newman's Apologia.

White, WILLIAM, a celebrated bishop of the American Church, was born in Philadelphia in 1747, died in 1836. From a very early age he had wished to become a clergyman, and in 1770, having passed successfully through the college course at Philadelphia, he went to England, and was ordained deacon towards the end of the same year by Young, Bishop of Norwich. As soon as he had been ordained priest by the Bishop of London he returned to America, and before long the great War of Independence broke out. Unlike most of his fellow-clergy, he took part with the States against the Mother Country, and was always a strong Republican. When the war was over the few remaining clergy met to consider the state of the Church, which looked well-nigh hopeless. White published a pamphlet entitled The Case of the Episcopal Churches in the United States considered. The meeting decided that in order to save the Church there must be no further delay in procuring bishops on their side of the Atlantic, so Dr. Seabury went to England for consecration at the hands of the English bishops. But difficulties were made, and he was consecrated by the Scottish bishops. [SEABURY.] Though the American clergy acknowledged his consecration as valid, all felt that it would be better to have some others consecrated in England. So in 1786 White (who had been elected Bishop of Pennsylvania) and Provost (elected to the See of New York) went to England, and were consecrated in Lambeth Chapel, Feb. 4th, 1787, by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishops of Bath and Wells and Peterborough. They arrived in New York on Easter Day, 1787. Bishop White was a wonderfully laborious and zealous prelate, and at his death had been at the head of the American Church for nearly fifty years, having consecrated in that time twenty-six bishops.

Whitfield, or Whitefield, GEORGE, one of the most celebrated of English preachers, was born at Gloucester, 1714, died in America 1770. His father was a wine merchant, and his mother kept an inn at Bristol. At the age of fifteen he had made some progress in classical studies, and while assisting his mother in her business he wrote many sermons, showing the serious impressions he already had. When eighteen years old, he entered Pembroke College, Oxford, and fraternised with the body of young men who were termed "Methodists" [q.v.]. At the very early age of twenty-one, Dr. Benson, Bishop of Gloucester, "reckoned it his duty," as he said, to ordain George Whitfield. The following Sunday he preached in the church where he was baptised, to a very large congregation, on the benefits of religious society. A complaint being made to the Bishop that fifteen people went mad after hearing that sermon, it was said that he replied "that he wished the madness might not be forgotten by next Sunday." He took a curacy in London for two months, working indefatigably amongst soldiers and prisoners; then, after returning to Oxford for a while, he undertook work at Dummer, in Hampshire, where he catechised the children daily, read prayers twice a day, and formed the habit of dividing his day into three parts: eight hours for study and retirement, eight for meals and sleep, eight for reading prayers, catechising, and visiting. At length he decided to join the Wesleys in America, and went to bid farewell to his friends in Gloucester, and it was on this journey that he first met with the marvellous success in preaching which was a feature in his work ever after. Large congregations flocked to hear him at Gloucester, Bath, Bristol, and Stonehouse. As his popularity increased, much opposition arose from the clergy, who strongly protested against his written opinion that "his brethren should entertain their auditories oftener on the new birth." He reached Savannah, May 7th, 1738, and preached three or four times every Sunday. He soon saw the great need of an orphan house, which he eventually built, returning several times to England to raise the necessary funds. He was ordained priest in England in 1738. Finding on Sunday, Jan. 21st, 1739, that the churches were not large enough to contain all the people who flocked to hear him, it occurred to him that open-air preaching would be an advantage; so on going to Bristol in February he carried out his idea, preaching at Kingswood to nearly 2,000 people, many of them being colliers with whom few dared to mingle. Beginning with about one hundred of these colliers at the first special service held in the open air for them, the congregation steadily increased until nearly twenty thousand eagerly listened to him at one time. He often said that the sight of such a multitude so anxiously listening to his words made him almost powerless to speak anything, but that God Himself seemed to supply the words. He went about for some time preaching to numbers of rich and poor in Wales, Gloucestershire, and Worcestershire, and on April 26th, 1739, preached for the first time in Moorfields and on Kennington Common to immense crowds. On returning to America that summer he went through Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina. In speaking of his journeyings through America, he says: "It is now the seventy-sixth day since I arrived at Rhode Island. . . . I have been enabled to preach, I think, 175 times in public. . . . I have travelled 800 miles, and gotten upwards of £700 sterling for the Georgia Orphan Homes." He again left America for England in 1741, and, on going to preach as of old at Kennington, was amazed and saddened to find that very few would listen to him owing to his having written against Archbishop Tillotson and others who differed from him. Scarcely one hundred people listened to him at Kennington, and few of his old supporters came even to see him. He was anxious to raise money for the Homes, yet saw no opening to get the much-needed sum of £1,500. At Bristol, he was prevented from preaching in the very house he had founded there. But one or two other ministers there soon joined him in starting a school at Kingswood to promulgate Calvinistic doctrine. Open-air preaching was begun again, and large audiences gathered round him, and at Moorfields, on account of the bad weather a large shed was erected, which was called a tabernacle. He visited Essex and Suffolk also, and had immense audiences wherever meetings were held. Ten thousand heard him at one time at Braintree. In 1741 he accepted urgent invitations to visit Scotland, where he was warmly received by the Erskines. He preached at Dunfermline first, then in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee, Paisley, Perth, Stirling, besides smaller towns. He there gathered £500 for the Orphan Home in America, and proceeded through Wales to London. At Abergavenny he married a widow, Mrs. Jenner. Next he dared to preach at Moorfields when a fair was being held, and he writes that no fewer than one thousand letters were received by him from persons under conviction of sin, and three hundred people joined his community at once. In 1743 he again visited Scotland, and what took place in the West at Cambuslang is described thus by him: "People sat till two in the morning hearing sermons, disregarding the weather. You could scarce walk a yard but you must tread upon some either rejoicing in God for mercies received, or crying out for more. Thousands and thousands have I seen, before it was possible to catch it by sympathy, melted down under the word and power of God." At the celebration of the Holy Communion their joy was so great that they arranged for a second. The Communion table was in the field; three tents were all surrounded with a multitude of hearers; above twenty ministers attending to preach and assist. About this time he received sad news of the Spaniards landing in Georgia, but he encouraged his friends by his unbounded trust in God's care for them and the Orphan Home, which faith was soon rewarded by all danger from the Spaniards being removed. In 1744, just before starting for America, he was nearly murdered in his bed by one of four men who had designs upon his life, but so little moved by resentment was he that he refused to prosecute these men, and as crowds gathered round him at Plymouth to see one who had been so nearly killed, he expressed his joy that greater opportunity was given him to draw them to seek their happiness in Christ. His health became affected, and after four years in America he was advised to visit the Bermudas, where he met with a hearty welcome from the English colonists. After three months there he returned to England, where at first he met with great discouragement, but eventually an opening to preach to the great people as well as the poor was afforded him by Lady Huntingdon, who had welcomed him to her house on his arrival. The Earl of Chesterfield and Lord Bolingbroke were amongst the brilliant audiences who so eagerly listened to him twice a week. In 1748 he paid a third visit to Scotland, meeting with every encouragement and success, and between that year and 1751, when he laboured in Ireland for a time, he travelled through almost every town in England. He returned to America after a time, but his constant travels undermined his health, and at length he succumbed to a fit of asthma at Newbury Port, in New England, on Sept. 30th, 1770. He was not quite fifty, and had spent thirty-four years in the ministry.

Whitgift, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury; famous for his zeal and energy in spreading the doctrines of the Reformation. He was born at Great Grimby in 1530, where his father possessed a large merchant business; died at Lambeth in 1604, and was buried in Croydon parish church. His uncle, Robert Whitgift, though Abbot of a monastery, had long predicted the speedy downfall of the Church of Rome, and as John's early education was entrusted entirely to him, he naturally was influenced from the first in favour of the Reformation. In 1555 he went to Peterhouse, Cambridge, the college being at that time under the superintendence of Bishop Ridley. John Bradford, the martyr, was his tutor. He also made the acquaintance of Grindal. Cambridge leant decidedly to the Reformation, and Whitgift had by this time become quite convinced of the truth of its doctrine. He was ordained in 1560. On the accession of Queen Mary he had to hide for some time, as his life, with that of many of his colleagues, was in the greatest danger. From the accession of Elizabeth he worked hard in the Protestant cause. All through his life he was remarkable for his firmness in carrying out what he judged to be right, without reference to the opinions of those about him. He has been accused of harshness and severity, but it must be remembered that his were perilous and anxious times, when half-hearted measures were of no use. He lived for the most part at Cambridge, where he had been appointed Regius Professor of Divinity, but his fame as a preacher reached the Queen, who in 1565 made him one of her chaplains and Master of Trinity College. As soon as he had the power he set to work to reorganise the government of the college, with which he had long been dissatisfied; and, as a groundwork, he insisted strongly on conformity to the Established Church. In 1571 he was asked by Archbishop Parker to write an answer to a book lately published by the Puritan Cartwright, entitled an Admonition to Parliament, which violently attacked the teaching and discipline of the Reformed Church. This he did very successfully, and as a reward was made Dean of Lincoln by the Queen in 1573, and Bishop of Worcester in 1576. He resisted the teaching of the Roman Catholics on the one hand, and of the Puritans on the other; in this way a great contrast to the meek and timid Archbishop Grindal. The latter was considered a dangerous man to have at the head of the Church at such a critical time, so the Queen and the Privy Council commanded him to resign, and offered the Primacy to Whitgift. He refused to take the office while Grindal was alive, but accepted it on his death in 1583. His first act was to insist that all the clergy should be obliged to subscribe to these three points—that the Queen was the Supreme Head of the Church; that the Common Prayer and Ordination Services contained nothing contrary to the teaching of the Bible; that the Thirty-nine Articles agreed in all particulars with the Holy Scriptures. His one idea all through his life was to obtain absolute uniformity of religion in England. With this in view he obtained an order from the Star Chamber to restrain the liberty of the press. Only matter was to be printed which had been licensed by the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London, or their chaplains. It was in consequence of this that the famous MARTIN MARPRELATE CONTROVERSY [q.v.] took place. His private character was estimable, and he was much respected by learned men, as may be seen from the dedication to him both of Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity and Stow's Annals. He was exceedingly liberal, built and endowed a hospital and a school at Croydon, both flourishing at the present time, and restored the hospital of Eastbridge. He was afraid, at the accession of James I., that much of what he had been able to effect would come to naught from the King's supposed indifference to the Church of England; and he took the earliest opportunity of begging James's favour to the Church. He attended the Hampton Court Conference, but did not live to see the plans laid there carried out.

Whithern, or Candida Casa, BISHOP-RIC OR.—This was the See of a border district which was evangelised by St. Ninian in the beginning of the fifth century. Alongside of the kingdom of Northumbria, which extended from the Humber to the Forth, there was also a kingdom of Cumbria or Strathclyde, a district inhabited by the southern Picts, and extending from the Mersey to the Clyde. The Venerable Bede says of St. Ninian, a native of North Wales who converted the southern Picts, and became their first bishop, "This holy man . . . Yeowell 118 . . . Roman arms." He was "indisputably," according to Stubbs and Haddan, the founder of this See, "and within a few years subsequent to A.D. 400." But nothing is known of the diocese, or of St. Ninian's successors, until the Saxon conquest brought hither a Saxon bishop nearly three hundred years afterwards. Before the Saxon Conquest the old British diocese appears to have been absorbed into that of Glasgow, but in A.D. 685 Egrith formed the southern portion of that great diocese into a new district under the old name, just as Hexham had been recently formed out of the northern part of the great diocese of York. There were six bishops of Candida Casa in about a century, the last dying in A.D. 791; but when Galloway was reunited to Scotland, Whithern ceased to be an English diocese, and became part of the Scottish diocese of Galloway. Cumberland and Lancashire eventually became part of York diocese, until the foundation of the See of Carlisle in 1132.

The following were the Bishops of Whithern:—

Whitsunday.—The common English name for the Feast of Pentecost, celebrating the gift of the Spirit and the foundation of the Christian Church on earth. The derivation of the word has been the subject of much dispute. Three solutions have been offered, but there is a certain amount of doubt about each of them. The most common is that the word was originally spelt "White Sunday," and was so called because in the early Church the catechumens were baptised on that day, and that their white garments gave name to the festival. But when it is noticed that the Prayer Book speaks of Whitsun Week, Whitsun Monday, and not Whit Monday, this derivation hardly holds good. Others derive it from the German Pfingsten—"Pentecost," and say that though some of the links in the chain are missing, the word through various changes has come to Whitsunday. The other solution is suggested by an old poem, probably written about the fourteenth century, in which the writer evidently takes for granted that Whit is a corruption of Wit or Wisdom—

"This day Whitsunday is cald,
For wisdom and wit sevene fald,
Was given to the Apostles as the day."

Whitsun-farthings, called also smoke farthings, the offerings formerly made by every one at Whitsuntide who lived in a house with a chimney, to the cathedral of the diocese in which he lived.

Wicelins or Witzel, GEORGE [b. 1501, d. 1573], was educated and ordained in the Roman Church, but adopted the Reformed religion, for which he was driven from his charge in 1525. He was appointed pastor of Niemeck, but relapsed into Romanism, and was expelled in 1530. He helped to draw up the Augsburg Interim. He lived at Fulda from 1540–54, and then, on the spread of the Reformation, withdrew to Mayence, where he died. He wrote Typus ecclesie prioris, and Querela pacis.

Wichern, JOHANN HEINRICH, Christian philosopher, was born at Hamburg in 1808, died there in 1881. He studied theology at the Universities of Göttingen and Berlin, and soon after started the institution in his native town which has made his name famous. Dr. Schaff says that he is the representative of practical philanthropic Christianity in Germany—a title which he deserves, as will be seen when some account of his efforts has been given. His first work was to institute a Free Sunday-school in the town, which in a short time numbered over 500 scholars. But his greatest achievement was the foundation of what he called his Rauhes Haus. Here he received boys who had been left quite destitute, kept and cared for them; had them taught some useful trade, and then sent them to make their way in the world. It is, in fact, managed very much on the same plan as Dr. Barnardo's Homes in England. He was also one of the leaders of the movement still doing much work in Germany under the name of the Innere Mission, the object of which is to fight against the heathenism and irreligion still prevalent amongst the lower classes of the large towns. Wichern was offered many posts of honour, but refused them all, and contented himself with superintending the Rauhes Haus [Rough House] to the end of his life, and with editing the paper called Fliegende Blätter, the organ of the Mission. He died at Hamburg, having been helpless from paralysis for nearly ten years.

Wicliffe. [WYCLIFFE.]

Widows of the Church.—Widows who made public profession of their intention to continue in widowhood were, if they satisfied certain conditions, enrolled in an Order which went by this designation. These conditions were that they should have been widows for some years, and should have lived without reproach, ruling their own households well. A special place was assigned to them in the Churches, and if need so required they were supported out of Church revenues.

Wilberforce, HENRY WILLIAM [b. 1809, d. 1873], son of William Wilberforce. He graduated with high honours at Oriel College, Oxford, in 1830. He was vicar of East Farleigh, but in 1853 became a member of the Roman Catholic Church, in which communion he died at Woodchester, in Gloucestershire. In early life he gained some celebrity as author of An Essay on the Parochial System of the Church. For some years after his secession he was proprietor and editor of the Catholic Standard, subsequently called the Weekly Register. He was a man of great intellectual power, and deeply beloved by his friends. Cardinal Newman wrote a very touching obituary notice of him.

Wilberforce, ROBERT ISAAC, second son of William Wilberforce, was born in 1802, died in 1857. He entered Oriel College, Oxford, as a commoner in 1819, and took his degree with a double first-class in 1823. He was elected Fellow of his college, became Public Examiner in 1830, and Select Preacher in 1849. He was vicar of East Farleigh, removing in 1850 to Burton Agnes, in Yorkshire, when he became Archdeacon of the East Riding. In 1854 he went over to the Church of Rome, and spent almost all the rest of his life in Italy. He died at Albano on his way to the English College at Rome for re-ordination. Two works of his written in the English Church have won a permanent place in our theology, namely, the treatises on The Incarnation of the Son of God, and On the Holy Eucharist; The Principles of Church Authority was written to vindicate his adoption of the Roman faith, and two other interesting volumes of his are The Five Empires and Rutilius, a tale of the early Church.

Wilberforce, SAMUEL, D.D., Bishop successively of Oxford and Winchester, was the third son of William Wilberforce, born at Broomefield House, Clapham Common, Sept. 7th, 1805; died July 19th, 1873, from a fall from his horse while riding on the Surrey hills near Dorking. He commenced his education at Edgbaston, near Birmingham, and then entered as a Commoner at Oriel College, Oxford, at that time enjoying a great reputation under Copleston, afterwards Bishop of Llandaff. While there, Wilberforce was a constant and fluent speaker at the Union Debating Society. He took his B.A. in 1826. He was ordained in 1828, and in 1830 was appointed to the living of Brightstone in the Isle of Wight. In 1841 he was promoted to the rectory of Alverstoke, near Gosport, and here he had at one time as his curate Dr. Trench, the late Archbishop of Dublin. He was already Archdeacon of Surrey, to which a canonry in Winchester Cathedral was attached, and in this same year was chosen by the authorities of Oxford to deliver the Bampton Lectures; the delivery of those was, however, prevented by the death of Mrs. Wilberforce. Preferences were now showered thickly on Archdeacon Wilberforce; in 1843 he was nominated one of the chaplains to the Prince Consort; in 1844 he was appointed Sub-Almoner to the Queen, and early in 1845 promoted to the Deanery of Westminster, but he was not destined to stay there long, for before the close of the year he was offered the Bishopric of Oxford, and consecrated in Lambeth Chapel by Archbishop Howley on St. Andrew's Day. As Bishop of Oxford he became also Chancellor of the Order of the Garter, for shortly before that time Windsor and St. George's Chapel had been transferred to that diocese from the see of Salisbury. In 1847 Bishop Wilberforce received also the appointment of Lord High Almoner to Her Majesty. Joined with the See of Oxford at that time was the rectory of Cuddesdon, near Oxford, and, as at Alverstoke Dr. Wilberforce had R. C. Trench, a future Archbishop, as his curate, so here he had Dr. Thomson, afterward Archbishop of York.

As a Bishop, Samuel Wilberforce lost no time in showing himself earnest, zealous, and indefatigable, confirming not only in the larger towns but in the village churches, mixing personally with his clergy, and stirring up their dormant energies by taking part in "special services" in Lent, in Advent, and at other sacred seasons. He was active also in preaching on behalf of new and old religious societies, which he regarded as useful handmaids to the Church, and in promoting all well-considered measures of school improvement, of Church extension, and of Church restoration. He also established, almost under his own eye, at Cuddesdon, a Training College for clergymen, in order to bridge over the years which young men who intended to take orders too often wasted, after taking their degree at Oxford and Cambridge, while not yet of canonical age for ordination as deacons.

He had not long taken his seat on the bishops' bench in the House of Lords before he began to make his presence felt there, speaking frequently on subjects in which the Church was more or less directly interested, such as the religious education of the young, the admission of Jews into Parliament, the Bill for legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and the revival of the active powers of Convocation, which had been long dormant at the time of his consecration to the episcopate. In 1848 some bitter controversy was excited by the part he took in reference to the nomination of DR. HAMPDEN [q.v.] to the Bishopric of Hereford, and it must be confessed that the Bishop in this matter did not appear to advantage. When Lord John Russell nominated Hampden, Bishop Wilberforce joined the opponents. But suddenly he went over to the other side, and printed a sermon which he preached in favour of Hampden, and a letter in which he implied that the latter had made concessions to him. Hampden immediately published another denying this in a curt manner, and Bishop Philpotts of Exeter wrote his brother of Oxford a letter of vehement sarcasm and invective, which Wilberforce's candid biographer, Canon Ashwell, has printed. The Bishop was one of the most active opponents of the Bill passed at the instance of Lord Palmerston to enable Bishops Blomfield and Maltby to resign their respective Sees. Another important controversy in which the Bishop was engaged was that on the Essays and Reviews [q.v.], and again the Bishop showed himself more versatile than discreet, and took up untenable positions, to the injury of his own reputation. In 1869 he accepted the See of Winchester on the resignation of Dr. Sumner, having before that time changed his views on the subject of clerical resignations, and become the most active promoter, if not the actual author, of the Act passed to enable aged incumbents to resign their livings, and retire on a pension when incapacitated for further work.

Bishop Wilberforce was a man of talents so great and varied as to constitute genius; his versatility, indeed, was at once his strength and his weakness; it enabled him to do everything, but it debarred him from that complete unity and concentration of purpose which are necessary for the highest achievements. He was, however, before all things, a hard-working bishop. He was a thoroughly accomplished preacher, and it was one of his characteristics that he took as great pains and achieved as great success with the simplest village congregation as with the most distinguished audience in London. He really acted as the spiritual chief of his diocese, and did his utmost to awaken religious life in every corner of it; he was not content with acting as a mere overseer; he was its motive power, and his clergy learnt to look to him for constant encouragement and support.

In the Church at large he held a very distinct and valuable position; his early life imbued him with the religious views of the Evangelical school, and his veneration for his father would alone have been sufficient to maintain their influence in his mind throughout life. But as a man who thoroughly shared in the thoughts and feelings of Oxford, he was not likely to hold aloof from that remarkable development of thought which marked the first fifteen years of his ministry. He was in consequence regarded as belonging to the High Church school, though he always held back from the extremes of that party; but he saw that its followers were at least reviving the organisation of the Church, and he turned their principles to great account in practical administration. It says much for his moderation that, coming to his diocese just when the Tractarian storm was at its height, he guided it through the crisis without a breach with any party among his clergy. Party feeling ran high for a time, but the Bishop's manifest earnestness, and the twofold sympathies which he embodied, formed a bond of union amid the discord, and he probably rendered the Church a great service by guiding and harmonising the confused movements of the day.

In Convocation he spoke with energy and fervour on all subjects connected with the Church. He was a very popular man; whatever he undertook he did with grace, ease, and heartiness. As a platform orator he has rarely been equalled; in the best sense of the term he was a "many-sided" man, and into his active career, many careers, so to speak, were crowded together. He was indefatigable in work, and in the management of two very important dioceses he showed great administrative ability and energy of personal character. His was an eloquence which never failed; it shone equally in his pastoral charges, in his confirmation addresses, and in those spirit-stirring appeals which he would deliver in Cuddesdon Chapel to the candidates for Holy Orders. He excelled also as a parliamentary orator. As an author he has left us no deep theological work, but his name will be remembered for a History of the Episcopal Church in America, and by two or three charming religious allegories, the most popular of which are Agathos and The Rocky Island. His sermons are some of them models of eloquence, and the personal influence which he exerted upon those who were brought into contact with him shows him to have been a good as well as an able man.

Wilberforce, WILLIAM [b. 1759, d. 1833], one of the noblest philanthropists in the history of the world, was born at Hull. He went first to the Hull Grammar School, and on his father's death in 1768 lived with an uncle at Wimbledon, who sent him to school near there. He went with his aunt to hear Whitfield's preaching, but his mother, fearing he would become a Methodist, recalled him to Yorkshire, and his education was carried on at Pocklington till he was seventeen. He then entered St. John's College, Cambridge, and remained there for three years. He resolved on entering a public life, and before he had attained his majority was elected member for his native town. William Pitt, who had already made a great mark in the House of Commons, was his intimate friend. His kindly manners and polished wit soon made him very popular in London society. In 1784, before he was twenty-five, he was chosen member for Yorkshire, a great triumph in his parliamentary career, as that seat was usually fiercely contended by the aristocracy. He took his seat in May, and entered into all the triumphs of his friend, who was now Prime Minister. In the autumn of that year he made a Continental tour, in which he was joined by his old Cambridge tutor, Isaac Milner, from whom he imbibed those earnest religious impressions which directed his actions for the remainder of his life. In 1786 he resumed his parliamentary life for awhile, but after 1787 he gave up his whole time to the great work of his life, the abolition of the slave trade. THOMAS CLARKSON [q.v.] and some other Quakers had already formed an association for this purpose, and William Wilberforce soon became their foremost champion. He and Pitt discussed the subject together under a tree at Holwood, near Keston in Kent, and Wilberforce set to work to collect all possible information on the subject to lay before the House of Commons. A serious illness prevented him from attending Parliament in 1788, but in 1789, in a powerful speech lasting three and a half hours, he laid the matter before the House, but was met with decided opposition, and a long delay occurred before further steps could be taken. John Wesley wrote to him from his death-bed in 1791, encouraging him, and exhorting him not to lose heart. On April 18th in the same year, the motion came on once more, but was rejected in consequence of the resistance of vested interests. Clarkson and others then established the Sierra Leone Company, of which Wilberforce became one of the directors. George III. and the royal princes were always opposed to the movement; Pitt and Fox both supported it. In 1793 Wilberforce endeavoured to stir up the nation to its duty as regarded Christian teaching amongst the natives of our colonies, but Government could not see its way. William Carey and his associates, however, undertook the task. [CAREY, WILLIAM.] In 1797 Wilberforce published his Practical View of the Prevailing Religious Systems of Professed Christians in the Higher and Middle Classes in this Country contrasted with Real Christianity, which went through five editions in six months. In 1797 he was engaged in those discussions which two years later resulted in the formation of the Church Missionary Society. In 1798 he helped to start the Christian Observer, and also an association for the better observance of Sunday, and he gave much time and money to the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The French Revolution made it impossible for a time to do anything in furtherance of his favourite scheme, and it was not till 1804 that the Abolition of Slavery Bill was first carried through the Commons; it was rejected by the Lords, and in the following year lost in the Commons on the second reading. At last, by an Order in Council in 1805, the importation of slaves to new colonies was prohibited, and in 1806 the abolition of the foreign slave trade was carried. On Feb. 23rd, 1807, his Bill, having passed the Lords, was sent down to the Commons, and carried by a majority of 283 to sixteen. The Solicitor-General, Sir Samuel Romilly, carried the House by storm when in his speech which followed this triumph, he contrasted the feelings of Napoleon with those of the honoured man who would that night "lay his head upon his pillow and remember that the slave trade was no more." The Royal assent was given on March 20th. Wilberforce then sought to secure the abolition of the slave trade abroad, and, indeed, the total abolition of slavery itself. In 1812 he resigned his seat for Yorkshire, and was elected to the borough of Bramber, which he held till 1825, when failing health obliged him to give up his parliamentary life. He never lost an opportunity of speaking in favour of abolition, and one country of Europe after another, and the United States, was led to abolish the slave trade. In 1823 he published an Appeal against it, and the Anti-Slavery Society was formed. In 1829 he made his last public appearance at a large meeting of Abolitionists in London, and then entrusted the cause to Sir T. Fowell Buxton. Three days before his death news was brought to Wilberforce that England was ready to pay twenty millions for the abolition of slavery. He died July 29th, 1833, and was accorded a public funeral at Westminster Abbey.

Wilfrid, Sr., Archbishop of York, was born of noble parents, and was early sent to court, where he soon became a favourite with Queen Eanflæda; following her advice, he determined to devote himself to a religious life. He spent some time at Lindisfarne under the discipline of the Scottish monks; but being dissatisfied with the simplicity of their rule, he asked and obtained permission to go to Rome, where he spent some years in study. After his return to England he became Abbot of a monastery at Ripon, and at thirty years of age was appointed to the See of York. As the primacy was vacant, Wilfrid went to France to be consecrated by Agilbert, Bishop of Paris, and did not return till about five years later, when he found St. Chad in possession of his See. The latter, however, vacated it in his favour, and Wilfrid set to work to restore the minster, which had fallen into disrepair; and he built also a minster at Hexham and one at Ripon, at the dedication of which he made a feast to King Egfrid and all the chief persons in the kingdom, which was a striking contrast to the simplicity of the former bishop, St. Chad. For some time the King and the bishops were on friendly terms; but the zeal of Wilfrid to enrich the Church, to the detriment of Egfrid's revenue, and the magnificence of his retinue and monasteries, excited the King's anger, and Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, was summoned to hear the accusations against him. He proposed that the diocese should be divided into the Sees of York, Lindisfarne, Hexham, and Whithern, but as Wilfrid would not consent to this Theodore declared him deposed, and he started for Rome to appeal to Pope Agatho, returning victorious with a letter to the King. Egfrid declared that he had bribed the Pope, and imprisoned him for nine months, first in Northumberland, then at Dunbar; being released, he went to Sussex, the most barbarous kingdom in England, which was not yet converted to Christianity, and which was suffering under a severe famine. Wilfrid first gained the friendship of the people by teaching them to fish, so that they were all the more ready to hear him when he began to preach to them. He founded a bishopric at Selsey, which was afterwards removed to Chichester. He went up the Meon Valley, in Hampshire, between the two kingdoms of Sussex and Wessex, which was inhabited by a colony of Jutes, and here he founded the church of Warnford, as an ancient inscription on the wall still testifies. The ancient church of Corhampton in the same valley was also probably built by him. About 690 Egfrid died, and Wilfrid was recalled to York; but his uncompromising manner gave offence, and he was again declared deposed. He was restored; however, after King Aldfrid's death, and died in 709 at the monastery of Oundle, which he had founded in Mercia.

Wilkins, JOHN, Bishop of Chester [b. at Fawsley, Northamptonshire, in 1614; d. in 1672]. His father was a citizen of Oxford, but he was born at the house of his mother's father, John Dods, a noted Dissenter, and here he spent his earlier years. At the age of thirteen he entered as a student at New Inn Hall, Oxford, and afterwards Magdalen Hall. He took his B.A. in 1631, and his M.A. in 1634, and was then ordained and became successively Chaplain to Lord Say, Lord Berkeley, and Charles, Count Palatine of the Rhine, who resided in England for some time studying mathematics with Wilkins. His Puritanical principles led him in the Civil War to join with the Parliament and to uphold the Solemn League and Covenant. In 1648 the Committee for the Reformation of the University of Oxford made him Warden of Wadham College. In 1656 he married a sister of Cromwell. Richard Cromwell made him Master of Trinity College; but he was ejected at the Restoration, and, coming to London, became Preacher at Gray's Inn, and soon after Rector of St. Lawrence Jewry. In 1663 he was chosen one of the council of the Royal Society, which was then incorporated; and, through the influence of another member, Seth Ward, Bishop of Exeter, he was introduced to Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury, and was soon promoted to the deanery of Ripon, and on the death of Bishop Hall, in 1668, became Bishop of Chester. Wilkins is said to have been a man of inconstant mind and unsettled principles, ready to swear allegiance to the ruling power; but he was benevolent, and according to his biographer, Anthony Wood, "a person endowed with rare gifts, a noted theologian and preacher, a curious critic, an excellent mathematician and experimentalist, and one as well seen in mechanisms and new philosophy as any of his time." He is the author of many scientific works. Among his theological publications are: Ecclesiastes, or a Discourse on the Gift of Preaching [1646]; Discourse concerning the Beauty of Providence, in all the Rugged Passages of it [1649]; Discourse concerning the Gift of Prayer [1651], and after his death Tillotson published an unfinished treatise of his Of the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion [1675], and a volume of Sermons [1682]. He died at the house of Dr. Tillotson in Chancery Lane, and is buried in St. Lawrence Jewry.

Will.—That faculty of the soul by which it chooses or refuses anything which is offered to it. It is therefore distinct from the understanding. "I see and approve the better things," said the heathen moralist, "and I follow the worse." Herein he confessed that his will was not in accord with his intellectual faculties. Nor is the Will synonymous with the desires and appetites. These may be spontaneous and either good or bad, but other motives acting on the Will may lead it to resist them. That the Will is free is implied in the very term, "for if a man acts in any given manner because he is forced, it is no longer an action of the Will." The Will indeed is finite, because man himself is a finite being, but within the extent of its capacity it is and must be able to choose. The great question about Free Will, regarded theologically, is stated in the article on FREE WILL. We may put it broadly thus: according to the Roman Catholic view, man lost control of his Will by sin, and recovers it by supernatural grace conveyed in the Sacraments. The Reformers of the sixteenth century, following Augustine, held that since the Fall man is totally depraved, and can do no spiritual good save through the special grace of God, given according to God's sovereign Will.

The tendency of modern materialistic philosophy is towards what is called DETERMINISM [q.v.], the belief that the Will depends like the physical constitution upon a chain of causes, so that all future volition might be predicted by any one who knew all the present facts. But this is in fact to blot out the soul from existence, and repeat the sinful cry which the prophets denounced, "We are delivered to do these abominations." In opposition to it is the Christian belief that we are placed in the world by the Creator for the very purpose of fighting against the sin which doth most easily beset us, and of being conquerors by His grace. Another form of Determinism is very different, that of Jonathan Edwards, who dwells upon the power of habits to enfeeble and even destroy the Will. This is the determinism of character. But neither does this fix the destiny of a human soul. The grace of God is offered to apostates and reprobates, for the very purpose of restoring the enfeebled and powerless Will. The same voice which cried to the paralytic "Rise, take up thy bed and walk," is saying to us when we are bound and enslaved by sin, "Arise and be free, shake thyself from the dust." The work of the Holy Ghost, and the grace of Christian ordinances, are perpetual miracles, a continual work of restoration to those who believe, and have faith to be healed. [FREE-WILL; PREDESTINATION.]

Will of God.—What God has determined from all eternity, and what must certainly come to pass, though as yet we know it not, is His secret will. What He has prescribed to us in His written Word, and in the universal conscience of mankind, is His revealed will. How shall we know that will?

There are certain rules which we may rest upon concerning what we ought not to do, as well as what we ought to do. Thus: [1] We should not make our inclinations the arbiter. "Do not determine that to be truth which you wish to be so, nor make an idol of cherished anticipations," are the memorable words of a great writer of our own day. [2] We should not make our particular frames of mind the rule of our determination, nor be guided by unaccountable impulses and impressions.

But there are three courses to be adopted by him who would learn the will of God.

[1] Deliberation. Our present station is to be regarded as that in which God has placed us. He may intend us to make our way out of it. But unless there is that in our present situation which we see clearly to be hostile to our soul's health, we are not to be inveterately desirous of change.

[2] Consultation. If the conviction come irresistibly upon us that such change is needful, and we have to choose a new path, then it behoves us to compare one thing with another, and to act upon such maxims as these:—Of two natural evils choose the least; of two moral evils choose neither; of two moral goods choose the greater.

[3] Supplication. When Providence does not make our way immediately clear we have to abide where we are in suspense. "Stand still and see the salvation of God." We must wait upon the Lord in constant prayer, avoiding temptation and shrinking from all sin; reverencing the Word of God and seeking it daily; remembering always that the highest object at which we can aim is the promotion of the glory of God.

William of Malmesbury. [MALMESBURY, WILLIAM OF.]

William of Wykeham, the greatest of the Bishops of Winchester, was born of obscure parents, John and Sibyl Longe, at Wickham, in Hampshire, in 1324. He was educated at Winchester School, and then became secretary to Uvedale, Lord of the Wickham Manor, through whom he was introduced to King Edward III. In 1356 he became surveyor of the castle and park at Windsor, and superintended the building of the present castle. He received the tonsure in 1356, and was ordained priest in 1362. On the death of Bishop Edyngdon in 1366, Wykeham was elected to succeed him. He had already held the Privy Seal, and now became Chancellor till 1371. He died in his eightieth year in 1404, at Bishop's Waltham. He repaired the bishop's palaces, did away with many abuses at St. Cross, founded New College, Oxford, and the Winchester School [q.v.], and restored Winchester Cathedral. His masterly work in the nave of the Cathedral stamps him as one of the greatest architects that ever lived. His benefactions to the parishes of his diocese were also very munificent.

Williams, ISAAC, was born in Wales in 1802, died in 1865. He was educated at Oxford, and after his ordination held several curacies, and finally was appointed to the living of Stinchcombe, Gloucestershire, where he died. He wrote some very beautiful poetry, though he was a little too fond of using irregular and peculiar rhythm. He, with Keble and Newman, wrote the Lyre Apostolica, and was also the author of Tracts 80, 86, and 87 of the famous Tracts for the Times. Other noted poems of his are Thoughts in Past Years, The Cathedral, The Baptistry, and the Christian Scholar. In 1839 he published a book of hymns translated from the

Williams, JOHN, Archbishop of York, was born at Aberconway in Carnarvonshire, in 1582, died in 1650. He went to St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1598, was ordained, and became a proctor of the university. He then removed to London, and was chaplain to Lord Chancellor Egerton, upon whose death, in 1619, he was made Dean of Salisbury, whence he was in 1620 preferred to the Deanery of Westminster. In the following year he became Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and in 1626 was consecrated Bishop of Lincoln. He soon afterwards rendered himself unpopular at court because he refused to comply with all the wishes of Buckingham, which occasioned him to lose the Great Seal, and he was ordered not to appear at the coronation of Charles I. He also angered Archbishop Laud by his opinions concerning the position of the Communion table. The dispute broke into a formal controversy, and occasioned Laud's Coal from the Altar, answered by Williams. Soon after a Bill was brought before the Star Chamber accusing him of revealing the King's secrets; he was heavily fined, and in 1636 imprisoned in the Tower. He remained there for four years, but was released by the Long Parliament in 1640. The King was reconciled to him, cancelled the records of his trial, and raised him to the Archbishopric of York, allowing him to hold the Deanery of Westminster for three years in commendam. He only survived the King's death a year, dying at Glodded on his sixty-eighth birthday.

Williams, JOHN, a famous Nonconformist minister [b. 1796, d. 1839] sent by the London Missionary Society to preach to the South Sea Islanders. He was born at Tottenham, and having been a short time at school was apprenticed to an ironmonger in the City Road. When he had served his time, he determined at once to fit himself as far as he could for the work of a missionary. With his wife and three other ministers he left England in November, 1816, and just a year later landed on one of the Society Islands. They succeeded in converting many of the natives to Christianity, and as a rule were treated with great kindness even by those who refused to listen to their preaching. He came to England once for a few weeks, and also paid a visit to Sydney, for the purpose of consulting a doctor about his health, which was very bad at the time, and which he was afraid would force him to give up his work. With these two exceptions he worked among the people of these islands till 1839, when he was cruelly murdered by the natives of Erromanga the first day he landed on their shores.

Williams, ROGER.—A Puritan writer, and founder of the State of Rhode Island,

U.S., who deserves mention as the first to publicly promulgate the doctrine of entire liberty of conscience and worship, without any qualification whatever, and to act upon it consistently through his own life in the midst of many provocations. He was born at Conwyl Cayo in Wales, in 1599, was befriended and educated by Sir Edward Coke, and ordained to the ministry of the Church of England; but soon adopting Puritan views, was compelled to emigrate to America, and arrived at Boston in 1630. At this early age of thirty, as Bancroft says, "his mind had already matured a doctrine which secures him an immortality of fame. . . . In the capacious recesses of his mind he had revolved the nature of intolerance, and he, and he alone, had arrived at the great principle which is its sole effectual remedy. He announced his discovery under the simple proposition of the sanctity of conscience. The civil magistrate should restrain crime, but never control opinion; should punish guilt, but never violate the freedom of the soul. The doctrine contained within itself an entire reform of theological jurisprudence. It would blot from the statute-book the crime of nonconformity; would quench the fires that persecution had so long kept burning; would repeal every law compelling attendance on public worship; would abolish tithes and all forced contributions to the maintenance of religion; would give an equal protection to every form of religious faith."

When Williams arrived in Boston, therefore, he could not unite heartily with Churches which, in spite of their own bitter experience of persecution, violated every one of these principles nearly as much as that Church from which they had fled, and he found himself involved in hot and bitter controversy for what, to him, were the first rights of the human soul. The magistrates compelled every man to attend worship: Williams reprobated that law. They compelled men to maintain that worship, and demanded of Williams if the labourer was not worthy of his hire? "Yes," he replied, "from them that do hire him and from no other." Magistrates themselves were to be chosen from church-members; he said this was as proper as to select a doctor or pilot for his skill in theology. And so on every point. Such views could not but give deep offence, and in 1835 he was summoned to Boston to stand examination on his grand principle that "the civil power has no jurisdiction over the conscience," and was actually threatened by the one-time fugitives with transportation back to England! To avoid this he fled to the territory of Narraganset, where he purchased land for himself and a few companions, calling the new settlement Providence, and engaging specially in mission-work among the Indians, with whom he acquired greater influence than any other man of the time.

Owing to this he was enabled on two occasions to save the colony which had cast him out from Indian attacks, being on one of these occasions applied to for such assistance, and never manifesting the least bitterness, or being led into the least act of retaliation. His later years were chiefly occupied in preaching to the Indians, in which he engaged till nearly his eightieth year. He died at the age of eighty-four, in 1683, the neighbouring colonies refusing to the last to admit his State into their league, in spite of the services he had rendered them.

Williams' chief work is, The Bloody Tenet of Persecution for the Cause of Conscience Discovered, followed later by The Bloody Tenet yet more Bloody by Mr. Cotton's endeavour to wash it white in the Blood of the Lamb. He refused to persecute Quakers like the other Puritans, but disputed with them, writing a tract called George Fox digged out of his Burrowes. He also wrote a Key to the Languages of America, and other works of less importance.

The following additional remarks of Bancroft are worth quoting: "He was the first person in modern Christendom to assert in its plenitude the doctrine of the liberty of conscience, the equality of opinions before the law; and in its defence he was the harbinger of Milton, the precursor and superior of Jeremy Taylor. For Taylor limited his toleration to a few Christian sects: the philanthropy of Williams compassed the earth. Taylor favoured partial reform, commended lenity, argued for forbearance, and entered a special plea in behalf of each tolerable sect; Williams would permit persecution of no opinion, of no religion, leaving heresy unharmed by law, and orthodox unprotected by the penalties of penal statutes. Taylor still clung to the necessity of positive regulations enforcing religion and eradicating error, and he resembled the poets, who in their folly first declare their hero to be invulnerable and then clothe him in earthly armour; Williams was willing to leave truth alone, in her own panoply of light, believing that if in the ancient feud between truth and error, the employment of force could be entirely abrogated, truth would have much the best of the bargain. If Copernicus is held in perpetual reverence because, on his death-bed, he published to the world that the sun is the centre of our system; if the name of Kepler is preserved for his sagacity in detecting the laws of planetary motion; if the genius of Newton has been almost adored for dissecting a ray of light and weighing heavenly bodies in a balance; let there be for the name of Roger Williams at least some humble place among those who have advanced moral science, and made themselves the benefactors of mankind."

Willibald, Sr., was the son of a king of the West Saxons, and born about 704. When three years old he had a dangerous illness, and his parents promised that if he recovered he should be consecrated to God's service. He was accordingly carefully trained in a monastery till 720, when he accompanied his father and brother on a pilgrimage to Rome. His father died on the journey, and his brother had soon to return home after reaching Rome; but Willibald joined with two companions and set out for the Holy Land. They got as far as Emesa in Phœnicia, where they were seized by the Saracens for spies and thrown into prison. When they were released they continued their journey, and, having visited the holy places, were returning to Rome, but stopping at Naples on their way in 728, the Bishop of that place persuaded Willibald to retire to the monastery of Mount Cassino, which had lately been built by Pope Gregory II., and here he spent ten years. In 729 he went again to Rome; Gregory III., who was then Pope, sent for him and told him that his cousin, St. BONIFACE [q.v.], wanted his help in Germany. He went, and Boniface made him Pastor of Aichstadt, which, in 741, was created into a bishopric, and Willibald became the first Bishop. He built a cathedral and founded a Benedictine monastery. He died in 790, and was canonised in 938 by Leo VII.

Willibrord, Sr., was born in Northumberland about 658. A short time before, the monastery of Ripon had been founded by St. Wilfrid [WILFRID], and there Willibrord was sent by his parents when he was only seven years old. His father, Wilgis, became a hermit, and founded a small monastery on the banks of the Humber. When twenty years old Willibrord went to Ireland to the missionary college of which St. Egbert was the head. This saint had sent out several parties of missionaries to attempt the conversion of Friesland, but their work was not crowned with great success. At the age of thirty-one Willibrord petitioned that he might be allowed to organise a further effort. Egbert gave him leave, and, accompanied by eleven other monks, he set sail for Europe. They landed at the mouth of the Rhine, and were well received by Pepin, the mayor of the palace and Duke of the French, who had lately conquered Friesland. Before attempting any definite work, Willibrord went on a pilgrimage to Rome to beg the blessing of Pope Sergius. This being given, Willibrord preached the Gospel successfully in Friesland for six years. At the end of that time Pepin sent him again to Rome, with a petition that the Pope would allow him to take the office of a bishop. Sergius consecrated him in St. Peter's, giving him the title of Archbishop of the Frisians, and permission to fix the Metropolitan See in whatever part of the diocese would be most convenient for the carrying on of his work. He returned in 696, and determined to have his cathedral at Utrecht. He built there two churches, one of which he dedicated to our Saviour and the other to St. Mary, choosing the latter for the cathedral. When he had worked for some years in that part of Friesland which belonged to France, he turned his attention to West Friesland, governed at that time by a man named Radbod, who, in spite of all persuasions and entreaties, remained a heathen: he, however, allowed the Archbishop to preach in all parts of his kingdom, and severely punished any who ventured to interfere with him or any of his band. He then went to an island called Walcheren, belonging to Zealand, and caused several churches to be built there. In the year 731 he was joined by BONIFACE [q.v.], who stayed with him three years, and then went into Germany. Willibrord died in 739 or 740, in extreme old age. He lived to see the nation which he had found in a state of barbarism one of the most cultured in Europe at that time. He was buried at Epternac, in the monastery he had built and endowed there.

Willihad.—When news came of the martyrdom of BONIFACE [q.v.], many wished to go at once to try to convert those who had opposed and killed him. The head of the little band was Willihad, a native of Northumbria, who, in spite of great difficulties and fierce opposition, preached in all parts of the country. At one place the chief wished to put him to death for daring to despise the national idols, and it was agreed that lots should be cast whether he was to die or be set free. The lot was in Willihad's favour, and he reached a place called Drenthe safely. After several years Charles the Great suggested to him that he should turn his attention to the people of Wymodia, who up to that time had not had the chance of giving up their heathen religion for a better, no missionary having visited them. At first the people seemed to listen to him gladly; but in 782 a man named Wittekind incited the people to rebel, and Willihad had secretly to make his escape. He determined before entering on any new work to go on a pilgrimage to Rome, and to seek an interview with the Pope. He went for two years to the monastery of Epternac, and there, in 787, the news came to him that Wittekind wished to be baptised, and that the country was quiet and ready to listen to him again. Charles the Great thought this a favourable opportunity to make Wymodia a diocese, and persuaded Willihad to be consecrated Bishop of Eastern Friesland. He constantly journeyed through his diocese, baptising and preaching, and was everywhere well received. He chose the town of Bremen as the site of his cathedral church, and watched its progress with great interest. He did not live to see it finished, for in the year 789, when holding a Visitation, he was seized with a fever at a place called Blexen, and died. He was buried in the cathedral at Bremen.

Wilson, THOMAS, Bishop of Sodor and Man, one of the holiest of English prelates, was born at Burton, in Cheshire, 1663, died in 1755. After he had graduated at Dublin, he was appointed chaplain to the Earl of Derby, who, as Lord of the Isle of Man, made him Bishop of that diocese in 1797 at the early age of thirty-four. He found the inhabitants of the island far behindhand both as regards civilisation and religious life. Being a man of great energy and possessing wonderful powers of organisation, he set to work in good earnest, and in a very short space of time had improved their condition in both matters. In 1707 he drew up a sort of Catechism for the people, which was the first book ever printed in Manx. Its English title was Principles and Duties of Christianity, later changed to The Knowledge and Practice of Christianity made easy to the Meanest Capacities. It was not only published in English, but also translated into French and Italian. He took the keenest interest in all missionary efforts, and at different times of his life presided over various societies. He was Bishop nearly fifty-eight years, and he left his diocese under wise and strict rules for the maintenance of good Church discipline. His life was so active that he wrote comparatively few books. What he did write, however, are regarded as some of the greatest treasures in the way of devotional books in the English language—notably Parochialia, Sacra Privata, and Short and Plain Instructions for the Better Understanding of the Lord's Supper. He gave instructions for the Bible to be translated into Manx, but did not live to see it completed. It appeared in 1772. His life was written in 1781 by the Rev. C. Cruttwell. Several editions have since been published, the most important being that by Keble, as part of the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, (1847-52).

Winchester, BISHOPRIC OF.—In the year 633, Birinus, a Benedictine monk of Rome, offered himself to Pope Honorius to penetrate into the innermost parts of Pagan Britain, "to sow the seeds of the holy faith." He was consecrated by Asterius, Bishop of Genoa, and, landing on the West Saxon coast, took up his abode there, and preached diligently before King Kynegils and his people. His efforts were aided by King Oswald, who had come to seek the hand of the daughter of Kynegils, and the latter was baptised in 635; the place of baptism is not stated, but it may be assumed that it was Winchester. The ancient city of Caer-Gwent had been laid in ruins by Cerdic, but had risen again, and was now the chief residence of the Court, its name passing into Went-Ceaster. It is said that on the occasion of his baptism, Kynegils gave land to the clergy for seven miles round Winchester. Yet Winchester was not made the first seat of the Bishop of the West Saxons; that honour was conferred on Dorchester, near Abingdon. [DORCHESTER, BISHOPRIC OF.] Hedda, who became Bishop in 676, removed the "bishop's stool" to Winchester, as the need no longer existed for having a See near the Mercian border. On his death, in 705, the diocese was divided: Hampshire, Surrey, Sussex, and the Isle of Wight were kept to Winchester; the western parts were committed to a See established at SHERBORNE [q.v.]. In 711 Sussex was placed under the newly created See of Selsey. Surrey also was placed under that See, but before long reverted to Winchester.

King Kynegils began to build a church at Winchester, which was finished by his son Kenwald, and hallowed on Christmas Day, 613, being dedicated to St. Birinus, the Holy Trinity, and to the honour of St. Peter and St. Paul. Around this church sprang up a great religious community, and Helmstan, one of the monks, became Bishop about 837. He was succeeded by ST. SWITHUN [q.v.], who built and repaired many churches in the diocese, and obtained from Ethelwulf a charter for the general establishment of tithes throughout the kingdom: he was the educator and adviser of King Alfred. King Alfred, for the use of the learned monk St. Grimbald, founded a new monastery known as Hyde Abbey, which was at first tenanted by secular canons, but Bishop Athelwold, at the bidding of Dunstan, turned them out in 964, and replaced them with Benedictines from the great Abbey of Abingdon. This Bishop rebuilt the church, which was completed in 980. It is doubtful whether the Saxon cathedral was on the site of the present one, or a little to the northward of it; at any rate, whatever Saxon work there may be in it has been completely incorporated. The existing cathedral was commenced in 1079 by Bishop Walkelin, and finished in 1093, being consecrated with much pomp on St. Swithun's Day. In 1107 the tower fell in, but was rebuilt with funds left by the Bishop, and is called Walkelin's Tower; it was finished in 1120. To Bishop Giffard belongs the honour of founding, in 1129, the first Cistercian monastery of England (at Waverley, near Farnham), which was followed by others, and through this means a great religious revival was brought about. Henry of Blois, among many acts of munificence, built Farnham Castle, as an episcopal residence, and also Wolvesey Castle in Winchester, the beautiful hospital of St. Cross, and the abbey church of Romsey. Bishop Godfrey de Lucy [1189-1205] instituted a confraternity for the renovation of his cathedral, and the result was the present beautiful east end, beginning from the back of the apse, and including the Lady Chapel; his work is a charming example of Early English architecture. Bishop Peter des Roches [1205-

1244] introduced the Preaching Friars into England, and in 1225 built them a house near the east gate of Winchester. Bishop William of Edyngton, between 1360 and 1366, carried out extensive alterations in the cathedral; he completely changed the façade at the west, introducing the strict Perpendicular style, and extensive restorations in the nave were carried on by his successor WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM [q.v.], a great benefactor to his See and to the nation. Cardinal Beaufort [1405-1447] did much for the Hospital of St. Cross, and left many benefactions in his will. Bishop Waynflete [1447-1486] continued the repairs of the cathedral. Bishop Langton [1493-1501] transformed the Early English chapel on the south side of the Lady Chapel into a chantry for his own burial place, decorating it with wood-carving and making a groined roof; his successor, Bishop Fox [1501-1528], decorated the choir and rebuilt the clerestory above the middle-pointed chancel arches. He was the founder of Corpus Christi College at Oxford. In the time of these two last-named bishops, Priors Hunton and Silkstede extended the Lady Chapel some twenty-six feet. Since that time there have been no great structural changes in the cathedral. In 1541, in the time of BISHOP GARDINER [q.v.], an important change came to Winchester Cathedral: it was put upon the new foundation; that is, a dean and chapter were substituted for the Benedictine house. By letters patent, Henry VIII. ordered that the cathedral should no longer be called that of St. Swithun, but that of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, and established the new foundation on the ruins of the old. He nominated William Kingsmill, the Prior, to be primum originalem et modernum Decanum, and appointed twelve prebendaries. He also appointed twelve Students in Divinity, six at Oxford and six at Cambridge; twelve "Pety Cannons, to syng in the Church"; twelve "Laye men to syng and serve in the Quere dayly, Angliot. Vycars"; ten "Queresteres"; one Master of the Choristers; one Goepeller; one "Pistoler"; an upper and an under Sexton; one "Obsonator to by their diet"; an upper and an under-Butler; a Cook and an under-Cook; a Porter; two Bellringers; and twelve "pore men" who had been about the King's Court or person, or engaged in public affairs, or had been worn out in the army or navy.

BISHOP LANCELOT ANDREWES [q.v.], 1619-1628, is the greatest Bishop of Winchester since the Reformation.

The present chapter of Winchester consists of a dean, five canons, three archdeacons, five minor canons, and twenty-four honorary canons. The income of the See is £6,500 per annum. The diocese comprises the entire county of Hants, the Channel Islands, part of Surrey, and small portions of adjacent counties. The number of benefices is 547.

Winchester School.—The College of St. Mary of Winchester was founded by WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM [q.v.], Bishop of Winchester. He made the special wants of the age his study. He saw how the religious instruction of the people had fallen off in consequence of the decreasing number of the clergy, and he determined to remedy this evil by helping poor scholars in their clerical education, and establishing two colleges of students for the increase of God's worship, for the propagating of the Christian faith, and for the improvement of the liberal arts and sciences. He had planned this soon after coming to the See, and had already bought the land in Oxford. In Winchester he agreed with one Richard Horton that for ten years he should diligently instruct in grammatical learning so many poor scholars as he should send him, and the Bishop agreed to provide him with a good assistant. His plan was already complete in his own mind; it was to provide for the perpetual maintenance and instruction of 200 scholars, to afford them a liberal support, and to lead them through a perfect course of education—from the first elements of knowledge through the whole circle of the sciences. Two establishments, one subordinate to the other, were to compass all this. He resolved to build the College at Oxford first, and began to deal with it as with Winchester; he would not wait till his buildings were finished, but gathered his students, found a governor for them, provided their lodgings, and laid down their code of management. The King's patent giving him leave to build is dated June 30th, 1379. He published his charter of foundation the November following, in which it is called Seinte Marie College of Wyncestre in Oxenford. But it was popularly called "New College," and that name still remains. The building was finished in six years, and was opened with much solemnity, April 14th, 1386. In the charter of St. Mary's, Winton, bearing date Oct. 20th, 1382, Thomas Cranley is nominated as the first warden. The first stone was laid March 26th, 1387, and it was opened March 28th, 1393. It had at once its full complement of scholars, and continued all along to furnish members to New College. At first it was ruled by a master and undermaster, then it was committed to a warden. The first nomination of fellows was made by the founder in 1394.

The situation of the college is singularly good, standing as it does on the south side of the city, without the walls, between two branches of the Itchen, which flow through the cathedral precincts. The open meadows on the south stretch down to St. Cross and Twyford. There is no useless ornamentation in the buildings; indeed, it is a characteristic of Wykeham's work everywhere that all his decoration was made to serve some useful purpose. In the present case it was needful to make his foundation safe from attacks. The east was secured by the brook; on the north he drew a wall of 300 feet; to the west was the back of the stables and another long wall which turned at the south to the brook again. The northern wall, facing the king's highway (which had the conventual grounds of St. Swithun's Priory on the opposite side), had one entrance only, a gateway, which led into a large fore-court. Round this were the brewhouse and bakehouse, malt and flour-rooms, slaughter-house, stables; for the ancient monastic economy provided for all articles of use and consumption within its own walls. Opposite the first gateway was another, which led into a quadrangle, 120 feet by 110 feet, around which the college buildings were grouped; between these buildings and the river were gardens. The outer walls are bare of ornament, because they were for defence; but the school buildings form a beautiful and dignified feature in the view, especially from the Giles Hill side. At the south-east portion of the quadrangle is the chapel, adjoining which is the muniment tower; west of this was the school, and refectory above it, and again west of this, forming the south-west corner, the cellar, the buttery, the bursary, audit-room, library, rose one above the other, and reached the entire height of the chapel. Thus all the offices of the college formed one imposing line of some 200 feet long. Over the inner gateway was the Warden's house, thus commanding a view of both quadrangle and fore-court.

Twenty-six years after Wykeham's death, his steward, John Fromond, completed the cloisters south of Wykeham's buildings.

The government of the college was carried on in entire conformity with the founder's statutes, except so far as the Reformation brought changes, until the year 1857. At that time the Oxford University Commission recommended the substitution of competitive examinations in place of the old nomination system, and this was done, but with a manifest disregard of the founder's proviso that the benefits of his foundation should be for those who could not otherwise obtain their education—the "pauperes et indigentes;" for now it is impossible for boys to gain a scholarship in competition with those whose parents are able to pay for a good preparatory course of training for them.

The Public School Commissioners have reconstructed the Constitution of the College, retaining the Warden and Fellows under the name of "the Governing Body," but relieving them from all duties connected with it, excepting those of managers. They were to administer the revenues, present to the livings, elect the two statutable masters, appoint the examiners to conduct the elections, and take cognisance of any complaints relating to the management of the school which might be laid before them. The Fellows are not now, as formerly, all Wykehamists. Of the eleven persons who form the Governing Body, two, the Warden of New College and the Warden of Winchester College, are ex officio members; one each is chosen by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, one by the Fellows of New College, one by the Royal Society, one by the Lord Chief Justice, one by the Masters at Winchester, and the remaining three by the other members of the Governing Body.

We cannot enter into all the customs and peculiarities of Winchester School, but will only mention the singing of Uides Domum on the eve of breaking up for the summer vacation; the origin of the song is doubtful, but tradition says that it was composed by a scholar who for some offence was punished by remaining at school during the holidays. A great curiosity is the famous picture of the Trusty Serrant, dating from the sixteenth century; it is in the west side of the inner quadrangle, painted on a board, and represents him in a closely-buttoned blue coat and bands, with a pig's head, an ass's ears, a deer's feet. His mouth is padlocked; his right hand held up open; his left hand has a broom, dust-pan, labour-fork, and shovel. A belt round his waist carries a sword, and on his left arm is his buckler. By his side is the founder's arms, with his famous motto beneath, "Manners makyth man." Underneath are some curious Latin verses which have been thus translated:—

"A trusty servant's portrait would you see,
This emblematic figure well survey.
The porker's mout not nice in diet shows;
The padlock shut, no secret he'll disclose;
Patient, the ass his master's rage will bear;
Swiftmess in errand the stag's feet declare;
Loaden his left hand apt to labour saith;
The vest, his neatness; open hand, his faith.
Girt with his sword, his shield upon his arm, Himself and master he'll protect from harm."

Among the most celebrated Wykehamists we may mention Archbishops Chichele, Warham, and Howley; Bishops Waynflete, Lowth, Maltby, and Mant; the Nonjuring prelates Ken and Turner; the poets Otway, Collins, and Young; Sydney Smith; Drs. Arnold, Hook, and Christopher Wordsworth; Lord Cottenham, Lord Selborne, Lord Hatherley, Chief Justice Erle, etc.

Wine.—One of the most important social movements of the present century is that of abstinence from intoxicating drinks. But total abstinensers comprise two classes, who take very divergent lines. The one side holds that wine, though lawful, is not expedient in the face of the terrible evils which afflict modern society through strong drink. These abstainers take the pledge of total abstinence as an example to others, following the example of St Paul, who said that he would rather not eat meat at all than cause his brother to offend. But the other class of abstainers maintain that wine is an evil in itself, that it is a sin to drink it, as it is to indulge in any other forbidden pleasure.

It is manifest that they who hold this view must also hold that the wines which our Lord created at Cana and which He used at the Last Supper were non-alcoholic, were in fact unfermented liquor, and not what we commonly know as "wine." It is quite conceivable that though Christ may have given wine which would intoxicate when used in excess, it may be desirable under present conditions to forego the right to drink such wine, just as St. Paul recommends abstinence from marriage under certain circumstances [1 Cor. vii.]. But it is impossible to believe that Christ gave what is in its very nature an evil thing. Accordingly those who hold the essential evil of all intoxicating drinks expound the various passages in which wine is commended in Scripture as referring to unfermented liquors.

The commonest Hebrew word of the Old Testament which is rendered "wine" is Yayin, and it is derived from a word signifying to ferment. It is used for intoxicating drinks in Gen. ix. 21; xix. 34; 2 Sam. xiii. 28, and many other places. It is spoken of with implied commendation in Gen. xiv. 18; Num. vi. 20; Ps. civ. 15; Deut. xiv. 26; etc.

Its evil use is condemned in Prov. xx. 1; xxiii. 31; Is. v. 22, etc. Another word is tirosk, from a root signifying "to possess," and so called, says Gesenius, "because it gets possession of the brain and inebriates." This is the word used in Gen. xxvii. 28, 37; Deut. vii. 13., etc.

In the New Testament the commonest word is oinos, a word closely connected with the English equivalent "wine." This is the word used in John ii. 9, and that it was fermented and intoxicating is shown by reference to Mark ii. 22; Eph. v. 18, where the same word is used. Another word, gleukos, "sweet wine," is also used in Acts ii. 13 of intoxicating drink. The argument which is sometimes brought forward that the wine used at the Last Supper was unfermented, because the Jews at that season rejected all things leavened, fails from the fact that the Jews have never been in the habit of putting away wine, though at the Passover season they are most rigid in abstaining from the taste or touch of any drink into which grain has entered, and to use only the fermented juice of the grape, prepared by their own hands.

On these grounds it is very strongly contended by strict rubricians that the use of what is called "Unfermented Wine" in the Holy Communion is altogether inadmissible as being contrary to the use of the whole Church from the beginning, and that such matter is not in the scriptural sense wine at all. It is further contended, not unreasonably, that the innovation is but a renewal of the old Encratite heresy. But there is no reason to be urged against those abstainers, who regarding abstinence in common life as in the highest sense expedient, desire also to keep the Holy Communion as far as may be free from that which may intoxicate, and therefore use a wine which, though fermented, and therefore genuine wine, contains but little alcoholic strength.

Winer, GEORGE BENEDIKT, one of the many great German writers on Biblical criticism in this century, was born at Leipzig in 1789, died there, 1858. Having passed through the course of education at Leipzig with great honours, he was appointed Professor of Theology in 1839, and kept the post till his death. He wrote an almost endless number of books, nearly all treating of the Bible, or of subjects connected with it. His great desire was to give a new direction to Biblical criticism, being convinced that writers were too fond of theories, and did not give enough attention to facts. His critical abilities were great and his judgment was sound. Of his many works there are three which deserve special mention—a Bible Dictionary; a Grammar of New Testament Greek regarded as a sure basis for New Testament Exegesis; and a Grammar of the Chaldee Language as con- tained in the Bible and the Targums. The two latter have been translated into English.

Wiseman, NICHOLAS, Cardinal and Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster [b. of an Irish family at Seville, 1802; d. in London, 1865], was educated at Waterford, and at St. Cuthbert's College near Durham, and in 1818 entered the English College at Rome. In 1823 he received Holy Orders, was made Vice-Rector of the English College and Professor of Oriental Languages at the Roman university, and was made a D.D. His first writings were published in 1828, the earliest being Hora Syriaca, from MSS. in the Vatican; and in 1836 the Doctrines of the Catholic Church appeared, which had already been delivered as lectures, and which was the first step towards his reputation in England. In 1840 he was appointed Coadjutor Vicar-Apostolic of the Central District of England, with the title of Bishop of Melipotamus in partibus Infidelium; and President of St. Mary's College, Oscott. In 1849 he became Vicar-Apostolic of the London district, and in September of the following year, at the new distribution of the kingdom into twelve Sees, he was nominated Archbishop of Westminster and a Cardinal Priest. The appointment was regarded in England with strong suspicion and dislike, as it was looked upon by Church of England members as a blow aimed at the Establishment; Cardinal Wiseman partly allayed the panic by an Appeal to the People of England concerning the Catholic Hierarchy, and by other lectures and essays, which gained the admiration of friends and foes alike. He was a genial man, popular in society. He wrote various works on the doctrine of the Eucharist and other matters of Roman dogma; and some books on science and art, The Influence of Words on Thought and Civilization, etc., which have gained a wide circulation.

Wishart, GEORGE, called "The Martyr."—One of the early Scottish Reformers; supposed to have been a native of Forfarshire, though the circumstances of his birth are unknown; he first came under notice as headmaster of a grammar school at Montrose at the beginning of the sixteenth century. It was here that he began to teach the Reformation doctrines, which so roused the anger of the guardians of his pupils that he was obliged to flee for a time to England, where he was seized on a charge of heresy, and publicly recanted at Bristol in 1538. In 1543 he returned to Scotland with the Commissioners who had been employed to treat with Henry VIII. for the marriage of Prince Edward with the infant Queen of Scots. Wishart now openly adopted the profession of Reformer, and travelled about through Scotland stirring up the mob to rebellion, and causing riots and destruction wherever he preached, while he defied all attempts of the authorities to stop the disturbances. In East Lothian he met with John Knox, who became warmly attached to him, and constituted himself Wishart's disciple and champion, as the Reformer was supposed to be in danger of an attack upon his life from Cardinal Beaton. Letters have lately been brought to light which seem to confirm a suspicion that Wishart was engaged in a plot against Beaton which had already been hinted at by two Scottish authors. These letters are to the effect that one Wyshert (or Wysshart), "a Scotchman," had been employed to deliver letters to Henry VIII. from "the Lorde of Brunstone," containing a plan of the method in which the murder of the Cardinal was to be carried out. The Laird of Brunstone was, without doubt, an intimate friend of Wishart, and it is also known that the latter had a private interview with the King immediately after. As Cardinal Beaton knew that a plot was being made against him, this would explain the danger in which Wishart knew himself to stand, and which eventually overtook him. He was seized at Haddington, brought to St. Andrews for trial, and condemned to be burned as a heretic; and the sentence was carried out on the 1st of March, 1546.

Witchcraft may be defined as the claim of the power of producing effects without the use of natural means. The question as to whether these supernatural powers exist or not has been one that has been argued in all ages; the upholders of the belief saying that those who deny it deny the truth of the Bible, while others say that belief in witches and the influence of evil spirits over mankind is not consistent with faith in God. In common with many other superstitions, it had its rise in the ignorance and simple credulity of the people in bygone ages. An old woman, perhaps, living alone with her cat, uttered curses on the head of some neighbour who had offended. Presently the neighbour's child fell ill, or some other calamity happened, and, remembering the curses, the trouble, whatever it was, was attributed to her. And the poor people especially, who had no education or religion, very often, to teach them better, believed these tales, and so the superstition spread. Innumerable books have been written on the subject, tracing the origin of the belief and describing the various meetings supposed to have been held by the witches. The best account of these is in the famous Brocken scene in Goethe's Faust. The people seem to have believed the powers of the witches almost unlimited, but not quite. We find Shakespeare, in Hamlet, alluding to the popular belief that at Christmas time "no witch hath power to charm." In all countries the practice of witchcraft was strenuously forbidden, and in all cases trial by ordeal was ordered. Very often the accused were thrown bound into a pond; if they immediately sank they were guilty, if they rose to the surface they were innocent. Sometimes they were made to repeat the Lord's Prayer, the belief being that no witch could say it without a mistake. With the improvement of education the belief in witchcraft began to die out, and the cases got fewer and fewer in all the countries of Europe, and in time ceased altogether. In England trial for witchcraft was put a stop to by a law in George II.'s reign. The last known instance of a woman being burned as a witch in Europe was at Posen in 1793. All sorts of preventives were used by the common people, and to this day many of the peasants in Germany burn straw on May 1st, "Walpurgisnacht," because the witches are supposed to assemble in great force on that night, and the burnt straw is sure to disperse them.

Wither, GEORGE, Christian poet, was born at Bentworth, near Alton in Hampshire, in 1588, died in 1667. He studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, and at the age of eighteen he was urged by his family to make his choice of a profession, so he entered at Lincoln's Inn to read for the law, but soon devoted himself to writing and became known as a poet. After travelling in Ireland, Scotland, and elsewhere, he published several poems which brought him more prominently before the world. His celebrated work, Abuses Stript and Whipt, a volume of political satires, appeared in 1613. This gave so much offence to the Government that he was for a time imprisoned in the Marshalsea. While there he wrote his Satire to the King in 1614. After some months' imprisonment, Wither was released through the kindly intervention of the Earl of Pembroke.

Amongst his works of greater importance are the Hymns and Songs of the Church, which were published about 1623, and for which he gained a patent or privilege from King James. They were the outcome of a translation of the Psalms, are well known, and are written in a simple touching style. They were set to music by Orlando Gibbons, one of the most distinguished musicians of that day. After a struggle with the publishers, Wither was obliged to give up his right to have the Psalms bound up with all Bibles, and could only have a patent for them separately. In 1646 he was in great poverty, having lost a great deal of money over the Hymns and Songs, and many of his old patrons and friends were dead. This state of things caused the tone of melancholy which pervades the Emblems, written about this time. He settled himself near Farnham, and there enjoyed the friendship of Selden, the most learned linguist and antiquarian of that time. In 1641 appeared the Halewiah, or Second Remembrancer, which may be said to have ended the poetical life of George Wither, who from that time became actively engaged in the Civil War; and it was while taking part as an officer in the Parliamentary Army that he was made prisoner after the battle of Edge Hill, and, as his property had been seized before by the Royalists, he and his family were in a pitiable state. Up to the time of the Civil War Wither belonged to the Established Church; then he might be said to have relinquished the forms rather than its ordinances. He called himself a "Catholic Christian," and said "he separated himself from no Church adhering to the foundations of Christianity." His political friends were amongst the most noted of those days, and, besides Milton and Dryden, included Michael Drayton, Thomas Cranley, Hayman, and Christopher Brooke. He was engaged in writing a Paraphrase on the Ten Commandments almost up to the last hour of his life. He was buried in the church belonging to the Savoy Hospital.

Wodrow, ROBERT.—An ecclesiastical historian [b. at Glasgow, 1679; d. at Eastwood, Renfrewshire, 1734]. He entered the Glasgow University in 1691, and was appointed Librarian of the College at an early age; in 1703 he received his licence to preach, and in the same year became minister of Eastwood, near Paisley, where he remained till his death. The intermediate time was spent by him in untiring literary work, and he was also a zealous Church politician, attending all ecclesiastical courts when it was possible, and fulfilling his duty as one of a Committee of Presbyters formed for the protection of the Church of Scotland after the Union of 1707. He was a strict adherent to Presbyterianism, and opposed the Act for re-establishing Patronage; he was appointed, with four others, to go to London to urge its repeal, but, failing in this object, he quietly submitted, and recommended his colleagues to do the same. The work to which he devoted his life was a History of the Church of Scotland from the Restoration to the Revolution, on which he expended the greatest care, and the first edition of which was published in 1721. It is a most valuable work as regards the accuracy of its facts, even to the smallest details; but it is one-sided, badly arranged, and absolutely deficient in all grace of style. Wodrow also wrote The Lives of the Scottish Reformers and Analecta: a History of Remarkable Providences.

Wolff, JOHANN CHRISTIAN [born at Breslau in 1679, died at Halle, 1754].—A German metaphysician. He was Professor of Physical Science at the University at Halle, and first came into notice through the opposition of the Pietists, who were shocked at his method of applying the test of mathematics to religion as well as philosophy. His colleagues, Francke and Lange, charged him with being a despiser of religion and a teacher of error, and the Faculty of Halle lodged a formal complaint against him with the king. The chief ground of this accusation was his oration, De Philosophia Sinensium Morali, in which he approved the morality of Confucius, and it was said also that he encouraged social anarchy. In November, 1723, a Cabinet decree was issued ordering him on pain of death to leave the Prussian dominions within forty-eight hours, and Prussian subjects were forbidden under heavy penalties to read his books. Wolff fled to Cassel, and within a year accepted a Chair at Marburg, whence his fame spread rapidly. He adopted the principles of Leibnitz, and endeavoured to popularise them by reducing them to a systematic method by means of mathematics. His system of philosophy grew at length to be considered an indispensable part of intellectual culture, and many German writers adopted his method. In 1740, when Frederic II. came to the throne, he was recalled to Halle, where his return was celebrated with a complete ovation, and he was made rector of the university, a Privy Councillor, and baron of the Empire.

Wolff was a voluminous writer, both in Latin and German; he published some German school-books of philosophy, and a number of treatises on special subjects in physics and mathematics, and he did much to create the widespread taste for philosophical speculation which has of late years characterised Germany. He also gave to rationalistic theology its fundamental principle; and Kant, while criticising him sharply, confessed that he was a great dogmatic philosopher. Wolff's disciples have cultivated most zealously his views on natural theology.

Wolfe, REV. CHARLES, Christian poet, born at Dublin, 1791, died at Cork, 1823. He was educated chiefly at Winchester, and in 1809 entered Dublin University, took his degree in 1814, and was ordained in 1817. His literary fame rests principally on The Burial of Sir John Moore, but he wrote other poems, which together with fifteen sermons were published after his death by the Rev. John Russell, under the title of Remains of the late Charles Wolfe, A.B., Curate of Donoughmore, Diocese of Armagh. Some of his poetry was of real merit, but is now well-nigh forgotten.

Wolff, JOSEPH, a missionary, was born near Bamberg in Germany in 1795, died in 1862. He was of Jewish origin, and his father was a Rabbi; but through the influence of some friends he was converted to Christianity, and was baptised into the Roman Catholic Church by a monk in 1812. Three years later he paid a visit to Rome, but there began to be dissatisfied with the teaching and ritual, and was therefore expelled from the city as a heretic by the Inquisition. He came to England and joined the Established Church, and, having studied Oriental languages at Cambridge, was employed as a missionary to the Society for the Conversion of the Jews in the East. He travelled for nearly twenty years in all parts of the world, finishing with America, where he was ordained deacon. He returned to England and was ordained priest. Being tired of a wandering life, he took a curacy in Yorkshire; but in 1843 the rumour coming that two British officers were in the greatest danger in Bokhara, Wolff started off to find them. After many adventures and hair-breadth escapes, he ascertained that they had been murdered there, and thensettled down as Vicar of Isle Brewers, in Somersetshire, where he died. Wolff was a most amusing man, original and quaint to eccentricity. Thus he would jump up in the middle of a dinner-party and volunteer a Bokhara song. And it was a favourite boast of his on his visits that he needed no carpet bag, having all his toilet requisites about him. But he was a man of deep piety and of remarkable kindness of heart, as well as of learning and shrewdness. He wrote accounts of his various missionary journeys—Missionary Journal and Memoir, Narrative of a Mission to Bokhara in the Years 1843-5, Travels and Adventures of "J.W.," etc., etc.

Wolsey, THOMAS, Cardinal, ecclesiastic and statesman, was born at Ipswich in 1471, died at Leicester in 1530. He was educated at Ipswich School, whence he went to Magdalen College, Oxford. He took his B.A. at fifteen years of age, and was therefore called the "Boy Bachelor." He became Fellow of his College, and was appointed tutor of a school in connection with it. His first preferment was to the rectory of Lymington, in Somersetshire [1500]. He was soon after named as Deputy to Sir John Nafant, Treasurer of Calais, who introduced him to King Henry VII., in whose favour he soon gained a prominent place. He was made Royal Chaplain [1505], and Rector of Redgrave [1506], and was in 1507 chosen to go to Flanders as Ambassador to the Emperor Maximilian. Wolsey transacted the embassy so quickly and well that he was rewarded by the Deanery of Lincoln [1508]. In the following year the King died, and was succeeded by Henry VIII. Up to this time Wolsey, though a rising man, had no great public influence; but now preferments were heaped upon him. He was made King's Almoner in 1509, and rose so rapidly in the King's favour that he soon did anything he pleased. He became Rector of Torrington, Canon of Windsor, and Registrar of the Order of the Garter, Prebendary and Dean of York, Dean of Hereford, Precentor of St. Paul's, Bishop of Tournay, Bishop of Lincoln, and in 1514 Archbishop of York. In the following year he was made Cardinal, and succeeded Warham as Chancellor, and in 1516 Legatus-a-Latere, which gave him great wealth as well as power over the English clergy. He also farmed the revenues of the Bath, Worcester, and Hereford dioceses for the foreign bishops who held them, and held in commendam the abbey of St. Albans. He lived in the greatest splendour at York Palace [now Whitehall] and at Hampton Court, which he built for himself. His household consisted of more than 500 persons, among whom were nine or ten lords, fifteen knights, and forty squires. These promotions not being enough to satisfy his ambition, he aimed at the Papedom, which he hoped to get, as Charles V. was his client, and a great part of the Cardinals were his pensioners. On the election of Adrian VI., he attributed his disappointment to Charles, and this determined him to procure the divorce of Queen Catherine, if he was not the first to suggest it. This the King consented to, but instead of agreeing to marry the Duchess of Alençon, as Wolsey wished, he resolved on Anne Boleyn. This was sufficient to displease the Minister, but, further, the clergy were almost unanimously against the divorce; so were the English merchants, whose prosperity depended so much upon the Flemish markets, which were under the control of the Emperor. Wolsey therefore shrank from the storm, while Henry was determined, and this led to a breach between King and Minister. The Pope, Clement VII., in hesitation between King and Emperor, bade Henry act on his own responsibility, but the latter demanded that the Papal Bull allowing his marriage with Catherine should first be declared null. Then the Pope appointed Cardinals Wolsey and Campeggio to be a commission to try the case. They met at Blackfriars, but soon adjourned in perplexity. The Pope cited the parties to appear before him at Rome. Henry was furious, and banished Wolsey from Court, and in 1529 he was charged with having transgressed the Statute of Præmunire by holding a Legatine Court within the realm. Wolsey admitted the charge, and all his preferments were taken from him; but in 1530 the Archbishopric of York and the Bishopric of Winchester, which he had recently acquired, were restored to him. He did not, however, enjoy them long, for his rivals at court, jealous of hearing of his popularity in the north, revived the King's wrath against him, and he was arrested at his Yorkshire residence of Cawood on a charge of high treason, and brought towards London to take his trial, but died on the way, in the monastery of Leicester.

"Wolsey," writes J. R. Green, "had done more than any of those who went before him to raise the New Monarchy into an overwhelming despotism. All sense of loyalty to England, to its freedom, to its institutions, had utterly passed away. The one duty which had filled his mind was a duty to his prince, a prince whose personal will and appetite was overriding the highest interests of the State, trampling under foot the wisest counsels, and crushing with the blind ingratitude of a Fate the servants who opposed him. But even Wolsey, while he recoiled from the monstrous fame which he had created, could hardly have dreamed of the work of destruction which the royal courage, and yet more royal appetite, of his master was to accomplish in the years to come." [Hist. of Eng. People, p. 324.] It should be mentioned that Wolsey was a munificent patron of learning, and the founder of Cardinal's College, Oxford, now Christ Church.

Woman.—The change effected by Christianity in the position of woman has been of a most marked character. Under the Roman law, women were under the perpetual tutelage of their male relatives, the object being to keep their property in the family. They had no voice in public affairs, nor, legally, in the government of their own household. A child desiring to marry need not obtain the mother's consent—only that of the father. On her marriage her property became that of her husband, and all her earnings were his. In the Oriental world her position was still more debased; she was a slave, not a co-partner with her husband. Mr. George Smith, in his Assyrian Discoveries, tells how a man could pay half a mina to his wife, and say to her, "Thou art not my wife," which freed him from her thenceforth; though, if a woman repudiated her husband, she could be drowned.

It was with the Oriental condition that the Old Testament found its points of contact. It was emphatically proclaimed in the first book of the Scriptures that monogamy was the original intention of the Creator, and though polygamy was practised, it was discouraged; while, as our Lord said, divorce was only permitted "for the hardness of men's hearts." It was one of the darkest features of the growth of Hebrew civilisation that royal polygamy became frequent in the days of David and Solomon, and was the chief cause of the troubles of each of those reigns. As the Old Testament moves onwards, the sacredness of marriage is more and more dwelt upon.

The times of the New Testament brought religion into contact with European civilisation. Roman law had undergone a change. There had arisen another form beside the ancient one, called "Free Marriage," recognised by law, and of which the children were held to be legitimate, but not always held to be a respectable connection. It was a form established in the interest of the woman, for she was allowed to keep her own property, worship her own gods, and keep up intercourse with her paternal family. Such a wife was called uxor and matrona, a name less honourable than the materfamilias of the old law. The "Free Marriage" had almost superseded the older form in the first Christian century, and under it there was the utmost freedom of divorce, and morality had sunk to a terrible depth. Juvenal tells of a woman who had had eight husbands in five years. When Christianity became the national religion, Constantine, although himself further from the Christian standard of morals than some of the Pagan Emperors, proceeded at once to legislation with a view of diminishing the moral evils of the time. By laws passed in 330–331, a wife could be divorced from her husband only under three conditions—viz., when he was a murderer, or a magician, or a violator of tombs. A wife repudiating her husband was banished with loss of her property. A husband could be divorced on proof of his wife's unfaithfulness, but was prohibited from having a concubine. The mischief, however, had eaten too deeply into the public life for the then-existing type of Christianity to be able to end it; and to this fact is to be attributed the piecemeal and ineffective legislation of succeeding emperors. "It need not be said," writes Mr. Brace [Gesta Christi, p. 29], "that the Christian system of morals demanded the utmost purity of life, as well from the man as from the woman. In regard to masculine purity, it is still in advance of the current opinion of the civilised world. So strongly is this elevation of morals characteristic of Christ's life, that we do not look for or expect direct teachings against vice. No direct denunciation is transmitted from Him against one of the most terrible organised evils of ancient or modern times—prostitution—or against the unnatural vices which were eating out the heart of Roman and Greek society. The impression, however, which an impartial reader would get from the narrative is of a person so pure and elevated that such vices could not even be thought of when under His influence. His power goes to the back of organised vices, and touches the sources of character. His relations to abandoned women; the story of the adulteress which, whether true or imagined, shows the popular conception of His character; and the few words reported from Him on these and related topics, together with the character of His early followers, all point to the unique elevation and nature of His influence on the great weakness and sin of mankind. He required absolute purity from man as from woman. He was not, however, alone in this. The stoical moralists had done the like; yet but few of their followers had ever practised this high self-restraint, and no great example stimulated them to it. Even the stoical jurists alluded to the principle, but there is little question that, before Christianity entered the world, comparatively few persons felt this obligation of morals. Had the Founder of Christianity simply taught purity as some of the early Fathers taught it—as meaning absolute asceticism and celibacy—the world would have been comparatively little benefited. The nature of man would have reacted against it. We should have had even more celibate sects, greater reactions, a more unnatural condition of society, and a falling again into vices and habits as bad as those of the Imperial era. Such a system of morality could not have met some of the first conditions of a divinely sanctioned system; it would have been only temporary and incomplete. But it is evident that Christ set the highest value on marriage. The only human institution in regard to which He departed from His ordinary habit was that of marriage. He lays down here a direct and positive rule. The words are so clear and definite, that a mistake of the historian or transcriber seems hardly possible. He evidently felt the bond as one which more than any other binds human society together. He foresaw the boundless evils which would arise to the world from a looseness of its ties; the breaking up of homes; the neglect and ruin of children; the low position which freedom of divorce would give to woman; the temptation to man to choose and to throw aside; the destruction and degradation of family life which must ensue where marriage is taken up and broken at every whim. He either foresaw these evils, now so familiar to moralists, or He felt the sacredness of the union so deeply, as to command that only one cause should break it—unfaithfulness to the tie, or its moral equivalent." [MARRIAGE; DIVORCE.]

It is an interesting question to consider, what are the proper religious functions of women in the ministry of the Church. What they have done in one direction of that ministry we have considered under SISTERHOOD; but what are we to make of their work as public teachers? St. Paul in 1 Cor. xiv. forbids women to speak in the congregation. Some divines hold that the prohibition was intended to apply only to certain conditions, others that it was intended for all time. Those who hold the former view dwell on the fact that the Apostle gives directions [1 Cor. xi. 5-6] as to the dress of the women who "prophesied," and that St. Peter quotes Joel ii. 28, 29, declaring it to be a part of the Pentecostal gift that the daughters of men should prophesy as well as the sons, and that God would pour out His Spirit on the handmaids. Professor Godet, in his valuable commentary on 1 Cor. xiv. 33-36, reconciles this direction with the passage in chapter xi. by supposing that the latter refers to exceptional cases of a special revelation. In support of his contention, he adduces 1 Tim. ii. 11-14; the appeal to Gen. iii. 16, indicating in his opinion that the divine sentence was never to lose its binding force. By way of example, he cites the Montanist prophetesses and the women of the French Protestant Church after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, as sources of weakness. Speaking of more modern instances, such as those of Mrs. Fry and Miss Marsh, he says that the Gospel does not lose its life-giving power, even when preached in a manner not altogether in accordance with Apostolical prescription; but thinks these devoted women might have laboured still more usefully in some other manner. It seems very difficult to take such a view of work so obviously honoured of God; and those who hold a different opinion reason that St. Paul simply dealt with the conditions of his day. In that day it was "a shame" for a woman to speak in public assemblies, and accordingly, they say, he forbade a public scandal; in these days, when it is no longer shameful, it is argued that his judgment would be very different. See on this side an article by Dean Plumtre in The Nineteenth Century for January, 1884.

Woolston, THOMAS, Deistical writer, born at Northampton, 1669; died 1731. He was educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow, was ordained, and took his B.D. He studied greatly the works of Origen, which imbued him with the love of allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures, which was shown in his first published work, The Old Apology of the Truth for the Christian Religion Against the Jews and Gentiles Revised [1705]. He treats Moses and the miracles recorded in the Pentateuch as allegorical, and the miracles of Christ in the same way. In 1720 he published three Latin tracts, one to prove that a letter attributed by the Fathers to Pontius Pilate was a forgery, and the others addressed to Whitby, Waterland, and Whiston, on the subject of interpretation. These he followed with another, Whether the Quakers do not the nearest of any other sect of Religion resemble the Primitive Christians in Principles and Practice. These publications exposed him to much suspicion from the clergy, and when, in 1721, he published The Moderator between the Infidel and the Apostate, mocking at the Gospel miracles, he narrowly escaped a public prosecution for blasphemy, and was deprived of his college fellowship. Later on he developed his views in Six Discourses on the Miracles of Christ, which, from their tone of ridicule and banter, gave great offence. He characterised the Gospel narrative as a tissue of absurdities, and fiercely denounced the order of clergy. For this he was prosecuted in 1729 by the Attorney-General, tried and found guilty at the Guildhall, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment in the King's Bench, at the end of which time he was to pay a fine of £100. Being unable to pay this sum he remained in prison, where he died in a short time. He is buried in St. George's Churchyard, Southwark.

Worcester, BISHOPRIC OF.—Worcester, on a Roman road, and near a great river, became naturally a bishop's seat when the great province of Mercia was divided into five bishoprics. It was the ancient Nigorn- ceaster, a stronghold of the Hwiccas. Its first bishop, Bosel, was consecrated in 680. St. Dunstan was Bishop from 957 to 961. Oswald, who succeeded him, was a great friend of the monks in opposition to the secular clergy; he built a church to St. Mary to the north-east of the present cathedral, containing twenty-seven altars for his monks. No traces remain either of the church or monastery; they were ruined by Hardicanute's soldiers, and Bishop Wulfstan began the existing cathedral in 1084; in 1089 the eastern part was ready for consecration. He built also the crypt, which is one of the glories of Worcester, and in 1092 held a synod in it. Within a quarter of a century the roof was destroyed by fire, and in 1202 it was again greatly injured by fire. Many miracles were said to be wrought at the tomb of Wulfstan; it was visited by King John in 1207, and that King, by his own special request, was buried beside St. Wulfstan in 1216. In 1218 the cathedral was reconsecrated with much pomp by Bishop Sylvester, in honour of St. Mary, St. Peter, St. Oswald, and St. Wulfstan, in the presence of the young King Henry III. The choir, retro-choir, and Lady Chapel were commenced in 1224 by Bishop Blois, and are in the Early English style. Bishop Giffard, in 1269, added the gilt rings round the columns, probably to hide the iron clamps which welded the stonework together. In the fourteenth century Bishop Cobham [1317-1327] revaulted the north aisle of the nave, and in 1377 Bishop Wakefield vaulted the nave itself; he also, in 1380, built the present north porch. The central tower had fallen in 1175, and was rebuilt about 1281. In 1502 Prince Arthur, the eldest son of Henry VII., was buried here, and an exquisite little chapel marks the spot. The cathedral suffered much in the Rebellion from Essex's and Cromwell's troopers. During the Commonwealth no services were allowed; they were resumed April 13th, 1661.

Traces of Norman work are to be found now in the walls of the transepts, in the western part of the choir, the eastern arch of the north transept, and elsewhere. The piers of the tower encase a Norman "core." Outside there are two Norman doorways surmounted by Norman windows, and a central doorway, which was decapitated by a great west window in 1380. The chapter-house is Transitional Norman; its upper walls were rebuilt in the fifteenth century. The cloisters are in the Decorated style; near their entrance is a small door, famous archaeologically as the "Miserrimus" door: at the foot of the steps leading to it is a stone with the single word Miserrimus, "most wretched one," engraved on it as an epitaph. Many have been the imaginations of hopeless lover or half-despairing penitent lying below—one of which is enshrined in a well-known sonnet of Wordsworth; but local history has dispelled these more romantic associations, and revealed in him the Rev. T. Morris, vicar of Upton-on-Severn, an old loyal Jacobite, who died in 1748, aged eighty-eight, sorrowing to the last for the fallen dynasty.

One of Worcester's most celebrated bishops was HUGH LATIMER [q.v.].

A complete restoration was commenced in 1857 by Mr. A. G. Perkins, the cathedral architect, and continued on his death by Sir Gilbert Scott, who superintended the whole of the interior work. It was reopened after restoration in April, 1874.

The chapter includes a dean, two archdeacons, four canons, four minor canons, and twenty-four honorary canons. The income of the See is £5,000 a year. The diocese comprises the whole counties of Warwick and Worcester, part of Stafford, and portions of adjacent counties, and includes 482 benefices.

Wordsworth, CHRISTOPHER, D.D., youngest brother of the poet, was born in 1774, at Cockermouth; died 1846. He was educated at Hawkshead and at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became Fellow in 1798. He was made Chaplain to Dr. Manners Sutton, Archbishop of Canterbury, and became successively Rector of Ashby and Oby-with-Thirne [1804]; Dean of Bocking, in Essex [1808]; Rector of St. Mary's, Lambeth, and of Sundridge, in Kent [1816]; Master of Trinity College, Cambridge [1820], in which year he also exchanged his livings of Lambeth and Sundridge for the Rectory of Buxted-with-Uckfield, in Sussex. He was the author of a work in six volumes, Ecclesiastical Biography; or, the Lives of Eminent Men connected with the History of Religion in England.

Wordsworth, CHRISTOPHER, Bishop of Lincoln, the son of the preceding, was born in 1807, died in 1885. He was educated at Winchester, and went thence to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he won the Chancellor's English medals in 1827 and 1828, the Porson prize, the Brown's medals, the Craven scholarship, and was Senior Classic Medallist in 1829. Soon after taking his degree he gained a Fellowship, took orders, and in 1836 became Public Orator at Cambridge. He succeeded Longley as Head Master of Harrow in 1836, which post he held eight years, being nominated by Sir R. Peel to a canonry at Westminster in 1844. He acquired great fame as a preacher, and in 1847 and 1848 delivered the Hulsean Lectures at Cambridge. In 1865 he became Archdeacon of Westminster, and in 1869 was nominated Bishop of Lincoln in succession to Bishop Jackson, translated to the See of London. He resigned only a few weeks before his death, living just long enough to carry his project of the Southwell bishopric. [q.v.]

Bishop Wordsworth was an eminent classical scholar. He visited Greece several times, and embodied his observations in two very charming works, Athens and Attica, and Greece, Pictorial, Descriptive, and Historical. Even in the last years of his life he showed that in the midst of his untiring labours he had not forgotten his old tastes, for he published a very excellent edition of Theocritus. But it is as a theologian that he will be remembered. His Commentary on the Bible is one of the most remarkable works of this century, whatever opinion may be formed of the soundness of the Bishop's views, which may be summed up at once in the expression "High Anglican." It amazes the reader to open one of the volumes at hazard and see how the notes bristle with references to the Fathers and to the great English Divines, and there seems no limit to the Bishop's acquaintance with them. He was the most uncompromising of men against Rationalism and Freethought, the strenuous assertor of verbal inspiration. And he was equally fierce against Romanism, maintaining that the Babylon of the Apocalypse is the Roman Catholic Church. He was one of the writers against Essays and Reviews, in the volume edited by Bishop Wilberforce, being pitted against Professor Jowett on the subject of inspiration. When Dr. Stanley was appointed to the Deanery of Westminster, Dr. Wordsworth, as one of the canons, protested on the ground of Stanley's opinions. However, the friendship which grew up between them was warm and sincere. Another work of the Bishop's which must not be forgotten is his Theophilus Anglicanus, a manual in catechetical form, of Church doctrine and government from the Bishop's Anglican standpoint. It has been widely circulated, and is the most complete work of its kind. But no account of Bishop Wordsworth could be just which left out of sight his untiring energy as a bishop, his geniality and hospitality, his self-sacrifice and munificence. It was said of him as Canon of Westminster, that poor curates were as frequent and as heartily welcomed at his table as rich men, and to him and Lord Hatherley it was mainly owing, that a great number of churches were built and endowed in Westminster. Judged by his writings, Bishop Wordsworth might be thought one of the narrowest of theologians, but his life proved him to be one of the most generous and large-hearted men that have ever graced the English Episcopate. Several volumes of his Sermons in Westminster Abbey were published, chiefly on current topics, and he was the author of some of our best known hymns.

Wordsworth, WILLIAM, poet, was born at Cockermouth, in Cumberland, 1770; died 1850. His early education was at a public school at Hawkeshead in Lancashire, where he remained till 1787, when he entered St. John's College, Cambridge, and continued a student there till 1791. In the preceding autumn he had made a pedestrian tour in France, and on leaving college he returned to that country, being strongly imbued with Republican principles. He however returned to England in 1792, shortly before the execution of Louis XVI. He spent his time in a desultory manner, having taken an aversion to entering the ministry, to which profession he had been destined. He took to writing poetry, and in 1793 published two poems, An Evening Walk, addressed to a Young Lady, and Descriptive Sketches, taken during a pedestrian tour among the Alps. These, however, did not meet with much notice, and as Wordsworth had no private means, he contemplated writing political articles for the newspapers, but just then a legacy of £900 came to him, and on this sum he and his sister lived for seven years, when a further sum of money came in which enabled him to devote himself to poetical composition. In 1797 Wordsworth made the acquaintance of Coleridge, which resulted in the intimate friendship of the two poets. In 1798 they jointly published Lyrical Ballads, which was coldly received; they travelled together in Germany, and then Wordsworth took up his residence at Grasmere, whence in 1808 he removed to Allan Bank, both in the Lake Country. Up to 1814 he gave to the public only his minor poems, and for these had to bear severe criticism and ridicule. His style was to the world eccentric, and his language bald even to puerility. But while he only published these short and desultory effusions, his mind was developing his great philosophical poem The Excursion; this he published in 1814, and though not a commercial success, nor at once securing the admiration it merited, yet it found readers able to recognise its worth, and eventually was confessed to be one of the greatest poems in our language. In 1815 came the historical poem The White Doe of Rylstone; in 1822 a volume called Memorials of a Tour on the Continent, and some years later a noble series of Ecclesiastical Sonnets; in 1835 Yarrow Revisited, and other Poems. In 1803 he had published his Platonic Ode on Immortality, neglected then, but afterwards given a high place among his compositions. A few years after his death, one of his grandest works, The Prelude, was published, a long autobiographical poem in blank verse. In 1839 he received the honorary degree of D.C.L. from the University of Oxford; in 1842 a pension of £300 per annum was granted to him by Government; and on the death of Southey, in 1843, he became Poet Laureate.

Wordsworth's poetry has exercised a vast influence on the literature and religious thought of England. His firm determination to revolutionise our poetry by casting away the artificialism into which it had sunk, to be the poet and describer of nature and not the repeater of what people said about nature, exposed him, as we have said, to satire and ridicule. "This will never do," was the beginning of Jeffrey's celebrated attack in the Edinburgh Review. But Wordsworth had no doubt of the truth of his views, or of the high responsibilities of the poet, and he kept on his course unmoved until he had brought about the revolution in public opinion which he had sought after, and is confessed by nearly all critics to be the greatest poet of the nineteenth century, indeed the greatest since Milton.

His poetry is open to objection in the eyes of two classes of religious thinkers. The late Archbishop of Dublin, a very enthusiastic admirer of Wordsworth, objects to him that he did not take sufficient count of the sorrows and sins of the world. Living in retirement among the still lakes and mountains, apart from the struggles and agonies of men, he seems to have so given himself to the love and admiration of natural beauty, as to suppose that perfectibility was within man's reach by the culture of nature, and not to have realised the terrible mischief which sin has wrought in the world. His own life was wonderfully pure and blameless, but he was not brought into contact with the rough hardships and temptations which are the lot of thousands. "Whatever," says Mr. Stopford Brooke, "may have been his stated creed, he laid aside as poet the severer doctrine of original sin." The other objection which has been made to Wordsworth is his ecclesiasticism. He was always enthusiastically attached to the Church of England, and while much of his verse transcends all distinctions of party, and even stands in the outer circle of natural religion, outside Christianity itself, the greater part of it contemplates Christianity in its concrete form as a system of Faith, Discipline, and Doctrine, such as it presented itself to him in the Ordinances of the Church of England. The beautiful White Doe of Rylstone is throughout accented by the poet's admiration for the Church as it came forth from the hands of the Reformers in the days of Elizabeth. The muse of Keble was nursed upon Wordsworth, who in his turn was greatly influenced by the Church movement of 1833.

Work of Christ.—This is stated in the Angel's words to St. Joseph, when he said of the Holy Child who should be born, "Thou shalt call His Name Jesus: for He shall save His people from their sins." The Work of Christ is to save from sin.

Although this is the view most frequently put before us in Holy Scripture, it should not be forgotten that there is much and unquestionable support for a belief of the Franciscan divines of the Middle Ages that the first object of the Incarnation was the uniting of God and man in one in holiness; that God the Son would have become incarnate even if man had never sinned, since humanity would not have attained its perfection if Christ had not come into the world. And certainly the promises of glory and honour to man from union with Christ so far exceed his restoration from his fallen state, that we should always bear this view in mind.

In considering, however, the Work of Christ, His Office of Saviour necessarily comes first, and the statement of the manner in which He accomplished our salvation is known as the doctrine of the Atonement. [ATONEMENT.] Christ worked our salvation both by His Life and by His Death.

[1] By His Life. [a] His perfect obedience. Man—the first Adam—fell by disobedience to God; the second Adam came, as He repeatedly said, not to do His own Will, but the will of His Father, and as St. Paul says, "For as through the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners, even so through the obedience of the One shall the many be made righteous" [Rom. v. 19]. [3] His resistance to temptation; in the wilderness, through His life, on the Cross, "One that hath been in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" [Heb. iv. 15]. [c] His doing of all those things which, though distasteful to the natural man, are pleasing to God, and His not doing all those things which, though pleasing to man, are displeasing to God. By His Life as perfect Man, the Second Adam, because He was Perfect God also, wrought out some part of our salvation. The early Church emphasised this side of the Atonement by dwelling on the Incarnation and Life of Christ rather than on His Death. We see this in those of our collects which come from ancient sources.

[2] By His Death. Whilst, however, we bear in mind the necessary and essential connection between the Incarnation and Life of Christ and His atoning work, it is upon His Death that the mind of the Church has been especially fixed in later times, and it is to the effects of this that the term Atonement is more particularly applied. If the early Church a little exaggerated the idea that the Death was but the necessary conclusion of the Life of Christ, we, perhaps, a little exaggerate His Death and depress the doctrine of His Life. It may be well to touch briefly on a few points in the history of the doctrine of the Atonement.

Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons [170], believed that it was only by the Incarnation, by God becoming man, that man could obtain the predestined end of His original creation. That the perfecting of humanity in Christ was, at the same time, a realisation of the true idea of humanity. He viewed the Atonement as the victorious conflict of Christ with Satan, in which Christ maintained, in spite of all His temptations, full and entire obedience to the Father, unmasking Satan as rebel and deceiver and thereby proving Himself the strong one. Besides this, he represented redemption through Christ's blood as a price voluntarily paid to the devil, and by him voluntarily received as a ransom for us, his prisoners, so that he could not say he had been deceived. This is a rather degraded view, but it did, nevertheless, throw into strong light the idea of God's justice.

Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria [330], treats of the Atonement in a way something like the modern theory; he regards it from its Godward side. Since God is just, His justice must be satisfied in working man's salvation; the Law must not be annulled, nor the world left in perdition; therefore righteousness and compassion moved God to give His Son for the redemption of His creatures.

The next distinct theory of the Atonement is that of Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury [1093], who wrote the Cur Deus Homo, a theory of the Incarnation and the Atonement. He takes the Godward side, and endeavours to show that the Atonement does reconcile God to man, that it not only acts on man's heart, but that the Life and Death of Christ act on God. He views sin as an infinite debt, and the Death of Christ as having infinite merit. Reconciliation to God is needed, not because He is angry, but because He is just. A ransom has to be paid to God.

Abelard [1079-1142] brings to light the human side of the Atonement. He says that its main feature is the way in which God could touch the human heart; that God's love is shown in giving His Son; that mankind only needed to be reconciled because they could not believe in God's love, and that the Sacrifice of Christ is the mightiest instance of self-sacrifice. Abelard would thus reconcile man to God, who is pure unchangeable love, too high, too sublime to require a sacrifice or atonement. This is doubtless a true aspect of the Atonement, but it does not exhaust the truth.

Aquinas [1250], a man of noble mind, takes Anselm's view of the Atonement, but brings out more fully the idea of Christ's sufferings and death. He believes that Calvary was the object for which Christ came to earth, and emphasises—to use a sixteenth century phrase—His passive obedience (the obedience which He showed in His sufferings) as distinguished from His active obedience (the obedience He showed in His life). Aquinas points out that salvation depends on a mystical union between the Saviour and the saved.

Bonaventura, General of the Franciscans [1256], thought that although Anselm and Aquinas had shown the necessity of an Atonement, the necessity for the Atonement by the Death of Christ had not been shown, and that there might have been some other method by which God could have redeemed men.

No further speculations were made regarding the Atonement in the Middle Ages. After the Reformation we come to Grotius [d. 1645], a great jurist, statesman, and theologian, who considered that punishment corresponding with guilt was not absolutely necessary to righteous government, but that it might be fit and convenient to inflict it, and who carried this legal and political idea into a theory of the Atonement which thus approached closely to that of Bonaventura.

Such are the chief landmarks in the history of the doctrine of the Work of Christ in the Atonement. No important addition has been made to these theories, but it will, perhaps, put the matter in a clearer light to state the chief ways in which that doctrine is now held or stated.

The Catholic Church in its Anglican and Roman branches, and the more important Protestant communions outside that Church, hold, in the main, the views of Anselm and Aquinas, without rejecting what is true in Abelard's theory. The form in which the truth is expressed is, however, somewhat different within and without the Church.

This statement may be illustrated by a few extracts:—

[1] Anglican Church.—"One Christ, very God, and very Man . . . truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile His Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men" [Article II.] "Almighty God . . . Who didst give Thine only Son Jesus Christ to suffer death upon the Cross for our redemption; who made there (by His one oblation of Himself once offered) a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world." [Prayer of Consecration in the Office of Holy Communion.]

[2] Roman Catholic Church.—"We must believe that Jesus Christ, our Saviour . . . offered Himself a Sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, by dying upon a cross to purchase mercy, grace, and salvation for us; and that neither mercy, nor grace, nor salvation can, or ever could since Adam's fall, be obtained any otherwise than through the death and passion of the Son of God."

"By this one offering we were completely redeemed, inasmuch as our ransom was paid."

Neither can there now be any need of His dying any more, or purchasing any other graces for us than those for which He has already paid the price of His blood." [Dr. Challoner's Garden of the Soul.]

[3] Congregationalists.—"Christ is described as a propitiation, showing the righteousness as well as the love of God, in the premission and pardon of sin, and revealing Him as at once the Just and the Justifier—maintaining law and yet justifying transgressors who believe in Jesus. He dies "for us," and "by His stripes we are healed." He pays the penalty we had incurred, and ransoms us from everlasting destruction. He takes our place; He expiates our offences; He bears the burden of our sins, and endures their penal consequences. From His cross we catch the inspiration of self-sacrifice." [Dr. Stoughton's Doctrine of the Atonement.]

Some follow Abelard in denying that a satisfaction or ransom for sin was necessary, or that we are to regard Christ's death in that light. Archdeacon Farrar says:—"What Christ came to reveal was the love of God to man, seeking man's salvation. Of a need of compensation on God's part neither He nor His Apostles breathed a word . . . Is it not enough to say that Christ's death is the means of our life; that it is a reconciling sacrifice; that it is but one act of that sacrifice which marked the submission of His whole will to that of His Father; that it has redeemed us from the power of sin and Satan; that it was the appointed means of our regeneration, of our new life, of our ransom from the bondage of Satan, of our satisfaction for the debt of sin, of our being reconciled to God, of our hope of glory? If we believe all this . . . we may rest in the words . . . of the English Prayer Book [Art. xxxi.]; and need enter no further into the transcendent and incoignisable aspect of the Atonement."

The Rev. John Page Hoppe, the Unitarian preacher, considers that "not the reconciliation of God to man, but of man to God," is needed. That "in a very profound sense it might be said that the Atonement is all that Christ is to any one—not only all that He was but all that He is." He takes the words of St. Paul, "in Christ," as going to the very heart of the subject; and says that the new moral and spiritual creation which comes of being "in Christ" is of God, as the result of the reconciling work of Christ.

There is a value in all reverent attempts to explain the Atonement, since they all help to throw light upon it; the mistake is to select one view as containing the whole truth.

It will be seen from what has been said thus far, that the different views about the work of Christ in the Atonement fall into two classes:—[a] The view of those who consider that God does not need to be reconciled to man, but man to God; and that the phrases and words which would imply the necessity for any "propitiation," "ransom," "redemption," etc., etc., are altogether metaphorical, and only variously describe the effect of the Atonement in its relation to us, that they are a concession to our limited power of understanding the mysteries of God, and that we had better keep to the Scriptural term "reconciliation," and not use the ambiguous word "Atonement," which has been discarded in the Revised Version. [b] The view of those who consider that although man needs to be reconciled to God, God must also be reconciled to man, and that the words implying ransom, sacrifice, etc., do describe, in human terms it is true, actual verities. These terms are chiefly four:—

[1] a sin offering, an atoning sacrifice, implied in Heb. i. 3; John i. 29; xix. 36; Rev. v. 7; [2] a reconciliation, Rom. v. 11; 2 Cor. v. 19, 20; Gal. iii. 19, etc.; [3] a ransom from slavery, 1 Tim. ii. 6; [4] Satisfaction or the discharge of a debt, involved in Gal. v. 3; 2 Cor. v. 21; 1 Pet. iii. 18. We use the three last of these expressions in speaking of sin or indebtedness between man and man, and, because language possesses no better terms, the sacred writers use or imply them in describing our sin against God. Obviously they are all inadequate, since we do not understand the mystery of evil, or even of the least sin, much less the light in which they appear to God. But we cannot doubt that the terms are true as far as they go, and within the limits which the analogy of the faith places upon them.

The first phrase, that of sin offering, or atoning sacrifice, is altogether a religious one. Mankind has felt from the earliest ages the need of some sacrifice or offering either to God or to some false deity, which would put away the sense of sin. The objections brought against taking these phrases in any way literally are chiefly two: first, that this would imply a difference of will in the Persons of the Godhead—the Father willing to punish, the Son willing to pardon; and, secondly, that the punishment of an innocent man for a guilty one is immoral. To the first it may be replied that the Atonement is always represented as the outcome of the love of God the Father: "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son" for it, and that to speak of God the Son appeasing the wrath of God the Father is, to say the least, irreverent, as well as contrary to Scripture. There can be no difference of will in the Persons of the Godhead. [TRINITY.] To the second it may be replied that the case is not that of a man who voluntarily offers himself as a substitute for a condemned criminal, but of the Incarnate Son of God who voluntarily died, apparently by the natural course of events, by civil punishment, and whose death in heaven pleaded as the sacrifice that taketh away the sin of the world. There was no apparent substitution; the evil passions and the jealousy of men brought about His death in the eyes of the world; the true purpose of that death being a matter of revelation. It is simply a great and entirely unscriptural error to represent a wrathful God as smiting His innocent Son in punishment for the sins of mankind.

The Relation of the Eucharist to the Work of Christ.—The Eucharist is a continual witness to the belief of the Church in the atoning work of Christ on its sacrificial side; and in it earnest Christians have, since the time of Gregory the Great, believed that not only is the Sacrifice of Christ commemorated, but that the merits of His death and passion are pleaded in a special way for the worshippers present and for those for whom they pray. There is no repetition of the death of Christ who was "once offered," nor any mediation again, since His sacrifice was "full, perfect, and sufficient," but a continual and effectual pleading of His atonement before God, "for as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till He come" [1 Cor. xi. 26]. This pleading of the One Sacrifice of Christ, upon earth, is the counterpart of His present work in heaven, where, as "a Priest for ever" [Heb. vii. 21, 24], "He ever liveth to make intercession" [Heb. vii. 25] by continually setting forth before God the Father the one great sacrifice of His death.

The close connection between the atoning work of Christ and the Incarnation must always be remembered. [INCARNATION.] As far as we can read the Gospel scheme, unless God the Son had become incarnate He could not have been our Saviour.

Works, Good. [GOOD WORKS.]

Worship.—The Hebrew words so translated are from the following roots:—[1] asad, "to prostrate oneself," a Chaldaic word found in Is. xlv., and in Daniel, and applied to obeisance done to an idol; [2] abad, "to labour for as a servant"; [3] shachah, "to bow down before." This last is by far the most commonly used word, from Gen. xxii. 5 to Zech. xiv. 16.

In the Greek we have [1] latreuo and the noun latreia. This is from latris, "a hired servant," and came to mean both in heathen and Christian phraseology "to serve with sacrifices and prayers," used in Acts xxiv. 14, Phil. iii. 3, Heb. x. 2; [2] threskeia, derivation uncertain, but probably signifies "religious fear" [Liddell and Scott.] Used very seldom [Col. ii. 18, Acts xxvi. 5, James i. 26, 27]. [3] Proskunein, lit. "to kiss the hand as a token of obeisance or homage," and so "to prostrate oneself." This is the most usual word in the New Testament. [4] Sebomai, "to feel awe," applied in classical authors to honour due to parents and to the gods. Used in Matt. xx. 9; Acts xvi. 14; xviii. 7; xix. 27, etc.

Worship comprises two elements, the inward feeling of the heart, and the outward expression of it in outward sign. The emotions of the heart towards God are manifold. Thus there is gratitude for goodness received, which is expressed in Praise; there is admiration and love for the beauty of the Divine character revealed to us, which is expressed in such words as "We give thanks to Thee for Thy Great Glory," and this we call Adoration. There is also supplication—the approach to God with requests to supply our needs, and this is Prayer.

The outward worship, therefore, is intended to express the emotions, and also to kindle them. This is admirably expressed by Canon Hoare in the following words:—

"Worship kindles emotion. I can understand a man going in to the throne of grace with a heart unmoved by deep emotion, but I cannot understand how it is possible that he should come out from it with his heart still cold, after the experience of such wonderful mercy. If love prompts worship, it must surely follow that worship will kindle love. David teaches us the twofold effect in a comparison of Psalm xviii. and Psalm cxvi. In both he declares his love for Jehovah, and in both he connects it with his worship. But there is this difference. In Ps. xviii. the love leads to the worship, and in Ps. cxvi. the worship calls forth the love. In Ps. xviii. he first says, 'I will love Thee, O Lord,' v. 1, and then adds as a consequence of that love, v. 3, 'I will call upon the Lord who is worthy to be praised,' whereas in Ps. cxvi. 1, he says, 'I love the Lord because He hath heard the voice of my supplication.' He loved as he went in, but he loved still more as he came out. Now if we are permitted to draw near to the throne of God, we who are not worthy so much as to gather up the crumbs under His table; we who only deserve to be outcasts from His presence for ever; if we are permitted to have the sacred privilege of speaking to Him, of drawing near to Him through the atoning blood; of calling Him Father, of being treated by Him as sons, of being admitted into the blessings of sacred intercourse, of feeding at His table, and of being ever loved by Him with an everlasting love, are we to come back just as if nothing had happened? Are we to be as cold as before? Is there to be no joy in the heart, no glow on the countenance, and no evidence either to ourselves or others that we have had the sacred privilege of being with Jesus? Surely such worship must kindle emotion."

The notices which we have of Christian worship in the New Testament are fragmentary. Brethren used to assemble together, especially on the first day of the week. The fullest passage bearing on the subject is in 1 Cor. xiv., a careful exegesis of which throws much light on Apostolic practice. After the days of the New Testament, the first notice we have of Christian worship is in the letters of the heathen PLINY [q.v.], and we get additional particulars from JUSTIN MARTYR [q.v.], who tells how in his time, "on the day called the Day of the Sun," the Christians meet to read the Gospels and the Prophets, how a sermon is preached exhorting to holy living, how prayer is said, to which the people respond with loud "Amens," and how the Sacrament is distributed to those present and sent to the sick, and a collection is made for the poor. There is no doubt that the Holy Communion was regarded as the highest and most essential act of Christian worship, and we have given in its place an account of the earliest forms which have come down to us of that service. The liturgical use of the Old Testament Psalms is also a clear fact, and there is little doubt that distinctive Christian hymns also were in use from the beginning. The addition of these from age to age to the treasures of Church worship, forms a very striking and beautiful chapter of religious history. [Hymns; Music.]

Tastes will no doubt vary as to the admissibility of complicated music in public worship. On the one hand there are those who hold that no music should be used in the church but such as all the congregation can join in; while others maintain that, while some music should undoubtedly be of this character, so that all may be enabled to join, it is not inconsistent with the true spirit of worship that the congregation should listen to an anthem. If the thoughts are elevated and calmed by listening to such a strain as Handel's "Comfort ye," this may fairly be called "edification" such as St. Paul bade us seek. We have heard it said especially of the Nicene Creed, that to sing it is like singing a proposition of Euclid, to which it was responded that this Creed is verily a magnificent hymn, and that men can listen to it devoutly in the same spirit that they can look at a picture of the Crucifixion, or listen to the narrative of the event solemnly read. Christian people, however much their tastes and prejudices may vary, will find themselves drawn closely together in spirit so long as they pay earnest heed to the great Apostle's exhortations, "Let all things be done to edifying," and "Let all things be done decently and in order."

Worshipping of Angels.—It has often been asserted that the Jews used to implore the intercession of angels, the text quoted in support of this statement being Gen. xlviii. 16; and in some Jewish commentaries the writers say that invocation of angels was allowed. But modern Jewish writers declare that the angel referred to in this passage was no other than Christ, and they absolutely deny that worship of any kind is given to angels. We find St. Paul warning some of his converts against it, notably the Colossians, which shows that the practice was already beginning to show itself; and all through the days of the early Church the different writers, such as Augustine and Irenæus, are constantly uttering protests; and the Council of Laodicea put forth this Canon: "Christians ought not to forsake the Church of God and go aside and hold conventicles, to invoke or call upon the names of angels; which things are forbidden. If any one, therefore, be found to exercise himself in this private idolatry, let him be accursed: because he hath forsaken our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and gone over to idolatry." The Roman Catholics, nevertheless, are taught to ask the angels to intercede for them, and Zech. i. 12 is quoted in defence. But Protestants hold that this by no means justifies them in addressing prayers to the angels; and that the prayers offered by the four-and-twenty elders [Rev. v. 8], another passage constantly quoted, are their own and not those of the Church.

Wotton, SIR HENRY, scholar and poet, [b. at Boughton-Malherbe, Kent, 1568; d. at Eton, 1639], was educated at Winchester, and New College, Oxford, afterwards removed to Queen's College in 1586, and took his M.A.; here he gave some Latin lectures, and won great applause from the professors for the knowledge which they displayed. He became the friend and pupil of ALBERICUS GENTILIS, then Professor of Civil Law at Oxford, who taught him mathematics, and gave him a thorough instruction in the Italian language. He travelled in France, Germany, and Italy for nine years, studying various arts and sciences, and making the acquaintance of many of the most learned men of the age. After his return to England he became secretary to the Earl of Essex, with whom he travelled in Spain and Ireland; he is said to have been a party to the plots in which Essex was engaged, but there is not sufficient ground for the accusation. After the death of Essex Wotton went to Italy, and there wrote The State of Christendom, giving an account of the intrigues carried on in the Courts of Europe. James I. sent him three times to the Continent as ambassador, but at Augsburg he wrote his famous definition of an ambassador, Legatus est vir bonus peregre missus ad mentiendum reipublice causa ["An ambassador is a good man sent abroad to lie for the good of his country"], which gave offence to the King and caused his recall. In 1623 he was made Provost of Eton, and, believing himself called upon to take orders, he was ordained deacon in 1627. Izaak Walton collected his works under the title of Reliquiæ Wottonianæ. He is now chiefly remembered by his religious Meditations, Letters, and Poems.

Wulfran, Sr., a monk of the Gallican Church, born at Maurilly in 650, spent his early youth in the court of King Clothaire III., but determined to devote his life to God, and so entered the monastery of Fontenelle, in Normandy, on which he bestowed his estate. In 682 he was made Bishop of Sens, and two years and a half afterwards journeyed with some monks of Fontenelle to Friesland, which he hoped to convert. He baptised the son of King Radbod, and several of the Frisians were converted, chiefly, legend says, on account of the miracles which the Christians worked. These so astonished Radbod that he also wished to be baptised; but on hearing that his ancestors must be in hell, having died heathens, he refused to go on, declaring that he would not be separated from them. St. Wulfran died at Fontenelle, April 20th, 720. His relics were removed to Abbeville, of which town he is the patron.

Wulfstan, Sr., Bishop of Worcester from 1062 to 1095. He is regarded as the patron saint of Worcester, being the founder of the present cathedral. He built it in place of one erected by St. Oswald, which, together with the monastery, had become too small for the needs of the monks. He died at an advanced age, and was buried in his cathedral. The fame of miracles said to be wrought at his tomb caused Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, and other ecclesiastics, to pay it a visit of inquiry, and, on their report, Wulfstan was canonised by Innocent III. in 1203.

Wycliffe, JOHN.—Wycliffe's biographers have not discovered the exact date of his birth, but most probably he was born in 1324, near Rokeby, in Yorkshire; died at Lutterworth, 1384. We know very little of his early days—surprisingly little when compared to the full and detailed account his biographers are able to give of him when he had attained middle age. He left home when he was about sixteen for Oxford, not to return. The college at which he studied is uncertain, some saying Queen's, some Merton, and others Balliol. That he was elected Master of Balliol in 1361 no one seems to doubt, and he held some office in Oxford till the end of his life, in addition to various livings. At this time he began to be famous on account of various Latin treatises, but he comes especially into prominence in 1366. In that year the King's Council absolutely refused to pay the annual tribute to Rome which had been promised by John in 1213, and Wycliffe's influence was mainly the cause of this decision. He was always in disfavour with the Roman Court afterwards, but at the same time he gained a powerful patron in John of Gaunt, the third son of Edward III. The next matter to which he turned his mind was that of limiting the power of the clergy—more especially with regard to secular affairs. In consequence of their being the only class of educated men, the custom had sprung up of allowing all offices in the State to be filled with clergy. Wycliffe published a protest against this custom which said: "Neither prelates nor doctors, priests nor deacons shall hold secular offices; that is, those of Chancery, Treasury, Privy Seal, and other such secular offices in the Exchequer; neither be stewards of lands, nor stewards of the hall, nor clerks of the kitchen, nor clerks of accounts; neither be occupied in any secular office in lords' courts, more especially while secular men are sufficient to do such offices." In 1373 he went to Bruges with John of Gaunt, who was at the head of a commission appointed to inquire whether the Pope had the right of filling up vacant Sees and livings in England. Wycliffe came back to England very bitter against the Pope and the way in which he exercised his power, and determined to destroy that power in England in every way he could. His preaching became bolder, and he attacked unflinchingly the corruption of the Church. He denied the supreme power of the Pope in a tract called Dominion founded in Grace; did not deny that the Pope was God's representative on earth, but asserted the right of each individual conscience to think and act for itself. These doctrines drew upon him the anger of many of the Bishops; and in 1376 he was cited to appear before a special Council of them at St. Paul's. He was accompanied by his faithful patron John of Gaunt, and Lord Henry Percy. Before the inquiry began, a quarrel arose between Percy and the retainers of the Bishops, which soon ended in an unseemly brawl, the result of which was that the Court was obliged to rise, and Wycliffe was dismissed without having any questions put to him. In the following year a Bull arrived in England ordering Wycliffe to be excommunicated; but, owing to the death of King Edward III., which occurred in this year, Parliament was prorogued before having given its consent. The Bull was, therefore, sent to Oxford with instructions to the authorities to see that the conditions were carried into effect. The University asked time for consideration, and ended by taking no notice of the Bull. The matter then fell into the hands of the Bishops, who showed themselves more anxious to put a stop to Wycliffe's teaching, and in April, 1378, he was summoned to appear at Lambeth. He had no influential supporters with him; but a throng of citizens, who had been led to adopt the new doctrines, would not allow the sentence of excommunication to be passed. They shouted out continually, "The Pope's briefs shall have no effect in England without the King's consent;" and they proved themselves so powerful that the Archbishop was obliged to dismiss Wycliffe with only a warning against preaching obnoxious doctrine. The schism in the Court of Rome, when Urban VI. reigned in Rome and Clement VII. at Avignon, shocked many faithful Catholics, and the result was a greater inclination to listen to the teaching of Wycliffe. He had now begun to attack the evils of monasticism. In order to make a firm opposition to the various orders of Preaching Friars, Wycliffe started a school at Oxford for graduates, whom he taught himself, and then sent them to all parts of the country. These "poor preachers," as they were called, had no power to sell pardons, or take confessions, but simply went from village to village preaching and visiting the sick. At the same time Wycliffe was writing several tracts on the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation, which he had come to look upon as erroneous, and was also preparing for his translation of the Bible. The New Testament was ready first, and this part is entirely his own work. The Old, which followed soon after, was brought out under his eye; but the actual translation of some parts was done by a faithful follower of his—Nicholas Hereford. By this time he had a large number of followers, and a Romanist chronicler writes: "A man could not meet two people on the road but one of them was a disciple of Wycliffe." He was now ill and broken in health, so he retired to his quiet village of Lutterworth, where he died. The Council of Constance in 1415 declared his writings to be heretical, and commanded that "his body and bones, if they could be distinguished from those of the faithful, should be disinterred and cast away from consecrated ground." This decree was disregarded for thirteen years, but at the end of that time was carried into effect by express command of the Pope. The bones were burnt and thrown into the river Swift. "Thus," says Thomas Fuller, "this brook did convey his ashes into Avon, the Avon into the Severn, the Severn into the narrow sea, and this into the wide ocean. And so the ashes of Wycliffe are the emblem of his doctrine, which is now dispersed all the world over."

Wykeham, WILLIAM OF. [WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM.]

Wynwaloe, St., Abbot, born in the fifth century in Brittany, of pious Welsh parents, who consecrated him to God from his birth. He was placed in the monastery of St. Budoc, in the island of Brehat; under him he made such progress that he was sent at the head of eleven other monks to lay the foundation of a new monastery. For this purpose they chose Landevenec, near Brest, and here they lived in great austerity. In 818 their Order was united with that of St. Benedict. St. Wynwaloe died in 529 at an advanced age, just after celebrating the mass. March 3rd is the day on which he is commemorated. He was buried in his own church, but when Brittany was ravaged by the Normans, his relics were removed from place to place, and are now at Ghent and Montreuil. We have given his name as known in England; in Brittany he is called Guignole or Venole; in Picardy, Vignevalley or Walovay, and in other parts of France, Guingalois.

Wythburga, St., daughter of Annas, King of East Anglia, sister to SAINT ETHELBURGA [q.v.]. She led an austere life, first at Holkham, and afterwards at Dereham, in Norfolk, where she laid the foundation of a church and nunnery, but did not live till their completion. She died in 743, and in 974 her relics were translated to Ely, and buried near those of her sisters

Xavier, FRANCIS.—One of the noblest names in the history of missionary enterprise. He was born April 7th, 1506, in Castle Xavier, Navarre. His father was a nobleman at the Court of the King of Navarre; his mother, the beautiful heiress of the Xavier family. Both parents were pious as well as wise. Francis was their youngest son, and as he grew up was behind none of his brothers in athletic accomplishments. But he soon announced his intention of becoming a scholar, and at the age of seventeen was sent to the college of St. Barbara at Paris. He showed the strength of his resolution, for he took the first place in each study to which he applied himself, whilst he still enjoyed the pleasures and excitements of bodily exercise. When he was twenty he became Professor of Philosophy at Beauvais, and soon won for himself a high name. After he had been there a year and a half his classes were attended by a new pupil, mean-looking, lame, uncouth, slovenly. He was older than Xavier, and in spite of his mean appearance seemed to have that in him which called for respect. His name was Ignatius Loyola. Xavier did not like him, but the pupil seemed much attracted to his master, and gradually gained an influence over him which he used in the endeavour to wean him from his merry and pleasure-loving life. As often as Xavier spoke of any amusement Loyola responded with the question, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain," etc. Xavier at first treated this as one of his pupil's eccentricities, but at length, after some five years' intercourse, yielded himself altogether to the new influence, especially as his pleasure-hunting life had involved him in difficulties out of which Loyola had helped him. The latter then proceeded to tell him his own previous history. [LOYOLA.] And thus the order of things became reversed, and Xavier became the pupil of Ignatius Loyola, and entered heartily into his scheme for the foundation of his new Order. The history of this Order belongs elsewhere. [JESUITS.] Xavier and his friend were ordained in 1534, and desired to go to evangelise Palestine, but it was not until seven years after that the Pope's doubts as to their usefulness were removed.

During these years, however, Xavier's labours seem to have been wonderful. He preached in one Italian town after another from church steps and market-crosses, by roadsides and in crowded fairs, and, when not so occupied, learned nursing in hospitals, or studied artisan labour, such as might be turned to account in distant lands.

At length on April 7th, 1541, he set sail for the East Indies, in friar's frock, crucifix on his heart, Bible and Breviary in his hands. All the time of the voyage he made the ship his parish, preached as often as he might, prayed with the crew, and both by day and night for them. The ship wintered at Mozambique, and Xavier, whilst ministering in the hospital there, caught a malignant fever, which nearly cost him his life. On May 6th, 1542, he arrived at Goa, the Portuguese capital of India. There was a nominally Christian colony there, even a bishop, but of real religion there seemed none. The Portuguese were frightfully profligate, and the natives who had been made converts had in disgust fallen back for the most part into heathenism. But Xavier knew Who was on his side, and addressed himself to what many men would have regarded as a hopeless task. He resolved to reform the colonists first, went in and out of hospitals, and begged almost from door to door for the sick. Then he got a bell, and rang it through the streets like a crier, until he had gathered an audience to whom to preach. "Parents," he would cry, "I have a message to you; send me your children, and I will teach them how to be obedient; send me your slaves and I will teach them how to serve you more faithfully. Come to me yourselves, for I have glad tidings of great joy to you. But now send me your children." The children came, and he addressed them: "Come, my children, that I may tell you of One who loves you dearly, who has prepared for you in His own beautiful country a home of joys past all understanding. I will tell you the way to it. I will tell you also stories of that same good Lord, who was once a little child like you, and all that He did and suffered for your sakes." So a year passed. Many of the evildoers hated his solemn speech about the judgment to come, but the children all loved him, and the simple holiness of his life and his burning eloquence began to tell effectually upon the parents. Morals sensibly improved at Goa under his ministry. But a call came to him to visit the pearl-fishers 600 miles away, a miserable race who had been baptised, but then left alone, no one willing to go near them. Among these he settled himself, lived as they did, on rice, preached to them by signs till he could learn their language, taught them to read and write, and persuaded them to build themselves chapels. Writing to Ignatius Loyola he poured forth his delight at the success he was receiving. Then he returned to Goa, and having organised a college for native teachers there, he returned to the pearl-fishers with a staff of helpers. He found his poor flock in dreadful misery. A neighbouring tribe had attacked them, and carried off all their substance. Hundreds had died of starvation, and the rest were homeless. He sent to the nearest station for provisions, which he distributed among the sufferers, whilst he resumed his simple life among them. Each morning he called them to worship, all day he taught the children, visited the sick, or went into neighbouring villages; at twilight he once more called them to worship, then he betook himself to study and prayer far into the night. He only took three and a half hours of sleep. After a while, leaving some of his companions there, he pushed on to the kingdom of Travancore, and in one month baptised 10,000 persons. The people, on his persuasion, destroyed their idols, and built thirty churches. The angry Brahmins waylaid him with arrows, and burned down houses that he frequented, but the people, who called him "the great father," organised themselves into a perpetual body-guard to protect him, and the work of evangelising still prospered. He next fixed on Malacca as a centre of labour, choosing it because it was (as it is still) the great mart between India, China and Japan. He thought that it was "the wickedest place in the world." Again he was seen with his bell morning and evening, calling with a loud voice on his hearers to "pray for those who were living in sin." But he was not to remain here long. He made a convert of a young Japanese named Angerso, who entreated him to go and work in Japan. It was 3,000 miles off, but Xavier, having left five friends newly arrived from Europe to carry on his work, arrived in Japan in August, 1549, though friends had warned him that he would be surely put to death. He had learned Japanese on the voyage. He found the people, as St. Paul had found the Athenians, very sharp-witted and clever, but wholly given to idolatry. Christianity was entirely unknown. When he had made a few converts he placed them in charge of Angerso, whom he had baptised by the name of Paul, and went on through the country barefooted, with a staff, a mat, and a wallet, and the sacred vessels, as his only possessions. He had never suffered so much privation as here, and never was so happy. Conversion everywhere followed his preaching. Persecuted in one city he fled to another, and still God visibly blessed his labours. He built chapels and ordained elders, and at length left a flourishing mission, and returned to Malacca in 1552, full of an even greater project than he had yet undertaken. This was to attempt the conversion of China.

But at Malacca he found a plague raging, and with magnificent skill as well as courage he used his medical knowledge so well that soon the sickness abated, for he put heart into the terror-stricken. But on applying for a convoy to China he failed. The Portuguese feared the loss of trade, and would not give him a passage. When at length he obtained a small ship at an exorbitant price, they found it out and stopped him. He contrived, indeed, to reach Sancian, an island opposite Macao, but he could get no further. Whilst he was still looking for fresh opportunities he was seized with fever, and, foreseeing his approaching end, he was taken to the ship's hospital; but finding his prayers hindered here, he begged to be taken back to the shore. A sailor put up a rough tent of tarpauling to shelter him from the burning sun, and left him. There untended, alone with the Good Shepherd, he died on the 2nd of December, 1552. His body was carried to Goa for burial.

Xerophagia [Gr. xeros, "dry," and phagō, "I eat"].—The name given to a fast kept by the early Church during the six days of Holy Week, in which nothing was eaten but bread and salt, though afterwards pulse, herbs, and fruit were added. This fast was not compulsory, and we find the Church condemning the Montanists, who not only made it so but also added other fasts.

Ximenes de Cisneros, FRANCIS, Cardinal, a celebrated Spanish ecclesiastic and statesman, was born at Torrelaguna in Castile in 1436, died 1517. He was educated at Alcalá de Henares, Salamanca, and Rome, where he obtained from the Pope a prospective nomination as Prebendary in Toledo Cathedral. The Archbishop refused to allow the claim, and, when Ximenes persisted in it, put him into prison, where he remained for six years. On his release, in 1480, he was made Vicar-General to Cardinal Mendoza, Bishop of Sigüenza. He showed great administrative talent, but, in 1482, suddenly gave up his office and entered a Franciscan monastery at Toledo; but becoming famed for his asceticism, retired to a lonely monastery at Castañar. In 1492 he was recalled to become Confessor to Queen Isabella, over whom he gained great influence, and three years after she appointed him Archbishop of Toledo, which post he refused till ordered to accept it by the Pope. This preferment was, next to the Papacy, the richest in the Church; but Ximenes, though obliged openly to maintain great splendour, lived privately with as great asceticism as when a monk, and devoted the whole of the revenues of his See to charitable and religious purposes. In his seventieth year Pope Julius II. gave him a cardinal's hat. On the death of King Ferdinand, in 1516, he became Regent till the arrival of Charles V., and died on the way to meet him at Bozaguillas, near Aranda de Duero, in 1517. Ximenes held extreme views, and was a strong Ultramontanist. He was Grand Inquisitor of Spain, and strongly opposed the translation of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue on the principle of not giving holy things to the profane. He was harsh in his measures towards the Moors, and it was by his advice that they were finally ordered to leave Spain in 1492. But he was sincere and patriotic, and clear of all suspicion of self-aggrandisement in his public life. He founded the University of Alcalá, and, assisted by other eminent scholars, undertook the grand Complutensian Polyglot. [POLYGLOT, COMPLUTENSIAN.]

Year, THE ECCLESIASTICAL.—The Christian Year is that arrangement of seasons which commemorates one by one the great facts in the life of Christ, and the doctrines which spring out of them. Some account of these seasons will be found under their respective headings; it remains for us here to set forth a conspectus of them as a whole.

The first is ADVENT, which commemorates the coming of Christ into the world in His great humility, and also bids us look for His second coming. The two subjects are closely blended together in the Advent services, especially in the Epistles and Gospels. There are four Sundays in Advent, which is followed by Christmas, the great festival of the Incarnation, to which are appended three commemorations, respectively of one who died in the prime of life, of little children dying in infancy, and of the Apostle who died in extreme old age—all ages alike sanctified and redeemed by the Incarnation. On January 1st, that being the eighth day after Christmas, is kept the feast of the CIRCUMCISION. The EPIPHANY season, starting with the visit of the wise men, brings before us the Manifestation of Christ during His sojourn on earth. Thus the Gospel for the first Sunday after Epiphany shows us Christ in His boyhood, sitting among the doctors, and declaring that He must be about His Father's business; they are the first recorded words of His that we have. On the second Sunday we have His first miracle, a simple act of creation, almost the only miracle of His that has nought to do with suffering, carrying us back in thought to the original Eden. The third Sunday shows Him the healer of sickness; the fourth the restorer of peace after disorder, both in the natural and spiritual world; the fifth and sixth, the future judge. The Epiphany season varies in length according as Easter comes early or late. A marked change then follows, as is shown by the names for the three Sundays, SEPTUAGESIMA, SEXAGESIMA, QUINQUAGESIMA ("Seventieth," "Sixtieth," "Fiftieth,"), so called because they are in round numbers so many days before Easter. Though these are not a season of fasting, there is a sombre hue upon them. The special portions of Scripture speak of self-denial and of judgment; the first lessons begin with Genesis, and show us man in his original state, and man fallen. Quinquagesima, the Sunday before Lent, brings before us the supreme necessity, in all religious exercises and works of cultivating Love as the most needful grace of all. Then comes the season of LENT, in which are blended together most closely the humiliation and sufferings of Christ, and the Christian work of repentance for sin. EASTER [q.v.] follows, the Queen of Festivals, and then the Sundays after Easter, covering the great forty days during which Christ showed Himself before His Ascension. On the fortieth day comes ASCENSION DAY, or Holy Thursday, and ten days after that WHITSUNDAY. The series of festivals closes with TRINITY SUNDAY. These seasons together make up, as nearly as possible, half the year; they are followed by the Sundays after Trinity. It has been pointed out by commentators on the Liturgy, that whereas in the first half, the Gospel for the Sunday shows us the special event commemorated, and the Epistle is the comment upon it, in the second half the Epistle seems to have been first selected as setting forth some Christian duty, and the Gospel to have been chosen as the commentary upon it. Further information will be found under the heads FASTS, FESTIVALS, MOVEABLE FEASTS, ERA, DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS, PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES.

The Civil Year in the Old Style ended on the 25th of March, though the old Parish Registers show that the present mode of computing had come greatly into vogue before the alteration of styles. During the Stuart period it is very common to find the registers between January and Lady Day marking both methods, and so leaving it an open question whether Feb. was [e.g.] in 1649 or 1650.

Yecidees.—A singular sect who inhabit the neighbourhood of Mosul and Nineveh. It is difficult to ascertain what their religious tenets really are, owing to their fear of persecution from the Turks, who will not allow the free exercise of religion to any who do not possess sacred books, so they pass themselves off as Mohammedans, Christians, or Jews, as most convenient at the time. Their name is derived from Azad, the ancient name for God, and they say Yecidees means worshippers of God. They believe in a supreme Creator, and they look upon Satan as the chief angel, suffering punishment for a time, but hereafter to be restored to favour, and from their superstitions regarding the necessity of propitiating him have been considered devil-worshippers. They practise circumcision, keep a fast of forty days in the spring, use Jewish names for the archangels in whom they believe, have four orders of ministers, reverence the Koran, the Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the Gospels, and on New Year's Day hold a propitiatory service to Satan. They guard their real tenets with the greatest mystery.

Yogis, the followers of a particular form of philosophy among the Hindoos. The name is derived from Sanskrit "yuj" to join (cognate with Lat. "jung-" and Greek zeug-), and the object aimed at is the being joined to the Divine Being, by keeping the mind unmodified by passion, and overcoming all desires. The methods are many. Thus one philosopher held that union with the Supreme might be attained by pondering on one single accepted truth; another, by practising benevolence, tenderness, complacency, disregard of either happiness or grief. By such means the mind becomes clear, as the pure crystal is seen to be free from colour when a coloured object is removed from behind it. Then came certain ascetic practices, for the purpose of securing concentration. They comprise regulations of respiration, long-continued holding of the breath, sitting in different attitudes (of which eighty-four are enumerated), fixing the eyes on the tip of the nose, etc. Such practices were a fruitful source of hypocrisy and imposture.

York, ARCHBISHOPRIC OF.—There is no doubt that Christianity was introduced into the north of England during the period of the Roman power, but no authentic records of its progress have been left, and it is usual to place Paulinus at the head of the list of prelates of York. Paulinus was one of those missionaries sent over by Gregory the Great with Augustine to convert the Anglo-Saxons. Edwin, King of Northumbria, married Ethelburga, daughter of King Ethelbert of Kent; and Paulinus, being duly consecrated to the Episcopate, accompanied her to her northern home that she might have the free exercise of the Christian religion in which she had been brought up. It was some time before Edwin was converted to Christianity, but at length he and the heathen high-priest Coifi, having listened to Paulinus's story of the Gospel, were so impressed with its truth, that Coifi himself destroyed the great pagan temple at Godmundham; and on Easter Day, 627, Edwin, Coifi, and many nobles were baptised at York, then called Eboracum. The King caused a small stone church to be erected on the place, and this became the forerunner of the present glorious minster. Paulinus then went about preaching through Northumbria, which embraced all the country between the Humber and the Forth and Clyde. He is said to have built a church on the present site of Lincoln Cathedral, and also to have founded the minster of Southwell. Edwin was killed while fighting against Penda in the battle of Hatfield Chase in 633. Ethelburga had to fly for safety to Kent, and she was accompanied by Paulinus, who was shortly after made Bishop of Rochester, where he died in 644. Northumbria under these untoward circumstances fell back into Paganism. Oswald, the grandson of Edwin, on regaining his kingdom, applied to Iona, in whose monastery he had learned Christianity, to send him some monks to evangelise his people. Accordingly, in 635 St. Aidan was consecrated Bishop and sent over, the small island of Lindisfarne being given to him as his episcopal seat. [AIDAN, ST.; LINDISFARNE.] On Aidan's death, in 651, another monk, Finan, from Iona, filled his place; then Colman, 661, and Tuda, 664; but these must be regarded as bishops of the Northern Province, and not of Northumbria as a whole. In 664 the famous St. WILFRID [q.v.] was chosen Bishop of Northumbria, and went to Gaul to be consecrated; during his absence of three years King Oswy appointed St. CHAD [q.v.]; but on Wilfrid's return he resigned the See, and was soon after appointed by Archbishop Theodore to the See of Mercia [LICHFIELD]. [For the division of the See in Wilfrid's time by Theodore see WILFRID, ST.; LINDISFARNE; HEXHAM; WITHERNE.] John, called also St. John of Beverley, from his having founded that monastery, became Bishop of York in 705; he is one of the most famous of northern saints, and was the pupil of St. HILDA [q.v.]. He was canonised in 1037 by Benedict IX. Egbert [732-766] was the first Archbishop of York, receiving the pall in 735 from Gregory III., and all other bishops of the Northern Province were considered as his suffragans. He wrote several books, the chief one being a Pontifical; or, Book of Episcopal Offices. Bede's Ecclesiastical History was dedicated to him. He founded the School of York and the library connected with it. ALCUIN [q.v.] was educated in this school. From 812 to 928 little is known of the ecclesiastical history of York beyond the record of the names of its prelates. Then came Wulstan, appointed to the See by Athelstan; but he afterwards allied himself to the Danes. In 956 we find both Archbishops to be men of Danish blood—Odo of Canterbury and Osmytel of York. In 972 came St. OSWALD [q.v.], who was also Bishop of Worcester. Aldred [1060-1069] held at various times the Sees of Sherborne, Hereford, and Worcester. He was the first English bishop who made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. In 1066 he crowned Harold, but transferred his allegiance to the Conqueror, whom he also crowned at Westminster. Next in 1069 came the first Norman Bishop, Thomas of Bayeux; he and Lanfranc disputed as to the supremacy of Canterbury over York. It was decided that the northern archbishops should swear allegiance to Canterbury and be consecrated in Canterbury Cathedral. The minster of York had been destroyed by fire in the devastation caused by the Conqueror; this, Thomas rebuilt and completely reorganised, appointing archdeacons to assist him in the supervision of the clergy. He re-established the Benedictines, and restored Whitby Abbey and St. Mary's, of York. Thurstan [1114-1140] was a remarkable man, the great restorer of monastic discipline and organisation in the north. For five years the dispute between Canterbury and York was renewed. Thurstan refused to acknowledge the supremacy of Canterbury, and went to Rome to get the matter settled. Pope Calixtus II. consecrated him there, and on his return to York Henry I. was furious and dispossessed him of all the property belonging to the See; but in 1119 the Pope determined that York should be freed from all submission to Canterbury, and published a Bull to that effect. Thurstan took part in the battle of the Standard in 1138. Six new Augustinian houses were founded in Yorkshire in his time, and he introduced the Cistercians into the north, founding the abbeys of Rievaulx and Fountains, the latter on his own property. William Fitz-Herbert [1140], known as St. William of York, was Archbishop but a short time; he was canonised on account of his supposed murder by the mixture of poison in the chalice, and of miracles said to be wrought at his tomb. Roger de Pont l'Evêque [1154-1181] was a great politician; it is said to have been through his representations of Becket's conduct that Henry uttered the words which caused St. Thomas's murder. He rebuilt the choir of his minster and his palace at York. Geoffery Plantagenet, an illegitimate son of Henry II., held the archbishopric from 1191-1207. In that year he fled from John, who seized on the temporalities of the See for himself, and no archbishop was appointed till 1216, when Walter de Gray was consecrated. He was employed by Henry III. on important diplomatic service, and was a great benefactor to his See. Among other things he bought Bishopthorpe, where he built a palace.

A list of bishops will be found at the end of this article. We need only particularise John Thursby [1352], of whom a short life is given [THURSBY, JOHN] and Richard Scroope [1398], who was executed for high treason in 1405.

A little wooden hut was the beginning of York Minster, over which, as we have seen, rose a larger church of stone finished by Oswald in 642. This was repaired by St. Wilfrid about 720, and destroyed by fire in 741, rebuilt by Bishop Egbert [732-766], and demolished by the Danes. Thomas of Bayeux rebuilt the church, but it was again partially burnt in 1137, in the time of Thurstan. Roger took in hand the work of restoration, and rebuilt the choir and crypt on a larger scale. Walter de Gray [1215-1255] in all probability built the south transept as it now exists. The central tower was built in 1260 by John Romaine, the treasurer. In 1291 Archbishop Romaine removed the early Norman nave of Thomas of Bayeux, and began to build the present one, which was finished by Archbishop Melton in 1335. In 1361 Archbishop Thoresby began the Lady Chapel and Presbytery, which were finished in 1373, and between that time and the close of the century the Norman choir was taken down and the present one built. In 1472 the church was consecrated and dedicated anew to St. Peter the Apostle. In 1829 the choir was set on fire by a maniac named Jonathan Martin, and so much damage was done that it cost £65,000 to repair it. Another fire, in 1840, destroyed the south-west tower and entire nave roof, which were repaired at a cost of £23,000. It is impossible, in the narrow limits of such a work as this, to give more than the dates of the building of the principal parts of what Sir Walter Scott calls "the most august of temples, the noble Minster of York."

The Diocese of York consists of York City, the entire East Riding, part of North and West Riding, and comprises 631 benefices. The chapter consists of a dean, four archdeacons, four canons, five minor canons, and thirty prebendaries. The income of the See is £10,000 per annum.

The Province of York comprises, speaking roughly, the ancient kingdom of Northumbria. Its two original Sees were York, founded in 625, and Lindisfarne in 634. York, in course of time, branched out into York, Carlisle [1133], and Ripon, 1836. Out of Chester have been formed the two new Sees of Manchester [1847] and Liverpool [1879]. Wakefield is arranged for. Lindisfarne changed to Chester-le-Street, and this again into Durham.

Chester was transferred from the Province of Canterbury to York in 1541.

Zanchi, BASILIO, Latin poet [b. at Bergamo, 1501; d. at Rome, 1558]. He gave himself to the study of theology, and entered the order of Regular Canons in 1524. He, like many others of his order, lived away from his convent, and when, in 1558, Paul IV. issued an order that this liberty would no longer be granted, Zanchi refused to return to seclusion, and was therefore imprisoned at Rome, where he died the same year. He wrote comments on the Bible, and among his Latin poems is one called De Horto Sophiae, in which he explains the chief dogmas of Christianity.

Zanchi, GIROLAMO, theological controversialist, cousin of the preceding. was born at Alzano, in the province of Bergamo, in 1516; died at Heidelberg, 1590. He entered the Order of the Regular Canons at the Lateran in 1531, but having studied the writings of the German Reformers, he embraced their doctrines, and, in consequence, was obliged to flee from Italy. He went to Heidelberg, where he taught divinity. He was particularly attached to the doctrines of Calvin, and in 1560 took a zealous and assiduous part in the great controversy at Strasburg between Zwingle and Calvin on the doctrine of Predestination. In 1572 he also bore an energetic part in the Anti-Trinitarian controversy, and wrote De tribus Elohim. His theological and controversial works were collected and published in eight volumes at Geneva in 1619.

Zenod-Avesta. [PARSEES.]

Zeno, founder of the Stoic Philosophy [q.v.], born in Cyprus, in the latter part of the fourth century before Christ. He is said to have adopted the Cynic doctrine of contempt for riches through having been shipwrecked at the age of thirty, and losing all his property. Coming to Athens, near to which his misfortune happened, he attached himself in turn to the various schools of philosophy there, and at length opened one of his own, in order to set forth the results of his inquiries, and develop his own peculiar system. For this purpose he selected "the Painted Porch" (Stoa) in which to lecture, whence the name "Stoic." And here he held his school, it is said, until his ninety-eighth year. The Athenians honoured him with a golden crown, and gave him a public burial at his death, and his countrymen erected a monument to his honour. And indeed, in spite of its weaknesses and drawbacks, the Stoic philosophy had noble elements in it, inculcating courage, manly energy, endurance, simplicity, reverence for goodness. Much that was noble in the Roman character is to be traced to it, and the finest character among the emperors, Marcus Aurelius, was a Stoic philosopher. None of Zeno's writings, beyond the titles, have been preserved.

Zeno, Sr., Confessor, Bishop of Verona, supposed to have been by birth a Latin and an African, was consecrated Bishop in 382, in the reign of Julian the Apostate. St. Zeno devoted himself earnestly to the extirpation of heresies, and attacked with great zeal the Arians and Pelagians; he also baptised every year numbers of converts from idolatry. The cause of the Church prospered at Verona under his episcopate to such an extent that people flocked to hear him, and it is said that he had so impressed upon his people the duty of hospitality, that no one ever came to ask alms or to lodge at Verona without being generously entertained. After the defeat of the Romans at Adrianople by the Goths, the victors brought numbers of captives to Verona, who, through the charity and solicitations of the inhabitants, were many of them released or rescued from a cruel death. Mention is made of the numerous ordinations held by St. Zeno, and of the virgins whom he consecrated to God. He died at Verona in 380, on April 12th, on which day he is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology. The works ascribed to Zeno are Sancti Zenonis Episcopi Sermones, and a Catechism.

Zinzendorf, NICOLAUS LUDWIG, COUNT von.—The founder of the present sect of Moravian Brethren [q.v.] [b. at Dresden, 1700; d. at Herrnhut, Upper Lusatia, 1760]. His father died while Nicolaus was in his infancy, and he was brought up by his grandmother, the Baroness von Gersdorf, who sent him, in 1710, to be educated at Halle, under the care of Francke, the philanthropist. Here he spent six years, displaying much industry and talent in his studies; and he founded among his schoolfellows a religious society, to which he gave the name of Der Orden von Senfkorn, "The Order of the Grain of Mustard-seed." A strong feeling of Pietism was then existing at Halle, and influenced the boy's whole life. He was sent in 1716 to Wittenberg, and afterwards travelled through Holland and France, remaining some time at Paris, but careful to avoid, as far as possible, the temptations of the Court. Upon his return to Dresden he was made a member of the State Council of Saxony; but he had little liking for political life, and retired with his newly married wife to his residence in Upper Lusatia. Here he found a settlement of some of the Moravian Brethren, who had fled thither from persecution, and to whom he gave permission to build a house on his estate, which was afterwards increased, and called the Herrnhut, "Tabernacle of the Lord." Zinzendorf now devoted all his spare time to furthering the welfare of the sect, for whom he wrote hymns, preached, and translated the Scriptures. In 1734 he was ordained a minister of the Lutheran Church; but was banished from Saxony two years later, on a charge of introducing new and strange doctrines. He went to Holland, and there founded a Moravian colony. He was made Bishop of the Moravians, and founded colonies in Livonia and Esthonia. In 1737 he came to England, and made the acquaintance of John and Charles Wesley, and in 1741 he went to North America, where he founded the colony of Bethlehem. He returned to Herrnhut in 1747, and remained there till his death, with a few interruptions for missionary work in North America. Zinzendorf wrote numerous works both in prose and verse, and composed many hymns for the use of the Moravian Congregation; his writings abound in passages of deep thought and beauty, but occasionally become incoherent in their mysticism.

Ziska, or Ziska, JOHN, OF TROCZNOW.—The leader of the Hussites [b. at Trocznow in Bohemia, about 1360, the son of a Bohemian nobleman; d. at the siege of the castle of Przibislav, in 1424]. He was first a page at the Court of King Wenceslas of Bohemia, and afterwards fought for a time as a volunteer in the English army in France; he then went to Poland and served under King Ladislas against the Teutonic Knights. He distinguished himself at the battle of Tannenberg, and was loaded with high honours; and at the battle of Agincourt in 1415 he also acquitted himself honourably. He was now a zealous follower of John Huss, and was roused to indignation by the cruelties heaped upon his leader and colleagues; a party was formed by several of the more patriotic and religious nobles, one of whom was Ziska, who endeavoured to rouse the King to oppose the cruel decisions of the Council of Constance. In 1419 Ziska headed an outbreak of the Hussites at Prague, where the rebels avenged themselves with interest for the wrongs done by the Roman Catholics; and the news proved fatal to the weak-minded King Wenceslas, who had never summoned up sufficient courage to take any steps to prevent a catastrophe. Sigismund, brother of Wenceslas, arrived with a large army to take possession of the throne, but was defeated by the Hussites, who followed up their advantage by the capture of the castle of Prague [1521]. Their chief stronghold, Tabor, procured for them the name of Taborites. Ziska became totally blind by a wound received while besieging the castle of Rabi; but he continued to hold the command of the Hussite army, and gained a series of victories which have had few parallels in history. Sigismund's second army was defeated in 1422, and driven back into Moravia; in the same year the German army, headed by Frederick of Saxony and the Elector of Brandenburg, was routed at Aussig; and Ziska gained ten other battles, convincing Sigismund that it was hopeless to attempt the conquest of Bohemia. He therefore proposed to make a treaty with the Hussites; but before matters were brought to a conclusion Ziska was seized by the plague at Przibislav, and died there. The glory of his conquests was to some extent marred by the cruelty with which he treated his enemies; but the circumstances under which the war was carried on, and the causes which led to it, are almost sufficient excuse for the accusation.

Zoe, Sr.—A Roman lady, wife of one of the chief officers who was martyred under the persecution of Diocletian in or about the year 286. Her husband, Nicostratus, was charged with the safe keeping of two Christians, and Zoe happened to be with them one day when they were visited by their priest. She was much impressed by what she heard, but could not say what she felt owing to her tongue being palsied. The priest, St. Sebastian, is said there and then to have performed a miracle on her, so that she henceforth had full use of her tongue, and she was from that time one of Sebastian's most faithful adherents. She, her husband, and their family, were baptised, and spent their time in cheering those of their brethren who were doomed to death. But they were not long allowed their liberty. Zoe was the first to suffer, the other members of the family, however, following soon after.

Zoharites.—A sect of modern Jews, so called from the high esteem in which they hold the Cabbalistic book Zohar. [CABBAL.] They believe that in the Elohim there exists a Trinity of Persons, that the Incarnation of God took place in Adam, and will be repeated in the Messiah, whom they allow will be God of the Gentiles as well as the Jew.

Zoroaster or Zarathust: the founder of the old Persian religion. We can speak with no certainty about the life of Zoroaster; so much that is told of him is mythical, and even the period at which he lived is so variously stated. Some say that he lived 5,000 years before the Trojan War; others that he reigned over Babylon 2,200 a.c.; the Parsees place him at about 550 a.c., in the time of Darius Hystaspes; others even deny that he ever existed. Legend says that he was born in Bactria; that his father Pourushaspe and his mother Daghdæ were in lowly circumstances, though of princely origin, and that the future greatness of Zoroaster was foretold to his mother before his birth. When he grew to man's estate he spent many years in retirement, and then Ormuzd, the good spirit, appeared to him, and gave him this command: "Teach the nations that my light is hidden under all that shines. Whenever you turn your face towards the light, and you follow my command, Ahriman [the evil spirit] will be seen to fly. In this world there is nothing superior to light." He then handed him the sacred book, Avesta, and bade him take it to Vishtâsp (Hystaspes); he did so, and this prince became a powerful propagator of his faith.

Zoroaster was probably one of the Soshyants, or fire-priests, amongst whom the religious reform began which he afterwards carried out so boldly. The religion of Iran had become mixed with that of the Hindoos and Chaldeans, the worship of elements had been introduced, and Zoroaster restored the religion of his ancestors to a state of greater purity; but after his death many schisms were introduced, and at length it degenerated into an idolatrous worship of the sun and fire. The leading features of his religion have already been stated in the article PARSEES [q.v.].

Owing to the different dates assigned to Zoroaster, some writers have maintained that there were no less than six men of that name; others have identified him with Moses, Elijah, Eedras, and the servant of Ezekiel. It is said that he was a great magician and astrologer.

Zosimus, Pope [417-418], was by birth a Greek. Celestius, a disciple of Pelagius, who had been condemned by Pope Innocent I. and the African Bishops at a synod at Carthage in 412, made his appeal from that Council to the See of Rome. He came to Rome in the beginning of Zosimus's popedom, hoping to prepossess him in his favour by lodging the final issue of the cause in his hands. Zosimus convened a synod in St. Clement's Church to examine the articles of impeachment against Celestius, who presented a confession of faith renouncing the heterodoxy with which he was charged; and Zosimus wrote to the African Bishops, first to ask them to reconsider their water, and secondly to pronounce Pelagius and Celestius innocent and acquitted. But the Bishops ultimately proved to the Pope that he had been deceived, and he summoned Celestius to appear before him and renounce in plainer and more decisive terms the errors with which he was accused; but instead of coming he ran away from Rome, and Zosimus then confirmed the sentence of his predecessor.

Zwingli, Ulrich, the celebrated Swiss Reformer, was born in 1484, at Wildhaus, in St. Gall; died in 1531. He was educated at Basle, Berne, and Vienna, where he studied philosophy, and then returned to Basle to study theology under Thomas Wytenbach. He was ordained priest in 1506, and was appointed pastor of Glarus. Here he stayed for ten years and learned Greek, studied the Scriptures in the Hebrew and Greek text and the early Fathers, also the writings of Wycliffe, John Huss, etc. He seems early to have realised the many abuses of the Church, and in his sermons always avoided the subjects of the invocation of saints, images, pilgrimages, etc. At that time many of the Swiss people were hired out to foreign countries as mercenaries, and Zwingli attended as chaplain when they fought with the Italians against the French. On his return to Switzerland he remonstrated with the Government against the practice. In 1516 he was invited as preacher in the monastery of Einsiedeln, famous for its pilgrimages. Here he stayed for nearly three years, preaching more freely than at Glarus against indulgences and other abuses, and calling on the Bishops of Constance and Sitten to reform them. In 1518, Luther, of whom Zwingli had never heard, affixed his theses against indulgences against the doors of the Wittenberg church. Bernardin Samson, a Franciscan friar, commissioned to sell indulgences in Switzerland, appeared in Einsiedeln. He told the people that not only would the indulgences remit the guilt of past sins, but would procure also an immunity for future sins that they might commit. He was opposed by Zwingli, who refused him admittance to the Abbey, and preached to those assembled against the glaring abuses made of indulgences. The Reformer was upheld by Faber, Vicar of the Bishop of Constance, who forbade Samson to sell indulgences within the diocese.

Meantime he had been invited to become preacher in the cathedral of Zurich, a post which he accepted on the condition that he might preach the pure Gospel. He preached his first sermon on January 1st, 1519, and, a few months after, Samson, arriving at the gates, found his old enemy there and was refused admittance. Having successfully preached against indulgences, Zwingli now turned his attention to other matters, as—the number of external forms in worship, the need of clear religious instruction and of services in the vernacular tongue, etc. He corresponded on the subject with Capito, Ecolampadius, Bullinger, Wytenbach, Haller, etc., and in 1522 the first steps towards the Reformation in Switzerland were made. The Bishop of Constance and the monks accused Zwingli of sedition and impiety, so, in 1522, he wrote a defence called Apologeticus Architeles. In January, 1523, the Legislative Council of Zurich called together a conference at the town-hall, to which were invited all the ecclesiastics of the canton. Sixty-seven Articles of Faith were discussed, as—Papal authority, celibacy of the clergy, auricular confession, purgatory. All these, which are the chief subjects in which the Swiss Reformers differed from the Roman Church, were declared by Zwingli to be contrary to the teaching of the Bible. His chief opponent was John Faber, afterwards Bishop of Ravenna. Six hundred clergy and laity were present, who decided that "Zwingli having neither been convicted of heresy nor refuted, should continue to preach the Gospel as before; that the pastors of the town and territory of Zurich should ground their discourses on the words of Scripture alone, and that both parties should avoid all personal reflections and recriminations." Thus the old religion remained for the present unchanged; but some of Zwingli's followers, in their zeal, destroyed a crucifix which stood at one of the gates of Zurich. Zwingli was blamed for it, and returned answer that they had committed violence, but had done no sacrilege, as images ought not to be worshipped. This led to a second conference, held in October, 1523, in which Zwingli, before 900 people, maintained that the worship of images was unauthorised, and that the Mass ought not to be retained. He was again victorious, and early in 1524 all pictures and statues were removed from the churches. In the same year Zwingli married, a full year before Martin Luther.

Early in 1525 Mass was finally abolished, and the Lord's Supper was celebrated in the same manner as it is still in the Reformed French and Swiss Churches. A new Liturgy was drawn up, and the monasteries and nunneries were destroyed. Thus Zurich was the first reformed Swiss canton. It was soon joined by Schaffhausen, Berne, and Basle, and half of St. Gall and Appenzell. In 1524 the first controversy broke out between the German and Swiss Reformers, who agreed on many points, but differed on the subject of the Eucharist, Luther maintaining the doctrine of the Real Presence, while Zwingli held that the outward symbols undergo no supernatural change in the Eucharist. At this time also Anabaptism found its way into Switzerland, and fanatics not only destroyed the altars and images, but parodied the Sacraments. Zwingli had many conferences with the leaders, in which he defended Infant Baptism, and urged them to discontinue the insurrections and disturbances which they created, but made no effect till the Government took the matter up, and used the more powerful weapons of imprisonment and exile. In 1526 the Bishops of Basle, Constance, and Lausanne called a general meeting of all the cantons to Baden to consider the new doctrines. Zwingli was not allowed to attend, but was represented by John Ecolampadius. The majority of the meeting being Roman Catholics, a decree was passed declaring Zwingli to be a heretic, and excommunicating him and his followers. However, the Reformed cantons refused to accept the decree, and a Council was called at Berne in 1528. The greater part of the Roman Catholics refused to attend, saying the matter was already settled, and the Reformers being thus in a majority, gained an advantage over their opponents, the important canton of Berne publicly embracing the Reformation. In September, 1529, the Saxon and Swiss Reformers met at Marburg through Philip, Landgrave of Hesse. The conference lasted for three days, but no progress was made towards a union. In 1531 open war broke out between the Evangelical cantons, with Zurich at their head, and the Catholic cantons of Uri, Schwytz, Unterwalden, Zug, and Lucerne. They met at Cappel on Oct. 11th, and after a fierce struggle the Reformers were beaten, and Zwingli was killed. He was wounded by a stone, and a Catholic of Unterwalden, without knowing him, exhorted him to see a priest and call upon the saints, and when he refused beat him to death with axes, calling him an obstinate heretic. His last words were: "They can kill the body but not the soul." Zwingli's chief works were: Exposition of the Christian Faith, Of the True and False Religion, On Baptism, On Re-baptism, and On Infant Baptism, written against the Anabaptists; and several works on the Eucharist, written during his controversy with Luther.

Zwingli's followers are called Zwinglians, or sometimes Sacramentarians, but they themselves assumed the name of Evangelicals. They did not at first form themselves into one Church, spiritual matters being left entirely to the pastors; but at last the want of a common bond was felt, and a Confession of Faith, drawn up by Bullinger, was accepted by all the Reformed cantons. This is known as the Helvetic Confession [q.v.], and was signed also by Knox and other Scotch ministers, the Church of the Palatinate, and those of Poland and Hungary. The Zwinglians have sometimes been called Calvinists, but, though they hold nearly the same doctrines, Calvin was not their founder, as the Reformation had been established before his time. The distinctive doctrine commonly connected with his name is the assertion that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper is a memorial only, and the denial in all forms of the doctrine of the Real Presence.
